the women of ATHENS? the people hearing his wordes, filled all the Theater with ioy and clapping of hands. The ſame Ladye, when a certen gentlewoman of IONIA came to ATHENS to ſee her, and ſhewed her all her rich iewels and pretious ſtones ſhe had: ſhe anſwered her againe, all my riches and iewels, is my husband Phocion, who theſe twentie years together hath continually bene choſen generall for the ATHENIANS. Phocions ſonne telling his father on a time, that he was deſirous to contend with other young men for the victorie, who ſhould cunninglieſt leape out, and get vp againe into the charets or coches, running full courſe at the feaſts Panathenæa at ATHENS: his father was contented he ſhould, not that he was deſirous his ſonne ſhould haue the honor of the victorie, but becauſe by this honeſt exerciſe he ſhould grow to better manner, for that he was a diſſolute young man, and much giuen to wine. Yet he wanne the victorie at that time, and there were diuerſe of his fathers friends, that prayed him to doe them that honor, that they might keepe the feaſte of this victorie in their houſes. Phocion denied them all, but one man, and him he ſuffred to ſhew his good will vnto his houſe and went thither himſelfe to ſupper to him. Where amongeſt many fine and ſuperfluous things prepared, he found paſſing bathes of wine and ſweet ſmelling ſpices to waſh the feete of the bidden gueſts as they came to the feaſt. Whereupon he called his ſon to him, and asked him, how canſt thou abide Phocus, that our friend ſhould thus diſgrace thy victorie with exceſſe? but becauſe he would withdraw his ſonne from that licentious life, he brought him to SPARTA, and placed him there among young boyes brought vp after the LACONIAN diſcipline. The ATHENIANS were much offended at it, to ſee that Phocion did ſo much deſpiſe his owne countrie maner and faſhions. Alſo when Demades the orator one day ſayd vnto Phocion: why do we not perſwade the ATHENIANS to liue after the LACONIAN manner? As for me (ſayd he if thou wilt make one to ſet it forward: I am ready to be the firſt man to moue the matter. Indeed ꝙ Phocion, thou art a meet man to perſwade the ATHENIANS to liue LACONIAN like, in cōmon together at their meales, & to praiſe Lycurgus ſtrait law: that art thy ſelf cōmonly ſo perfumed, & fine in thy apparel. Another time when Alexāder writ letters vnto ATHENS to ſend him ſome ſhips, and that the Orators perſwaded them not to grant him, the people called vpon Phocion chiefly to ſay his opinion: then Phociō told thē plainly, me thinks ye muſt either make your ſelues the ſtrongeſt in warres, or being the weaker, procure to be friends vnto the ſtronger. Pythias a new come orator, being full of tongue, and impudent, would ſtill make one to ſpeake in euery matter: Wherefore Phocion ſayed to him, good gods, will this noueſſe neuer leaue babling? And when Harpalus king Alexanders Lieutenant of the prouince of BABYLON, fled out of ASIA, and came to ATTICA with a great ſumme of gold and ſiluer: ſtraight theſe men that ſolde their tongues to the people for money, flocked about him like a ſight of ſwallowes. And he ſtuck not to giue euery one of them a peece of money to baſt them with: for it was a trifle to him, conſidering the great ſummes of money he brought. But to Phocion himſelfe, he ſent vnto him ſeuen hundreth talents, and offered himſelfe and all that he had into his hands of truſt. But Phocion gaue him a ſharpe anſwer, and tolde him, that he would make him repent it, if he corrupted the citie of ATHENS in that manner. So Harpalus being amated therewith, left him at that time, and went vnto them that had taken money of him. But ſhortly after, when the ATHENIANS ſate in councell about him, he perceiued that thoſe which had taken his money were ſhrunk from him, and that they did accuſe him, where they ſhould haue excuſed him, to bleere the world, that men ſhould not ſuſpect them they had bene corrupted: and that Phocion on the other ſide which had refuſed his money, hauing reſpect to the cōmon wealth, had alſo ſome regard to ſaue his life: he once more attempted all the waies he could to win him. Howbeit he found him ſo conſtant, that no money could carie the man. Then Harpalus falling in friendſhip with Chariles (Phocions ſonne in lawe) he made him to be ill ſpoken of, and greatly ſuſpected, becauſe men ſaw that he truſted him in all things, and imployed him in all his affaires. As in committing to his truſt the making of a ſumptuous tombe for Pythonicè, the famous Curtiſan that was dead, whom he loued, and by whom he had a daughter: the taking vpon him whereof was no leſſe ſhame vnto Chariles, then the finiſhing thereof was diſgrace vnto him. This tombe is ſene vnto this day in a place called Hermium, in the high way from ATHENS to ELEVSIN: the workmanſhip thereof being nothing like neare the charge of thirtie talents, which was reported to be giuen by Harpalus vnto Chariles, for the finiſhing of the ſame. Furthermore after Harpalus death, Chariles and Phocion tooke his daughter, and carefully brought her vp. Afterwards alſo, Chariles being accuſed for the money he had taken of Harpalus, he beſought his father in law Phociō, to help to eaſe him in his iudgment. But Phocion flatly denied him, and ſaid: Chariles I took thee for my ſonne in law, in al honeſt and iuſt cauſes only. Furthermore, when Aſclepiades the ſon of Hipparchus, brought the firſt newes of the death of king Alexander, Demades the Orator would not beleue him: for ſaid he, if it were true, all the earth would ſmell of the ſauor of his corſe, Phocion then perceiuing the people began to be high minded, and ſought innouation: he went about to bridle and pacifie them. But when many of the Orators got vp to the pulpit for orations, and cryed out that Aſclepiades newes was true of Alexanders death: well then quoth Phocion, if it be true to day, it ſhalbe true alſo to morrow, and the next day after. And therfore my Maiſters, be not too haſty, but thinke of it at better leiſure, and ſet your affayres at a ſure ſtay. When Leoſthenes alſo by his practiſe had brought the citie of ATHENS into the warre called the GREEKES warre, and in skorne asked Phocion that was offended at it, what good he had done vnto the common wealth ſoe many yeares together, as he had bene generall ouer the ATHENIANS: Phocion aunſwered him, no ſmall good ſayed he, for all my countrye men haue bene buryed at home in their owne graues. Another time alſo, Leoſthenes ſpeaking proudly and inſolently vnto the people, Phocion one daye ſayed vnto him: young man my friende, thy wordes are lyke vnto a Cypreſſe tree, which is high and greate, but beareth no fruite. Then Hyperides riſing vppe, asked Phocion: when wilt thou then counſell the ATHENIANS to make warre? when I ſhall ſee young men ſayed he not to forſake theirranckes, rich men liberall, and Orators leaue to robbe the common wealth. When the ATHENIANS wondred to ſee ſuch a goodly greate armie as Leoſthenes had leauied: and that they asked Phocion how he lyked it: A goodly armie, quoth he, for a furlong, but I feare their returne, and the continuance of this warre: for I doe not ſee the citie able to make any more money, nor more ſhippes, neither yet any more ſouldiers than theſe. The which proued true, as it fell out afterwardes: for at the firſt, Leoſthenes did many notable exploytes. He ouercame the BOEOTIANS in battell, and draue Antipater into the citie of LAMIA: the which did put the ATHENIANS in ſuch a hope and iolitie, that they made continuall feaſtes and ſacrifices through the citie to thanke the goddes for theſe good newes. And there were ſome among them, that to take Phocion in a trippe, asked him if he did not wiſh that he had done all thoſe things? yes indeed anſwered he, I would I had done them, but yet I would not haue giuen the counſell to haue done them. Another time alſo when letters came daily, one after another, bringing good newes, good gods, ſayd he, when ſhall we leaue off to ouercome? When Leoſthenes was dead in this voyage, they that feared Phocion ſhoulde be appoynted Captaine in his place, and that he would pacifie the warre: did thruſt in a man of meane hauior, and vnknowen, that ſayed in the aſſembly, that he was Phocions friend, and ſchoolefellowe, and therefore beſought the people that they would ſpare Phocion, becauſe they had not ſuch another man as he, and that they would make Antiphilus Generall of their armie. The people were contented withall. But then Phocion ſtoode vppe, and ſayed, that this man was neuer ſcholler with him, neither did he euer knowe him before that time: but nowe ſayed he, from henceforth I will take thee for my friend, for thou haſt giuen the people the beſt counſell for mee. The people notwithſtanding determining to make warre with the BOEOTIANS, Phocion ſpake againſt it all he coulde, Thereupon his friendes bidding him beware of ſuch ſpeeches, howe he did offende the people, leaſt they killled him: he anſwered them, they ſhall wrongfully put me to death quoth he, ſpeaking for the benefitte of my countrie, but otherwiſe they ſhall haue reaſon for to doe it, if I ſpeake to the contrarie. But when he ſawe nothing would pacifie them, and that they went on ſtill with their intent: then he commaunded the Herauld to proclayme by ſound of trumpet, that all Citizens from fourete̔ene yeeres vnto threeſcore, able to carrie weapon, ſhould preſently vpon breaking vp of the aſſembly, arme themſelues, and follow him with fiue dayes prouiſion for victuals. Then was there great ſturre amongſt them in the citie, and the olde men came and complained vnto him, for his ouer ſtraight commandement. He told them againe, I doe you no wrong: for I am foure ſcore my ſelfe, and yet will goe with you. By this meanes he pacified them at that time, and quenched their fonde deſire of warre. But when all the ſea coaſt was full of ſouldiers, both of the MACEDONIANS, and other ſtrangers which were led by Micion their Captaine, that landed in the territorie of the village RHAMNVS, and ſpoyled the countrie thereabouts: then Phocion led the ATHENIANS thither. But when he was there, diuers taking vpon them the office of a Lieutenant, & going about to counſell him, ſome to lodge his camp vpon ſuch a hill, & others to ſend his horſmen to ſuch a place, and others to campe heere: O Hercules ꝙ he, how many Captains do I ſee, and how few ſouldiers? Afterwards when he had ſet his footmẽ in battel ray, there was one among them that left his ranck, & ſtepped out before them al. Therupon one of his enemies alſo made towards him to fight with him: but the ATHENIANS hart failed him, and he went backe again to his place. Then ſaid Phocion vnto him: art thou not aſhamed yong lout to haue forſaken thy ranck twiſe? the one, where thy captain had placed thee, & the other in the which thou haddeſt placed thy ſelf? So Phocion giuing charge vpon the enemies, he ouerthrew them, and ſlue Micion their Captain, with diuers others.

Furthermore, the army of the GRECIANS being at that time in THESSALY, wan a battell of Antipater, & Leonatus, that ioyned with him with the MACEDONIANS which he had brought out of ASIA: where Leonatus was ſlaine in the field, Antiphilus being generall of the footmen, & Menon THESSALIAN, Collonell of the horſmen. Shortly after Craterus cõming out of ASIA into EVROPE with a great armie, they fought a battell by the citie of CRANON, where the GRECIANS were ouerthrowen: yet was not the ouerthrow nor ſlaughter great, although it came through the diſobedience of the ſouldiers to their captains, which were but yong men & vſed them ouer gently.

Moreouer, when Antipater practiſed to make the cities reuolt, they betrayed them, and ſhamefully forſooke to defend their cõmon libertie: whereupon Antipater marched forthwith with his armie, to the citie of ATHENS. Demoſthenes & Hyperides vnderſtanding that, forſook the citie. Then Demades, that was in diſgrace & defamed for lack of payment of ſuch fines as were ſet vpon his head (being 7 ſeuerall times condemned, becauſe he had ſo many times moued matters contrary to the law) & could not therfore be ſuffered any more to ſpeake in the aſſembly, was then diſpenced withall, & licenſed to ſpeake: whereupon he moued the people to ſend ambaſſadors vnto Antipater, with ful cõmiſſion & authoritie to treate with him of peace. The people fearing to put to any mans truſt this abſolute authoritie to treat of peace: they called for Phocion, ſaying that he only was to be truſted with the ambaſſade. Thẽ Phocion anſwered them: if you had beleued my former coũcels I alwaies gaue you, ſuch weighty matters ſhould not now haue trobled you at all. So the decree being confirmed by the people, Phocion was ſent ambaſſador vnto Antipater, that lay at the caſtle of Cadmea, being ready at that time to inuade the coũtry of ATTICA.

Phocion firſt requeſted him, that before he remoued from thence, he would make peace with the ATHENIANS Craterus preſently anſwered him: Phocion, thy requeſt is vnreaſonable, that lying here we ſhould eate out our frends, & deſtroy their country: when we may liue of our enemies, & enrich our ſelues with their ſpoile. But Antipater taking Craterus by the hand, told him: we muſt needs doe Phocion this pleaſure. And for the reſt, touching the capitulations of peace, he willed that the ATHENIANS ſhould ſend them a blanck, & refer the conditions of peace to them: like as himſelf being beſieged in the citie LAMIA, had referred all capitulations and articles of peace, vnto the diſcretion of Leoſthenes their generall. So when Phocion was come backe to ATHENS, the ATHENIANS ſeing there was no remedie, were compelled to be contented with ſuch offer of peace, as the enemie made thẽ. Then Phocion was ſent back again to Antipater at THEBES, with other ambaſſadors ioyned in commiſſion with him: amongſt whom alſo was that famous Philoſopher Xenocrates? The eſtimatiõ of his vertue was ſo great with all men, that it was thought there was no liuing mã ſo proud, cruell, diſdainfull, nor haſty of nature, but that the onely looke of Xenocrates would ſoften and qualifie him, and make him to reuerence him: but yet with Antipater it fell out contrary, by his peruerſe nature, which hated all vertue: for he embraced all the reſt, and would not once ſalute Xenocrates. Whereupon, ſome ſay, that Xenocrates ſaid then, Antipater doth well to be aſhamed, to ſee me a witnes of the diſcourteſie and euill he meaneth vnto the ATHENIANS. So when Xenocrates beganne to ſpeake, Antipater would not abide to heare him, but interrupted him, and checked him, and in the end commaunded him to holde his peace. When Phocion had ſpoken, Antipater anſwered them, that he would make peace with the ATHENIANS, ſo they deliuered him Demoſthenes and Hyperides: that they ſhould keep their ancient lawes and gouernment, that they ſhould receiue a garriſon into the hauen of Munychia, that they ſhould defraye the charges of this warre, and alſo pay a ranſome beſides. All the other Ambaſſadours but Xenocrates, willingly accepted theſe conditions of peace, as very reaſonable and fauorable: but he ſayed that for ſlaues, Antipater did handle them fauourably, but for free men, he dealt too hardly with them. Then Phocion beſought him that he woulde yet releaſe them of their garriſon. But Antipater (as it is ſayed) anſwered him: Phocion, we would gladly graunt thee any thing, ſauing that which ſhould vndoe thee, and vs both. Some other write notwithſtanding, that Antipater ſayed not ſo, but asked him, if he would become ſuertie for the ATHENIANS, that they ſhould attempt no alteration, but faithfully keepe the articles and conditions of this peace, if he did releaſe them of this garriſon. Phocion then holding his peace, & delaying anſwer, there was one Callimedon ſurnamed Carabos, (a bold man, and hated the libertie of the people) that brake forth in theſe wordes: if Phocion were ſo fonde to giue his word for the ATHENIANS, wouldeſt thou Antipater beleue him therefore, and leaue to doe that thou haſt determined? Thus were the ATHENIANS, driuen to receiue the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS of the which Menillus was Captaine, an honeſt man, and Phocions friend. This commandement to receiue the garriſon within the hauen of Munychia, was found very ſtately, and done by Antipater rather of a vaine glorie to boaſt of his power: then for any profit could otherwiſe come of it. For not long after, on that day when he tooke poſſeſſiõ of the caſtle, he further increaſed their griefe: becauſe the garriſon entred the twentith day of Bœdromion (to wit, the month of Auguſt) on the which the feaſt day of their miſteries was celebrated, at what time they make their proceſſion called Iacchus, from the citie of ATHENS, vnto ELEVSIN. Therfore the ſolemnitie of this holy feaſt being thus confuſed, many began to conſider, that in old time when their realme did flouriſh, there were heard and ſene voices and images of the gods on that day, which made the enemies both afraied, and amazed: and nowe in contrary manner in the very ſelfe ſame ſolemnitie of the goddes, they ſaw the greateſt calamitie that could haue happened vnto GRECE. And the holieſt feaſt which was kept all the yere through before, became then too prophaned with the title of the greateſt miſfortune and euent, that euer happened vnto the GRECIANS, which was, the loſſe of their libertie. For, not many yeres before, there was brought an Oracle from DODONE vnto ATHENS: that they ſhould looke well to the rockes of Diana, that ſtraungers ſhoulde not poſſeſſe them. And about that time alſo the couerings with the which they doe adorne the holy beddes of the myſteries, being wette with water, became from a purple colour which they had before, to looke yealowe and pale, as if it had bene the couering of a dead bodie. Yea, and that which was moſt to be wondred at of all other, was this: that taking other couerings which were not holy, and putting them in the ſame water, they did without changing keepe their colour they had before. When one of the miniſters of the temple alſo did waſh a white pig in the ſea in a cleane place, by the wharfe: there ſodainly came a great fiſh that bytte at it, and caried the hinder partes of the pigge cleane away with it. Whereby men coniectured that the goddes did ſignifie vnto them, that they ſhoulde loſe the loweſt part of their cittie, neareſt vnto the ſea, and ſhould keepe the higheſt partes thereof. This notwithſtanding, the garriſon did not offend nor trouble the ATHENIANS, becauſe of the honeſtie of their Captaine Menillus. Now there were aboue 12000 Citizens, that for their pouertie loſt the benefit of their freedome of the which, part of them remained at ATHENS, vnto whom it ſeemed that they offered great wrong and iniurie: and parte of them alſo went into THRACIA, where Antipater aſſigned them townes and landes to inhabit. They ſeemed to be menne like vnto them, that had bene taken by aſſaulte, or by ſeege within a citie, which had bene compelled to forſake their countrie. Furthermore, the ſhamefull death of Demoſthenes in the Ile of CALAVRIA, and of HY-

PERIDES, by the citie of CLEONES, (whereof we haue written heretofore) were almoſt occaſion giuen them to lament the times of the raigne of king Philip and Alexander. As it is reported that when Antigonus was ſlaine, they that had ouercome him, were ſo cruell vnto their ſubiects: that a laborer in the countrie of PHRYGIA digging the earth, being asked what he ſought for, anſwered ſighing: I ſeeke for Antigonus. Then many men beganne to ſay as much, when they remembred the noble mindes of thoſe two Princes, how mercifull they were to pardon in their anger, forgetting their diſpleaſure: not like vnto Antipater, who craftily cloaked his tyrannicall power, which he vſurped, by being familiar, going ſimply apparelled, and faring meanely: and yet ſhewed himſelfe notwithſtanding a more cruell Lorde and tirant vnto them whom he had ouercome. Neuertheleſſe Phocion obtained of him the reſtoring againe of diuerſe men, whom he had baniſhed: and thoſe whom he could not get to be reſtored, yet he procured that they ſhould not be baniſhed into ſo farre countries, as others which had bene ſent beyond the Mountaines Acroceraunians, and the head of Tænarus out of GRECE, but that they had libertie to remaine within the countrie of PELOPONNESVS: among the which was one Agnonides a Sycophant, and falſe accuſer. Furthermore, he gouerned them that remained in ATHENS with great iuſtice and lenitie, and ſuch as he knew to be good men and quiet, them he alwayes preferred to ſome office: but ſuch as he ſawe were fantaſticall people, and deſirous of change, he kept them from office, and tooke all occaſion from them, ſo that they vaniſhed away of themſelues, and learned in time to loue the countrie, and to followe tillage. When he ſawe Xenocrates alſo paye a certen penſion or tribute to the common wealth, which all ſtrangers dwelling in ATHENS did vſe yearely to paye: he would haue made him a freeman, and offered to put his name amongſt the number of free Cittizens. But Xenocrates refuſed it, ſaying he would haue no part of that freedom, for the hinderance whereof, he had bene ſent Ambaſſador. And when Menyllus had ſent Phocion money, he made him anſwer: that Menyllus was no greater Lord then Alexander had bene, neither had he at that time any greater occaſion to receiue his preſent, then when he had refuſed King Alexanders gifte. Menyllus replying againe, ſayd that if he had no neede of it for himſelfe, yet he might let his ſone Phocus haue it. But Phocion anſwered: if my ſonne Phocus will leaue his naughtie life, and become an honeſt man, that which I will leaue him, ſhall ſerue his turne very well: but if it be ſo that he will ſtill holde on the courſe he hath taken, there is no riches then that can ſuffice him. Another time alſo he anſwered Antipater more roundly, when he would haue had him done an vnhoneſt thing: Antipater, ſayed he, cannot haue me to be his friend, and flatterer both. Antipater, ſelfe was wont to ſaye, that he had two friendes at ATHENS, Phocion and Demades: of the which he could neuer make the one to take any thing of him, and the other, he could neuer ſatiſfie him. And truly Phocions pouertie was a great glorie vnto his vertue, ſithence he was growen olde, continuing in the ſame, after he had bene ſo many times generall of the ATHENIANS, and had receiued ſuch friendſhip and courteſie of ſo many Kings and Princes. Where Demades to the contrarie delighted to ſhew his riches, in things that were contrarie to the lawes of the citie. For, a decree being made at ATHENS, commaunding that no ſtranger, vpon forfeiture of a thouſand Drachmas to be payed by the defrayer of the daunces of the citie, ſhould be any of the Dauncers that Daunced at any common plaies or ſportes: Demades one day making certen games and ſportes at his owne charges, brought a hundreth Dauncers of ſtrangers at one time, and withall, brought alſo a hundreth thouſand Drachmas to pay the forfeyture thereof. Another time, when he married his ſonne Demas, he ſayed vnto him: ſonne, when I married thy mother there was no ſmall roſte, that my next neighbour knewe not of it: where nowe at thy mariage, Kings and Princes are at the charge of the feaſt. Furthermore, when the ATHENIANS were importunate with Phocion to goe vnto Antipater, to intreat him to take his garriſon out of their citie: he ſtil refuſed the ambaſſade either becauſe he had no hope to obtaine it, or for that he ſaw the people more obedient vnto reaſon, for feare of the garriſon. Howbeit, he obtained of Antipater, that he ſhould not be too haſtye in the demaunding of his money, but ſhoulde deferre it vntill a further time. So the ATHENIANS perceiuing they could do no good with Phocion, they intreated Demades, who willingly tooke

the matter vpon him, and went with his ſonne into MACEDON, whither doubtleſſe his deſtinie caried him to his vtter deſtruction, euen at that very time when Antipater was fallen ſicke of a diſeaſe whereof he dyed: whereby the affaires of the Realme went through the hands of Caſſander his ſonne, who had intercepted a letter of this Demades, which he had ſent vnto Antigonus in ASIA, willing him to come in all poſſible ſpeede to win GRECE and MACEDON, which hung but of an old rottē threed, mocking Antipater in this maner. Wherfore Caſſander being aduertiſed of his arriuall, he made him preſently to be apprehended, & ſetting his ſonne hard by him, ſlew him before his father, ſo neere him, that the bloud of his ſonne ſprang vpon him: ſo that the father was all bloudied with the murther of his ſonne. Then Caſſander caſting in Demades teeth his ingratitude, and trecherous treaſon againſt his father, giuing him all the reproachfull words he could deuiſe: at the length he ſlew him with his own hands. Now Antipater before his death, had eſtabliſhed Polyperchon Generall of the army of the MACEDONIANS, & Caſſander his ſonne only Colonell of a thouſand footemen. He notwithſtanding, after his fathers deceaſe, taking vpon him the gouernment of the realme: ſent Nicanor with ſpeede to ſucceede Menillus in the Captaineſhip of the garriſon of ATHENS, before his death ſhould be reuealed, commaunding him firſt in any caſe, to take the caſtle of Munychia, which hee did. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS vnderſtanding of the death of Antipater, they accuſed Phocion for that he had knowen of his death long before, and yet kept it ſecret to pleaſe Nicanor. But Phocion regarded not this accuſation, but fell in acquaintance notwithſtanding with Nicanor: whō he handled ſo wiſely, that he made him not only friendly vnto the ATHENIANS but furthermore perſwaded him to be at ſome charge to giue the people the paſtime of common playes, which he made to be done at his coſt. In the meane time, Polyperchon, who had the gouernment of the kings perſon, meaning to giue Caſſander a ſlampant and blurt, he ſent letters pattentes vnto the people at ATHENS, declaring how the young king did reſtore vnto them their popular ſtate againe, and commaunded that all the ATHENIANS ſhould vſe their former ancient lawes of their citie. This was a wile and crafty fetch againſt Phocion. For Polyperchon deuiſing this practiſe to get the city of ATHENS into his hands (as it fell out afterwards by proofe) had no hope to obtaine his purpoſe, vnleſſe he found meanes firſt to baniſh Phocion: and thought that he ſhould eaſily bring that to paſſe, when ſuch as had before beene put off their freedome, by his meanes, ſhould come againe to haue voices in the aſſembly, & that the ſeditious Orators and accuſers might be turned at liberty againe, to ſay what they would. The ATHENIANS hauing heard the contentes of theſe letters pattentes, beganne to be ſomewhat quickned and moued withall: whereupon Nicanor deſiring to ſpeake with the ATHENIANS in their Senate, which was aſſembled in the hauen of Piræa: he went and hazarded his perſon amongſt them, vpon Phocions faith and word. Dercyllus Captaine for the king, being ſecretly aduertiſed thereof, and in the field, not farre from the citie, did what he could to take Nicanor: but Nicanor hauing warning of it in time, ſaued himſelfe. Then it appeared, that Nicanor would preſently be reuenged of the citie, and they accuſed Phocion becauſe he kept him not, but did let him goe. Whereunto he anſwered: that he truſted Nicanors worde, and that he did not thinke he would offer the citie any hurt, but if it ſhould fal out otherwiſe, he had rather the world ſhould knowe, that he had the wrong offred him, then that he ſhould offer any. This truely appeared to be nobly ſpoken, in reſpect of himſelfe. But conſidering that he being then Generall, did thereby hazard the ſafetie of his countrie: I can not tell whether he did not breake a greater faith which he ought to haue had to the ſafetie of his countriemen. Neither could he alſo alleage for his excuſe, that hee did not lay handes on Nicanor, for feare to bring the citie into manifeſt warre: but that for a colour he did preferre the faith which he had ſworne and promiſed vnto him, and the iuſtice that he would obſerue in his behalfe: that for his ſake, Nicanor ſhould afterwardes keepe himſelfe in peace, and doe no hurt to the ATHENIANS. Howbeit in truth it ſeemed, that nothing deceiued Phocion: but by the other truſt hee had in this Nicanor. The which ſeemeth to be ſo, becauſe when diuers came to him to complaine of Nicanor, that he ſought all the ſecret meanes he could to ſurpriſe the hauen of Piræa, and that he daily paſſed ouer ſouldiers in the Ile of SALAMINA, and practiſed to bribe certaine of the inhabitants within the precinct of the hauen: he would neuer heare of it, and much leſſe beleeue it. Furthermore, when Philomedes LAMBRIAN made a motion, that the ATHENIANS ſhould prepare to be in readines to waite vpon their Captaine Phocion, to do as he commaunded them: he made no account of it, vntill he ſaw Nicanor come out with his ſouldiers from the fort of Munychia, and that he beganne to caſt trenches to compaſſe in the hauen of Piræa. But then, when Phocion thought to lead out the people to preuent him: he found they mutined againſt him, and no man would obey his commandement. In the meane time, Alexander the ſonne of Polyperchon came with an armie, pretending to aide them of the citie againſt Nicanor, where in deede he ment (if he could) to get the reſt of the citie into his hands, then ſpecially, when they were in greateſt broile one againſt an other, and the rather, becauſe the baniſhed men entred hand ouer head with him, and diuerſe ſtraungers alſo, and other defamed men: ſo that there was a confuſed councell and aſſembly of Omnigatherum kept within the citie, without any order, in the which Phocion was depriued of his office of Generall, and others were alſo choſen Captaines in his place. And had they not ſeene this Alexander talking alone with Nicanor, and returning many times hard to the walles of the citie, which made the ATHENIANS affraid and miſtruſtfull: they had neuer ſaued it from taking. At that time Phocion was preſently accuſed of treaſon by the Orator Agnonides: the which Callimedon and Pericles fearing got them out of the citie betimes. And Phocion alſo with his friendes that were not fled, went vnto Polyperchon: with whom alſo Solon PLATÆIAN, and Dinarchus CORINTHIAN, went for company, who thought to haue found friendſhip and familiarity with Polyperchon. Howbeit Dinarchus falling ſicke by the way, in the citie of ELATIA, they ſtayed there many daies, hoping of his recouerie. But in the meane time, the people at the perſwaſion of the Orator Agnonides, and at the requeſt of Archeſtratus, ſtabliſhed a decree, to ſende Ambaſſadors vnto Polyperchon, to accuſe Phocion: inſomuch as both parties met at one ſelfe time, & found him in the field with the king about a village of the country of PHOCIDE, called PHARYGÆS, ſtanding at the foote of the mountaine Acrorion, which they ſurname alſo Galaten. There Polyperchon commaunded a cloth of gold to be ſet vp, and cauſed the king to be ſet vnder the ſame, and all his chiefeſt friends about him. But to beginne withall, he made Dinarchus to be taken, and commaunded them to put him to death after they had racked him: then he willed the ATHENIANS to tell what they had to ſay. Then they beganne to quarrell, and to be loud one with an other, accuſing one an other in the preſence of the king and his councell: vntill Agnonides at length ſtepped forth, and ſaid: my Lords of MACEDON, put vs all in priſon, and then ſende vs bound handes and feete to ATHENS, to giue account of our doings. The king laughed to heare him ſay ſo. But the noble men of MACEDON that were preſent then, and diuerſe ſtrangers beſides to heare their complaints: made ſigne to the Ambaſſadors to vtter their accuſations before the king, rather then to referre them to the hearing of the people at ATHENS. Howbeit both parties had not alike indifferent hearing: for Polyperchon checked vp Phocion oftentimes, and did ſtill cut off his tale, as he thought to purge him ſelfe: inſomuch as in anger, he beat his ſtaffe he had in his hand againſt the ground, and commaunded him at length to hold his peace, & to get him thence. And when Hegemon alſo told Polyperchon, that he himſelfe could beſt witneſſe, how Phocion had alwaies faithfully ſerued and loued the people: he angrily aunſwered him, come not hither to lie falſly vpon me, in the preſence of the king. Therewith the king roſe out of his ſeate, and tooke a ſpeare in his hand, thinking to haue killed Hegemon: had not Polyperchon ſodainly embraced him behind, and ſtayed him. So the councell roſe, and brake vp, but preſently Phocion was apprehended, and they that ſtood by him. Certaine of his friendes ſeeing that, which ſtood further off, muffeled their faces, and ſtraight conueyed themſelues away. The reſt were ſent priſoners to ATHENS by Clitus, not ſo much to haue their cauſes heard there, as to haue them executed for condemned men. Furthermore, the manner of the carying of them to ATHENS was ſhamefull. For they were caried vpon cartes through the great ſtreete Ceramicum, vnto the Theater: where Clitus kept them, vntill the Senate had aſſembled the people, excepting no bondman, no ſtraunger, nor defamed perſon out of this aſſembly, but left the Theater wide open to all comers in whatſoeuer they were, and the pulpit for Orations free for euery man that would ſpeake againſt them. So firſt of all, the kings letters were read openly, by the which he did aduertiſe the people, that he had found theſe offendors conuicted of treaſon: notwithſtanding, that he referred the ſentence of their condemnation vnto them, for that they were free men. Then Clitus brought his priſoners before the people, where the noble men when they ſaw Phocion, were aſhamed, and hiding their faces, wept to ſee him. Howbeit, there was one that roſe vp and ſaide: my Lordes ſith the king referreth the iudgement of ſo great perſons vnto the people, it were great reaſon all the bondmen and ſtrangers which are no free citizens of ATHENS; ſhould be taken out of this aſſembly. The people would not agree to it, but cried out, that ſuch traitors ſhould be ſtoned to death, that fauour the authority of a few, and are enemies of the people: whereupon ſilence was made, and no man durſt ſpeake any more for Phocion. Neuertheleſſe when Phocion with much a doe had obtained audience, hee asked them: my Lordes, will ye iuſtly or wrongfully put vs to death? Some anſwered him: iuſtly. How then can ye do it, quoth he, that will not heare our iuſtifications? Yet could they not be heard for all this. Then Phocion comming neerer, ſaide vnto them. For my ſelfe, my Lordes, I confeſſe I haue done you wrong, & haue in gouernment committed faults deſeruing death: but for theſe priſoners with mee, what haue they done why you ſhould put them to death? The common people aunſwered him: becauſe they are thy friendes. With this anſwere Phocion departed, and ſpake neuer a word more. Then the Orator Agnonides holding a decree in his hand readie written, read it openly to the people, declaring how they ſhould be iudged by voyces, whether the offendors had deſerued death or not: & if it were found they had, then that they ſhould all be put to death. And there were that when this decree was red, cried out, that they ſhould adde further vnto the decree, that before Phocion ſhould be put to death, they ſhould firſt torment him: and therewithall commandement was giuen that the wheele ſhould be ſette vp to breake his ioynts vpon it, and alſo that the hangman ſhould be ſent for. But then Agnonides perceiuing that Clitus was offended with it, and thinking beſides it were too beaſtly and barbarous a part to vſe him in that ſort, he ſaide openly: my Lordes, when you ſhall haue ſuch a varlet in your handes at Callimedon, then you may caſt him on the wheele: but againſt Phocion, I would not wiſh ſuch crueltie. Then roſe vp a noble man among them, and added to his words: thou haſt reaſon to ſay ſo, Agnonides: for if Phocion ſhould be laid on the wheele, what ſhould we then doe with thee? The decree being confirmed according to the contentes thereof, iudgement was giuen by voices of the people, no man ſitting but all ſtanding vp, and moſt of them with garlandes on their heades, for the ioy they had to condemne theſe priſoners to death. With Phocion there were condemned, Nicocles, Thudippus, Hegemon, and Pythocles: but Demetrius PHALERIAN, Callimedon & Charicles were alſo in their abſence condemned to die. Now when the aſſembly was broken vp, and that the perſons condemned were caried backe to priſon, from thence to be conueighed to execution: others imbracing their friends, and taking their laſt leaue of them as they went, wept, and lamented their curſed fortune. But Phocion looking as cheerefully of it as he was wont to doe being Generall, when they honorably waited on him to his houſe from the aſſembly: he made many of them pitie him in their hearts to conſider his conſtancie and noble courage. On the other ſide alſo, there were many of his enemies that came as neere vnto him as they could, to reuile him, amongſt whom there was one that ſtepped before him, and did ſpit in his face. Then Phocion turning him vnto the Magiſtrates, ſaide: will ye not cauſe this impudent fellow to leaue his rayling? When they were in priſon, Thudippus ſeeing the hemlocke which they brayed in a morter to giue them to drinke: he beganne deſperately to curſe and banne, ſaying, that they wrongfully put him to death with Phocion. Why, ſaid Phocion againe: and doeſt thou not rather reioyce to die with me? When one that ſtoode by asked Phocion, if he would any thing to his ſonne Phocus: yes, ꝙ he, that I will: bid him neuer reuenge the wrong the ATHENIANS do me. Then Nicocles one of Phocions deareſt friends, prayed him to let him drinke the poyſon before him. Phocion anſwered him, thy requeſt is grieuous to me, Nicocles: but becauſe I neuer denyed thee any thing in my life, I will alſo grant thee this at my death. When al the reſt had drunke, there was no more poyſon left, and the hangman ſaide he would make no more vnleſſe they gaue him twelue Drachmas, for ſo much the pound did coſt him. Phocion perceiuing then that the hangman delayed time, he called one of his friends vnto him, and prayed him to giue the hangman that litle money he demaunded, ſith a man can not die at Athens for nothing, without coſt. It was the nineteenth day of the moneth of Munichion, ( to wit, March ) on which day the Knights were wont to make a ſolemne proceſsion in the honour of Iupiter: howbeit ſome of them left off the garlands of flowers which they ſhould haue worn on their heads, and others alſo looking towards the priſon dore as they went by, burſt out a weeping. For, they whoſe hearts were not altogether hardned with cruelty, & whoſe iudgements were not wholly ſuppreſſed with enuie, thought it a grieuous ſacriledge againſt the goddes, that they did not let that day paſſe, but that they did defile ſo ſolemne a feaſt, with the violent death of a man. His enemies notwithſtanding, continuing ſtill their anger againſt him, made the people paſſe a decree, that his bodie ſhould be baniſhed, and caried out of the boundes of the country of Attica, forbidding the Athenians that no fire ſhould be made for the ſolemniſing of his funerals. For this reſpect no friend of his durſt once touch his bodie. Howbeit a poore man called Conopion, that was wont to get his liuing that way, being hyred for money to burne mens bodies: he tooke his corſe, and caried it beyond the citie of Elevsin, and getting fire out of a womans houſe of Megara, he ſolemniſed his funerals. Furthermore, there was a gentlewoman of Megara, who comming by chaunce that way, with her gentlewomen, where his bodie was but newly burnt: ſhe cauſed the earth to be caſt vp a litle where the bodie was burnt, and made it like to a hollow tombe, wherupon ſhe did vſe ſuch ſprincklings and effuſions, as are commonly done at the funerals of the dead: and then taking vp his bones in her lappe in the night, ſhe brought them home, and buried them in her harth, ſaying: O deare harth, to thee I bequeath the reliques of this noble and good man, and pray thee to kepe them faithfully, to bring them one day to the graue of his aunceſters, when the Athenians ſhall come to confeſſe the fault & wrong they haue done vnto him. And truly it was not long after, that the Athenians found by the vntowardnes of their affaires, that they had put him to death, who only maintained iuſtice, and honeſtie at Athens. Whereupon they made his image to be ſet vp in braſſe, and gaue honorable buriall to his bones, at the charges of the citie. And for his accuſers, they condemned Agnonides of treaſon, and put him to death them ſelues. The other two, Epicurus and Demophilus being fled out of the citie, were afterwardes met with by his ſonne Phocus, who was reuenged of them. This Phocus as men report, was otherwiſe no great good man, who fancying a young maide which a bawde kept, comming by chance one day into the ſchoole of Lycæum, he heard Theodorus the Atheiſt (to wit, that beleeued not there were any goddes) make this argument. If it be no ſhame, ſaid he, to deliuer a mans friend from bondage, no more ſhame is it to redeeme his leman which he loueth: euen ſo it is all one to redeeme a mans leman, as his friend. This young man taking this argument to ſerue his turne, beleeuing that he might lawfully do it, got the young maide he loued from the baude. Furthermore, this death of Phocion did alſo reuiue the lamentable death of Socrates vnto the Grecians: for men thought that it was a like hainous offence and calamitie vnto the citie of Athens.

THE LIFE OF Cato Utican.

THe family and houſe of Cato, tooke his firſt glory & name of his great grandfather, Cato the Cenſor: who for his vertue (as we haue declared in his life) was one of the famouſeſt and worthieſt men of ROME in his time. This Cato whom we now write of, was left an orphan by his father and mother, with his brother Capio, and Porcia his ſiſter. Seruilia was alſo Catoes halfe ſiſter, by his mothers ſide. All theſe were brought vp with their vncle Liuius Druſus, at that time the greateſt man of the citie: for he was paſſing eloquent, and very honeſt, and of as great a courage beſides, as any other ROMAINE. Men report, that Cato from his childhood ſhewed himſelfe both in word and countenance, and alſo in all his paſtimes and recreations, verie conſtant and ſtable. For he would goe through with that he tooke vpon him to doe, and would force himſelfe aboue his ſtrength: and as he could not away with flatterers, ſo was he rough with them that went about to threaten him. He would hardly laugh, and yet had euer a pleaſant countenance. He was not chollericke, nor eaſie to be angred: but when the bloud was vp, he was hardly pacified. When he was firſt put to ſchoole, he was very dull of vnderſtanding, and ſlow to learne: but when he had once learned it, he would neuer forget it, as all men elſe commonly doe. For ſuch as are quicke of conceite, haue commonly the worſt memories: and contrarily, they that are hard to learne, doe keepe that better which they haue learned. For euery kinde of learning is a motion and quickening of the minde. He ſeemed beſides not to be light of credite, & that may be ſome cauſe of his ſlowneſſe in conceite. For truely he ſuffereth ſomewhat that learneth, and thereof it commeth, that they that haue leaſt reaſon to reſiſt, are thoſe which doe giue lighteſt credite. For young men are eaſilier perſwaded then old men, and the ſicke then the whole. And where a man hath leaſt reaſon for his doubts: there he is ſooneſt brought to beleeue any thing. This notwithſtanding, it is reported that Cato was obedient vnto his ſchoolemaiſter, and would doe what he commaunded him: howbeit he would aske him ſtill the cauſe and reaſon of euery thing. In deede his ſchoolemaſter was very gentle, and readier to teach him, then to ſtrike him with his fiſt. His name was Sarpedo. Furthermore, when Cato was but a young boy, the people of ITALY which were confederates of the ROMAINES, ſued to be made free citizens of ROME. At that time it chaunced one Pompedius Silo, a valiant ſouldier, and of great eſtimation among the confederates of the ROMAINES, and a great friend beſides of Druſus: to be lodged many daies at his houſe. He in this time falling acquainted with theſe young boyes, ſaid one day vnto them: good boyes, intreate your vncle to ſpeake for vs, that we may be made free citizens of ROME. Cæpio ſmiling nodded with his head, that he would. But Cato making no anſwere, looked very wiſely vpon the ſtrangers that lay in the houſe. Then Pompedius taking him aſide, asked him: and thou, my pretie boy, what ſayeſt thou to it? Wilt thou not pray thine vncle as well as thy brother, to be good to his gueſtes? Cato ſtill held his peace and aunſwered nothing, but ſhewed by his ſilence and looke, that he would not heare their requeſt. Then Pompedius taking him vp in his armes, did put him out of the window, as if he would haue let him haue gone: and ſpeaking more ſharply to him then he did before, he caſt him many times out of his armes without the window, and ſaid, promiſe vs then, or elſe I will let thee fall. But Cato abid it a long time, and neuer quinched for it, nor ſhewed countenance of feare. Thereupon Pompedius ſetting him downe againe, told his friends that ſtood by him: O what good happe doth this child promiſe one day vnto ITALIE, if he liue? ſure if he were a man, I beleeue we ſhould not haue one voice of all the people of our ſide. An other time, there were ſome of Catoes neere kinſemen, that keeping the feaſt day of his birth, bad many young boyes to ſupper, and amongſt others this Cato. The boyes to occupie themſelues till ſupper was readie, gathered themſelues together great and ſmall, into ſome priuate place of the houſe. Their play was, counterfaiting pleadings before the iudges, accuſing one an other, and carying them that were condemned to priſon. Amongſt them, a goodly young boy was caried by a bigger boy into a litle chamber, bounde as a condemned perſon. The boy perceiuing he was locked vp, cryed out vnto Cato: who miſtruſting what it was, went ſtraight to the chamber dore & putting them by by force that withſtood him to come vnto it, he tooke out the young boy, and caried him very angrily with him to his owne houſe, and all the other young boyes followed him alſo. So Cato had ſuch name among the young boyes, that when Sylla made the game of young boyes running a horſebacke, which the ROMAINES call Troia: to appoint them before that they might be ready at the day of the ſhew, he hauing gotten all the young boyes of noble houſes together, appointed them two Captaines. Of them, the boyes tooke the one, becauſe of his mother Metella, which was the wife of Sylla: but they would none of the other called Sextus, who was nephew to Pompey the great, neither would they be exerciſed vnder him, nor followe him. Wherefore Sylla asked them, which of them they would haue: they all cryed then Cato, and Sextus himſelfe did willingly giue him the honor, as the worthier of both. Sylla was their fathers friend, and therefore did ſend for them many times to come vnto him, & he would talke with them: the which kindnes he ſhewed to few men, for the maieſtie and great authoritie he had. Serpedo alſo (Catoes ſchoolemaiſter) thinking it a great preferrement and ſafetie for his ſchollers, did commonly bring Cato vnto Syllaes houſe, to waite vpon him: the which was rather like vnto a iayle or priſon, for the great number of priſoners which were daily brought thither, and put to death. Cato being then but foureteene yeares of age, and perceiuing that there were many heads brought which were ſaied to be of great men, and that euerie bodie ſighed and mourned to ſee them: he asked his ſchoolemaſter, how it was poſſible the tyrant ſcaped, that ſome one or other killed him not? Becauſe, ꝗ Serpedo, that all men feare him, more then they hate him. Why then, replyed Cato againe, diddeſt thou not giue me a ſword that I might kill him, to deliuer my country of this ſlauery & bondage? Serpedo hearing the boy ſay ſo, and ſeeing his countenance and eyes on fire with choller, he maruelled much at it, and afterwardes had a very good eye vnto him, leaſt raſhly he ſhould attempt ſome thing againſt Sylla. When he was but a litle boy, ſome asked him whom he loued beſt? My brother, ſaide he. Then the other continuing ſtil to aske him, & who next: he anſwered likewiſe, his brother. Then the third time againe, likewiſe his brother. Till at length he that asked him, was weary with asking him ſo oft. Yea and when he was come of age alſo, he then confirmed the loue he bare to his brother in his deedes. For twenty yeares together he neuer ſupped without his brother Cæpio, neither went he euer out of his houſe into the market place, nor into the fieldes without him: but when his brother did noint himſelfe with ſweete oyles of perfume, hee would none of that, and in all things elſe, he led a ſtraight and hard life. So that his brother

Capio being commended of euery man for his temperaunce, honeſty, and ſober life: he graunted in deede that in reſpect of others, he led a ſober and temperate life: but when I doe (ſayed he) compare my life with my brother Catoes, me thinkes then there is no difference betwixt me and Sippius. This Sippius was at that time noted and pointed at, for his fine and curious effeminate life. After that Cato was once choſen Apolloes Prieſt, he went from his brother, and tooke his portion of the goods of his father, which amounted to the ſumme of a hundred and twenty talents. Then he liued more hardly then hee did before. For he fell in acquaintaunce with Antipater TYRIAM, a Stoicke Philoſopher, and gaue him ſelfe chiefly vnto the ſtudie of morall and ciuill Philoſophy, imbracing all exerciſe of vertue with ſuch an earneſt deſire, that it ſeemed he was prickt forward by ſome god: but aboue all other vertues, he loued the ſeuerity of iuſtice, which he would not wreſt for any gift nor fauor. He ſtudied alſo to be eloquent, that he might ſpeake openly before the people, becauſe he would there ſhould be certaine warlike forces entertained in ciuill Philoſophy, as alſo in a great city. Notwithſtanding, he would not exerciſe it before any body, neither would he euer haue any man to heare him ſpeake when he did learne to ſpeake. For when one of his friends told him one day, that men did miſlike he ſpake ſo litle in company: it skilleth no matter, ꝙ he, ſo they can not reproue my life, for I will beginne to ſpeake, when I can ſay ſome thing worthy to be ſpoken. Hard by the market place there was the common pallace or towne houſe of the citie, called Baſilica Porcia, the which Porcius Cato the elder had built, in the time of his Cenſorſhip. There the Tribunes were wont to keepe their audience: and becauſe there was a piller that troubled their ſeates, they would either haue taken it away, or elſe haue ſet it in ſome other place. That was the firſt cauſe that made Cato againſt his will to goe into the market place, and to get vp into the pulpit for orations, to ſpeake againſt them: where hauing giuen this firſt proofe of his eloquence and noble minde, he was maruellouſly eſteemed of. For his oration was not like a young man, counterfeating fineneſſe of ſpeach and affectation, but ſtout, full of wit and vehemency: and yet in the ſhortneſſe of his ſentences, he had ſuch an excellent grace withall, that he maruellouſly delighted the hearers: and furthermore, ſhewing in nature a certaine grauity beſides, it did ſo pleaſe them, that he made them laugh. Hee had a very full and audible voyce that might be heard of a maruellous number of people, and ſuch a ſtrong nature beſides, that he neuer fainted, nor brake his ſpeach: for many times hee would ſpeake a whole day together, and was neuer wearie. So when he had obtained his cauſe againſt the Tribunes, he returned againe to keepe his former great ſilence, and to harden his body with painefull exerciſes, as to abide heate, froſt, and ſnow bare headed, and alwayes to goe a foote in the fielde, where his friends that did accompany him rode a horſebacke, and ſometime hee would come and talke with one, ſometime with an other, as he went a foote by them. He had a wonderfull patience alſo in his ſickneſſe. For when he had any ague, he would be alone all day long, and ſuffer no man to come and ſee him, vntill he perceiued his fit was off him, and that he founde he was better. When he ſupped with his friendes and familiars, they drew lots who ſhould chooſe their parts. If he chaunced not to chooſe, his friendes notwithſtanding gaue him the preferment to chooſe: but he refuſed it, ſaying it was no reaſon, ſith the goddeſſe Venus was againſt him. At the firſt he did not vſe to ſitte long at the table, but after he had drunke one draught onely, he would ſtraight riſe. But when he came to be elder, he ſate long at the table: ſo that oftentimes he would ſit it out all night with his friendes, till the next morning. But they ſeeking to excuſe it, ſayed, that his great buſineſſe and affaires in the common wealth was the cauſe of it. For following that all the day long, hauing no leyſure nor time to ſtudie when night came, he delighted to talke with learned men, and Philoſophers, at the bord. Wherefore when Memmius on a time being in company, ſayed, that Cato did nothing but drinke all night: Cicero taking his tale out of his mouth, aunſwered him, thou doeſt not adde this vnto it, that all the daie he doth nothing but plaie at diſe. To be ſhort, Cato thinking that the manners and faſhions of mens liues in his time were ſo corrupt, and required ſuch great chaunge and alteration: that to goe vprightly, he was to take a contrary courſe in all things. For hee ſaw that purple, red, and the lighteſt colours were beſt eſteemed of: he in contrary manner deſired to weare blacke. And many times alſo after dinner hee would goe abroade bare footed without ſhooes, and without any gowne: not becauſe he would be wondered at for any ſuch ſtrangeneſſe, but to acquaint him ſelfe to be aſhamed onely of ſhameleſſe and diſhoneſt things, and to deſpiſe thoſe which were not reproued, but by mens opinions. Furthermore, land being left him to the value of an hundred talentes by the death of a couſin of his, that likewiſe was called Cato: he put it all into ready money: to lend to his friends that lacked, and without vſury. And there were ſome of his frends alſo that would morgage his land, or his ſlaues, to the chamber of the city, for their owne priuate buſines: the which he him ſelfe would either giue them to morgage, or els afterwards confirme the morgage of thē. Furthermore, when he was come of age to mary, hauing neuer knowen woman before, he was made ſure to Lepida. This Lepida had bene precontracted vnto Metellus Scipio: but afterwardes the precontract being broken, he forſooke her, ſo that ſhee was free, when Cato was contracted to her. Notwithſtanding, before Cato maried her, Scipio repenting him that he had refuſed her, made all the means he could to haue her againe: and ſo he had. Cato tooke it ſo grieuouſly, that he thought to goe to law for her: but his friendes diſſwaded him from it. Then ſeeing no other remedie, to ſatisfie his angry minde, he wrote verſes againſt Scipio, in the which hee reuiled him all he could: vſing the bitter taunts of Archilocus verſes, but not ſuch impudent, lewde, and childiſh reproaches as be there. After that, he maried Attilia, Soranus daughter, being the firſt woman he euer knew: yet not the onely woman whom hee did know, as is reported of Lælius, Scipioes friend, who therein was counted the happier, becauſe all that long time wherein he liued, hee neuer knew other woman but his firſt wife. Furthermore, in the warre of the bondemen (otherwiſe called Spartacus warre) one Gellius was choſen Prætor of the army vnder whom Cato ſerued of his own good will, for the loue he bare vnto his brother Cæpio, who in that army had charge of a thouſand footemen. Now Cato could not as he wiſhed, ſhew his valiantneſſe and good ſeruice, becauſe of the inſufficiency of the Prætor that gaue ill direction. This notwithſtanding, in the middeſt of all the ryot and inſolencie of them in the campe, he ſhewing him ſelfe a ſtayed man in all his doings, valiant where neede was, and very wiſe alſo: all men eſteemed him to be nothing inferiour vnto Cato the elder. Whereupon Gellius the Prætor gaue him many honors in token of his valiantnes, which are giuen in reward of mens good ſeruice: howbeit Cato refuſed them, and ſayed, that he was nothing worthy of thoſe honors. Theſe things made him to be thought a maruellous ſtraunge man. Furthermore, when there was a law made, forbidding all men that ſued for any office in the common wealth, that they ſhould haue no prompters in any of the aſſemblies, to blow into their eares the names of priuat citizens: he alone making ſute to be Colonell of a thouſand footemen, was obedient to the law, and committed all the priuate citizens names to memory, to ſpeake vnto euery one of them, and to call them by their names: ſo that he was enuied euen of them that did commend him. For, by how much they knew his deedes praiſe worthy, by ſo much more were they grieued, for that they could not follow them. So Cato being choſen Colonell of a thouſand footemen, he was ſent into MACEDON, vnto Rubrius, Prætor there. Some ſay, that at his departure from thence, his wife lamenting, and weeping to ſee him goe: one Munatius a friend of his ſayd vnto her, take no thought Attilia, and leaue weeping, for I promiſe thee I will keepe thy husband for thee. It is well ſayd, anſwered Cato. Then when they were a daies iorney frō ROME, Cato after ſupper ſaid vnto this Munatius: thou muſt looke well to thy promiſe thou haſt made Attilia, that thou wouldeſt keepe me for her, and therefore forſake me not night nor day. Thereuppon he commaunded his men that from thence forth they ſhould prepare two beds in his chamber, that Munatius alſo might lye there: who was rather pleaſantly him ſelfe looked vnto by Cato, then Cato by him. He had fifteen ſlaues with him, two free men, and foure of his friends, which rode, and he him ſelfe went a foote: ſometime talking with one, otherwhile with another as he went. Whē he came to the campe, where there were many legions of the ROMAINS, the Prætor immediatly gaue him charge of one of them: who thinking it ſmall honor to him for him ſelf only to be valiant, ſith he was but one man, he practiſed to make all his ſouldiers vnder him, like vnto him ſelf. The which he did not by feare & terror, but by lenity and gentle perſwaſion, training and inſtructing them in euery point what they ſhould do: adding to his gentle inſtruction & perſwaſions, reward to thoſe that did well, and puniſhment to them that offended. Whereby it was hard to iudge, whether hee had made them more quiet, then warlicke: more valiant, then iuſt. So dreadfull they ſhewed them ſelues to their enemies, and curteous to their friendes: fearefull to doe euill, and ready to winne honour. Whereof followed that which Cata leaſt accounted of, that is, he wanne fame, and good will: for his ſouldiers did greatly honour and loue him, becauſe he him ſelfe would euer firſt ſet his hand to any thing he commaunded them, and becauſe alſo both in his diet, in his apparell, and in any iorney or paines, he was rather like vnto the meaneſt ſouldier, then any of the other Captaines. In contrary manner alſo, in good nature, noble courage, and eloquence, he farre exceeded all the other Colonels and Captaines. For the true loue of vertue, (to wit, the deſire to follow it) taketh no roote in mens mindes, vnleſſe they haue a ſingular loue and reuerence vnto the perſon, whome they deſire to follow. When Cato vnderſtoode that Athenodorus ſurnamed Cordylion, a Stoicke Philoſopher, excellently well learned, dwelt at that time in the city of PERGAMVM, being a very old man, and one that ſtiffely refuſed the friendſhip of kings, princes, and noble men, deſirous to haue him about them: to write to him, he thought it was but loſt labor. Wherefore hauing two moneths liberty by the laws of the ROMAINES, to follow his owne affaires: he tooke ſea, and went into ASIA to him, hoping he ſhould not loſe his iourney, for the great vertues he knew in him. So when he had ſpoken with him, and talked of diuerſe matters together: at length he brought him from his firſt determination, and caried him to the campe with him, eſteeming this victory more, then all the conqueſtes of Lucullus or Pompey, who had conquered the moſt part of all the prouinces and realmes of the Eaſt parts of the world. In the meane time, whileſt hee lay at his charge in the campe, being Colonell of a thouſand footemen: his brother preparing to goe into ASIA, fell ſicke in the city of ÆNVS, in the countrey of THRACIA. Cato hauing ſpeedy intelligence thereof, tooke ſea preſently, when it was maruellous rough and boyſterous, and imbarked in a litle crayer of a marchants of THESSALY, with two of his friends, and three bondmen only, & did eſcape drowning very narrowly: and yet by good fortune arriued ſafely, a litle after his brother Capioes death. He tooke his death more ſorrowfully, then became a Philoſopher, not onely mourning and lamenting for him, imbracing the dead corps of his brother: but alſo for the exceeding charge and ſumptuous funerals, which he beſtowed vpon him, in perfumes, ſweete ſauors, and ſumptuous ſilkes that were burnt with his bodie: and furthermore, in the ſtately tombe of THRACIAN marble which he made for him, and ſet vp in the market place of the ÆNIANS, that coſt eight talents. Some did miſlike this vaine charge that Cato beſtowed, conſidering the modeſty and temperance he vſed in all things elſe, not regarding with iudgement his tender loue and affection towards his kinſmen, which was mingled in him with his ſeuerity and hardnes, againſt all voluptuouſnes, feare, and ſhameleſſe requeſtes. Diuers cities, Princes and noble men ſent him many ſundry preſents, to honour the funerals of his brother Capio: howbeit he tooke no money of all them, ſauing only ſpices, and ſweete ſauors, and ſuch other ornaments, as honored the obſequies of the dead, and yet payed for them, vnto thoſe that brought them, as much as they were worth. Furthermore, in the land that fell vnto him, and a litle daughter of his, by the death of his brother: notwithſtanding the charge hee had bene at, in his funerals, he did not reckon it in the partition of the land, betwixt him and his brother Capioes daughter. All the which things when they were ſolemniſed, ſome* write notwithſtanding, that he did clenſe the imbers where his brothers body had bene burnt, through a ſieue or riddell, where through they clenſe corne, and all to get out the gold and ſiluer that was molten there. But ſuch thinke that their writings ſhould be as farre from controlement, as their doings. So when Catoes time of his charge was expired, they did accompany him at his departure, not only with ordinary praiſes, vowes, and prayers to the goddes for his health: but with imbracings, teares, and maruellous lamentations of the ſouldiers, which ſpred their garments on the ground as he went, and kiſſing of his hands, which honor the ROMAINS did but to very few of their Generalles. Furthermore, Cato being determined before he returned to ROME to deale in the affaires there, to go and ſee ASIA, partly to be an eye witneſſe of the maners, cuſtomes, and power of euery prouince as he went: and partly alſo to ſatisfie king Deiotarus requeſt, who hauing bene his fathers friend, had earneſtly intreated him to come and ſee him: he went the iourney, and vſed it in this ſort. Firſt, by peepe of day, he ſent his baker and cooke before, where he ment to lie that night. They comming ſoberly into the city or village, inquired if there were none of Catoes friendes and acquaintance there, and if they found none, then they prepared his ſupper in an Inne, and troubled no man: but if there were no Inne, then they went to the Gouernors of the towne, and prayed them to helpe them to lodging, and did content them ſelues with the firſt that was offered them. Oftentimes the townes men did not beleeue they were Catoes men, and made no accompt of them: becauſe they tooke all things ſo quietly, and made no a doe with the officers. Inſomuch as Cato ſometime came him ſelfe, and found nothing ready for him, and when he was come, they made as ſmall account of him, ſeeing him ſet vpon his cariages, and ſpeake neuer a word: for they tooke him for ſome meane man, and a timerous perſon. Notwithſtanding, ſometime he called them vnto him, and tolde them O poore men, learne to be more curteous to receiue trauelling ROMAINS that paſſe by you, and looke not alwaies to haue Catoes to come vnto you: & therefore ſee that you vſe them with ſuch curteſie and entertainement, that they may bridle the authority they haue ouer you: for you ſhall finde many that will deſire no better colour nor occaſion, by force to take from you that they would haue: becauſe you vnwillingly alſo do grant them the things they would, and need. There is a report of a prety ieſt hapned him in SYRIA. Whē he came to ANTIOCH, he found a great number of people deuided on either ſide of the ſtreete, ſtanding a row one by an other very decently: the yong men by them ſelues in faire clokes, boyes by them ſelues in ſeemely aray, and prieſts and other officers of the city alſo, al in white garments, crowned with garlands. Cato thought ſtraight they had made this ſolemne proceſſion to honor him, and fell out with his men he had ſent before, becauſe they did ſuffer them to make ſuch preparation for his comming. So he made his friends light from their horſes, and go a foot to accompany him. But when they came neare to the gate of the city, the maiſter of theſe ceremonies that had aſſembled all that company (an old man, hauing a rodde in his hand, and a crowne on his head) came to Cato without ſaluting of him, and asked him only, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come. This Demetrius had bin one of Pompeis ſlaues, and becauſe Pompeis fame was great with all men, his ſeruant Demetrius alſo was much honored and made of aboue his deſert, for that he was in great credite with Pompey. Catoes friends hearing what queſtion the olde man asked him, burſt out a laughing as they went through this proceſſion. Cato being aſhamed of it, ſaied no more then: but, O vnfortunate city. Afterwards notwithſtanding, when he told it to any body, he would laugh at it him ſelfe. So Pompey rebuked them, that through ignorance had failed to honor Cato. When Cato came to the city of EPHESVS, and was comming towardes Pompey to ſalute him, being the elder man, and of greater dignity and eſtimation then he, who at that time alſo was Generall of a great and puiſaunt army: Pompey ſeeing him comming towards him a farre off, would not tary till he came to him, ſitting in his chaire of eſtate, but riſing vp went to meete him, as one of the greateſt and nobleſt perſons of ROME, and taking him by the hand, after he had imbraced and welcommed him, he preſently fell in praiſe of his vertue before his face, and afterwards alſo commended him in his abſence, when he was gone from him. Whereuppon, euery man after that had him in great veneration for thoſe things, which before they deſpiſed in him, when they conſidered better of his noble and curteous mind. For men that ſaw P*ompeis* entertainment towards him, knew wel enough that Cato was a man which he rather reuerenced, & for a kinde of duty obſerued, more then for any loue he bare him: & they noted further, that he honored him greatly while he was with him, but yet that he was glad when Cato went from him. For he ſought to keepe backe all the yong gentlemen of ROME that went to ſee him, and deſired them to remaine with him: but for Cato, he was nothing deſirous of his company, for that in his preſence hee thought he could not cōmand as he would, & therefore was willing to let him go, recommending his wife & his children to him, the which he neuer did before vnto any other ROMAIN that returned to ROME: howbeit in deed Cato was partly allied vnto him. After that time, all the cities whereby he paſſed, deuiſed (in emulation one of the other) which of thē ſhould honor him moſt, & made him great feaſts & bankets: in the which he praid his friends to haue an eie to him, leaſt vnwares he ſhold proue Curioes words true. For Curio ſomtime being his frēd, & a familiar of his, miſliking notwithſtanding his ſeuerity: asked Cato if he would go ſee Asia, when his charge were expired. Cato anſwered againe, that it was his full determination. Oh well ſayd, ꝙ Curio, I hope then thou wilt returne more pleaſant and ciuill. And theſe were Curioes words. Furthermore, Deiotarus king of Galatia, being a very old man, ſent for Cato to come into his countrey to recommend his ſonnes and houſe vnto him: who, when he arriued there, had great riche preſents of all ſortes offered him by the king, intreating him all he could to take them. This ſo much miſliked and angered Cato, that he comming thither in the euening, (after he had taried there one whole day only) the next morning he went his way from thence at the third houre. Howbeit he had not gone one daies iuorney, but he found greater gifts that taried him, with Deiotarus letters, at the city of Pessinunta: in the which he inſtantly requeſted him to take them, or at the leaſt if he would refuſe them him ſelfe, that then he would let them be deuided amongeſt his friends, ſith euery way they did deſerue it, but ſpecially for his ſake, for that his goodes alſo were not ſo great, as could content all his friends. But Cato would not ſuffer them to take any iot of it more then before, although he ſaw well enough that there were ſome of them ſo tender hearted, that they complained of him, for that hee would not ſuffer them to take any of it. For he told them, that otherwiſe, corruption and bribery could lacke no honeſt colour to take: and for his friendes, they ſhoulde alwayes haue part with him of that which was his owne iuſtly. So hee returned king Deiotarus preſents backe againe. Now when he was ready to imbarke, to paſſe ouer the ſea againe vnto Brundusium: ſome of his friendes perſwaded him, that it was better to put the aſhes of his brother Capioes bones into an other ſhippe. But he aunſwered them, that he would rather loſe his owne life, then to leaue his brothers reliques. Thereuppon he preſently hoyſed ſaile, and it is reported that he paſſed ouer in great danger, where other ſhippes arriued very ſafely. When he was returned vnto Rome, he was alwayes either talking Philoſophy with Athenodorus the Philoſopher, or elſe in the market place to pleaſure his friends. When his turne came that he was to make ſute to be Quæſtor, he would neuer ſue for it, before he had firſt diligently peruſed all the ordinaunces touching the office of Quæſtor, and that hee had particularly made enquiry of men of greateſt experience to know what the authority of the office was. So, he no ſooner came to his office, but he preſently made great alteration amongeſt the clearkes and officers of the treaſurie: who hauing the lawes and recordes in their handes, and exerciſing the office commonly vnder young men which were choſen treaſurers (who for their ignoraunce and lacke of experience, ſtoode rather in neede of maiſters to teache them, then that they were able to correct others) they them ſelues were the officers, and controlled them. But Cato not contenting him ſelfe with the name and honour of the thing, did throughly vnderſtand what the clearkes and regiſters ſhould be, and therefore would haue them to be as they ought to be, miniſters vnder the Quæſtors onely, telling them of their bribery and corruption which they committed, and reformed them alſo, that faulted through ignorance. And when hee ſaw ſome inſolent and impudent perſons, that curried fauour with other treaſurers to be againſt him: he cauſed the chiefeſt of them to be condemned for falſhoode, in making diuiſion betwixt two coheires, and conſequently turned him cleare out of his office, for euer doing any thing there any more. He accuſed an other alſo for forging of a will, whome Catulus Luctatius defending, being then Cenſor, and a man of great honor for the dignity of his office, but chiefly for his vertue, being counted the iuſteſt man one of them in his time at Rome, and one of thoſe alſo that highly commended Cato, & was conuerſant with him for his honeſt life: when hee perceiued that he could not defend his man by no reaſon, he prayed them at his requeſt that they would pardon him. But Cato would in no wiſe graunt it. But Catulus earneſtly intreating ſtill for him: then Cato plainely ſayed vnto him. It is ſhame for thee (Catulus) thou that art Cenſor, and ſhouldeſt reforme all our liues, thus to forget the duetie of thine office, to pleaſe our miniſters. Catulus looking at Cato when he had ſpoken, as though he would anſwere him: whether it were for ſhame, or anger, he went his way, and ſaid neuer a word more. Yet was not the party condemned, though there was one voice more that did condemne then cleare him, becauſe of the abſence of one of the Iudges. For Marcus Lollius, one of Catulus colleagues in the Quæſtorſhip, being ſicke at that time, and abſent, Catulus ſent vnto him, to pray him to come and helpe the poore man. Thereuppon Lollius being brought thither in a litter after iudgement giuen, gaue his laſt voice, which abſolutely cleared him. Cato, this notwithſtanding, would neuer vſe him as a clearke, nor pay him his wages, nor would count of Lollius voyce among others. Thus hauing pulled downe the pride and ſtomacke of theſe clearkes, and brought them vnto reaſon: in ſhort time he had all the tables and recordes at his commaundement, and made the treaſure chamber as honourable, as the Senate it ſelfe: ſo that euery man thought, and ſayd, that Cato had added vnto the Quæſtorſhippe the dignity of the Conſulſhip.

Cato made the Quæſtorſhip of great dignity.

For finding diuers men indebted before vnto the common wealth, and the common wealth alſo vnto diuerſe men: he ſette downe ſuch an order, that neither the common wealth ſhould be deceiued by any man, nor that any man alſo ſhould haue wrong of it. For being rough with them that were indebted to the chamber, hee compelled them to pay their debt, and willingly and quickly alſo payed them to whom the chamber ought any thing: ſo that the people were aſhamed to ſee ſome pay which neuer thought to haue payed any thing, and on the contrary ſide alſo others payed, which neuer looked to haue had any part of their debts paid them. Furthermore, diuers men did before make falſe bils of their debts, & brought them ſo to be put into the coffer of the Quæſtors: and many times alſo his predeceſſors were wont of fauor and friendſhip to receiue falſe meſſages. For whileſt he was Quæſtor, he neuer did paſſe away matters ſo lightly. For one day, he being doubtfull of a meſſage that was ſent vnto him, to know whether it was true or no: albeit diuerſe men did witneſſe it was true, yet would he not beleeue it, vntill ſuch time as the Conſuls them ſelues came in their owne perſons to iuſtifie it was true, and to ſweare, that it was ſo ordained. Now there were many vnto whom Lucius Sylla being Dictator, had appointed in his ſecond proſcription twelue thouſand ſiluer Drachmas for euery citizen and outlaw which they had ſlaine with their owne handes. Theſe men, though euery man did hate them, and knew them to be wicked people and cruell murtherers: yet no man durſt offer to be reuenged of them.

Cato was reuenged of Syllaes bloody murther.

Cato called theſe men in ſute, as thoſe that did wrongfully detaine the money of the common treaſure, and compelled them to repay it backe againe: ſharpely reproouing (and iuſtly) the wicked deuiliſh fact they had committed. So when they had repayed the money, they were ſtraight accuſed by others for murder: & as if they had bene wrongfully condemned by one iudgement, they were brought into an other, to the great ioy of all the ROMAINS, who then thought they ſaw all the tyranny of that time rooted out, and Sylla him ſelfe puniſhed. Beſides all this, Catoes continuall paines and care of the treaſure, was ſo well thought of, and liked of the people as could be. For he was alwaies the firſt that came to the coffer of the treaſurers, and alſo the laſt that went from thence, and was neuer weary of any paines. Furthermore, he neuer miſſed to be at any aſſembly of the people or Senate, fearing, and being alwayes carefull, leaſt lightly by fauour, any money due to the common wealth ſhould be forgiuen: or elſe that they ſhould abate the rent of the farmers, or that they ſhould giue no money but to them that had iuſtly deſerued it. Thus hauing ridde all accuſers, and alſo filled the coffers with treaſure: hee made men ſee, that the common wealth might be rich, without oppreſſing of any man. In deede at his firſt comming into the office, his colleagues and companions founde him maruellous troubleſome and tedious, for that they thought him too rough and ſeuere: howbeit they all loued him in the end, becauſe he onely withſtood the complaints and cries of all men againſt them (which complained that they would not for any mans reſpect or fauor let go the money of the common treaſure) and was contented his companions ſhould excuſe them ſelues vnto their friends that were importunate, and lay the fault vppon him, ſaying, that it was vnpoſſible for them to bring Cato vnto it.

The laſt day that he went out of his office, being very honorably brought home to his houſe by the people: it was tolde him that Marcellus, being in the treaſure chamber, was attempted and enuironned with many of his friends, and men of great authority, that were earneſtly in hand with him to record a certaine gift of money, as a thing that had bene due by the common wealth. This Marcellus had bene Catoes frend euen from their childhood, and whileſt Cato was in office, he did orderly execute his office with him: but whē he was left alone, he was of ſo gentle a nature, that he would eaſily be intreated, and was as much aſhamed to deny any man, as he was alſo ouerreadie to graunt euery man that he required. Cato ſtraight returned backe vpon it, and finding that Marcellus had yeelded vnto their importunacie, and recorded the gift: he cauſed the bookes to be brought vnto him, and did raſe it out before his face, Marcellus ſpeaking neuer a word to the contrary. After that, Marcellus brought Cato home, and neuer once repined againſt that he had done, neither then, nor at any time after, but continued ſtill friendſhip with him, as he had done before. But now, though Cato was out of his office of Quæſtor, he was not without ſpials of his men in the treaſure chamber: who marked alwayes, and wrote what was done and paſſed in the treaſurie. And Cato himſelfe hauing bought the bookes of account for the ſumme of fiue talents conteyning the reuenue of the whole ſtate of the common wealth, from Syllaes time vntill the very yeare of his Quæſtorſhip: he euer had them about him, and was the firſt man that came to the Senate and the laſt that went out of it. There many times the Senatours tarying long before they came, he went and ſate downe in a corner by himſelfe, and read cloſely the booke he had vnder his gowne, clapping his gowne before it, and would neuer be out of the citie on that day when he knew the Senate ſhould aſſemble. After that, P*ompey* and his conſorts perceiuing that it was vnpoſsible to compell Cato, & much leſſe to winne or corrupt him, to fauour their vniuſt doings, they ſought what meanes they could to keepe him from comming to the Senate, and defending certaine of his friends cauſes, and to occupy him ſome other wayes about matters of arbiterment. But Cato finding their wiles and craft, to encounter them, he told his friendes once for all, whom he would pleaſure: that when the Senate did ſit, no mans cauſe could make him be abſent from thence. For he came not to ſerue the common wealth to enrich himſelfe as many did, neither for any glory or reputation, nor yet at all aduenture: but that he had aduiſedly choſen to ſerue the common wealth, like a iuſt and honeſt man, & therefore thought himſelfe bound to be as carefull of his dutie, as the bee working her waxe in the honny combe. For this reſpect therefore, to performe his dutie the better, by the meanes of his friendes which he had in euery prouince belonging to the Empire of ROME: he got into his handes the copies of all the chiefeſt actes, edicts, decrees, ſentences, and the notableſt iudgements of the gouernours that remained in record. Once Cato perceiuing that P*ublius Clodius* a ſeditious Orator amongeſt the people, did make great ſturre, and accuſed diuers vnto the aſſembly, as the Prieſtes and Veſtall Nunnes: among the which Fabia Terentia, Ciceroes wiues ſiſter was accuſed) he taking their cauſe in hand, did ſo diſgrace C*lodius* their accuſer, that he was driuen to flie the citie. C*icero* therefore giuing Cato thankes, Cato told him, that he muſt thanke the common wealth, not him, for whoſe ſake onely he both ſayd and did that he had done. Hereby Cato wanne him great fame. For when a certain Oratour or common counſeller preferred one witnes vnto the Iudges, the counſeller on the other ſide told them, that one witneſſe was not to be credited, though it were Cato himſelfe. In ſomuch as the people tooke it vp for a prouerbe among them, that when any man ſpake any ſtraunge and vnlikely matter, they would ſay: Nay, though Cato himſelfe ſayd it, yet were it not to be beleeued. When on a time a certaine prodigall man had made a long Oration in the Senate, in prayſe & cõmendation of ſobrietie, temperance, & thriftines: one Amnæus a Senator riſing vp, ſaid vnto him, alas, friend, what thinkeſt thou? who can abide to heare thee any longer with patience: that fareſt at thy table like C*raſſus*, buildeſt like Lucullus, & ſpeakeſt to vs like Cato? So men commõly (in ſport) called them Catoes, which were graue and ſeuere in their wordes, and diſſolute in their deeds. When diuers of his friends were in hand with him to ſue to be Tribune of the people, he told them he thought it not meete at that time: for ſuch an office (quoth he) of great authoritie as that, is not to be imployed, but like a ſtrong medicine in time of neede. So, the terme and matters of law ceaſing for that time, Cato went into the coũtry of LVKE to take his pleaſure there, where he had pleaſant houſes: and tooke with him both his bookes & Philoſophers to keepe him company. Becauſe, meeting as he went, with diuers ſumpters and great cariage, and a great traine of men beſides, he asked them whoſe cariage it was: they told him it was Metellus Nepos that returned to ROME, to make ſute to be Tribune. Thereupon Cato ſtayd ſodainly, and bethinking himſelfe, commaunded his men to returne backe againe. His friends maruelling at it, he aunſwered them: Do not you know that Metellus is to be feared of himſelfe, for his raſhnes & folly? & now that he commeth inſtructed by P*ompey*, like a lightning he would

The authoritie and credit of Cato.

Cato tooke Philoſophers with him whẽ he went into the countrey.

ſet all the common wealth a fire? for this cauſe therefore, we muſt not now go take our pleaſure in the coũtry, but ouercome his folly, or otherwiſe dye honorably in defence of our libertie. Yet at his friendes perſwaſions, he went firſt vnto his houſe in the country, but taried not long there, and returned ſtraight again to ROME. When he came thither ouernight, the next morning betimes he went into the market place, & ſued to the Tribune of the people, purpoſely to croſſe Metellus enterpriſe, becauſe the power & authoritie of the Tribune cõſiſteth more in hindring, then doing any thing: for if all men elſe were agreed of a matter, and that he onely were againſt it, the Tribune would cary it from them all.

Cato at the firſt had not many of his friendes about him, but when they heard of his intent, why he made ſute for the Tribuneſhip all his friendes and noble men ſtraight tooke part with him, confirmed his determination, and incouraged him to go on withall, for that he did it rather to ſerue the common wealth, thẽ his owne turne, conſidering, that where many times before he might (without reſiſtance or deniall) haue obteined the ſame, the ſtate being toward no trouble, he then would neuer ſue for it, but now that he ſaw it in danger, where he was to fight for the common wealth, and the protection of her libertie.

It is reported that there was ſuch a number of people about him to fauour his ſute, that he was like to haue bene ſtifled amõg them, & thought he ſhould neuer haue come to the market place, for the preaſſe of people that ſwarmed about him. Thus when he was choſen Tribune with Metellus and others, he perceiued how they bought & ſold the voyces of the people when the Conſuls were choſen: whereupon he made an Oration, & ſharply tooke them vp for this deteſtable marchãdiſe, and after his Oration ended, ſolemnly proteſted by oth that he would accuſe him, and bewray his name, which had giuen money to be choſen Cõſul. Howbeit he ſpake nothing of Syllanus, whoſe ſiſter, Seruilia, he had maried: but he flatly accuſed Lucius Muræna, that had obtained to be Cõſul with Syllanus, by meanes of his money. Now a law being prouided, that the party accuſed might haue a keeper or ſpiall to follow the accuſer, to ſee what he would accuſe the party with, that he might the better be able to defend himſelfe, knowing what ſhould be obiected againſt him: Muræna hauing one for him to wait vpon Cato, to conſider throughly what courſe he tooke, when he ſaw that he went not malitiouſly to worke, but tooke a plaine common way of a iuſt accuſer: he had ſo great confidence in Catoes vpright mind and integritie, that not regarding the narrow ſifting of him otherwiſe, he did one day aske him himſelfe in the market place, (or at home in his owne houſe) if that day he were determined to proſecute any matter againſt him touching his accuſation. If Cato aunſwered him that he did not: thẽ he went his way and ſimply beleeued him.

Cicero defended Muræna againſt his accuſer Cato.

When the day came indeed that his cauſe was to be heard, & pleaded vnto: Cicero being Conſull that yeare, defending Muræna, played ſo pleaſantly with the STOICKE Philoſophers, and their ſtrange opinions, that he made all the Iudges laugh: in ſomuch as Cato himſelfe ſmiling at him, told them that were by him: ſee, we haue a pleaſant Conſull that makes men laugh thus. So Muræna being diſcharged by this iudgement, did neuer after malice Cato for that, but ſo long as he remained Conſull, he was alwayes ruled by his counſell in all his affaires, & continued euer to honour him, following his counſell in all things touching his office. Hereof Cato himſelf was cauſe, who was neuer rough nor terrible, but in matters of counſell, and in his orations before the people, for the maintenance onely of equitie and iuſtice: for otherwiſe, he was very ciuil & curteous to all mẽ. But before he entred into his Tribuneſhip, Cicero being yet Conſull, he did helpe him in many things touching his office, but ſpecially, in bringing Catilins conſpiracie to good end, which was a noble act done of him.

The conſpiracie of Catilin againſt Rome.

For Catilin did practiſe a generall commotion and ſturre in the common wealth, to ouerthrow the whole ſtate of ROME, by ciuill diſcord within ROME, and open warres abroad: who being diſcouered and ouercome by Cicero, he was driuen in the end to flie ROME. But Lentulus, Cethegus, and many other of the accomplices of this conſpiracie, blamed Catilin for his faint and cowardly proceeding in it. For their parts, they had determined to burne the whole citie of ROME, and to put all the Empire thereof in vprore, by ſtraunge warres, and rebellions of forreine nations and prouinces. Howbeit this treaſon being diſcouered, as appeareth more largely in the life of Cicero, the matter was referred vnto the iudgement of the Senate, to determine what was to be done therein. Syllanus being the firſt who was asked his opinion therein, ſayd, that he thought it good they ſhould ſuffer cruell paines : and after him alſo,all the reſt ſaid the like , vntill it came to Cæſar.Cæſar being an excellent ſpoken man,& that rather deſired to nouriſh then to quench any ſuch ſturres or ſeditions in the common wealth , being fit for his purpoſe lõg determined of: made an Oration full of ſweet pleaſant wordes, declaring vnto them , that to put ſuch men as them to death without lawfull condemnation , he thought it altogether vnreaſonable, and rather that they ſhould do better to keepe them in priſon . This Oration of C*æſar* ſo altered all the reſt of the Senators minds,for that they were affrayd of the people : that Syllanus ſelfe mended his opinion againe,& ſayd,that he meant not they ſhould put them to death, but keepe thẽ faſt in priſon , becauſe that to be a priſoner, was the greateſt paine a ROMAINE Citizen could abide. Thus,the Senators minds being ſo ſodainly chaunged, & bent to a more fauourable ſentence: C*ato* riſing vp to ſay his opinion,began very angrily with maruellous eloquence, grieuouſly to reproue Syllanus for changing his mind,& ſharply to take vp C*æſar*, that vnder a popular ſemblance,& maſke of ſweet ſuggred words , he ſought vnder hand to deſtroy the common wealth,and alſo to terrifie and make the Senate affrayed: where he himſefe ſhould haue ” bene affrayd , and thinke himſelfe happy , if he could ſcape from being ſuſpected , giuing ſuch ” apparant cauſe of ſuſpition as he did, going about ſo openly to take the enemies and traitours ” of the common wealth out of the hands of iuſtice,ſeeming to haue no pitie nor compaſsion of ” his naturall citie,of ſuch nobilitie and fame,being euen brought in maner to vtter deſtruction, ” but rather to lament the fortune of theſe wicked men,that it was pity they were euer borne, & ” whoſe death preſerued ROME from a thouſand murthers & miſchiefs. Of all the Orations that ” euer C*ato* made,that onely was kept:for C*icero* the Conſull, that day had diſperſed diuers pen ” men in ſundry places of the Senate houſe,which had maruellous ſwift hands , and had further taught them how to make briefe notes and abridgements , which in few lines ſhewed many words. For vntill that time,writers were not knowen that could by figures & ciphers expreſſe a whole ſentence and word,as afterwardes they could:being then the firſt time that euer they were found out. So C*ato* at that time preuailed againſt Cæſar,and made them all chaunge their mindes againe , that theſe men were put to death . But that we may not leaue out a iot of his maners,as the very pattern and impreſsion of his mind: It is reported, that when C*ato* that day was ſo hot , and vehement againſt Cæſar,that all the Senate could but looke at them , to heare them both:a letter was deliuered Cæſar,ſent him into the houſe. C*ato* began preſently to ſuſpect it,and ſo earneſtly miſliked of it,that many of the Senatours being offended, commaunded his letter ſhould be ſeene & read opẽly. Cæſar thereupon reached his letter vnto C*ato*,that ſate not farre from him. When C*ato* had read it,& found that it was a loue letter which his ſiſter Seruilia had written vnto C*æſar*,whõ ſhe loued,& had knowen:he caſt it againe to C*æſar* , & ſaid there,drunkard. After that he went on againe with his matter,which he had begun before. In, fine,it ſeemeth that C*ato* was very vnfortunate in his wiues: for this Seruilia , as we haue ſayd, had an ill name by C*æſar* . And the other Seruilia alſo , which was his ſiſter , was worſe defamed. For ſhe being maried vnto Lucullus,one of the greateſt men of ROME, by whom ſhe had a ſon was in the end put away frõ him,for her naughty life . But worſt of all,his own wife Attilia alſo was not altogether cleare without ſuſpitiõ: For though he had two ſonnes by her , yet he was driuen to be diuorced from her,ſhe was ſo naught and common . After that, he maried Martia,the daughter of P*hilip*,which by report ſeemed to be a very honeſt gentlewoman. It is ſhe that is ſo famous among the ROMAINES. For in the life of C*ato*,this place (as a fable or comedie) is diſputable,and hard to be iudged. For thus it was, as Thraſeas writeth : who referreth all to the report and credit of one Munatius , Catoes very familiar friend . Among many that loued C*atoes* vertues,& had them in admiration , ſome of them did ſhew him more what he was,then other ſome did: amongeſt the which, was Q. Hortenſius,a man of great honeſtie and authoritie . He,deſiring not onely to be C*atoes* friend and familiar , but alſo to ioyne with him in alliance,and by affinitie to make both their houſes one: was not abaſhed to moue him, to let him haue his daughter P*orcia* in mariage,(which was Bibulus wife, & had brought him two children) that he might alſo caſt abroad the ſeede of goodly children , in that pleaſant fertile ground . And though to men this might ſeeme a ſtraunge minde and deſire , yet that in reſpect of nature, it was both honeſt and profitable to the common wealth,not to ſuffer a young woman in the prime of her youth, to loſe the frute of her wombe, being apt to beare children; nor alſo that he ſhould impouerish his ſonne in law with moe children, then one houſe needed. And further, that communicating women in this ſort from one to an other, ſpecially being beſtowed vpon worthy and vertuous men: that vertue ſhould thereby be increaſed the more, being ſo diſperſed in diuers families, and the citie likewiſe ſhould be the ſtronger, by making alliances in this ſort together. And if it be ſo, quoth he, that Bibulus do loue his wife ſo dearely, that he will not depart from her altogether, then that he would reſtore her to him againe, when he had a child by her, that thereby he might be the more bound in friendſhip to him, by meanes of this communication of children with Bibulus ſelfe, and with him. Cato aunſwered him, that he loued Hortenſius well, and liked of his alliance howbeit that he maruelled he would ſpeake to him to let him haue his daughter to get children of, ſith he knew that ſhe was maried to an other. Thẽ Hortenſius altering his tale, ſtucke not to tell him his mind plainly, & to deſire his wife of him, the which was yet a yong woman, & Cato had childrẽ enough. But a man can not tell whether Hortenſius made this ſute, becauſe he ſaw Cato make no reckoning of Martia, for that ſhe was then with child by him. In fine, Cato ſeeing the earneſt deſire of Hortẽſius, he did not deny him her, but told him, that he muſt alſo get Philips good will, the father of Martia. He knowing that Cato had graunted his good will, would not therefore let him haue his daughter, before that Cato himſelfe by his preſence did confirme the contract and mariage with him. Though theſe things were done long after, yet hauing occaſion to talke of Catoes wiues, I thought it not amiſſe to anticipate the time. Now Lentulus, & his cõſorts of Catilines conſpiracie being put to death: Cæſar, to cloke the accuſations wherewith Cato charged him in opẽ Senate, did put himſelfe into the peoples hands, and gathering the rakehels & ſeditious perſons together, which ſought to ſet all at ſix & ſeuen, he did further encourage them in their miſchieuous intent and practiſes. Whereupon, Cato fearing leaſt ſuch a rabble of people ſhould put all the commõ wealth in vproare & daunger: he perſwaded the Senat to winne the poore needy people that had nothing, by diſtributing of corne amongſt them, the which was done: For the charge thereof amounted yearely vnto twelue hundred and fiftie talents. This liberalitie did manifeſtly drinke vp and quench all thoſe troubles which they ſtood in feare of. But on the other ſide, Metellus entring into his Tribuneſhip, made certaine ſeditious Orations and aſſemblies, & preferred a law to the people, that Pompey the great ſhould preſently be called into ITALIE with his army, that he ſhould keepe the citie by his comming, from the preſent daunger of Catilins conſpiracie. Theſe were but wordes ſpoken for faſhions ſake, but indeede the law had a ſecret meaning, to put the whole cõmon wealth & Empire of ROME into Pompeys hands. Hereupõ the Senate aſſembled, wherein Cato at his firſt comming, ſpake ſomwhat gently, and not too vehemẽtly againſt Metellus, as his manner was to be ſharpe vnto them that were againſt him: but modeſtly perſwaded him, and fell to intreate him in the end, and highly to extoll his houſe, for that they had alwayes taken part with the Senate and nobilitie. But Metellus therewith tooke ſuch pride & conceit of himſelf, that he began to deſpiſe Cato, thinking he had vſed that mildneſſe, as though he had bene affrayde of him: in ſomuch as he gaue out proud ſpeaches againſt him, and cruell threats, that in deſpight of the Senate he would do that which he had vndertaken. Then Cato chaunging his countenance, his voyce and ſpeach, after he had ſpoken very ſharply againſt him; in the end he roughly proteſted, that while he liued, he would neuer ſuffer Pompey to come into ROME with his armie. The Senate hearing them both, thought neither of both well in their wits, but that Metellus doings was a furie, which proceeding of a cancred ſtomacke and extreme malice, would put all in hazard: & that which Cato did, was a rauiſhment and extacie of his vertue, that made him beſide himſelfe, contending for iuſtice and equitie. When the day came that this law ſhould paſſe by voyces of the people, Metellus failed not to be in the market place with a world of ſtraungers, ſlaues, and fenſers, armed, and ſet in battell ray, beſides a number of the common people that were deſirous to ſee Pompeys returne, hoping after chaunge. Beſides all thoſe, Cæſar then being Prætor, gaue aide likewiſe with his men, in the behalfe of Metellus. On the contrary part alſo, the noble men & Senators of the citie were as angry as Cato, and ſayd it was a horrible ſhame: howbeit they were his friendes, rather in miſliking the matter, then in defending the common wealth.

Whereupon, all his friendes at home, and his whole family, were maruellouſly perplexed and ſorowfull, that they both refuſed their meate, and alſo could take no reſt in the night for feare of Cato. But he, as one without feare, hauing a good hart with him, did comfort his people, and bad them not ſorow for him: and after he had ſupped, as he commonly vſed to do, he went to bed, and ſlept ſoundly all night, till the morning that Minutius Thermus, his collegue & fellow Tribune, came and called him. So they both went together into the market place, accompanied with a very few after them: Whereupon diuers of their friends came and met them by the way, & bad them take heede vnto themſelues. When they were come into the market place, and that Cato ſaw the temple of Caſtor and Pollux full of armed men, and the degrees or ſteps kept by ſword players and fenſers, and Metellus on the top of them ſet by Cæſar: turning to his friends he ſayd, ſee I pray you the coward there, what a number of armed men he hath gotten together, againſt one man naked, & vnarmed. Therewithall he ſtraight went forward with his companion Thermus vnto that place, and they that kept the degrees, opened of them ſelues to let him paſſe, but they would let no other go vp but himſelfe: But Cato with much a do, taking Minutius by the hand, got him vp with him, and when he was come vp, he ſate him downe betwixt Metellus and Cæſar, to keepe them aſunder, that they ſhould not whiſper one in an others eare. Neither of them both could tell what to ſay to him. Whereupon the noble men that conſidered Catoes countenaunce and boldnes, wondring to ſee it, drew neare and by their cryes willed him not to be affrayd, but encouraged one an other to ſticke by him, that ſtood for defence of their libertie. So, there was a ſeruaunt that tooke the written law in his hand, and would haue read it to the people: but Cato would not let him. Then Metellus tooke it himſelfe in his handes to read it: but Cato alſo ſnatched it out of his handes. Metellus notwithſtanding, hauing it perfect without booke, would needes declare the effect of it by hart. But Thermus clapped his hand before his mouth to keepe him that he ſhould not ſpeake. Metellus ſeeing theſe two men bent by all meanes to keepe this law from paſsing, and that the people did leane on their ſide: he beckned to his men to go for the armed men which were at home in his houſe, that they ſhould come with terrour and cries to make them affrayd, and ſo they did. The people thereupon were diſperſed here and there for feare, that Cato was left alone in the market place, and they threw ſtones at him from beneath. But then Muræna, who had before accuſed Cato for buying of the Conſulſhip, forſooke him not in that daunger, but holding his long gowne before him, cryed out vnto them beneath, that threw at Cato, to leaue. So ſhewing him the daunger he had brought himſelfe vnto, holding him ſtill by the armes, he brought him into the temple of Caſtor and Pollux. Then Metellus ſeeing the pulpit for Orations voided, and his enemies flying out of the market place, he thought he had wonne the gole: Whereupon commaunding his ſouldiers to depart, then proceeding gently, he attempted to paſſe his law. But his enemies that fled for feare, being gathered againe together in the market place, began a freſh to cry out againſt Metellus, with greater boldneſſe and courage then before. Then Metellus and his adherents being affrayd and amazed, doubting that their enemies had gotten weapons, and were prouided, and therefore were the bolder: they fled, and all of them left the pulpit for Orations. So when Metellus and his company were gone, Cato came againe to the pulpit for Orations, and greatly commended the people for the good will they had ſhewed, and perſwaded them to continue in their well doing. Whereupon the common people were then againſt Metellus, and the Senate alſo being aſſembled gaue order, that Cato ſhould haue better ayde then he had before, and that by all meanes poſsible they ſhould reſiſt Metellus law, which onely tended to moue ſedition and ciuill warre in ROME. For Metellus ſelfe, he was yet vehemently bent to follow his attempt and enterpriſe: but perceiuing that his friendes were maruellouſly affrayed of Cato, as a man whom they thought inuincible, he ſodainly came into the market place, and aſſembling the people, told them many reaſons in his Oration, ſuppoſing to bring Cato in diſgrace with the people, and amongeſt other things he ſayd, that he would withdraw himſelfe out of this tyrannicall power of Catoes, and his conſpiracie againſt Pompey, the which peraduenture the citie before it were long, ſhould repent, for that they had ſhamed and defaced ſo noble a man. After that, he preſently departed ROME, and went into ASIA to informe Pompey of all this matter. Cato on the other ſide was greatly eſteemed for his doings, for that he had freed the cõmon wealth from the great trouble of ſuch a fooliſh Tribune, and by ouerthrowing Metellus, he had alſo ſuppreſſed the power of Pompey. But he was yet much more commended, when he was againſt the Senate, who would haue noted Metellus of infamie, and depriued him of his office, the which he would not ſuffer them to do. The common people thought him of a curteous and gentle nature, becauſe he would not tread his enemie vnder his foote, when he had the vpper hand of him, nor be reuenged of him when he had ouercome him: but wiſe men iudged it otherwiſe, that it was wiſely done of him not to prouoke Pompey. About this time returned Lucullus frõ the warre, of the which it ſeemed that Pompey had taken the honor & glory from him for the ending of it, & was likely alſo to haue bene put frõ his honour of triumph, for that Caius Memmius was his aduerſary, who layd many accuſations againſt him before the people, rather to pleaſe Pompey, then for any malice elſe he had towards him. But Cato, both for that Lucullus was his brother in law, and had maried his owne ſiſter Seruilia, as alſo for that he ſaw they did him wrong: reſiſted this Memmius, & defended many accuſatiõs againſt him. So that in the end, though Memmius had laboured that Cato ſhould be depriued of his office, as from a tyrannicall power: yet Cato compelled Memmius at the laſt to leaue off his accuſations, and to proſecute law no more againſt him. Thus Lucullus hauing obteined honor of triumph, did embrace Catoes friendſhip more then before, taking him for a ſure bulwarck and defence againſt the power of Pompey the great. But Pompey ſhortly after returning home againe, with great honour from his conqueſts, truſting that for reſpect of his welcome he ſhould be denyed nothing at the peoples hands when he came home: ſent before vnto the Senate, to pray them for his ſake to deferre the election of the Conſuls, vntill he came to ROME, that being preſent he might fauour Piſoes ſute, ſuing to be Conſull. Thereunto the moſt part of the Senate gaue their conſent, but Cato on the other ſide was againſt it, not that the deferring of time was a matter of ſuch importance, but to cut all hope from Pompey to go about to attempt any new deuiſes, inſomuch that he made the Senate chaunge opinion againe, and Pompeys requeſt was denied. Pompey being maruellouſly troubled withall, & perceiuing that Cato would be againſt him in all things if he found not ſome deuiſe to winne him: he ſent for his friend Munatius, by his meanes to demaund Catoes two neeces of him which were mariable: the eldeſt for himſelfe, & the yongeſt for his ſonne. Others ſay alſo, that they were not his neeces, but his own daughters. Munatius did Pompeys meſſage, & brake the matter vnto him, his wife, & to his ſiſters, who maruellouſly deſired Pompeys alliance, for the greatneſſe & dignitie of his perſon. But Cato making no farther delay, without other deliberation, as not greatly pleaſed with the motion, aunſwered him preſently. Munatius, go thy way vnto Pompey againe, and tell him that Cato is not to be wonne by women, though otherwiſe I miſlike not of his friendſhip: and withall, that ſo long as he ſhall deale vprightly in all cauſes, & none otherwiſe, that he ſhall finde him more aſſuredly his friend, then by any alliance of mariage: and yet, that to ſatisfie Pompeys pleaſure and will againſt his country, he will neuer giue him ſuch pledges. The women & his friends at that time were angry with his aunſwer & refuſall, ſaying, it was too ſtately and vncurteous. But afterwardes it chaunced, that Pompey ſuing to haue one of his friendes made Conſull, he ſent a great ſumme of money to bribe the voyces of the people, which liberalitie was noted, & ſpoken of, becauſe the money was told in Pompeys own garden. Then did Cato tell the women of his houſe, that if he had now bene bound by alliance of mariage vnto Pompey, he ſhould then haue bene driuen to haue bene partaker of Pompeys ſhamefull acts. When they heard what he had told them, they all confeſſed then that he was wiſer to refuſe ſuch alliance, then they were that wiſhed and deſired it. And yet, if men ſhould iudge of wiſedome, by the ſucceſſe and euent of things: I muſt needes ſay, that Cato was in great fault for refuſing of this alliance. For thereby he was the cauſe of Pompeys matching with Cæſar, who ioyning both their powers together, was the whole deſtruction of the Empire of ROME: Whereas peraduenture it had not fallen out ſo, if Cato fearing Pompeys light faultes, had not cauſed him by increaſing his power with an other, to commit farre greater faultes. Howbeit thoſe things were yet to come. Furthermore. Pompey being at iarre with Lucullus, touching certain ordinãces which he had made in the Realme of PONTVS, becauſe both the one & the other would haue their ordinances to take place: Cato fauoured Lucullus, who had open wrong. Pompey therefore ſeeing that he was the weaker in the Senate, tooke part with the people, and put forth the law for diuiuing of the landes amongeſt the ſouldiers. But Cato ſtoutly reſiſting that law againe, he put it by, and made Pompey thereby in a rage to acquaint himſelſe with Publius Clodius, the moſt ſeditious and boldeſt perſon of all the Tribunes, and beſides that, made allyance euen at that time with Cæſar, whereof Cato himſelſe was the onely Authour. Cæſar returning out of SPAYNE from his Prætorſhip, required the honour of triumphe, and withall made ſute to be Conſull. But being a law to the contrary, that they that ſued to be Conſuls ſhould be preſent themſelues in the citie, and ſuch alſo as deſired honour of triumphe, ſhould be without the citie: he earneſtly required the Senate, that he might ſue for the Conſulſhip by his friendes. The moſt part of the Senate were willing vnto it, but Cato was flatly againſt it. He perceiuing that the other Senatours were willing to gratifie Cæſar, when it came to him to deliuer his opinion, he ſpent all the whole day in his Oration, and by this pollicie preuented the Senate, that they could not conclude any thing. Then Cæſar letting fall his triumphe, made ſute to be Conſull, and entring the citie, ioyned friendſhip with Pompey. Hereupon he was choſen Conſull, and immediatly after maried his daughter Iulia vnto Pompey: and ſo hauing made in manner a conſpiracie againſt the common wealth betweene themſelues, Cæſar preferred the law Agraria, for diſtributing the landes vnto the Citizens, and Pompey was preſent to mainteine the publication thereof. Lucullus and Cicero on the other ſide taking part with Bibulus the other Conſull, did what they could againſt it, but ſpecially Cato: who fearing much this alliance of Cæſar and Pompey, that it was a pact and conſpiracie to ouerthrow the common wealth, ſayd, that he cared not ſo much for this law Agraria, as he feared the reward they looked for, who by ſuch meanes did intiſe and pleaſe the common people. Therewithall, the Senate were wholly of his opinion, and ſo were many other honeſt men of the people beſides, that were none of the Senate, and tooke his part: maruelling much, and alſo being offended with Cæſars great vnreaſonableneſſe and importunitie, who by the authoritie of his Conſulſhip did preferre ſuch things, as the moſt ſeditiouſeſt Tribunes of the people were wont commonly to do, to currie fauour with the people, and by ſuch vile meanes ſought to make them at his commaundement. Wherefore, Cæſar and his friends fearing ſo great enemies, fell to open force. For to begin withall, as the Conſull Bibulus was going to the market place, there was a basket of dung powred vpon his head: and furthermore, the Officers roddes were broken in their handes, which they caried before him. In fine, dartes were throwen at them out of euery corner, and many of them being hurt, they all at length were driuen to flye, and leaue the market place. But Cato, he came laſt of all, keeping his wonted pace, and often caſt backe his head, and curſed ſuch Citizens. So, they did not onely paſſe this law Agraria by voyces of the people, but furthermore they added to it: that the Senate ſhould be ſworne to ſtabliſh that law, and be bounde to defende the ſame, (if any attempted the alteration thereof) vpon great penalties and fines to be ſet on his head, that ſhould refuſe the othe. All the other Senatours ſware againſt their wils, remembring the example of the miſchiefe that chanced vnto the old Metellus, who was baniſhed out of ITALIE, becauſe he would not ſweare to ſuch a like law. Whereupon, the women that were in Catoes houſe, beſought him with the teares in their eyes, that he would yeeld and take the othe: and ſo did alſo diuers of his friendes beſides. Howbeit, he that moſt inforced and brought Cato to ſweare, was Cicero the Oratour: who perſwaded him, that peraduenture he would be thought vnreaſonable, that being but one man, he ſhould ſeeme to miſlike that, which all other had thought meete and reaſonable: and that it were a fonde part of him wilfully to put himſelfe in ſo great daunger, thinking to hynder a matter already paſt remedie. But yet that beſides all this, a greater inconuenience would happen, if he forſooke his country (for whoſe ſake he did all theſe things) and left it a prey vnto them, which ſought the vtter ſubuerſion of the ſame, as if he were glad to be ridde from the trouble of defending the common wealth. For (ſayd he) though Cato haue no neede of ROME, yet ROME hath neede of Cato, and ſo haue all his friends: of the which, Cicero ſayd he was the chiefe, and was moſt maliced of Publius Clodius the Tribune, who ſought to driue him out of the country. It is ſayd that Cato being wonne by theſe like wordes and perſwaſions at home, and openly in the market place, they ſo ſoftened him, that he came to take his othe laſt of all men, but one Phaonius, a very friend of his. Cæſars hart being then lift vp, for that he had brought his firſt purpoſe to paſſe: began now to preferre an other law, to diuide all CAMPANIA, and the country called TERRA DI LAVORO, (the land of labour) vnto the poore needy people of ROME, and no man ſtood againſt him but Cato. Whereupon Cæſar made his officers to take him from the pulpit for Orations, to carie him to priſon. All this made not Cato ſtoupe, nor leaue his francke ſpeach, but as he went he ſtill ſpake againſt this edict, and perſwaded the people to beware of them that preferred ſuch lawes. All the Senate, and the beſt ſort of Citizens followed Cato with heauie hartes, ſhewing by their ſilence that they were offended and angry for the iniurie they did vnto him, being ſo worthy a man. In ſomuch as Cæſars ſelfe perceiued that the people were offended with it, and yet of ambition and ſtomacke, he looked alwayes when Cato would haue appealed vnto the people. So when he ſaw that Cato meant no ſuch matter, at length ouercome with ſhame and diſhonour, he himſelfe procured one of the Tribunes to take Cato from the Sergeaunts. In fine, all Cæſars practiſe tended to this end, that when he had wonne the peoples fauour by ſuch lawes: they ſhould then graunt him the gouernement of all the GAVLES, (aſwell on this ſide, as beyond the mountaines) and all ILLYRIA, with an armie of foure legions, for the ſpace of fiue yeares, notwithſtanding that Cato told the people before, that they themſelues with their owne voyces did ſet vp a tyrant, that one day would cut their thoats. They did alſo chuſe Publius Clodius Tribune of the people, which was of a noble houſe: a thing directly contrary to the law. But this Clodius had promiſed them, ſo that they would helpe him to baniſh Cicero out of ROME, to do all that he could for them. Furthermore, they made Calphurnius Piſo (Cæſars wiues father) and Gabinius Paulus, (a man wholly at Pompeys commaundement, as they write which knew his life and manners) Conſuls the next yeare following. Now, notwithſtanding they had the rule of the common wealth in their owne handes, and that they had wonne part of the citie with bribes, and the other part alſo with feare: yet they were both affrayed of Cato, when they conſidered what trouble they had to ouercome him, which they did very hardly notwithſtanding, and to their great ſhame, being driuen to vſe force, and yet thought they ſhould neuer haue done it. Furthermore, Clodius vtterly diſpaired that he could poſſiblie baniſh Cicero, ſo long as Cato was there. So deuiſing wayes how to do it, when he had taken poſſeſſion of his office, he ſent for Cato, and began to tell him, that he thought him the honeſteſt and iuſteſt man of ROME, and that he was ready to performe it to him by deede. For, where many made ſute vnto him to be ſent into CYPRVS, to make warre with king Ptolomie: he thought none ſo worthy as himſelfe, and therefore for the good will he bare him, he was very willing to offer him that pleaſure. Cato ſtraight cryed out with open mouth, that this was a deuiſe to intrappe him, not to pleaſure him. Then Clodius proudly and fiercely aunſwered him, well, ſeeing thou wilt not go with good will, thou ſhalt go then againſt thy will: and ſo he did. For at the firſt aſſembly of the citie, he cauſed the people to graunt his commiſſion for his iourney thither: but they neither appointed him ſhippes, nor ſouldiers, nor any Miniſters to go with him, ſauing two Secretaries onely, of the which, the one of them was a very villaine and arrant theefe, and the other, one of Clodius followers. Beſides all this, as if they had appointed him but litle to do in CYPRVS againſt Ptolomie, he made them commaunde him after that, to go and reſtore the outlawes and baniſhed men of the citie of BYZANTIVM, vnto their country and goodes againe, of purpoſe onely to keepe Cato farre enough from ROME, whileſt he continued Tribune. Cato being driuen by neceſſitie to obey, he counſelled Cicero (whom Clodius purſued) to beware that he made no ſturre againſt him, for feare of bringing ROME into ciuill warre and murther for his ſake; but rather, to abſent himſelfe, that he might an other tyme preſerue his countrey. After that, he ſent his friend Canidius before into CYPRVS, vnto Ptolomie, to perſwade him to be quiet without warre: declaring vnto him, that he ſhould neither lacke honour nor riches, for the ROMAINES would graunt him the Prieſthood of Venus in the citie of PAPHOS. Cato in the meane meane tyme remained in the Ile of RHODES, preparing himſelfe there, and abiding his aunſwere. In the time of theſe ſturres Ptolomie king of ÆGYPT, for a certaine offence and diſcorde with his ſubiectes, departing out of ALEXANDRIA, ſayled towardes ROME, hoping that Cæſar and Pompey with a great armie would reſtore him to his crowne and kingdome againe. He being deſirous to ſee Cato, ſent vnto him, ſuppoſing he would come at his ſending for. Cato by chaunce was occupied at that tyme about ſome buſineſſe, and bad the meſſenger will Ptolomie to come to him, if he would ſee him. So when Ptolomie came, he neither went to meete him, nor roſe vp vnto him, but onely welcomed him, and bad him ſit downe. It amazed the king at the firſt, to ſee vnder ſo ſimple and meane a trayne, ſuch a ſtatelineſſe and maieſtie in Catoes behauiour. But he heard him boldly talke with him of his affaires, and ſuch graue talke come from him, reprouing his follie he had committed, to forſake ſuch princely pleaſure and wealth, to go and ſubiect himſelfe vnto ſuch diſhonour, ſuch extreme paynes, and ſuch paſsing great giftes and preſents, as he ſhould throw away, to ſatisfie the couetouſneſſe of the rulers at ROME, the which was ſo vnſatiable, that if all the Realme of ÆGYPT were conuerted into ſiluer to giue among them, it would ſcarce ſuffice them: in reſpect whereof, he counſelled him to returne backe with his nauie, and to reconcile himſelfe againe with his ſubiectes, offering himſelfe alſo to go with him, to helpe to make his peace. Then Ptolomy comming to himſelfe, and repenting him of his follie, knowing that Cato told him truly, and wiſely: he determined to follow his counſell, had not his friendes turned his minde to the contrarie. So when Ptolomie came to ROME, and was driuen to wait at the gates of the Magiſtrates that were in authoritie: he ſighed then, and repented his follie, for that he had not onely deſpiſed the counſell of a wiſe man, but rather the Oracle of a god. Furthermore, the other Ptolomie that was in CYPRVS (a happie turne for Cato) poyſoned himſelfe. Cato being alſo informed that he left a wonderfull ſumme of money behind him, he determined to go himſelfe vnto BYZANTIVM, and ſent his nephew Brutus into CYPRVS, becauſe he durſt not truſt Canidius ſo farre. Then hauing reſtored the baniſhed men vnto the peoples fauour againe, ſetting agreement betwixt them, he returned into CYPRVS. There he founde a maruellous great treaſure, and plate both of gold and ſiluer, tables, precious ſtones, hangings, and purple ſilkes, all the which he was to make ready money of. There he tooke great care and paynes to raiſe all things to the vtmoſt and deareſt pryces that could be, and he himſelfe was preſent at all, to keepe reckoning of the laſt peny. Wherefore, to bring this to paſſe, he would not ſtand to the common vſe of the ſale of the cryer, but ſuſpected them all, both cryers, prayſers, and his owne friendes, and therefore talked himſelfe with the prayſers, and made them ſet high priſes vpon euery thing that was to be ſold. And thus were the moſt part of the goodes ſold and caryed away, at the deareſt prices. This did maruellouſly offende the moſt of his friendes, when they ſaw that he did miſtruſt them: but Munatius ſpecially, his deareſt friend, tooke it ſo inwardly, that he thought neuer to be friendes with him againe. In ſomuch as in the booke Cæſar wrote againſt Cato, in this place he forceth moſt the accuſation againſt him. Munatius notwithſtanding writeth, that he was not angry ſo much with Cato for that he miſtruſted him, but for a certaine diſdaine he had himſelfe of Cato, and for the emulation betwixt him and Canidius. For Munatius wrote a booke of Catoes deeds and ſayings, whom Thraſeas in his hiſtory chiefly followed. In this booke he ſheweth that he came late into CYPRVS, and was very ill lodged. ſell, he would not come there neither. Wherfore Cato threatned him, that he would ſeaze vpon all his goods and cariage, as they vſe to handle them that are diſobedient vnto iuſtice. This notwithſtanding, Munatius cared not for it, but tooke ſea, and returned againe to Rome, bearing Cato grudge a long time. Then Martia, being at that time Catoes wife, ſpake with him, & were both bidden to ſupper together, vnto a friend of theirs, called Barca. Thereupon Cato alſo arriued, and came thither, when they were all ſet at ſupper, and asked where he ſhould ſit, Barca told him againe, where it pleaſed him. Then caſting his eyes about, he ſayd he would ſit by Munatius: and ſo fetching a compaſſe about the bord, he went and ſate by him, but offered him no friendſhip and familiaritie all ſupper tyme. Afterwardes notwithſtanding, at the requeſt of Martia, that was earneſtly in hand with Cato for him: he wrote vnto him, & willed him to come and ſpeake with him. Munatius went to Catoes houſe in the morning, where Martia ſtayed him, and kept him companie, vntill all the reſt that came to ſalute Cato, were departed. Then Cato comming to him, embraced him in his armes, and made very much of him. We haue the willinglier dilated this matter at length, becauſe mens natures and manners might be diſcerned euen in theſe ſmall matters of friendſhip priuately, as otherwiſe in the greateſt publicke cauſes. Now touching Catoes commiſsion, he got together litle leſſe then ſeuen thouſand ſiluer talents. Furthermore, fearing the farreneſſe of the iourney he had to go by ſea, he made diuers litle cofers, and put into euery one of them two talents, and fiue hundred Drachmas, and tyed vnto eache of them a long rope, and a great peece of corcke: becauſe that if the ſhippe ſhould fortune to miſcarie, thoſe corckes might ſhew where the cheſtes with money lay in the bottome of the ſea. Thus was all the money ſaued, ſauing a litle, & brought ſafely to Rome. Cato hauing made two bookes wherin he had noted all things done in his iourney, he could neither ſaue the one nor the other of thē. For one of his bondmen made free, called Philargyrus, tooke the one away: who taking ſhip at the hauen of Cenchrees, was himſelfe drowned, and the booke he had alſo, loſt with him. The other booke which he himſelfe had kept, vntill he came vnto Corfov: he lying in the market place of the citie in his tents, which he cauſed to be ſet vp: the Mariners being very cold in the night, made ſo great a fire, that it burnt the tents, ſtuffe, booke and all. Notwithſtanding, he brought certaine of the late king P*tolomies* ſlaues with him, who while he liued, had the charge and cuſtodie of all his treaſure and riches, the which he brought as witneſſes, to ſtoppe the mouthes of his malitious enemies, that would haue accuſed him in any thing. But yet the loſſe of them did grieue him, not ſo much for the great care and paynes he had taken in ſetting downe the account of his charge, for the iuſtification and proofe of his fidelitie and good ſeruice: but alſo, for that they might haue ſerued for a good memoriall and example vnto all others, to haue bene a like carefull in their charge, as himſelfe. But the goddes denyed him this good hap. Newes being brought that he was come to Rome by water, when they vnderſtood that he was at hand, by and by all the Magiſtrates, the Prieſtes, the Senate, & the moſt part of the people alſo went out to meete him by the riuers ſide: ſo that both ſides of the riuer of Tyber were full of people, & the receiuing of him in, ſeemed not inferiour to the entry of a triumphe. Notwithſtanding, ſome thought him very preſumptuous, that the Conſuls and Prætors comming out to meete him, he did not ſtay his gally, but rowed ſtill vp the ſtreame (being in a kings galley of ſix owers to euery bancke) and neuer ſtayed, vntill all his fleete arriued in the hauen. This notwithſtanding, when the cofers with money were caried through the market place into the treaſure chamber, the people wondred to ſee ſo great a quantitie of it. And thereupon the Senate being aſſembled, with great and honourable words they gaue Cato an extraordinary Prætorſhip, and priuiledge alſo, at any common ſports to weare a purple gowne. Cato refuſed all theſe honours, and onely beſought the Senate to make Nicias a free man, Steward of the late deceaſed king P*tolomy*, being a witneſſe of his faith and great paines he had taken in this ſeruice. P*hilip* the father of Martia, was that yeare Conſull, ſo that after a ſort, the authoritie of the Conſull was in Cato: becauſe Lentulus, collegue and fellow Conſull with P*hilip*, did no leſſe reuerence Cato for his vertues, then P*hilip* did for his allyance with him. Furthermore, when Cicero was reſtored againe from his baniſhment, the which P*ublius Clodius* (being then Tribune of the people) had put vpon him, and being againe againe growen to great credit: he went one day into the Capitoll, in the abſence of Clodius, by force to take away the tables which Clodius had conſecrated there, in the which were compriſed all his doings during the time he was Tribune. Thereupon the Senate being aſſembled, Clodius did accuſe Cicero of this violent fact. Cicero aunſwered him againe: that becauſe Clodius was choſen Tribune, directly againſt the law, therefore all his doings were voyde, and of no validitie. Then ſtood vp Cato, and ſayd: he knew that all that which Clodius did when he was Tribune, was ſcantly good and allowable, but yet if generally any man ſhould vndo all that he had paſſed by that authoritie: then all that he himſelfe had done likewiſe in CYPRVS, muſt of neceſſitie be reuoked. For the commiſſion that was graunted vnto him (by vertue whereof he had done many things) ſhould be vnlawfull: becauſe the Tribune alſo that did graunt it him, was not lawfully choſen. And therefore, that Publius Clodius was not made Tribune againſt the law, who by conſent of the law was taken out from a noble houſe, and made a popular perſon: howbeit, if he had behaued himſelfe vndutifully in his office, as other men that happely had offended, then he was to be accuſed to make him mend his fault, and not to deſtroy the authoritie of the officer, which in it ſelfe was lawfull. After that, there fell miſliking betwixt Cicero and Cato, for this counter buffe he had giuen him: and Cicero continued a long time after, before he did ſhew him any countenaunce of friendſhip as he had at other times done. But afterwardes they were reconciled together againe, by this occaſion. Pompey and Craſſus hauing bene with Cæſar to talke with him (who for that purpoſe came out of GAVLE beyond the Alpes) made an agreement there betwixt them, to demaund the ſecond Conſulſhip together, and when they had it, then to proroge Cæſars gouernement for fiue yeares more, & alſo they would haue the beſt prouinces & greateſt, for themſelues, with great armies, & money enough to pay thẽ with. This was indeed a plaine conſpiracie to deuide the Empire of ROME betweene them, & vtterly to ouerthrow the ſtate of the common wealth. At that time there were many noble men, which came to make ſute for the Conſulſhip. But when they ſaw Pompey and Craſſus offer to make ſute for it, all the reſt gaue ouer, but Lucius Domitius that had maried Porcia, Catoes ſiſter: through whoſe perſwaſion he would not relinquiſh his ſute, conſidering that it was not the office onely of the Conſulſhip that was the chiefeſt matter of importance, but the libertie of the Senate and people. Straight there ranne a rumour through the moſt part of the people, that they were not to ſuffer Pompeys power to be ioyned with Craſſus, by meanes of this office: for then his authoritie would be too great and ſtrong, and therefore, that of neceſſitie one of theſe two were to be denied. For this cauſe therefore, the good men tooke Domitius part, and did encourage him to go on with his ſute, aſſuring him of ayde vnder hand of diuers, which durſt not be ſene openly for feare of thoſe two great men, who at the day of the election would procure him voyces in his fauour. Pompey and Craſſus miſtruſting this, made Domitius be ſet vpon, going with torch light before day into the field of Mars, where the election was alwayes made: and firſt ſtriking the torch bearer that went before him, they hurt him ſo ſore, that he fell downe dead at his feete, Then they layed at the reſt in like caſe, who finding themſelues cruelly hurt, ranne away euery man of them, and left Domitius and Cato poſt alone. But Cato, notwithſtanding he was hurt in one of his armes, ſtill held Domitius faſt, and prayed him to tary, and not to leaue to defend the libertie of their country, againſt tyrants, which plainly ſhewed after what manner they would gouerne, ſith by ſuch wicked meanes they aſpired to tyrannicall gouernement. All this notwithſtanding, Domitius would tary no longer, but betooke him to his legges, and ranne home. Thus were Craſſus and Pompey without deniall proclaimed Conſuls. Cato neuer yeelded therefore, but came and ſued to be Prætor, becauſe that thereby he might yet make it ſome ſtrength and countenaunce to him againſt their Conſulſhip, that being no priuate perſon, he ſhould haue ſome better authoritie to reſiſt them that were the chiefeſt perſons. But they fearing, that the Prætorſhip by the eſtimation of Cato, would come to equall their authoritie of the Conſulſhip: firſt aſſembled the Senate (the moſt part of the Senatours not hearing of it) and in that aſſembly cauſed the Senate to decree: that all ſuch as were choſen Prætors, ſhould preſently go to their charge, not attending the time and libertie appointed by the law, during which time men might accuſe thoſe which had bought the voyces of the people with money. Then hauing by this colour and decree ſet ill doers at libertie, without feare of puniſhment, they pretending to vſe corruption, did preferre ſome of their owne Miniſters to make ſute for the Prætorſhip, them ſelues giuing money to corrupt the people, and being preſent alſo at the election. But notwithſtanding all theſe practiſes, the vertue and reputation of Cato ouercame them. For the people had him in ſo great reuerence, that they thought it too ſhamefull a part to ſell Cato by voyces, who deſerued rather to be hyred to take the Prætorſhip vpon him. Then the firſt Tribe being called to giue their voyces, declared him Prætor. Pompey ſeeing that, ſtraight brake off the aſſemblie, making a ſhamefull lye, telling that he heard it thunder: the which the ROMAINES do maruellouſly deteſt, and will conclude nothing when it thundereth. Howbeit afterwardes they gaue more money, then they had done before, and thereby draue away the chiefeſt men out of the field of Mars, and by practiſe obtained, that Vatinius was choſen Prætor for Cato. And the report went, that they that had ſo wickedly giuen their voyces, feeling themſelues pricked in conſcience, fled immediatly out of the field: and the honeſt men that remained, were both very ſory and angry, for the iniurie they had offered Cato. At that tyme one of the Tribunes keeping an aſſemblie of the citie, Cato ſtood vp, and told (as if he had prophecied) before them all, what would happen to the common wealth by theſe practiſers, and ſtirred vp the people againſt Pompey, and Cæſar, ſaying: that they were giltie of thoſe things, and therefore procured them to be done, becauſe they were affrayed that if Cato had bene Prætor, he would too narrowly haue ſifted out their deuiſes. In fine, Cato going home to his houſe, had more companie to waite vpon him alone, then all the other Prætors that had bene choſen. When Caius Trebonius, Tribune of the people, had preferred a law for the deuiding of the prouinces vnto the new Conſuls, SPAYNE and AFRICKE vnto the one, and ÆGYPT & SYRIA vnto the other, with full power to make warre as they thought good both by ſea and land: all other men hauing no hope to keepe it backe, did let it alone, and ſpake nothing to contrary it. Then Cato getting vp into the pulpit for Orations, before the people began to giue their voyces, could hardly haue two houres ſpace to ſpeake: but at length, they perceiuing that he delayed time by foretelling things to come, would ſuffer him to ſpeake no longer, but ſent a Sergeaunt to him, and plucked him by force out of the pulpit. But when he was beneath, and cryed out notwithſtanding, and diuers gaue good eare vnto him: the Sergeaunt went to him againe, and tooke him, and caryed him out of the market place. Howbeit the officer had no ſooner left him, but he went ſtraight towardes the pulpit for Orations, and there cried out more vehemently then before, and willed the people to haue an eye to ayde the libertie of their commõ wealth, which went to ruine. When he oftentimes together did this, Trebonius the Tribune being mad withall, commaunded his Sergeaunt to cary him to priſon. The people followed him hard notwithſtanding, to heare what he ſayd vnto them. Whereupon Trebonius fearing ſome ſturre, was forced to commaund his Sergeaunt to let Cato go. So Cato draue off all that day without any matter concluded. The next morning notwithſtanding, the contrary faction hauing partly put the ROMAINES in feare, and wonne the other part alſo by fayre wordes and money, and by force of armes likewiſe kept Aquilius, one of the Tribunes, from comming out of the Senate, and after they had alſo violently driuen Cato out of the market place, for ſaying that it thundred, and hauing hurt many men, and alſo ſlayne ſome out of hand in the market place: in the end they forcibly paſſed the decree by voyces of the people. Many being offended therewith, went a company of them together to plucke downe Pompeys images: but Cato would not ſuffer them. And afterwardes alſo, when they preferred an other law for the prorogation of the prouinces & armies which Cæſar demaunded: Cato would ſpeake no more to the people to hinder it, but proteſted vnto Pompey himſelf, that he ſaw not how he plucked Cæſar vpon him, and that he ſhould feele the weight of his force before he looked for it: and then when he could neither ſuffer nor remedy it, he would euen caſt his burthen and himſelfe vpon the common wealth, and too late would remember Catoes warnings, which were priuatly as profitable for Pompey, as openly iuſt and reaſonable for the cõmon wealth. Cato vſed many of theſe perſwaſions ſundry times vnto him, but Pompey neuer made account of them: for he would not be perſwaded that Cæſar would euer change in that ſort, and beſides he truſted too much to his owne power and proſperitie. Furthermore Cato was choſen Prætor for the next yeare following, in the which it appeared (though he miniſtred iuſtice vprightly) that he rather defaced and impaired the maieſtie and dignitie of his office, then that he gaue it grace and countenance by his doings: for he would oftentimes go a foot barelegged, and without any coate, vnto his Prætors chaire, & there giue ſentence of life & death, otherwhiles of men of great account. And ſome report, that he would giue audience when he had dyned, and drunke wine: but that is vntrue. Now Cato perceiuing that the citizens of ROME were marred by bribes & gifts of thoſe which aſpired vnto offices, and that the people made it an art and faculty to gaine by: to roote this vice altogether out of the common wealth, he perſwaded the Senate to make a law, that ſuch as hereafter ſhould be choſen Conſuls or Prætors, ſhould (if there were no man to accuſe them) come and offer themſelues before the iudges, and taking their oath, ſhould truely declare what meanes they had vſed to attaine to their office. This offended the ſuters for the offices, but much more the mercenarie multitude. Whereupon, a great number of them went in a morning together where he kept his audience, and all cryed out vpon him, reuiled him & threw ſtones at him: inſomuch as they that were there, were forced to flie thence, & himſelfe alſo was driuen out of the place by the preaſe of people, and had much a doe to get to the pulpit for orations, where ſtanding on his feete, he preſently pacified the tumult of the people, by the boldneſſe and conſtancie of his countenance only. Then when all was pacified by the preſent perſwaſions he vſed, aptly ſpoken to purpoſe for the inſtant, they giuing attentiue eare, without ſturre or vprore. The Senate giuing him great commendation therefore, he told them roundly & plainly: but I haue no cauſe to praiſe you, to leaue a Prætor in ſuch daunger of his life, offering no aide to helpe him. But the ſuters for the offices, they were in a maruellous caſe: for one way, they were affraide to giue money to buy the peoples voices, and on the other ſide, they were affraid alſo if any other did it, that they ſhould go without their ſute. So they were all agreed together, euerie man to put downe twelue Myriades and a halfe a peece, and then they ſhould make their ſute iuſtly and vprightly: and whoſoeuer were taken faultie, and that had otherwiſe made his way by corruption, that he ſhould loſe the money he had laid downe. This agreement being concluded betwene them, they choſe Cato (as it is reported) for their arbitrator, and keeper of all the ſame money. This match was made in Catoes houſe, where they all did put in caution or ſureties to anſwere the mony: the which he tooke, but would not meddle with the money. The day being come, Cato aſſiſting the Tribune that gouerned the election, & carefully marking how they did giue their voices: he ſpied one of the ſuters for the office breake the accord agreed vpon, and condemned him to pay the forfeiture vnto the reſt. But they greatly cōmending his iuſtice and integritie, forgaue the forfeiture, thinking it puniſhment enough vnto him that had forfeited, to be condemned by Cato. But thereby Cato procured himſelfe the diſpleaſure of the other Senators, for that he ſeemed therein to take vpon him the power and authoritie ouer the whole court and election. For there is no vertue, whereof the honor and credite doth procure more enuy, than iuſtice doth: becauſe the people doe commonly reſpect and reuerence that more than any other. For they doe not honor them as they doe valiant men, nor haue them in admiration, as they do wiſe men: but they loue and truſt them better. As for the two firſt, the one they are affraide of, and the other they diſtruſt: beſide, they ſuppoſe that valiancie and wiſedome commeth rather by the benefite of nature, then of our intent and choice, eſteeming wiſedome as a readines of conceit: and fortitude, a preſence & courage of the mind. For euery man may be iuſt that will, and therſore iniuſtice is of all other vices moſt ſhamefull: for it is a wilfull and malicious default, and therefore can not be excuſed. Lo this was the cauſe why all the noble men in manner were againſt Cato, as though he only had ouercome them. Pompey, he thought that the eſtimation of Cato was altogether the diſcountenāce of his power and greatneſſe, and therefore did daily raiſe vp many railers againſt him. Of them Publius Clodius that ſeditious Tribune, who was againe fallen in friendſhip with Pompey: he accuſed Cato and cried out vpon him, how he had robbed the common wealth of a wonderfull treaſure, by his cōmiſſion in CYPRVS: and that he was enemy vnto Pompey, becauſe he did refuſe to marry his daughter. Cato thereto made aunſwere, that he had brought more golde and ſiluer out of

For there is no vertue, whereof the honor and credite doth procure more enuy, than iuſtice doth: becauſe the people doe commonly reſpect and reuerence that more than any other. For they doe not honor them as they doe valiant men, nor haue them in admiration, as they do wiſe men: but they loue and truſt them better. CYPRVS, into the treaſure of ROME, without the allowance of either horſe or ſouldier: then Pompey had done with all his triumphes and warres, with the which he had troubled all the world. And moreouer, that he did neuer ſeeke alliance with Pompey, not that he thought him vnworthie of it, but becauſe he ſaw he delt not as vprightly in the common wealth as he him ſelfe did. I, ſaid he, haue refuſed a prouince offred me when I came out of my Prætorſhippe: but Pompey hath taken ſome by force, and giuen away vnto others. And to conclude, he lent Cæſar not long ſince, an armie of ſixe thouſand men to ſerue him in the warres in GAVLE: the which he neuer required of vs, nor Pompey graunted them him by our conſent. But wee ſee, that ſo many armies, armors and weapon, ſo many men and horſes by common pleaſures of our priuate citizens, giuen and lent at our charge. And P*ompey* himſelfe reſeruing onely the name of Emperour, and Lieutenant generall, aſſigneth ouer his armies and prouinces to the gouernement of others, whileſt he himſelfe beſiegeth here the walles of the citie, with ſeditious & tumultuous election of officers, craftily vndermining thereby the ſtate of the common wealth, to bring all to confuſion, that he himſelfe might be abſolute Prince, and rule alone. Thus was he reuenged of P*ompey*. Among Ca*toes* friends, he had one called Marcus Faonius, ſuch a one as Apollodorus PHALERIAN was ſaid to be in old time, vnto Socrates, who did counterfaite to be an other himſelfe, in doing all things as he did. This man would be farre out of reaſon, and paſſionate in his talke, ſtorming like a drunkard. He one yeare made ſute to be Ædilis, but he was reiected. Howbeit C*ato* that furthered his ſute, marked, that the tables wherein the voices were written, were all one hande. So, he finding out the falſehoode, appealed thereupon vnto the Tribunes, and made the election voyde for that time. After that Faonius was created Ædilis, C*ato* did helpe him forth in all the other charges of his office, and ſpecially in ſetting foorth playes in the Theater, which are cuſtomably done at the comming in of euery ſuch new officer, to giue the people paſtime: and gaue vnto the common players and dauncers in thoſe playes, no golden crownes, as other Ædiles did, but crownes of wilde oliue twigges, as they commonly vſe in GRECE at the Olympian games. And where others gaue vnto the poore rich giftes, he gaue the GRECIANS leekes, lettiſes, radiſhes, and peares: and vnto the ROMAINES, they had earthen pots full of wine, porke, figges, cowcombers, and fagots of wood of ſmall value. Inſomuch as ſome thought ſcorne of them they were ſo meane, others were very glad of them, ſeeing that Cato which was ſeuere and hard of nature, had a doing in them, and by litle and litle they turned this auſteritie of his into pleaſure. In fine, Faonius himſelfe ſitting downe amongſt the people, which looked vpon the players, clapped his handes for ioy at C*ato*: and cried out to him, that he ſhould giue them good rewards that played well, alluring them alſo about him to doe the like, and told them that he had made Cato the whole ruler of thoſe ſportes. At the ſelfe ſame time, C*urio*, Faonius colleague and companion in the office of Ædilis, had likewiſe goodly playes in an other Theater: but all the people forſooke his, and went to ſee Faonius playes, who ſate among them like a priuate man, and C*ato* as the maiſter of the playes. C*ato* did this in ſcorne and mockerie of vaine charge and expences, which men are wont to beſtow in ſuch trifles, ſhewing thereby, that whoſoeuer will make any playes, he ſhould make the charge but a ſport alſo, furniſhing it onely with a conuenient grace, but with no vaine expence or charge about ſuch a trifle. Shortly after, when Scipio, Hypſeus and Milo, ſued all three together to be Conſuls, not only by briberie of money (a common fault then in ſuing for any of the offices in the common wealth) but by plaine force of armes, ſlaying and killing as in a ciuill warre, they were ſo deſperate and inſolent: ſome preferred a lawe, that they ſhould make Pompey Præſident in theſe elections, becauſe men ſhould moue their ſute after a lawfull ſort. But C*ato* ſtraight was againſt it, ſaying, that the law could haue no ſafetie by P*ompey*, but P*ompey* might haue ſafetie by the law. Notwithſtanding, when he ſaw this trouble continue of a long time, without any Conſuls in ROME, and that daily there were three campes in the market place, that it was almoſt impoſſible to preuent the miſchiefe at hand, and to ſtay that it ſhould goe no further: then he thought it better, that the Senate of their owne good willes, rather then by compulſion, ſhould put the gouernment of the ſtate into P*ompeys* hands alone, chooſing the leſſer euill, to withſtand the greater, and ſo to yeeld to the abſolute gouernment without conſtraint, which the ſedition would bring it vnto.

Therefore Bibulus Catoes friend and kinſeman, made a motion to the Senate, that they would chooſe Pompey ſole Conſull. For, ſaid he, either the common wealth ſhall be well gouerned by him, or elſe ROME ſhall ſerue an ill Lord. Cato then riſing vp, beyonde all mens expectation confirmed Bibulus opinion, and ſaid: that the citie were better to haue one ſoueraigne Magiſtrate then none, and that he hoped Pompey could giue preſent order for the pacifying of this confuſion, and that he would be carefull to preſerue the citie, when he ſawe that they truſted him with the gouernment thereof. Thus was Pompey by Catoes meanes choſen ſole Conſull. Then he ſent for Cato to come to his gardens to him, which were in the ſuburbes of the citie. Cato went thither, and was receiued with as great honor & courteſie of Pompey as could be deuiſed: and in the end, after he had giuen him great thankes for the honors he had done him, he prayed him to afford him his aduiſe and counſell in his gouernment. Cato anſwered him thus, that he had not ſpoken any thing before that time in reſpect of any ill will he bare him, neither that he deliuered this laſt opinion of his in reſpect of his friendſhippe, but wholly for the common wealthes ſake: howbeit otherwiſe, that for his owne priuate affaires, if he thought good to vſe his aduiſe, whenſoeuer it pleaſed him to aske his opinion, he would tell him the beſt he could. But for common cauſes, that he would alwaies tell what he thought, though he neuer asked him: and in fine, he performed all he ſaid. For firſt of all, when Pompey did ſet grieuous penalties & new fines vpon their heades, which had bought the peoples voyces for money: Cato counſelled him to prouide for things to come, and to let that alone which was alreadie paſt. For, ſaid he, it is a hard thing to determine any certaine time, in the which a man ſhould ſeeke to reforme the faults that are paſt: and furthermore, if the puniſhmentes appointed were newer then the offences committed, then they ſhould doe wrong vnto them that were alreadie accuſed, to puniſh them by a new law which they had not offended. Afterwards alſo, certaine men of good calling (Pompeys friends) being accuſed, Cato perceiuing that Pompey grew remiſſe, and yeelded in many things: he ſharpely reproued, and reformed him. Furthermore, where Pompey had by law taken away the praiſes which were wont to be ſpoken of the offenders that were accuſed: he himſelfe notwithſtanding hauing written an oration in the praiſe of Munatius Plancus, ſent it vnto the Iudges, whileſt his cauſe was a hearing. Cato being one of the Iudges at that time, ſtopped his eares with both his hands, and would not haue it read. Wherefore Plancus refuſed him for one of his Iudges, after his cauſe was pleaded vnto: howbeit he was condemned notwithſtanding. To conclude, Cato was ſuch a griefe and trouble vnto them that were accuſed, that they could not tell well howe to deale with him. For, once they durſt not let him be any of their Iudges, neither could they well alſo refuſe him. For there were many that were condemned, which refuſing Cato, ſeemed vnto others that they were guiltie: & many alſo were ſhamefully reproued, becauſe they would not accept Cato for their Iudge, when he was offered them. Things proceeding in this ſort at ROME, Cæſar remained in GAVLE with his armie, where he made warres: neuertheleſſe he wanne him friends ſtill in ROME, by gifts and money, and made himſelfe very ſtrong. Now appeared Catoes predictions & forewarnings true vnto Pompey, and began to quicken his ſpirits which had ſlept ſo long, and made him then to conſider of the daunger, the which before he could not be perſwaded to beleeue. But perceiuing his ſlacknes and feare withall, doubting how to proceede: to preuent Cæſars practiſes, Cato determined to ſue to be Conſul, with intent either to make him leaue his army, or elſe to find out the practiſe he entended. Catoes competitors, they were both of thẽ very honeſt men alſo, of the which, Sulpitius had receiued great honor and preferrement by Catoes credite and authoritie: in reſpect wherof, many thought that it was ſcant honeſtly done of Sulpitius, to ſhew himſelfe ſo vnthankful, as to ſtand againſt Cato in this ſute. Howbeit Cato neuer complained of the matter, but ſaid, that it was no maruell he would giue place to no man in that, ſith it was the greateſt good happe that euer came vnto him. This notwithſtanding he perſwaded the Senate to make a law, that from thence forth, ſuch as ſued for any office, they ſhould themſelues be ſuters to the people, and not preferre their ſute by others. This cauſed the people to be more offended with him, then before, becauſe thereby he did not only take away their fingering of money, which they got by their voices in elections: but tooke from them the meanes they had alſo to pleaſure many, bringing them now into pouertie and contempt. He therefore hauing no face to flatter the people and to currie fauour with them, but rather ſticking to his graue maner and modeſt life, then to ſeeke the dignitie of a Conſull by ſuch meanes: made ſute himſelfe in perſon, and would not ſuffer his friends to take the ordinarie courſe which might win the peoples harts, wherupon he was put from his Conſulſhippe. This denyall was wont not only to haue made the parties refuſed, very ſorrowfull, but their friends and kinſemen alſo greatly aſhamed a long time after. Howbeit Cato made no reckoning of that, but went the next morning, and played at tennis with his friendes in the field of Mars, and after he had dyned, walked againe in the market place, as his maner was, without ſhooes on his feete, and coate. But Cicero blamed him much for that, becauſe the common wealth requiring then ſuch a Conſull as he, he had not carefully endeuoured himſelfe by courteſie and gentle meanes to winne the fauour of the people, neither would euer after make ſute for it, although at an other time he ſued to be Prætor. Thereunto Cato anſwered, that for the Prætorſhippe he was not denyed it by the good will of the people, but rather for that they were bribed with money. And for the election of the Conſuls, where there was no deceit vſed, he knew plainly he went without it, for his maners which the people miſliked: the which he thought were no wiſe mans part to chaunge for any mans pleaſure, nor yet by making the like ſute againe to hazard the refuſall. Furthermore, Cæſar making war with very ſtout nations, & hauing with no ſmall danger and trauell ſubdued them: and hauing alſo ſet vpon the GERMAINES, with whom the ROMAINES were at peace, & alſo ſlaine three hundred thouſand perſons: his friends made ſute that the people ſhould do ſolemne ſacrifice to giue thankes vnto the gods. But Cato in open Senate was of opinion, that they ſhould deliuer Cæſar into their handes, whom he had iniured, to receiue ſuch puniſhment as they thought good: to the end the whole offence, for the breach of peace, might be caſt vpon him, that the citie might be no partaker of it, ſith they could not do withall. Neuertheleſſe, ſaid he, we are to doe ſacrifices vnto the goddes, to giue them thankes, for that they turned not the reuenge of the furie and raſhnes of the Captaine, vpon our poore ſouldiers which were in no fault, but haue pardoned the common wealth. Cæſar being aduertiſed thereof, wrote a letter vnto the Senate, contayning many accuſations againſt Cato. The letter being read, Cato roſe, not as a man put in a chafe with choller, nor pricked with enuie, but coldly and quietly (as if he had long before premeditated what he would ſay) declared that the accuſations which Cæſar heaped againſt him in his letters, were but pretie mockes and ſleights which he had gathered together to make the people merry withall. But on the other ſide, when he beganne to vnrip his whole intents and practiſes from the beginning, not as if he had beene his enemie, but rather a confederate with him in his conſpiracy, declaring that they were not the GERMAINES, nor the GAVLES, which they were to be affraid of, but of himſelfe, if they were wiſe: he thereupon ſo offended the Senate, and made ſuch ſturre among them, that Cæſars friends repented them they had cauſed his letters to be read in the Senate, giuing Cato therby occaſion iuſtly to complaine of Cæſar, & to alleage much good matter againſt him. At that time therefore there was nothing decreed in the Senate againſt Cæſar, but this was ſaide onely, that it were good reaſon to let him haue a ſucceſſor. Then Cæſars friendes made ſute that Pompey ſhould put away his army, and reſigne vp the prouinces he kept, or elſe that they ſhould compell Cæſar no more then him to doe it. Then Cato opened his mouth, and ſaid, the thing was now come to paſſe, which he had euer told them of, and that Cæſar came to oppreſſe the common wealth, openly turning the armie againſt it, which deceitfully he had obtained of the ſame. All this preuailed not, neither could he thereby winne any thing of the Senate, becauſe the people fauoured Cæſar, and would alwaies haue him great: for the Senate did beleeue all that he ſaid, but for all that they feared the people. When newes was brought that Cæſar had wonne the citie of ARIMINVM, and was comming on with his armie towards ROME: then euery man looked vpon Cato, and the people and Pompey confeſſed, that he only from the beginning had found out the marke Cæſar ſhot at, and had hit the white of his ſlie deuiſe. Then ſaid Cato vnto them, if you would haue beleued me, my Lordes, and followed my counſell: you ſhould not now haue bene affraid of one man alone, neither ſhould you alſo haue put your onely hope in one man. Pompey aunſwered thereunto, that Cato in deede had geſſed more truely, howbeit that he alſo had dealt more friendly. Thereupon Cato gaue counſell that the Senate ſhould refer all vnto Pompeys order: for, ſaid he, they that can do great miſchiefe, know alſo how to helpe it. Pompey perceiuing that he had no armie conuenient about him to tarie Cæſars comming, and that the men alſo which he had, were but faint hearted: he forſooke the citie. Cato being determined to go with him, ſent his younger ſonne before vnto Munatius, which lay in the country of the BRVTIANS, & tooke his eldeſt ſonne with him. Now, becauſe he was to prouide a ſtay and gouernor of his houſe and daughters, he tooke Martia againe, which was left a widow and very rich, for that Hortenſius dying, made her his heire of all that he had. Therein Cæſar vpbraydeth Cato much, reprouing his couetouſnes to marry for goods. For, ſaide he, if he had neede of a wife, why then did he before graunt her vnto an other? If he had no neede of a woman, why then did he take her afterwardes againe? Vnleſſe ſhe were before a baite vnto Hortenſius, to keepe her whileſt ſhee was young, that he might haue her againe when ſhe was rich. But againſt that me thinkes it is ſufficient to recite theſe verſes of Euripides:

Vnlikelihoods firſt I will diſproue. For why? what man can ſay,
That euer feare made Hercules to turne his face away?

For I take it to be all one, to reproue Hercules cowardlines, and Catoes couetouſnes. But if his marriage be to be reproued, peraduenture it is in an other ſort. For ſo ſoone as he had maried Martia againe, he left his houſe and his daughters to her gouernment, and followed Pompey. But after that time, men report that he neuer polled his head, clipped his beard, nor ware any garland, but to his dying day, lamented, and bewailed in his heart, the miſerie and calamitie of his countrie, whether they had victorie, or were ouercome. So hauing the prouince of SICILE allotted to him, he went vnto SYRACVSA. There vnderſtanding that Aſinius Pollio was arriued at MESSINA, with men of warre from his enemies: Cato ſent vnto him, to know wherefore he came thither. Pollio againe asked of him, who was the cauſer of all this warre. Againe, when Cato was aduertiſed that Pompey had forſaken ITALIE, & that he lay in campe beyond the ſea by the citie of DYRRACHIVM, then he ſaid, he ſaw a maruellous great chaunge and incertaintie in the prouidence of the goddes: that when Pompey did all things beyond reaſon, and out of courſe, he was inuincible: and now that he ſought to preſerue his country, he ſaw he lacked his former good happe. Now he knewe he was ſtrong enough at that time to driue Aſinius Pollio out of SICILE if he would: but becauſe there came a greater aide vnto him, he would not plague that Iland, with the miſerie of warre. Then after he had aduiſed the SYRACVSANS to take the ſtronger part, and to looke to their ſafetie: he tooke the ſea & went towards Pompey. When he was come vnto him, he did alwaies cōſel him to prolong the war, hoping ſtill of ſome treatie of peace: & would in no caſe they ſhould come to fight any battell, where the weaker part ſhould of neceſſitie be put to the ſword, by the ſtronger. Therefore he perſwaded Pompey and the counſellers about him, to eſtabliſh certaine lawes to this effect. That they ſhould ſacke no citie in this warre, the which belonged vnto the Empire of ROME: and alſo, that they ſhould kill no citizen of ROME, but in furie of battell, when their ſwordes were in their hands. Thereby he wanne himſelfe great honor, and brought many men to take Pompeys part, by the lenitie and clemencie he vſed vnto them that were taken. Thereupon Cato being ſent into ASIA, to aide them that had commiſſion to preſſe ſhips and men of warre, he tooke his ſiſter Seruilia with him, and the boy which Lucullus had by her: for all the time of her widowhood, ſhe had followed Cato, and thereby had worne out her ill name ſhe had before, ſith they ſaw ſhe had ſo willingly giuen her ſelfe to follow him in his flying, and contented her ſelf with this ſtraight maner of life. This notwithſtāding, Cæſar did not let to ſhame her to Cato. Pompeys Captaines had no neede of Cato any where but at the RHODES. For he wanne the people there with his courteous vſage & perſwaſion, leauing with them Seruilia & her litle ſonne, and went from thence to Pompeys campe, who had leauied a great armie both by ſea and land. There did Pompey moſt of all diſcouer his minde and intent. For firſt he ment to haue giuen Cato the charge of the armie by ſea, which were aboue fiue hundred ſhippes of warre, beſides an infinite number of foyſtes & pinaſes, & ſuch ſmall bottomes vncouered: but ſodainly cōſidering better of it (or poſſibly being informed by ſome of his friends, that al Catoes regard & counſell in matters of gouernment was, to deliuer ROME from tyranny, & that if he had ſo great a charge vnder him, Cæſar being once ouercome, he would alſo force Pompey to leaue his armie, & ſo make him ſubiect to the law) he changed his minde, notwithſtanding he had already moued it to Cato, & leauing him, gaue Bibulus the charge of al his army by ſea. But Cato therefore ſhewed no leſſe good will vnto Pompey, then before. For it is reported, that in a certaine skirmiſh & conflict before the city of DYRRACHIVM, Pompey encouraging his ſouldiers, & commanding euery Captaine alſo to do the like in his quarter: the ſouldiers gaue but faint eare vnto them, & made no manner of ſhew of men whoſe hearts had beene any whit the more encouraged thereby. But when Cato after them all came and told them (as the time ſerued) the reaſon of Philoſophie, and the effect of libertie, manhoode, death, and honor, and that with a great vehement affection: and laſt of all ending his oration, calling vpon the gods, turning his ſpeech vnto them, as if they had bene preſent to haue ſeene how valiantly the ſouldiers fought for the libertie of their countrie: they gaue ſuch a luſtie cry, & had ſuch a braue conceite & vehement deſire to fight like men, that all the Captaines were filled with good hope, and ſo led them to battell, where they gaue ſuch a cruell charge and fierce onſet vpon their enemies, that they ouerthrewe them, and put them that day to flight. Howbeit Cæſars good fortune tooke the finall ende of this victorie from Pompey, by his ouergreat feare and miſtruſt: who could not tell how to take the benefite of his victorie, as we haue written more amply in his life. But when all the reſt reioyced that they had done ſo noble an exploite, and made their vaunts of the great aduantage they had of their enemies: Cato to the contrarie bewailed the calamitie of his country, and lamented that curſed ambition which cauſed ſo many good and valiant citizens of one ſelfe citie, ſo to kill and murther one an other. After this ouerthrowe, Cæſar taking his way into THESSALIE, Pompey raiſed his campe to follow him, and leauing a great power at DYRRACHIVM, of men, armor, munition and friends: he gaue Cato the charge of them all, and fifteene enſignes of footemen beſides. The which he did for the feare and miſtruſt he had of him, being aſſured, that if by ill fortune he ſhould loſe the battell, he knew well enough that he could not commit them to a truſtier man then he: but on the other ſide if he wanne the victory, he doubted ſore that he could not command as he would, where Cato was. There were alſo many other noble men, as a man would ſay, caſt away, and left at DYRRACHIVM, with Cato. In fine, the ouerthrow of the battel at Pharſalia being blowen abroad, Cato reſolued with himſelfe if Pompey were dead, that he would paſſe ouer all his men into ITALY, and then like a baniſhed man would himſelfe alone wander as farre as he could from the tyrannie: and contrarily, if he were aliue, that then he would keepe his armie together for him, as long as he could. With this determination, he paſſed ouer the ſea into the Ile of CORFV, where Pompeys armie by ſea lay. There Cato finding C*icero*, he would haue ſurrendered vp his charge vnto him, as to a man of greater dignitie, for that he had bene Conſull, and Cato onely but Prætor. Howbeit C*icero* would in no wiſe receiue it, but returned immediatly into ITALY. C*ato* then perceiuing that Pompey the younger (ſonne vnto P*ompey* the great) of a raſh & hauty minde, would haue puniſhed all them that went into ITALIE, and left the army by ſea, and that ſpecially he was bent firſt of all to begin with C*icero*: C*ato* reproued him priuately for it, ſo that he certainly ſaued C*iceroes* life, and many other moe beſides. Now C*ato* ſuppoſing that Pompey the great had ſaued himſelfe in ÆGYPT, or in AFRICKE, he determined to take the ſeas, to meete him with all his men: but before he tooke ſhippe, he gaue all men leaue to depart that were not willing to follow him. Cato being arriued in AFRICK, ſailing vp & down the coaſt there, he met with Sextus, the youngeſt ſonne of P*ompey*, who firſt told him, that his father was ſlaine in ÆGYPT: when the ſouldiers heard it, they tooke it very heauily, and not one of them after the death of P*ompey* the great, would ſerue vnder any other Captaine then Cato. He therupon being aſhamed, & thinking it pity alſo to leaue ſo many noble & good men that had ſerued ſo faithfully vnder him, without a Captaine, not knowing what way to take, nor whither to goe: at their requeſt he was contented to take charge of them, and went firſt vnto the citie of CYRENES, where not many daies before, the citizens had ſhut the gates againſt Labienus. Being there, it was told him that Scipio, Pompeys father in law, was gotten vnto king Iuba, who had receiued him: and that Actius Varus, vnto whom P*ompey* had giuen the charge of the prouince of AFRICKE, was in their company with an army, and determined to

goe ioyne with them. So he went by land in the winter time, and had gotten a maruellous number of aſſes together, to cary water and victuals, which followed him with a great number of carts beſides, and of thoſe men, which the AFRICANES call PSILLES, to wit, they that doe heale the ſtinging of ſerpents, and do ſucke out the poiſon with their mouths, and doe furthermore: charme and enchaunt the ſnakes, that they haue no power to doe any hurt. He was ſeuen dayes together marching continually, and went a foote as a guide vnto his men, without helpe of horſe or beaſt. From that day foorth, on the which he vnderſtoode of the battell loſt at Pharſalia, he neuer ſupped, but ſitting, * and added that vnto the reſt of his ſorrow, that he neuer layed him downe, but when he went to bedde for all night. Cato hauing paſſed the winter in LYBIA, he brought his ſouldiers into the fielde, which were about tenne thouſand perſons. The affaires on their ſide had but hard ſucceſſe, for the contention and variance betwixt Scipio, and Varus, for the which, they both flattered king Iuba to winne his fauour: being a maruellous proud man for his greatnes and riches: as he ſhewed the firſt time hee ſpake with Cato. For when Cato came, he cauſed his owne chaire to be ſet betwixt Scipio and Cato, to haue the honour to be in the middeſt. But Cato perceiuing it, tooke vp his owne chaire, and ſet it on the other ſide by Scipio to put him in the middeſt, notwithſtanding that he was his enemy, and had written a ſhamefull booke againſt him. Many make no accompt of this fact of Cato, but reproue him, becauſe that walking one day with Philoſtratus in SICILE, he gaue him the vpper hand, honoring him for his Philoſophy. Thus Cato did pull downe the pride of the king at that time, who before had vſed Scipio, and Varus, as his noble men and ſubiects: howbeit Cato did reconcile them together againe. Furthermore, when all the company prayed him to take charge of the whole army, and that Scipio him ſelfe, and Varus both, did firſt giue him place, and willingly reſigned vnto him the honour to command the whole campe: he aunſwered them, he would not offend the law, ſith he made warre onely to preſerue the authority and priuiledge thereof, neither would take vppon him to commaund all, himſelfe being but Viceprætor, where there was a Viceconſull preſent. For Scipio was created Proconſull, and furthermore, the people had a certaine confidence that their affaires woulde proſper the better, if they had but the name of a Scipio to leade them in AFRICK. Now when Scipio was Generall ouer them, he would ſtraight, for Iubaes ſake, haue put all the inhabitants of the city of VTICA (without reſpect of age) vnto the ſword, and haue raſed the houſes to the ground as thoſe that had taken Cæſars part. Howbeit Cato would not ſuffer him, but proteſting vnto them that were preſent, and calling the goddes to witneſſe in open councell, with great difficulty he ſaued the poore people of VTICA from that cruell tragedy and ſlaughter. Afterwards, partly at the requeſt of the people, and partly alſo at Scipioes inſtance, Cato tooke vppon him to keepe the city, fearing leaſt by treaſon, or againſt their wils, it ſhould come into Cæſars hands: becauſe it was a ſtrong place of ſituation, and well repleniſhed with all things neceſſary for him that ſhould keepe it. Cato did both furniſh it, & alſo fortifie it. For he brought in great ſtore of corne, he repaired the rampers of the walles, made great high towers, and caſt deepe trenches round about the city, paling them in: and betwixt the trenches and the towne, he lodged all the young men of VTICA, and compelled them to deliuer vp their armour and weapon and kept all the reſt within the city it ſelfe, carefully prouiding, that neuer a man of them ſhould be hurt by the ROMAINS, and beſides, did alſo ſend corn, armor, munition & money vnto the campe: ſo that the city of VTICA was the ſtaple & ſtorehouſe of the wars. Moreouer, as he had before counſelled Pompey not to come to battell, the like counſell he now gaue alſo vnto Scipio: not to hazard battell againſt a man of great skill and experience in wars, but to take time, whereby, by litle and litle, he ſhould conſume the power and ſtrength of Cæſars tyranny. But Scipio was ſo ſtout, that he regarded not Catoes counſell, but wrote otherwhile vnto him, twitting him with his cowardlines in this maner: that it was enough for him to be ſafe in a good city compaſſed about with wals, though otherwiſe hee ſought not to hinder men to be valiant, to execute any enterpriſe as occaſion was offered. Cato wrote againe vnto him, that he was ready to goe into ITALY with his footemen and horſmen which he had brought into AFRICKE to draw Cæſar from them, and to turne him againſt him. Scipio made but a ſport at it. Then Cato ſhewed plainly, that he did repent him hee had giuen him the preferment to be generall of the army, becauſe he ſaw he would but fondly proſecute this war: and alſo, that if he chaunced to ouercome, he could not moderatly vſe the victory againſt his countrey men. Then he beganne to miſtruſt the good ſucceſſe of this warre (and ſo he told his friendes) for the Generals haſtineſſe and vnſkilfulneſſe: and yet if beyond expectation it fell out well, and that Cæſar were ouerthrowen, he would neuer dwell at ROME any more, but would flie the cruelty and bitterneſſe of Scipio, who euen at that preſent time did proudly threaten many. But in the end, that fell out ſooner then looked for. For a poſte came to him late that night, who but three dayes before departed from the campe, and brought newes that all was loſt, in a great battell, by the city of THAPSES, which Cæſar had wonne: that hee had taken both campes, that Scipio and king Iuba were fled with a few men, and that all the reſt of their army was ſlaine. Theſe newes did put the citizens in ſuch a feare and maze, (and ſpecially being in the warre, and in the night time) that for very feare they could ſcant keepe them ſelues within the walles of their city.

Catoes conſtancy in extremity

But Cato meeting with them, ſtayed them that ranne vp and downe crying in the ſtreetes, and did comfort them the beſt he could. Yet he tooke not all their feare from them, though he brought them againe vnto them ſelues from the extaſie they were in, declaring vnto them, that the loſſe was nothing ſo great as it was made, and that it was a common matter to enlarge ſuch newes with wordes enough. By theſe perſwaſions, he ſomewhat pacified the tumult and vprore, and the next morning by breake of day, he made proclamation, that the three hundred men which he had choſen for his counſellers, ſhould come and aſſemble in the temple of Iupiter, they all being citizens of ROME, which for trafficke of marchaundiſe lay in AFRICKE, and all the ROMAINE Senators and their children alſo. Now whileſt they gathered them ſelues together, Cato him ſelfe went very grauely with a ſet modeſt countenaunce, as if no ſuch matter had happened, hauing a litle booke in his hande, which he read as he went. This booke contayned the ſtore and preparation of munition hee had made for this warre, as corne, armor, weapons, bowes, ſlings and footemen.

Catoes oration to the Romains at Vtica.

When they were all aſſembled, he began greatly to commend the good loue and faithfulnes of theſe three hundred ROMAINS, which had profitably ſerued their country with their perſons, money, & counſell, and did counſell them not to depart one from an other, as men hauing no hope, or otherwiſe ſeeking to ſaue them ſelues ſcatteringly. For remaining together, Cæſar would leſſe
” deſpiſe them, if they would make warre againſt him: and would alſo ſooner pardon them, if ” they craued mercy of him. Therefore he counſelled them to determine what they would do,
” and for his owne part, he ſayed he would not miſlike whatſoeuer they determined of: for if ” their mindes followed their fortune, he would thinke this chaunge to proceede of the neceſ-
” ſitie of time. But if they were reſolued to withſtand their miſfortune, and to hazard them-
” ſelues to defend their liberty: he then would not only commend them, but hauing their noble
” corage in admiration, would him ſelfe be their chieftaine and companion, euen to proue the
” fortune of their countrey to the vttermoſt. The which was not VTICA, nor ADRVMETVM,
” but the city ſelfe of ROME: the which oftentimes through her greatneſſe, had raiſed her ſelfe
” from greater daungers and calamities. Furthermore, that they had many waies to ſaue them-

” reaſon of his warres was compelled to be in many places. For SPAINE of the one ſide was vp
” againſt him, and tooke part with the younger Pompey: and the city of ROME alſo not being
” vſed to be bridled with the ſnaffle of ſuch inſolency, could not abide it, but woulde rather riſe
” with any other change. Furthermore, that they were not to refuſe any danger, but to take exam” ple of their enemy: who, to worke his miſchieuous intent, ſpareth not his perſon in any daun-
” ger. And contrarily alſo, that vnto them, the incertainety of the war, if victory followed, would ” make them happy, as alſo in being ouerthrowen, their death would turne to immortall glory.
” Notwithſtanding, they were to thinke of the matter among thẽſelues, & to make their prayers ” to the gods, that in recompence of their vertue & good ſeruice which they had ſhewed thither-
” unto, they would grant them grace to determine for the beſt. After Cato had ended his oration,
” there were diuers of thẽ that were ſtirred vp by his liuely perſwaſions, but the moſt part of thẽ were incoraged by his conſtãcy & noble mind, and alſo by his kindnes: ſo that they preſently forgat the danger they were in, & praid him to command their perſons, goods, and weapons, as he thought good, taking him for their only inuincible Captaine, of whom fortune had no power, thinking it better to die obeying his counſell, then to ſaue them ſelues, forſaking ſo valiant & worthy a man. Then, when one of the aſſembly made a motion that they ſhould make their bondmen free, and that diuers alſo did confirme it, Cato ſayd he would by no meanes ſuffer it, becauſe it was neither meet nor lawful: howbeit if their maſters would manumiſſe them, that he was contented to receiue them for ſouldiers, that could weare any weapon. Diuers promiſed him to do it: and Cato commaunded their names ſhould be enrolled that would, and ſo went his way. Immediatly after, letters were broght him frõ king Iuba, & Scipio: of the which, king Iuba was hiddẽ in a moũtain with few men with him, who ſent vnto him to know what he would determine to do. For if he ment to forſake VTICA, he would tary him there: and if otherwiſe he determined to keep VTICA, then that he would come & helpe him with an army. Scipio on the other ſide riding at anker, at a point of the land not far from VTICA, ſtaid for the like aunſwere. Then Cato thought it beſt to ſtay the meſſengers which had brought him their letters, till he ſaw what was the determination of the three hundred. For all they that were Senators of ROME, were very glad men, and did preſently make their bondmen free, & gaue them weapons. But the other thre hundred which were marchant venturers, and that liued by vſury and exchange, who had the moſt part of their goods in ſlaues and bondmen, did not long follow Catoes counſell: but like men, whoſe bodies ſoone receiue heat, and are ſoone cold againe, when they are once gone from the fire: euen ſo thoſe marchants, while Cato was preſent amõg them, had ſome good prety wil & deſire: but when by them ſelues they had caſt their account, the feare they had of Cæſar, made them forget the reuerence they bare vnto Cato, & vnto their duty. For, ſaid they, what are we, and what is he whom we diſdain to obey? Is it not Cæſar him ſelfe, who at this day is Lord & Emperor of ROME? Neuer a one of vs is Scipio, Pompey, nor Cato: and yet now, when al men for feare (and in maner compelled) do yeeld and ſubmit thẽſelues, we will needs take vpon vs within the wals of VTICA to fight for the liberty of ROME againſt him, for whom, Cato flying with Pompey, forſooke ITALY: & we now make our bondmen free to fight with Cæſar, hauing no better liberty our ſelues, then it pleaſeth him to giue vs. Let vs therefore now know our ſelues whileſt we haue time, and craue mercy at his hands that is the ſtronger, & ſend vnto him, to pray him to pardon vs. The greateſt & wiſeſt men of thoſe three hundred marchants, had this ſpeache. But the moſt part of them ſought meanes how to entrap the Senators, hoping the better of mercy at Cæſars hand, if they did deliuer them vnto him. Cato did looke for this change in them, but yet vttered not that he thought, and returned the meſſengers backe againe vnto king Iuba, and Scipio, and wrote vnto them: that they ſhould beware they came not near VTICA, becauſe he did miſtruſt theſe three hũdred marchants. Now there were a great number of horſemen which had eſcaped from the battel, who comming towards VTICA, ſent three of their company vnto Cato, the which brought him not one ſelfe determination from all the company. For ſome of them went to go vnto king Iuba, others alſo to ioyne with Cato, and part of them were afrayd to come into VTICA. Theſe things being thus reported vnto Cato, he commaunded Marcus Rubrius to take care of theſe three hundred men, & to receiue the names of the bondmẽ which they willingly manumiſſed, without compelling of any man. In the mean time, Cato with all the Senators went out of VTICA, to meete with theſe horſemen, & there he ſpake to the Captains, & praid them that they would not forſake ſo many noblemen & Senators of ROME as were there: & that they would not haue king Iuba for their captaine before Cato, but to come into VTICA: where they might ſaue thẽ ſelues the city was of ſuch ſtrength, and beſides, ſo well armed and victualed for many years. The like requeſt did the Senators alſo make vnto them, with the teares running downe their cheekes. Thereupon the Captaines went & ſpake with their ſouldiers. Cato in the meane time ſate him downe on a litle hill, with the Senators, tarying for aunſwere. But then on the ſodaine came Rubrius vnto him in great haſt, complaining of the tumult of theſe three hundred marchants, which went about to make the city to rebell: whereupon, the reſt their harts failing them, fell to bewaile their miſerable fortune. But Cato ſought to comfort them, and then ſent vnto the three hundred marchauntes, to pray them to haue a litle patience. So the Captaines returned againe with vnreaſonable demaundes of the horſemen. For they ſayed, that they cared not for king Iubaes pay, neither were they afrayed of Cæſars malice, ſo that they had Cato for their generall: yet to be pend vp within the wals of a city with AFRICANES, that were PHOENICIANS, and a traiterous nation as could be: that grieued them moſt of all. For, ſayed they, though now they ſturre not, and be quiet: yet when Cæſar comes, they will be the firſt that will betray vs, and cut our throates. And therefore, if Cato would haue them to ioyne with him in this warre: that he ſhould either kill or driue away all the VTICANS out of the city, and then that they would come into it, when it was cleare of all thoſe barbarous people their enemies. Cato thought this a cruell and barbarous condition, neuertheleſſe he told them that he would talke with the three hundred: and ſo returning againe into VTICA, he ſpake vnto them. But they then not regarding the reuerence vnto Cato, diſſembling no longer, ſaid opēly, that they would not like of him whatſoeuer he were, that ſhould compell them to make war with Cæſar, both becauſe they would not, nor could not doe it. Further, there were ſome of them that mumbled to them ſelues, that the Senators ſhould be kept there, till Cæſar came. Cato ouerheard them, for in deede his hearing was not very quicke. At that very inſtant one came to him, and tolde him, that the horſemen were going their way. Cato therefore fearing leaſt theſe three hundred marchants would lay hands vpon the Senators: he went vnto them him ſelfe with his friends, and perceiuing they were gone a great way off, he tooke his horſe and rode after them. They reioycing to ſee him come, receiued him among them, and prayed him to ſaue him ſelfe with them. But Cato prayed them againe to ſaue the Senators, and that with ſuch affection, as it forced tears in him, beſides, he held vp his hands vnto them, tooke their horſes by the bridles, and them ſelues by their weapons, that at length hee obtained of them, that they would remaine there one day at the leaſt, to helpe the Senatours to ſaue them ſelues. So Cato returning with them into the city, he appointed ſome of them to ward at the gates, and put others alſo in garriſon into the caſtell: ſo that the three hundred marchants quaked for fear, leaſt he would haue bene reuenged of them, becauſe of their returne with him. Thereuppon they ſent vnto Cato, humbly to pray him to come vnto them in any caſe. But the Senatours flocking about him, would not ſuffer him to goe, & ſaid, that they would not caſt away their ſauior and protector, to put him into traitors hands. Then doubtles, al that were within VTICA, plainly ſaw the vertue and ſimplicity of Cato, and found that there was no fraud nor deceite in him: who hauing long time reſolued to kill him ſelfe, he only tooke that extreame pains and care for others that their liues being ſaued, he might then rid himſelf of his own. For men might eaſily ſee, though he diſſembled it, that he was reſolued to die. Whereupon, hauing comforted the Senators, he yeelded vnto the requeſts of the three hundred marchants, & went him ſelfe alone vnto them. Then they thanked him much for his comming, and praied him to command them, & boldly to truſt them: ſo that he would pardon them if they could not be all Catoes, and would take pity of their faint harts, though they were not ſo conſtant & noble minded as he. For they were determined to ſend vnto Cæſar, ſpecially to intreat him for him: and if that they could not obtaine pardon for him, then they were aſſured they could haue none for them ſelues, and therefore would fight for the ſafety of him, while they had any breath in their bodies. Cato thanking them for their good wils, aunſwered: that they ſhould ſend quickely to craue pardon for them ſelues, but to aske none for him. For ſayd he, men that be ouercome, and haue offended, it ſtandeth them vpon to make humble ſute, and to craue pardon: but for him ſelfe, he was neuer ouercome in his life, and yet had ouercome as much as he deſired, and had alwayes beene better then Cæſar in iuſtice, who only (not him ſelfe) was now taken and ouercome: the thing being apparantly proued in ſight againſt him, which he had alwaies denied to haue practiſed againſt his country. When he had made this anſwere vnto the three hundred marchants, he departed from them. Newes being brought that Cæſar was in his way with all his army, comming towards VTICA: O goddes, ſayd he, then he commeth againſt vs, as againſt men. Then turning vnto the Senatours, he gaue them counſell quickely to ſaue them ſelues, whileſt the horſemen were yet in the city. So ſhutting all the gates of the city, ſauing that towardes the hauen: he appointed ſhippes for them all, and ſet euery thing at a ſtay, without tumult or diſorder, no man hauing iniury offered him, and gaue euery one money to make way for their ſafety. When Marcus Octauius) who came with two legions, & camped hard by VTICA) ſent vnto Cato, to determine which of them two ſhould be Generall: he made no aunſwere, but turning to his friends ſaid: How can we wonder any more that all goeth to wracke with vs, ſith there is ſuch ambition amongſt vs for the gouernment, euen now, when we are at the laſt caſt? In the mean time word was brought him, how the horſmen going their way were ſpoiling of the citizens goods, as a lawfull prey in warre. He ſtraight ran thither him ſelfe, and the firſt he met withall, he tooke from them that they had gotten. The reſt, before he came vnto them, threw downe that they were carying away, and hanging downe their heads for ſhame, they went their way, and ſaid nothing. Then Cato calling all the citizens of VTICA together, praied them not to incenſe nor moue Cæſar againſt the three hundred, but rather to craue of him pardon for thē all. Then he went againe to the peere, and there imbracing his friends, & taking his leaue of them all, he brought them to their ſhips. Now for his ſonne, he did not counſell him to goe, neither did he thinke it meete to vrge him to forſake his father. Furthermore, there was one Statilius a young man in his company, of a noble corage, that was determined to follow the inuincible conſtancy of Cato: who counſelled him to take the ſea, and to ſaile away with the reſt, becauſe he knew he was Cæſars mortall enemy. Statilius ſaid he would not go. Then Cato turning him vnto Apollonides a Stoick Philoſopher, & vnto Demetrius a Peripatetick Philoſopher, ſaid: you muſt take this ſtout young man, to perſwade him to obey vnto neceſſity. Cato him ſelfe in the meane time ſent away the reſt, and did miniſter iuſtice vnto them that required it: ſpending all that night, and the next day, about thoſe matters. Then Lucius Cæſar, the kinſman of Iulius Cæſar the conqueror, being choſen by the three hundred, to go and make ſute vnto him for them all, came and praied Cato to helpe him to make his oration, which he ſhould ſay vnto Cæſar for them all: and as for thee, Cato, ſaid he, I will kiſſe his hands, and fall downe on my knees before him to intreat him for thee. Nay ſaid Cato, thou ſhalt not do ſo. For if I would ſaue my life by Cæſars grace, I could do it, if I would but go vnto him: howbeit I will not be bound to a tyrant for iniuſtice. For it is an iniuſtice in him to take vpon him, as a Lord & ſoueraign to ſaue a mās life, when him ſelfe hath no authority to command. But yet let vs conſider if thou wilt, what thou ſhalt ſay, to craue pardon for the three hundred. So they were a while together conſidering the matter, and in fine, Lucius Cæſar being ready to depart, Cato recommended his ſonne and friends vnto him, and imbracing him, tooke his leaue of him. Then he returned vnto his lodging, and calling his ſonne and friends before him, and talking of many matters: among others he charged his ſonne in no caſe to meddle in the affairs of the common wealth. For ſayd he, to deale vprightly like Catoes ſonne, the corruption of the time and ſtate will not abide it: and contrarily, obſeruing the time, thou canſt not do like an honeſt man. Towards euening he went into his bath to waſh him ſelfe, and as he was a bathing, thinking vpon Statilius, he cried out aloud: well Apollonides, thou haſt at length yet perſwaded Statilius, to goe his way and pulled downe his ſtout courage he had: and is he gone without bidding vs farewell? How, gone ſaid Apollonides? Nay, his heart is now more ſtout and coragious then euer it was, notwithſtanding all the perſwaſions we could vſe vnto him: for he is determined to tary, & to take ſuch part as thou doeſt. After he had bathed him ſelfe, he went to ſupper, and ſate at his meate, as he had alwaies vſed after the battell of Pharſalia, and neuer lay, but when he went to bed. So he had all his frends, & the chiefe Magiſtrats of VTICA to ſupper with him. After ſupper, they fell into graue talke and matters of Philoſophy: till at length they came vnto the ſtraunge opinion of the Stoicke Philoſophers, which was this: that onely the good man is free, and all the euill be ſlaues. The Peripateticke Philoſopher that was preſent there, was ſtraight againſt it. But Cato was very earneſt againſt the Peripateticke, and argued the matter a long time, with a vehement ſpeach and contention: inſomuch as they that heard him, found then that he was determined to end his life, and to rid him him ſelfe out of all thoſe troubles. But then when he had ended his argument, and ſaw that euery man held his peace, and looked ſadly of it: to comfort them againe, and to put the ſuſpition of his death out of their heades: he beganne againe to fall in talke of their affaires, and ſeemed to be carefull of them, as though he hadde bene afrayed leaſt ſome misfortune were come vnto them vppon the ſea, or vnto them that were gone by land, becauſe they paſſed through deſerts, where there was no water to be had. Now when ſupper was done, and the ſtraungers gone, he walked as his manner was with his friendes,and hauing taken order with the Captaines of the watch for matters of ſeruice,as the time required:going into his chamber he embraced his ſon and his frends more louingly then he was wont to do,whereby he made them againe ſuſpect the execution of his determination.

When he was come into his chamber and laied in his bed,he tooke Platoes dialogues in hand treating of the ſoule, and red the moſt part of it. Then looking by his beds ſide,and miſſing his ſword(which his ſon had taken from him when he was at ſupper)he called one of the groomes of his chamber to him,and asked him who had taken his ſword away: his man made him no anſwer,and he fell again to read his booke. Then a prety while after,not ſeeming to be importunate,or ouerhaſty of the matter,but as though he would only know what became of it: hee willed them to bring him his ſword againe. They taried long,& he had red ouer al the booke, but yet his ſword was not brought him againe. Whereupon he called for all his men one after an other,and very angrily asked them his ſword, and gaue one of them ſuch a blow in the face,that his noſe fell a bleeding,and his hand was all bloudy withall, and cried out that his ſon and his ſeruants would deliuer him naked into the hands of his enemy: vntil his ſon and frends at length ranne vnto him,and falling downe on their knees, lamented,and beſought him to be contented. Cato then riſing out of his bed, looked grimly vppon them, and ſaied vnto them: O gods,who euer ſaw me in this taking? Why doth no man by reaſon perſwade me,if they ſee me out of the way:and not to keep me from my determination by plucking my weapons from me? why doeſt not thou bind thy father (my ſonne) his hands behinde him, that when Caſar commeth,he may find me in caſe not to defend my ſelfe? I do not deſire my ſword to hurt my ſelfe, for if I had any ſuch minde, I neede but hold my breath a litle,or giue but a knocke of my head againſt the wall onely,and diſpatch my ſelfe quickly.

Catoes laſt words vnto the Philoſophers his friends.

When he had ſayd thus, his ſonne went out of his chamber weeping, and all his friendes alſo, no man remaining with Cato, but Demetrius and Apollonides,vnto whom he ſpake more gently,and reaſoned in this ſort. What, do you thinke to keepe an old man as I am, aliue by force? And haue you taried behind but to ſit ſtaring vpon me, & ſay nothing vnto me? If otherwiſe els,by reaſon you come to perſwade me,that it ſhall be no ſhame for Cato, diſpairing of the ſafety of his life, to ſeeke it by the grace and mercy of his enemy: why then doe you not now tell me your reaſons to perſwade me,that forſaking all other fancies and determinations which hitherunto we haue holden for good, being on a ſodaine become wiſer by Caſars meanes, wee ſhould be bound the more therefore to giue him thanks? I do not tell you this that I haue determined any thing of my life,but that it is in my power(if I liſt)to put the thing in execution I haue determined: but yet I will conſult with you,when I am ſo determined,to heare the reaſons & opinion of your books,which your ſelues do vſe in diſcourſe and argument together. Go your way therfore hardily vnto my ſon,and tell him,that he muſt not thinke to cōpell his father vnto that,which he cannot proue good vnto him by reaſon. After this talke, Demetrius and Apollonides being nothing comforted,weeping,departed out of his chamber. Then his ſworde was brought him by a litle boy.

Cato conſidered his ſword wherewith he killed him ſelfe.

When he had it, he drew it out,& looked whether the point and edge of his ſword was ſharp and would cut: when he ſaw it was well,O,ſaid he,now I am where I would be,and ſo laying down the ſword naked by him,he tooke his booke againe in his hand,and red it ouer(as they ſay):wiſe together. Then hee ſlept ſo ſoundly after it, that his men which were without his chamber heard him ſnort againe. About midnight,he called for two of his freemen, Cleanthes his Phiſitian, and Butas, whom he chiefly employed in his waighteſt affaires of the common wealth. So hee ſent him vnto the hauen to ſee, if all his men that were imbarked were vnder ſaile:and gaue his hand to the Phiſitian to be bound vp,becauſe it was ſwollen with the blowe he gaue one of his ſlaues when he hit him on the face. All his ſeruants were glad to hear of that, hoping then that he deſired to liue. Soone after came Butas backe againe from the hauen, and brought him word that all were gone but Craſſus, who ſtayed about ſome buſines he had,and yet that he was going to take ſhippe: howbeit that the ſea was very roughe, and wind exceeding great Cato hearing this,ſighed,being ſory for them that were vpon the ſea: and ſent Butas backe againe to the hauen, to ſee if any man came backe for any matter they had to ſay vnto him. The litle birdes began to chirpe,and Cato fell againe in a litle ſlumber. But thereupon Butas returned,and brought him word that all was quiet in the hauen,& there was no ſtur. Then

Cato, bad him goe his way, and ſhut to the dore after him, and layed him downe in his bed, as though he had ment to haue ſlept out all the reſt of the night. But as backe was no ſooner turned, but Cato taking his naked ſword in his hand, thruſt it into his breaſt: howbeit the ſwelling of his hand made the blow ſo weake, that it killed him not preſently, but drawing on to his latter ende, he fell downe vpon his bedde, and made ſuch a noyſe with his fall (ouerthrowing a litle table of geometrie hard by his bedde, that his ſeruantes hearing the noiſe, gaue a great ſhreeke for feare. Thereupon his ſonne and his friendes ranne into the chamber, and founde him all of a gore blood, and the moſt part of his bowels comming out of his bodie, himſelfe being yet aliue and ſeing them. They were all ſtriken with ſuch ſorrow to behold it, that at the firſt they were ſo amaſed, as they could not tell what to ſay to it. His Phiſitiã comming to him, he went about to put in his bowels againe which were not periſhed, and to ſow vp his woūd. But Cato comming to himſelfe, thruſt backe the Phiſitian, and tore his bowels with his owne hands, and made his wound very great, and immediately gaue vp the ghoſt. Whereupon the three hundred Romains (in leſſe time then a man would haue thought Catoes own houſhold ſeruantes could haue knowen of his death) were at his dores, and immediatly after, all the people of Vtica alſo came thither, and with one voice called Cato their benefactor and ſauior, and ſayed he onely was a free man, and had an inuincible mind: and this was done, when they hard ſay that Cæſar was not farre from Vtica. Furthermore, neither feare of the preſent danger, nor the deſire to flatter the Conqueror, neither any priuate quarrell amongſt them ſelues, could keepe them from honoring Catoes funerals. For, ſumptuouſly ſetting out his bodie, and honorably accompanying his funerals as might be, they buried him by the ſea ſide, where at this preſent time is to be ſeene his image, holding a ſworde in his hande. After that they made their beſt way to ſaue themſelues and their citie. Nowe Cæſar being aduertiſed by them that came vnto him, how Cato ſturred not from Vtica, nor fled not, but ſent all others away, ſauing himſelfe and his ſonne, and a few of his friends that remained there, being affraid of nothing: he could not deuiſe what he ment by it. Therefore eſteeming Cato much, he made haſte with all the ſpeede he could with his armie, to come thither. But when he vnderſtoode that Cato had ſlaine himſelfe, writers doe report he ſaide thus: O Cato, I enuie thy death, ſith thou haſt enuied mine honour to ſaue thy life. For indeede, had Cato beene contented Cæſar ſhould haue ſaued his life, he had not ſo much impaired his owne honor, as he had augmented Cæſars glorie. And yet what Cæſar would haue done, men make it doubtfull, ſauing that they coniecture well of Cæſars clemency. Cato died when he was but eight and forty yeare old. For his ſonne, Cæſar neuer did him hurt: howbeit it is reported of him, that he was very idlely giuen, and laſciuious beſides. For when he lay in Cappadocia, in a noble mans houſe of the kings bloud, called Maphradates, who had a faire woman to his wife: he taried longer there then he might well with honeſtie, whereuppon he fell to be a laughing ſtocke to the people, and in mockery they ſayd, Cato will goe to morrow, a thirty dayes hence. And further, that Maphradates and Porcius are two good friends, but they haue but one minde. And the reaſon was becauſe Maphradates wife was called Pſyche, which in the Greeke ſignifieth, minde: and Cato is a noble fellow, and hath a princely mind, howbeit his famous death did ſtoppe this infamous ſpeech. For he valiantly fighting againſt Auguſtus, and Antonius, at the battell of Philippes, for the liberty of his country: their army being ouerthrowen and fled, he would neither flie nor hide him ſelfe, but running in amongeſt his enemies, he made them know what hee was, by incoraging thoſe of his ſide, which yet did defend them ſelues, till he was ſlaine in the field, to the great admiration of his valiantnes. Furthermore, Porcia, the Daughter of Cato, gaue no place vnto her father, neither for chaſtity, nor greatnes of mind. For ſhe being maried vnto Brutus, who ſlue Cæſar, was of the conſpiracie, and ſlue her ſelfe as couragiouſly as became the vertue and nobility of her bloud from whence ſhee came, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Brutus. Statilius alſo, who had ſayd he would runne Catoes fortune (as we haue told you before) was kept from killing of him ſelfe by the Philoſophers, Demetrius, and Apollonides. But after that time hauing ſhewed him ſelfe very faithfull and ſeruiceable vnto Brutus in all his affaires, he was ſlaine in the field alſo at the battell of Philppes.

For like as in a ſhippe the Mariners that ſtande in the prowe, doe better ſee before them, then the Pilots that ſteere the helme in the poope, and yet lookes alwaies backe vnto them to ſee what they commaunde: euen ſo, they that gouerne in the cõmon wealth for honors ſake, are no better then honorable ſlaues of the people, hauing no more but the bare name of a gouernour. But in deede, the perfect good and honeſt man ſhould neuer couet outwarde glory, but as a meane to bring him to noble attempts, whereby he might procure the better credite of his doings. And for a young man that coueteth honor by vertue, giue him leaue a litle to glory in his well doing: for as Theophraſtus ſayeth, vertue buddeth and floriſheth in youth, and taketh faſt roote by praiſes giuen, as wit & corage groweth in them. But ouermuch praiſe is dangerous in euery perſon, but chiefly in ambitious gouernors. For if they be men of great power, it makes them commit many deſperate parts: for they will not allow that honor proceedes of vertue, but that honor is vertue it ſelfe. But in deed they ſhould ſay as Phocion did vnto Antipater, that requeſted an vnlawful matter of him: Thou canſt not, ſaied he, haue Phocion a friend and flatterer both. This, or the very like, may be ſayd vnto the people: you can not both haue one, a Maiſter and a ſeruaunt, that can commaund and obey together. Or els the miſchiefe ſpoken of in the tale of the Dragon muſt needes happen, which was: the taile on a time fell out with the head, and complained, ſaying, it would another while go before, & would not alwaies come behind. The head graunted the taile, which fell out verie ill for it, not knowing how to guide the head, and beſides that the head thereby was tormented euery way, being compelled againſt nature to follow that part and member, which could neither heare, nor ſee how to guid it. The like matter haue we ſeene happen vnto many, which in the adminiſtration of the common wealth, did ſeeke to pleaſe the humors of the multitude. For when they haue once put their heads vnder their girdles to pleaſe the common people, which without cauſe and reaſon doe ſoone rebell: they can by no poſſible meanes afterwards bridle their furie & inſolency. Now the reaſon that made vs to enter into diſcourſe againſt the ambition and vaine glorie amongſt the people: was the conſideration I had of their great power, remembring the miſſortunes of Tiberius and Caius Gracchi: both of the which comming of a noble houſe, and hauing bene maruellous wel brought vp, & managing alſo the affaires of the common wealth with a good deſire, were notwithſtanding in the ende caſt away: not ſo much through couetouſnes of glory, as for feare of diſhonor, which came alſo of no baſe mind. For they hauing receiued great pleaſures and friendſhips of the people, were aſhamed to be indebted to them, and therefore earneſtly ſought to exceede the people in good will, by new decrees and deuiſes, which they preferred for common benefit: and the people alſo for their partes contended to honor them the more, by how much they ſtriued to ſhewe themſelues thankefull. So with like ſtrife on either ſide, they to gratifie the common people, and the people alſo to honor them, were ſo vnwares entangled with publike cauſes, that they could no more follow the common prouerbe, which ſayeth:

Although our deedes diſſent from equitie
Yet can we not deſiſt with honeſtie

This thou ſhalt eaſily finde by the declaration of the hiſtorie. With theſe we doe compare two other popular men, both kings of LACEDÆMON, Agis and Cleomenes. For they as the Gracchi, ſeeking to increaſe the power of the common people, and to reſtore the iuſt and honeſt gouernment again of the common wealth of LACEDÆMON, which of long time had bene out of vſe: did in like manner purchaſe the hate of the nobilitie, which were loth to loſe any part of their wonted couetouſnes. In deed theſe two LACONIANS were no brethrē borne but yet did both follow one ſelfe courſe & forme of gouernment, which had beginning in this ſort. After that couetouſnes of gold and ſiluer crept againe into the citie of SPARTA, and with riches, couetouſnes alſo and miſerie, and by vſe, voluptuouſnes and licentious life: SPARTA then was voide of all honor and goodnes, and was long time drowned in ſhame & diſhonor, vntill king Agis and Leonidas came to raigne there. Agis was of the houſe of the Eurytiontides, the ſonne of Eudamedas, the ſixt of lineall deſcent after Ageſilaus, who had bene the greateſt Prince of all GRECE in his time. This Ageſilaus had a ſonne ſlain in ITALY by the MESSAPIANS, called Archidamus, before the citie of MANDONIVM. Archidamus had iſſue two ſonnes, Agis & Eudamidas that was king, who ſucceeded his brother Agis, whom Antipater ſlew before the city of MEGALOPOLIS, & left no childrē behind him. Eudamidas begat Archidamus, which Archidamus begat another Eudamidas: which Eudamidas alſo begat Agis, whoſe life we now write of. Leonidas alſo, the ſonne of Cleonymus, was of the other familie of the Agiades, the eight of ſucceſſion after Pauſanias, who ſlew Mardonius, the kings Lieutenant general of PERSIA, in a battell fought before the citie of PLATEES. This Pauſanias had a ſonne called Pliſtonax, and Pliſtonax alſo an other, called Pauſanias: who flying from SPARTA vnto the citie of TEGEA, his eldeſt ſon Ageſipolis was made king in his fathers roome, who dying without iſſue, his yonger brother Cleombrotus ſucceeded him in the kingdom. Cleombrotus had two ſons, Ageſipolis and Cleomenes: of the which, Ageſipolis raigned not long king, and died without iſſue. Then Cleomenes his brother, who was king after him, had two ſonnes, Acrotatus the elder, that died in his fathers life time: and Cleonymus the yonger which ſuruiued him, & was not king, but one Areus his Nephew, the ſonne of Acrotatus. This Areus died before the city of CORINTHE: who hauing an other Acrotatus to his ſonne, he ſucceeded him in the kingdom. He alſo died at a battell before the city of MEGALIPOLIS, and was ſlaine there by the tyrant Ariſtodemus, leauing his wife great with childe. Shee being brought to bedde after his death of a ſonne, whom Leonidas the ſonne of Cleonymus taught and brought vp: the childe dying verie young, the crowne by his death was caſt vpon Leonidas himſelfe. Howbeit his maners & conditions neuer liked the people. For though all men generally were corrupted through the cōmon wealth, and cleane out of order: yet Leonidas of all other exceeded, deforming moſt the auncient LACONIAN life: becauſe he had bene long time brought vp in Princes houſes, & followed alſo Seleucus Court, from whence hee had brought all the pride and pompe of thoſe Courts into GREECE, where law and reaſon ruleth. Agis on the contrary part did not only far excell Leonidas, in honor and magnanimity of mind: but all other almoſt alſo which had raig-

ned in SPARTA from the time of Ageſilaus the great. So that when Agis was not yet twentie yeare old, and being daintily brought vp with the fines of two women, his mother Agiſtrata, and Archidamia his grandmother, which had more gold and ſiluer, then all the LACEDÆMONIANS elſe, he began to ſpurn againſt theſe womaniſh delights & pleaſures, in making him ſelfe fayer to be the better beliked, and to be fine and trimme in his apparell, and to caſt vpon him a plaine Spaniſh cape, taking pleaſure in the diet, bathes, and manner of the ancient LACONIAN life: and openly boaſted beſides, that he would not deſire to be king, but onely for the hope he had to reſtore the ancient LACONIAN life by his authority. Then began the ſtate of LACEDÆMON firſt to be corrupted, and to leaue her ancient diſcipline, when the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing ſubdued the empire of the ATHENIANS, ſtored themſelues & coūtrie both, with plenty of gold & ſiluer. But yet reſeruing ſtill the lands left vnto them by ſucceſſion from their fathers, according vnto Lycurgus firſt ordinance and inſtitution, for diuiſion of lands amongſt them: which ordinance, and equalitie being inuiolably kept amongſt them, did yet preſerue the common wealth from defamation of diuerſe other notorious crimes: vntill the time of the authoritie of Epitadeus, one of the Ephores, a ſeditious man, and of proud conditions: who bitterly falling out with his owne ſon, preferred a law, that euery man might lawfully giue his lands and goods whileſt he liued, or after his death by teſtament, vnto any man whom he liked or thought well of. Thus this mā made this law to ſatiſfie his anger, & others alſo did confirme it for couetouſneſſe ſake, and ſo ouerthrew a noble ordinance. For the rich men then began to buy lands of numbers, and ſo transferred it from the right & lawfull heires: whereby a few men in ſhort time being made very rich, immediatly after there fell out great pouertie in the citie of SPARTA, which made all honeſt ſciences to ceaſe, & brought in thereupon vnlawfull occupations, who enuyed them that were wealthy. Therefore, there remained not aboue ſeuen hundred naturall citizens of SPARTA in all, & of them, not aboue a hundred that had lands and inheritance: for all the reſt were poore people in the citie, and were of no countenance nor calling, & beſides that, went vnwillingly to the warres againſt their enemies, looking euery day for ſturre and change in the citie. Agis therefore thinking it a notable good act (as in deede it was) to repleniſh the citie of SPARTA againe, and to bring in the old equalitie, he moued the matter vnto the citizens. He found the youth (againſt all hope) to giue good eare vnto him, and very well giuen vnto vertue, eaſily changing their garments & life, to recouer their libertie againe. But the oldeſt men, which were now euen rotten with couetouſneſſe and corruption, they were affraide to returne againe to the ſtraight ordinances of Lycurgus, as a ſlaue and runnagate from his Maſter, that trembleth when he is brought back againe vnto him. Therfore they reproued Agis, when he did lament before them their preſent miſerable eſtate, and wiſh alſo for the former auncient honour and true dignitie of SPARTA. Howbeit Lyſander the ſonne of Lybis, and Mandroclidas the ſonne of Ecphanes, and Ageſilaus alſo, greatly commended his noble deſire, and perſwaded him to goe forward withall. This Lyſander was of great authority and eſtimation amongeſt them in the city, Mandroclidas was alſo very wiſe, and carefull about any matter of counſell, and with his wiſdome and policy, very valiant: Ageſilaus in like manner, the kings Vncle, and an eloquent man, was very effeminate and couetous, and yet prickt forward to giue his furtheraunce to this attempt as it appeared, by his ſonne Hippomedon, who was a noble good ſouldier, and could doe very much, by meanes of the loue and good will the young men did beare him. But in deede, the ſecrete cauſe that brought Ageſilaus to conſent vnto this practiſe, was the greatneſſe of his debt which he ought, of the which he hoped to be diſcharged by chaunging of the ſtate and common wealth. Now when Agis had wonne him, he ſought by his meanes to draw his mother alſo vnto the matter, which was Ageſilaus ſiſter. Shee could doe very much by the number of her friendes, followers, and debters in the city, by whoſe meanes ſhee ruled the moſt part of the affaires of the city after her owne pleaſure. But the young man Hippomedon making her priuie vnto it, at the firſt ſhe was amazed withall, and bad him hold his peace if he were wiſe, and not meddle in matters vnpoſſible & vnprofitable. But when Ageſilaus had told her what a notable act it would be, and how eaſily it might be brought to paſſe, with maruellous great profit: and that king Agis beganne alſo to ſtraine her with great intreaty, that ſhe ſhould willingly depart with her goods to win her ſonne honor and glorie: who though he could not in money and riches come to be like vnto other kings (becauſe the ſlaues and factors onely of the kings Seleucus and Ptolomy, had more money then all the kings of SPARTA had together that euer raigned) yet if in temperance, thriftines, and noble mind (exceeding all their vanities) he could come to reſtore the LACEDÆMONIANS againe vnto equalitie: that then indeede he ſhould be counted a noble king. Theſe women being ſtirred vp with ambition by theſe perſwaſions of the young man, ſeing him ſo nobly bent, as if by the gods their mindes had ſecretly bene inflamed with the loue of vertue: did preſently alter their mindes in ſuch ſort, that they themſelues did pricke forward Agis, and ſent for their friends to pray and intreate them to fauor his enterpriſe: and furthermore they brought on other women alſo, knowing that the LACEDÆMONIANS did euer heare and beleue their wiues, ſuffering them to vnderſtand more of the affayres of the ſtate, then they themſelues did of their priuate eſtate at home. Herein is to be conſidered, that the moſt part of the riches of LACEDÆMON was in the hands of the women, and therefore they were againſt it, not only becauſe thereby they were cut off from their fines and exceſſe, in the which being ignorant of the true good indeede, they put all their felicitie: but alſo becauſe they ſawe their honour and authoritie which they had by their riches, cleane troden vnder foote. Therefore they comming to Leonidas, they did perſwade him to reproue Agis, becauſe he was elder man than he, and to let that this enterpriſe went not forward. Leonidas did what he could in fauour of the rich, but fearing the common people, who deſired nothing but alteration, he durſt not openly ſpeake againſt him, but ſecretly he did the beſt he could to hinder Agis practiſe, talking with the Magiſtrates of the citie, and accuſing Agis vnto them, he told them how he did offer the rich mens goods vnto the poore, the diuiſion of their landes, and the aboliſhing of all debts, for rewarde to put the tyrannie into his handes, and that thereby he got him a ſtrong guard vnto himſelfe, but not many citizens vnto SPARTA. This notwithſtanding, king Agis hauing procured Lyſander to be choſen one of the Ephores, he preſently perferred his lawe vnto the councell. The articles whereof were theſe: That ſuch as were in debt, ſhould be cleered of all their debts, and that the landes alſo ſhould be diuided into equall partes: ſo that from the valley of Pallena vnto mount Taugetus, and vnto the cities of MALEA and SELASIA, there ſhould be foure thouſand fiue hundred partes, and without thoſe boundes, there ſhould be in all the reſt, fifteene thouſand partes, the which ſhould be diſtributed vnto their neighbours meete to carie weapon: and the reſt vnto the naturall SPARTANS. The number of them ſhould be repleniſhed with their neighbors and ſtrangers in like manner, which ſhould be very well brought vp, and be able men beſides to ſerue the common wealth: all the which afterwardes ſhould be deuided into fifteene companies, of the which, ſome ſhould receiue two hundred, & others foure hundred men, & ſhould liue according to the old auncient inſtitution obſerued by their aunceſtors. This lawe being preferred vnto the Senate, the Senators grew to diuerſe opinions vppon it. Whereupon Lyſander him ſelfe aſſembled the great councell of all the people, and there ſpake vnto them him ſelfe, and Mandroclidas, and Ageſilaus alſo, praying them not to ſuffer the honor of SPARTA to be troden vnder foote, for the vanitie of a few: but that they would remember the auncient oracles of the goddes, warning them to beware of auarice, as of the plague and deſtruction of the common wealth: and of the late oracle alſo brought vnto them, from the temple of Paſiphaë. The temple and oracle of Paſiphaë, was famous at the city of THALAMES: and ſome ſay, that Paſiphaë was one of the Daughters of Atlas, which was gotten with child by Iupiter, and was deliuered of a ſon called Hammon. Other think that it was Caſſandra, one of king Priamus Daughters that died there, which was ſurnamed Paſiphaë, becauſe ſhe gaue all the anſwers and oracles of things to come. But Phylarchus writeth, that Daphné the Daughter of Amycla, flying from Apollo that would haue rauiſhed her, was turned into a lawrell tree, and honored by Apollo with the gift of propecy. So, they ſaid that this oracle of the god commaunded them, that the SPARTANS ſhould againe returne vnto their former auncient equality, ſtabliſhed firſt by Lycurgus law. When euery man els had ſpoken, king Agis riſing vp, briefly ſpeaking vnto the people, ſayed: that he would beſtow great contributions for the reformation of this common wealth, which hee was deſirous to reſtore againe. For firſt of all, he would make common

all his arable and paſture he had, and beſides that, he would ad to ſixe hundreth talents in ready money, and ſo much ſhould his mother, grandmother, kinſmen and friends, all the which were the richeſt and wealthieſt in SPARTA. When the people heard what he ſayd, they maruelled much at the noble minde of this young king, and were very glad of it, ſaying: that for three hundreth yeres ſpace together, the city of SPARTA had not ſo worthy a king as he. But Leonidas contrarily aſſayed with all his power he could to reſiſt him, thinking with himſelfe, that if king Agis purpoſe tooke place, he ſhould alſo be compelled to doe as he did, and yet he ſhould haue no thankes, but king Agis: becauſe that all the SPARTANS indifferently ſhould be compelled to make their goods in common, but the honor ſhould be his onely that firſt began it. So he asked Agis, whether he thought Lycurgus had bene a good and iuſt man or not. Agis anſwered, that he had bene. Then replyed Leonidas, did you euer ſee that he had taken away and aboliſhed any debts, or had receiued ſtrangers into the number of the Citizens of SPARTA? Who contrarily thought his common wealth vnperfect, if all ſtrangers were not baniſhed the citie. Agis againe aunſwered him: that he maruelled not that Leonidas being brought vp in a ſtrange coũtrie, and alſo maried there in a noblemans houſe, he ſhould be ignorant of Lycurgus lawes, who baniſhing gold and ſiluer out of his citie, did therewithall exile debt and lending. And for ſtraungers he hated them that would not conforme them ſelues vnto the maners and faſhions of life which he inſtituted, and thoſe they were which he baniſhed: not for any ill will he bare vnto their perſons, but becauſe he feared their manners of life, leaſt that mingling them with the citizens, they ſhould make them runne after vanitie and couetouſnes to be rich. For otherwiſe, Terpander, Thales, and Pherecydes, which were all ſtrangers, were maruelloully reuerenced and honored in SPARTA in olde time, becauſe they did ſing in their writings, the ſelfe ſame things which Lycurgus had eſtabliſhed in his lawes. And thou thy ſelfe alſo doeſt commend Ecprepes, being one of the Ephores, becauſe he did cut with a hatchet the two ſtrings which Phrynis the Muſitian had added vnto the Citherne, more then the ſeuen common ſtrings, and thoſe alſo which did the like vnto Timotheus: and yet thou reproueſt me, becauſe I goe about to roote out all exceſſe and pride out of SPARTA, as though thoſe men did not farre off preuent that theſe ſuperfluous ſtrings of the muſicke, delighting the citizens mindes too much with their ſongs, ſhould not cauſe them fall vnto ſuch trade and manner of life, as ſhould make the citie at diſcorde with it ſelfe. After this contention, the common people did ſticke vnto king Agis, and the rich men followed Leonidas, praying and perſwading him not to forſake them: and further, they did ſo intreate the Senators, in whom conſiſteth the chiefe authoritie, to determine and diſgeſt all matters before they be propounded vnto the people, that they ouerthrew the law, by the onely voice of one man more. Wherefore Lyſander who was yet in office, attempted to accuſe Leonidas by an auncient law, forbidding that none of the race of Hercules ſhould marry with any ſtrange woman, nor beget children of her: and ſayed further, that no man vppon paine of death ſhould dwell any where, but in SPARTA. When hee had inſtructed others to obiect theſe things againſt Leonidas, he with other of his colleagues obſerued a ſigne in the element, the ceremony wherof was in this ſorte: Euery nineth yeare, the Ephori chooſing a bright night without moonelight, did ſit downe in ſome open place, and behelde the ſtarres in the element, to ſee if they ſaw any ſtarre ſhoote from one place to an other: if they did, then they accuſed their kings that they had offended the goddes, and did depriue them of their kingdome, vntill ſome oracle came from DELPHES or Olympus, or reſtore them againe. Lyſander then declaring that he had ſeene a ſtarre flie in the element, did therefore accuſe king Leonidas, and brought forth witneſſes againſt him: how he had maried a woman of ASIA, the which one of king Seleucus Lieutenants had giuen him in mariage, and that he had two children by her: and afterwardes being forſaken of his wife that refuſed him, he returned againe into his country againſt his will: & ſo had poſſeſſed the kingdom for lack of a lawful heir. So following his accuſation in this maner againſt him, he allured Cleombrotus his ſon in law, being alſo of the kings bloud, to make title to the crowne. Leonidas being afraied of the ſucceſſe hereof, tooke ſanctuary in the temple of Iuno, ſurnamed Chalceæcos, & his daughter with him, who forſooke her huſband Cleombrotus. Leonidas then being cited to appeare in perſon, & making default, they depoſed him, and made

Cleombrotus king. In the mean time Lyſanders office expired, & the new Ephori which ſucceded him, did deliuer Leonidas again, and accuſed Lyſander & Mandroclidas, becauſe againſt the law, they had aboliſhed all debts, & had againe made new diuiſion of lands. When they ſawe they were openly accuſed, they incenſed both the kings; that ioyning together, they ſhould make the Ephores ordinances of no effect: declaring that their authoritie was onely erected for the diſcord of the two kings, becauſe they ſhould giue their voices vnto that king that had the beſt iudgment & reaſon, whē the other would wilfully withſtand both right & reaſon: & therfore, they two agreing together, might lawfully do what they would, without controlment of any perſon: & that to reſiſt the kings, was a breaking of the law, ſith that by right the Ephori had no other priuiledge & authority, but to be iudges & arbitrators betwene thē, whē there was any cauſe of iarre or controuerſie. Both the kings being caried away by this perſuaſion, went into the market place accōpanied with their frends, plucked the Ephores from their ſeats, & put others in their roomes, of the which Ageſilaus was one. Furthermore, they armed a great number of yong men, & opening the priſons, did ſet the priſoners at liberty: the which made their aduerſaries afraid of thē doubting ſome great murther would haue followed vpon it, howbeit no man had any hurt. For Ageſilaus being bent to kill Leonidas, who fled to the city of TEGEA, & hauing alſo layd men in wait for him by the way: king Agis hearing of it, ſent thither other friends of his in whō he put great confidence & they did accōpany Leonidas, & brought him ſafely vnto the city of TEGEA. Thus their purpoſe taking effect, & no man cōtrarying thē: one man only Ageſilaus ouerthrew all, & daſhed a noble LACONIAN law by a ſhameful vice, which was couetouſnes. For he being a great landed man, & hauing the beſt lands of any man in the coūtry, & owing a great ſumme of mony beſides: would neither pay his debts nor let go his land. Wherfore he perſuaded king Agis, that if he went about to ſtabliſh both together, he ſhould raiſe a great vprore in the city, and withall, if he did firſt win them that were landed men, preferring at the beginning the cutting off of dets only: then that they would eaſily & willingly alſo accept the law of partitiō of lands: Lyſander was alſo of this opiniō: wherby king Agis and he both were deceiued by Ageſilaus ſubtilty. So they cōmanded al the creditors to bring their bonds, obligations, and bils of det (which the LACEDÆMONIANS do call Claria) into the market place, & there laying them on a heape together, they did ſet fire on them. Whē the vſurers & creditors ſaw their writings obligatory a fire, they departed thence with heauie harts: But Ageſilaus mocking thē ſaid he neuer ſaw a brighter fire in his life. The people then requiring that the lands alſo ſhould be preſently deuided, & the kings likewiſe cōmanding it: Ageſilaus ſtill interpoſing ſome cauſe of let, delayed time, vntill oportunity ſerued, that king Agis ſhould go to the warres, for that the ACHAIANS their confederats had praied aid of LACEDÆMON, being bound therunto by the league confirmed betwene them, becauſe they looked daily that the ÆTOLIANS cōming through the coūtry of MEGARA, would inuade PELOPONNESVS. Aratus general of the ACHAIANS had leuied a great army to withſtād their inuaſion, & had alſo written vnto the Ephores, that they ſhould ſend thē aide. Whereupon they preſently ſent king Agis, perceiuing alſo the readines and good wil of the ſoldiers which were appointed to go with him: for the moſt of them were yong men & needy, who ſeing thēſelues diſcharged of the feare of their dets, & hoping alſo at their return, that the lāds likewiſe ſhould be deuided among thē: they went with glad harts, and were obedient to king Agis. So that the cities where through they paſſed, wondred how they came through PELOPONNESVS, from the one ſide to the other, very quietly, without noyſe or offence to any man. Likewiſe many GRECIANS calling to mind the ancient times, told one another, that it was a noble ſight thē to ſee the army of LACEDÆMON, whē they were led by Ageſilaus, Lyſāder, & Leonidas, famous captains: ſith now they ſaw ſo great obedience vnto Agis by his ſouldiers, who was in manner the yōgeſt man of al his camp: who alſo glorying to be contēt with litle, to away with paines, & not to be more coſtly apparelled, & armed thē any priuat ſouldier he had: he wan himſelfe therby a maruelous loue of the people. Howbeit the rich men liked not this change, & were afraid leſt Agis ſhould giue other people example to riſe alſo, & to doe the like with theirs, as he had done. Agis meting with Aratus by the city of CORINTH, euen as he was conſulting whether he ſhould fight with his enemy or not: ſhewed himſelf in his counſel, then no raſh, but a reſolute & valiant man. For he told him, that for his opinion he thought it better to fight, & not to ſuffer the war to come any farther, leauing the entry into PELOPONNESVS free to their enemy: neuertheles, that he would do what Aratus thought good, becauſe he was the elder, and generall alſo of the ACHAIANS, whom he came not to cõmand, but to aide thẽ. But Baton SINOPIAN writeth that king Agis would not fight, though Aratus was willing: howbeit he had not read that which Aratus had writtẽ for his excuſe & iuſtificatiõ, aleaging there that the farmers & husbandmẽ hauing brought al the corn into their barnes, he thought it better to ſuffer the enemies to come farther into their cõutrie, rather then to hazard battell, to the loſſe of the whole cõutry of PELOPONNESVS, & that therfore he licenced al the confederats to depart & brake vp his army. So king Agis returned home again, greatly honored of them that ſerued with him in his iorney, finding the citie of SPARTA then in great broile and trouble. For Ageſilaus at that time being one of the Ephores, finding himſelfe rid of the feare which before kept him vnder: cared not what iniurie or miſchiefe he did vnto any citizen, ſo he might get money. For amongſt other things, that very yeare he made them paye beyond all reaſon the tillages and taxes due vnto the cõmon wealth for thirteene moneths, adding to the thirteenth moneth aboue the ordinarie time of the yeare. Wherefore perceiuing euerie manne hated him, and being afrayd of them he had offended: he kept ſouldiers about him, armed with their ſwords, and ſo came downe into the market place among them. And for the two kings, he made no account of the one: but of the other that was Agis, he ſeemed outwardly to make good account, rather for kindreds ſake, then for his dignitie of a king, and furthermore gaue it out abroad, that he would alſo be one of the Ephores the next yere following. Wherupon, his enemies ſpeedely to preuent the danger gathered force together, & openly brought king Leonidas from TEGEA, to reſtore him again to his kingdom. The people were glad to ſe that, becauſe they were angry they had bene mocked in that ſort, for that the lands were not deuided according vnto promiſe. Furthermore Hippomedon was ſo wel beloued for his valiantnes of euery man, that intreating the people for his father Ageſilaus, he ſaued his life, and got him out of the citie. But for the two kings, Agis tooke ſanctuarie in the temple of Iuno Chalceæcos. And Cleombrotus the other king fled into the temple of Neptune: for it ſeemed that Leonidas being much more offended with him, did let king Agis alone, and went againſt him with certen ſouldiers armed. Then he ſharpely taunted him, that being his ſonne in law, he had conſpired againſt him to depriue him of his kingdom, and had driuen him out of his countrie. But then Cleombrotus not hauing a word to ſay, ſate ſtill, and made him no aunſwer. Whereupon, his wife Chelonis, the daughter of Leonidas, who before was offended for the iniurie they did her father, and had left her husband Cleombrotus, that had vſurped the kingom from him, to ſerue her father in his aduerſity, & while he was in ſanctuarie tooke part with him alſo of his miſery, & afterwards when he went vnto the citie of TEGEA, wore blacks for ſorrow, being offended with her husband: ſhe contrarily then changing her anger with her husbands fortune and miſerie, became alſo an humble ſuter with him, ſitting downe by him, and imbracing him, hauing her two litle ſonnes on either ſide of them. All men wondering, and weeping for pitie to ſee the goodnes and naturall loue of this Ladie, who ſhewing her mourning apparell, & haire of her head flaring about her eyes, bareheaded: ſhe ſpake in this manner vnto her father. O father mine, this ſorowfull garment and countenance is not for pitie of Cleombrotus, but hath long remained with mee, lamenting ſore your former miſery and exile: but nowe, which of the two ſhould I rather chooſe, either to continue a mourner in this pitifull ſtate, ſeeing you againe reſtored to your kingdome, hauing ouercome your enemies: or elſe putting on my princely apparell, to ſee my husband ſlaine, vnto whom you maried me a mayde? who if he cannot moue you to take compaſſion on him, and to obtaine mercie, by the teares of his wife and children: he ſhall then abide more bitter paine of his euill counſell, then that which you intend to make him ſuffer. For he ſhall ſee his wife dye before him, whom he loueth more deerely then any thing in the world. Alſo, with what face can I look vpon other Ladies, when I could neuer bring my father to pity by any interceſſiõ I could make for my husband, neither my husband, intreate him for my father: and that my hap is to be borne, a daughter and wife alwaies moſt vnfortunate, and deſpiſed of mine owne? And for my husband, if he had any reaſon to doe that he did, I then tooke it from him, by taking your parte, and proteſting againſt him: and contrarily, your ſelfe doth giue him honeſt colour to excuſe his fault, when he ſeeth in you the deſire of the kingdome ſo great, that for the loue thereof, you thinke it lawfull to kill your ſons in law, and alſo not to regard the children he hath gotten, for her ſake. Chelonis pitifully complaining in this ſorte, putting her face vpon Cleombrotus head, caſt her ſwollen and blubbering eyes vpon the ſtanders by. Wherefore Leonidas after he had talked a litle with his friends, he commanded Cleombrotus to get him thence and to leaue the citie as an exile: & prayed his daughter for his ſake to remain with him, and not to forſake her father, that did ſo dearely loue her, as for her ſake he had ſaued her husbands life. This notwithſtanding, ſhe would not yeld to his requeſt, but riſing vp with her husband, gaue him one of his ſons & her ſelf took the other in her armes: & then making her prayer before the alter of the goddeſſe, ſhe went as a baniſhed woman away with her husband. And truely the example of her vertue was ſo famous, that if Cleombrotus mind had not bene too much blinded with vaine glorie, he had cauſe to thinke his exile farre more happie, to enioy the loue of ſo noble a wife as he had, then for the kingdom which he poſſeſſed without her. Then Leonidas hauing baniſhed king Cleombrotus out of the citie, and remouing the firſt Ephores, had ſubſtituted other in their place: he preſently bethought him howe he might craftily come by king Agis. Firſt, he perſwaded him to come out of the ſanctuarie, and to gouerne the kingdom ſafely with him, declaring vnto him that his citizens had forgiuen him all that was paſt, becauſe they knew he was deceiued, and ſubtilly circumuented by Ageſilaus craft being a young man, ambitious of honor. Agis would not leaue the ſanctuarie for Leonidas cunning perſwaſion, but miſtruſted all that he ſayed vnto him. Wherefore Leonidas would no more beguile him with faier words. But Amphares, Demochares, and Arceſilaus, did often times go to viſit king Agis, and otherwhile alſo they got him out of the ſanctuarie with them vnto the bath, and brought him backe againe into the temple, when he had bathed. But Amphares hauing borrowed not long before, certain rich apparel & plate of Ageſiſtrata, becauſe he would not redeliuer them againe, he determined to betray king Agis, his mother and grandmother. And it is reported that he chiefely did ſerue Leonidas turne, and prouoked the Ephores (of which number he was one) againſt Agis. Now therfore, Agis keping all the reſt of his time within the temple, ſauing whē he went vpon occaſion to the bath: they determined to intercept him by the way, and to take him when he was out of the ſanctuarie. So they watched him one day when he came and bathed and came & ſaluted him as their maner was, & ſeemed to accompany him, ſporting, and being mery with him, as with a young man their familiar. But when they came to the turning of a ſtreet that went towards the priſon, Amphares laying hold on him, being one of the Ephores, ſaid vnto him: I arreſt thee Agis, and will bring thee before the Ephores, to giue account of thy doings in the cōmon wealth. Then Demochares, which was a great mightie man caſt his gown ouer his eares, & pulled him forward: others alſo thruſted him forward behind him, as they had agreed together. So no man being nere them to helpe Agis, they got him into priſon. Then came Leonidas incontinently with a great number of ſouldiers that were ſtrangers, and beſet the priſon round about. The Ephores went into the priſon, and ſent vnto ſome of the Senate to come vnto them, whom they knew to be of their mind: then they cōmanded Agis, as if it had bene iudicially, to giue account of the alteration he had made in the common wealth. The young man laughed at their hypocriſie. But Amphares told him that it was no laughing ſport, & that he ſhould pay for his folly. Then another of the Ephores ſeeming to deale more fauorably with him, & to ſhew him a way, how he might eſcape the condēnation for his fault: asked him if he had not bene intiſed vnto it by Ageſilaus and Lyſander. Agis anſwered, that no man compelled him, but that he onely did it to follow the ſteppes of the ancient Lycurgus, to bring the common wealth vnto the former eſtate of his graue ordinance and inſtitution. Then the ſame Senator asked him againe, if he did not repent him of that he had done. The young man boldly anſwered him, that he would neuer repent him of ſo wiſe and vertuous an enterpriſe, though he ventured his life for it. Then they condemned him to death, and commanded the Sergeants to carie him into the Decade, which was a place in the priſon where they were ſtrangled, that were condemned to die. Demochares perceiuing the Sergeantes durſt not laye hold of him,and likewiſe that the ſouldiers which were ſtrangers,did abhor to commit ſuch a fact contrarie to the law of god and man, to lay violent hands vpon the perſon of a king: he threatned and reuiled them,and dragged Agis perforce into that place called the Decade. Now the rumor ranne ſtraight through the citie,that king Agis was taken,& a multitude of people were at the priſon dores with lights & torches. Thither came alſo king Agis mother & grandmother ſhreeking out & praying that the king of SPARTA might yet be heard and iudged by the people. For this cauſe they haſtened his death the ſooner, and were afraid beſides, leaſt the people in the night would take him out of their hands by force,if there came any more people thither. Thus king Agis being led to his death, ſpied a ſargeant lamenting & weping for him, vnto whom he ſayed: good fellow I pray thee weepe not for me, for I am honeſter man than they that ſo ſhamefully put me to death, & with thoſe words he willingly put his hed into the halter. Amphares then going out of the priſon into the ſtreet,found Ageſiſtrata there king Agis mother, who ſtraight fell downe at his feete: but he taking her vp againe,in old familiar manner,as being her very friend,told her that they ſhould do king Agis no hurte, & that ſhe might if ſhe would,go & ſee him. Then ſhe prayed, that they would alſo let her mother in with her. Amphares ſayed, with a good will: and ſo put them both into the priſon houſe, and made the dores be ſhut after them. But when they were within,he firſt gaue Archidamia vnto the ſergeants to be put to death, who was a maruellous olde woman, and had liued more honorably vnto that age, then any Ladie or Matrone beſide her in the citie. She being executed, he commanded Ageſiſtrata alſo to come in. Who when ſhe ſawe the bodie of her dead ſonne layed on the ground, & her mother alſo hanging on the gallowes: ſhe did her ſelfe helpe the hangman to plucke her downe, and layed her body by her ſonnes. Then hauing couered her in decent manner,ſhe layed her downe on the ground by the corps of her ſonne Agis, and kiſſing his cheeke ſayd: out alas my ſonne, thy great modeſtie, goodnes,and clemencie, brought thee and vs vnto this death. Then Amphares peeping in at the dore to ſee what was done, hearing what ſhe ſayed, came in withall in a great rage, and ſayed: I perceiue that thou haſt alſo bene of councell with thy ſonne, and ſithence it is ſo, thou ſhalt alſo followe him. Then ſhee riſing alſo to be ſtrangled, ſayed: the goddes graunt yet that this may profit SPARTA. This horrible murther being blowen abroade in the citie, and the three dead bodies alſo brought out of priſon: the feare though it were great amongſt the people, could not keep them backe from apparant ſhew of griefe, and manifeſt hate againſt Leonidas and Amphares,thinking that there was neuer a more wicked and crueller fact committed in SPARTA,ſince the DORIANS came to dwell in PELOPONNESVS. For the very enemies thēſelues in battell, would not willingly lay hands vpō the kings of LACEDÆMON,but did forbeare as much as they could poſſible,both for feare & reuerence they bare vnto their maieſtie. For in many great battels & cōflicts which the LACEDÆMONIANS had againſt the GRECIANS,there was neuer any king of LACEDÆMON ſlain,before Philips time,but Cleōbrotus only,who was ſlaine with a dart at the battell of LEVCTRES. Some write alſo that the MESSENIANS holde opinion, that their Ariſtomenes ſlue Theopompus:howbeit the LACEDÆMONIANS ſayed,that he was but hurt not ſlaine. But hereof there are diuerſe opinions:but it is certaine that Agis was the firſt king whō the Ephores euer put to death: for that he had layed a plot of a noble deuiſe, and worthy of SPARTA,being of that age when men doe eaſily pardon them that offend: and was rather to be accuſed of his friends & enemies,becauſe he had ſaued Leonidas life, and had truſted other men, as the beſt natured young man that could be.

Cleomenes the ſonne of Leonidas

Agiatis king Agis wife, maried vnto Cleomenes.

Now Agis hauing ſuffered in this ſort,Leonidas was not quicke enough to take Archidamus his brother alſo,for he fled preſently. Yet he brought Agis wife out of her houſe by force,with a litle boy ſhe had by him,and maried her vnto his ſonne Cleomenes, who was yet vnder age to marie: fearing leaſt this young Ladye ſhould be beſtowed elſe where, being indeede a great heire, and of a rich houſe, and the daughter of Gylippus,called by her name Agiatis, beſides that ſhe was the faireſt woman at that time in all GRECE, and the vertuouſeſt, and beſt conditioned. Wherfore for diuers reſpectes ſhe prayed ſhe might not be forced to it. But now being at length maried with Cleomenes,ſhe euer hated Leonidas to the death, and yet was a good and louing wife vnto her young husband: who immediatly after he was maried vnto her, fell greatly in fancie with her, and for compaſſions ſake (as it ſeemed) he thanked her for the loue ſhe bare vnto her firſt husbande, and for the louing remembraunce ſhe had of him: inſomuch as he himſelfe many times would fall in talke of it, and woulde be inquiſitiue howe things had paſſed, taking great pleaſure to heare of Agis wiſe counſell and purpoſe. For Cleomenes was as deſirous of honor, and had as noble a minde as Agis, and was borne alſo to temperancie, and moderation of life, as Agis in like manner was: howbeit, he had not, that ſhamefaſt modeſtie and lenitie, which the other had, but was ſomewhat more ſturring of nature, & readier to put any good matter in execution. So he thought it great honeſtie, to bring the Citizens if that he could, to be contented to liue after an honeſt ſorte: but contrarily, he thought it no diſhoneſtie to bring them vnto good life, by compulſion alſo. Furthermore the manners of the Citizens of Sparta, giuing themſelues ouer to idlenes and pleaſure, did nothing like him at all: neither that the king did ſuffer the common wealth to be ruled as they liſted, ſo no man impeached his pleaſure, and that they did let him alone: inſomuch, no man regarding the profit of the common wealth, euery man was for himſelfe, and his family. And contrarily it was not lawfull for any man to ſpeake for the exerciſes of the youth, for their education in temperancie, and for the reſtoring againe of equalitie of life, the preferment whereof was, the only cauſe of the late death of Agis. They ſay alſo, that Cleomenes being a young ſtripling had heard ſome diſputation of Philoſophie, when the Philoſopher Sphærus, of the coũtry of Borysthenes came to Lacedæmon, and louingly ſtayed there to teache young men and children. He was one of the chiefeſt ſchollers of Zenon Citian, and delghted (as it ſeemed) in Cleomenes noble minde, and had a great deſire to pricke him forward vnto honor. For as it is reported, that the ancient Leonidas being demaunded what Poet he thought Tyrtæus to be, aunſwered he was good to flatter young mens mindes: for he ſette their hartes on fire by his verſes, when they beganne to fight any battell, fearing no danger, they were ſo encouraged by them. So the Stoicke diſcipline is ſomewhat daungerous, for the ſtoute and valiaut mindes, which otherwiſe doeth make them deſperate: ſo when they are ioyned vnto a graue and gentle nature, firſt it lifteth vp his heart, and then maketh him taſt the profit thereof. Nowe Leonidas (the father of Cleomenes) being deceaſed, and he himſelfe alſo come vnto the crowne finding that the Citizens of Sparta at that time were very diſſolute, that the rich men followed their pleaſure and profit, taking no care for the common wealth, that the poore men alſo for very want and neede, went with no good life and courage to the warres, neither cared for the bringing vp of their children, and that he himſelfe had but the name of a king, and the Ephori the abſolute authoritie to doe what they liſted: at his firſt comming to his kingdome, he determined to alter the whole ſtate and gouernement of the common wealth. Who hauing a friend called Xenares, that had bene his louer in his youth (which the Lacedæmonians called Empniſtæ, as much as inſpired) he beganne to ſound his opinion, asking what manner of man king Agis had bene, and by what reaſon, and whoſe aduiſe he had followed in his attempt for the reformation of the commen wealth. Xenares at the firſt did not willingly rehearſe theſe things vnto him, declaring euery thing what had paſſed. But when he found that Cleomenes was affected vnto king Agis intent, & ſtill deſired to heare of it: then Xenares ſharply and angrily reproued him, and tolde him he was not wiſe, nor well aduiſed, and at length would no more come and talke with him as he was wont, yet making no man priuie why he abſtained from comming to him but told them that asked him, he knewe a cauſe well enough why. Xenares nowe hauing thus refuſed him, and thinking all the reſt woulde doe the like: to bring this matter to paſſe, he tooke this reſolution with himſelfe. Becauſe he thought he might the rather doe it in warre, then in peace, he ſet the citie of Sparta and the Achaians at variance together: who did themſelues giue the firſt occaſion to be complained vpon. For Aratus being the Preſident and chiefe of all the Achaians, had practiſed a long time to bring all Peloponnesus into one bodie: and had therefore onely ſuſtained great troubles in warres, and at home in peace: thinking that there was no other waye to deliuer them from forraine warres. Nowe when he had wonne all the other people to be of his opinion: there remained no more but the Elians, the Lacedæmonians, & a fewe of the Archadians, which were ſubiect to the Lacedæmonians. When king Leonidas was dead,

Aratus beganne to inuade the ARCHADIANS, thoſe ſpecially that bordered vpon the ARGIVES: to proue how the LACEDÆMONIANS would take it, making no account of Cleomenes, being but a yong king, & had no experience of warres. Thereupon the Ephori ſent Cleomenes vnto ATHÆNIVM (a temple of Minerua hard by the citie of BELBINA) with an army to take it: becauſe it was a paſſage and entry into the country of LACONIA, howbeit the place at that time was in queſtion betwixt the MEGALOPOLITANS & the LACEDÆMONIANS, Cleomenes got it, and fortified it. Aratus making no complaint otherwiſe of the matter, ſtole out one night with his armie to ſet vpon the TEGEANS, & ORCHOMENIANS, hoping to haue taken thoſe cities by treaſõ. But the traitors that were of his conſederacy, their harts failed thẽ when they ſhould haue gone about it: ſo that Aratus returned, hauing loſt his iorney, thinking that this ſecret attempt of his was not diſcouered. But Cleomenes finely wrote vnto him as his frend, and asked him, whither he had led his armie by night: Aratus returned anſwer againe, that vnderſtanding Cleomenes ment to fortifie BELBINA, he went forth with his armie, thinking to haue let him. Cleomenes wrote againe vnto him & ſaid he did beleue that which he ſpake was true: howbeit he earneſtly requeſted him, (if it were no trouble to him) to aduertiſe him why he brought ſcaling ladders and lightes after him. Aratus ſmiling at this mocke, asked what this yong mã was. Democritus LACEDÆMONIAN being a baniſhed man out of his coũtrie anſwered: if thou haſt any thing to doe againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, thou hadſt need make haſte, before this young Cockrel, haue on his ſpurres. Then Cleomenes being in the field in the countrie of ARCHADIA, with a few horſemen and three hundreth footmen only: the Ephori being afraid of warres, ſent for him to returne againe. His backe was no ſooner turned, obeying their commandement: but Aratus ſodainly tooke the citie of CAPHYES. Thereupon, the Ephori incontinently ſent Cleomenes backe againe with his armie: who took the fort of Methydrium, and burnt the borders of the ARGIVES. The ACHAIANS came againſt him with an armie of twentie thouſand footemen, and a thouſand horſemen led by Ariſtomachus: Cleomenes met with them by the city of PALANTIVM, & offred battell. But Aratus quaking at the hardines of this young man, would not ſuffer Ariſtomachus to hazard battell, but went his way derided by the ACHAIANS, & deſpiſed by the LACEDÆMONIANS: who in all were not aboue fiue thouſand fighting men. Cleomenes courage being now lift vp, & brauely ſpeaking to his citizens: he remembred them of a ſaying of one of their ancient kings, that the LACEDÆMONIANS neuer inquired what nũber their enemies were, but where they were. Shortly after, the ACHAIANS making warre with the ELIANS, Cleomenes was ſent to aid them & met with the armie of the ACHAIANS by the mountain Lyceum, as they were in their return: he ſetting vpon them, gaue them the ouerthrow, ſlue a great number of them, and tooke many alſo priſoners, that the rumor ranne through GRECE, how Aratus ſelfe was ſlaine. Cleomenes wiſely taking the occaſion which this victory gaue him: he went ſtraight to the city of MANTINEA, and taking it vpon a ſodaine, when no man knew of his comming, he put a ſtrong garriſon into it. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS harts failing them, & reſiſting Cleomenes enterpriſes, ouer wearying them with warres: he went about to ſend Archidamus, king Agis brother, being then at MESSENA, vnto whom the kingdõ of right belonged by the other houſe, ſuppoſing that he ſhoulde eaſily weaken the power of the Ephores, by the authoritie of the two kings, if both of them ioyned together. Which when the murtherers of king Agis vnderſtoode, being afraid that Archidamus returning from exile, he would be reuenged of them, they ſecretly receiued him into the citie, and founde the means to bring him into SPARTA. But when they had him, they put him ſtraight to death, whether it was vnwitting to Cleomenes (as Phylarchus plainly teſtifieth) or els with his priuitie, ſuffering them to make him away, by perſwaſion of his frends. But it is a clere caſe, the citie was burdened withall, becauſe probable matter fell out that they had compelled Cleomenes to doe it. Neuertheleſſe, he holding ſtill his firſt determination, to alter the ſtate of the common wealth of SPARTA, as ſoone as he could poſſible: he ſo fed the Ephores with money, that he brought them to be contented he ſhould make warre. He had alſo won many other citizens by the meanes of his mother Crateſiclea, who furniſht him with money, that he lacked not to honor him withall: and further, maried as it is reported, (being other wiſe not ment to marie) for her ſonnes ſake, vnto one of the wealthieſt men of all the citie. So Cleomenes leading his army into the field, wanne a place within the territory of Megalopolis, called Leuctra. The Achaians alſo being quickly come to their aide, led by Aratus: they ſtraight fought a battell by the citie ſelfe, where Cleomenes had the worſt on the one ſide of his armie. Howbeit Aratus would not ſuffer the Achaians to follow them, becauſe of bogges and quauemyres, but ſounded the retreate. But Lyſiadas a Megalopolitan being angry withal cauſed the horſemen he had about him to followe the chaſe, who purſued ſo fiercely, that they came amongſt vines, wals, and ditches, where he was driuen to diſperſe his men, and yet could not get out. Cleomenes perceiuing it, ſent the light horſemen of the Tarentins & Cretans againſt him: of whom Lyſiadas valiantly fighting was ſlaine. Then the Lacedæmonians being couragious for this victorie, came with great cries, & giuing a fierce charge vpon the Achaians, ouerthrew their whole armie, & ſlew a maruellous number of them: but yet Cleomenes at their requeſt ſuffered them to take vp the dead bodies of their men to burie them. For Lyſiadas corps, he cauſed it to be brought vnto him, and putting a purple robe vpon it, and a crowne on his head, ſent it in this aray vnto the very gates of the citie of Megalopolis. It was that ſelfe Lyſiadas, who giuing ouer the tyranny and gouernment of Megalopolis, made it a popular ſtate, and free citie, and ioyned it to the Achaians. After this victorie, Cleomenes that determined greater matters and attemptes, perſwaded himſelfe that if he might once come to ſtabliſh the affaires of the common wealth at Sparta to his mind, he might then eaſily ouercome the Achaians: brake with his father in law Megiſtonus, & told him that it was neceſſarie to take away the authoritie of the Ephores, and to make diuiſion of the lands among the Spartans, and then being brought to equalitie, to encorage them to recouer the Empire of Grece againe vnto the Lacedæmonians, which their predeceſſors before them, held and enioyed. Megiſtonus graunting his good will and furtherance, ioyned two or three of his friends more vnto him. It chaunced at that time that one of the Ephores lying in the temple of Paſiphaé, had a maruellous dreame in the night. For he thought he ſawe but one chaire ſtanding where the Ephori did vſe to ſit to giue audience, and that the other foure which were wont to be there, were taken away: and that maruelling at it, he heard a voice out of the temple that ſaid, that was the beſt for Sparta. He declaring this dreame the next morning vnto Cleomenes, it ſomewhat troubled him at the firſt, thinking that he came to feele him, for that he had heard ſome inckling of his intent. But when he perſwaded himſelfe that the other ment good faith, and lyed not vnto him, being bolder then before, he went forward with his purpoſe, and taking with him vnto the campe all thoſe Spartans which he ſuſpected to be againſt his enterpriſe, hee went and tooke the cities of Heræa & Alsea, confederats of the Achaians, & victualled Orchomena, and went and camped before the citie of Mantinea. In fine, he ſo wearied & ouerharried the Lacedæmonians by long iorneys, that at length they beſought him he would let them remaine in Arcadia, to repoſe themſelues there. In the meane time, Cleomenes with his ſtrangers which he had hyred, returned againe vnto Sparta, and imparted his intent by the way vnto them he truſted beſt, and marched at his owne eaſe, that he might take the Ephores at ſupper. When he came neere vnto the citie, he ſent Euryclidas before, into the hall of the Ephores, as though he brought them newes out of the campe from him. After him, he ſent alſo Thericion & Phœbis, and two other that had bene brought vp with him, whom the Lacedæmonians called the Samothracians, taking with them a few ſouldiers. Now whileſt Euryclidas was talking with the Ephores, they alſo came in vpon them with their ſwordes drawen, and did ſet vpon the Ephores. Ageſilaus was hurt firſt of all, and falling downe, made as though he had bene ſlaine, but by litle & litle he crept out of the hall, and got ſecretly into a chappell conſecrated vnto Feare, the which was wont euer to be kept ſhut, but then by chaunce was left open: when he was come in, he ſhut the dore faſt to him. The other foure of the Ephores were ſlaine preſently, and aboue tenne moe beſides, which came to defend them. Furthermore, for them that ſate ſtill and ſturred not, they killed not a man of them, neither did keepe any man that was deſirous to goe out of the citie: but moreouer, they pardoned Ageſilaus, who came the next morning out of the chappell of Feare. Amongſt the Lacedæmonians in the citie of Sparta, there are not onely temples of feare and death, but alſo of laughter, and of many other ſuch paſſions of the minde. They doe worſhippe Feare, not as other ſpirites and deuils that are hurtfull: but becauſe they are perſwaded that nothing preſerueth a common wealth better than feare. Wherefore the Ephori (as Ariſtotle witneſſeth) when they are created, doe by publicke proclamation commaunde all the SPARTANS to ſhaue their chinnes, and to obey the law, leaſt they ſhould make them feele the rigour of the law. They brought in the ſhauing of their chins, in my opinion, to inure young men to obey the Magiſtrates euen in trifles. Moreouer it ſeemes that men in olde time did eſteeme fortitude to be no taking away of feare, but rather a feare and lothnes to incurre ſhame. For commonly thoſe that are moſt affraide to offende the lawe, are in the field moſt valiant againſt their enemie: and ſhunne no perill to winne fame and honeſt reputation. And therefore it was wiſely ſaid of one,

The valianteſt men are moſt affraid to offend the law.

That feare can not be without ſhamefaſtnes.

And ſo Homer in a certaine place made Hellen ſay vnto king Priamus:

Of truth I doe confeſſe deere father in law,
You are the man of whom I ſtand in aw,
And reuerence moſt of all that euer I ſaw.

And in an other place, ſpeaking of the GRECIAN ſouldiers, he ſaith thus:

For feare of their Captaines they ſpake not a word.

For men do vſe to reuerence them whom they feare. And this was the cauſe why the chappell of Feare was by the hall of the Ephores, hauing in maner a princely and abſolute authoritie. The next morning Cleomenes baniſhed by trumpet, foure ſcore citizens of SPARTA, and ouerthrew all the chaires of the Ephores but one onely, the which he reſerued for himſelfe to ſit in to giue audience. Then calling the people to counſell, he gaue them an account of his doings, and told them that Lycurgus had ioyned the Senators with the kings, & how the citie had bene gouerned a long time by them, without helpe of any other officers. Notwithſtanding, afterwards the citie hauing great wars with the MESSENIANS, the kings being alwaies employed in that warre, whereby they could not attend the affaires of the common wealth at home, did chooſe certaine of their friendes to ſit in iudgement in their ſteades, to determine controuerſies of lawe: which were called Ephores, and did gouerne long time as the kings miniſters, howbeit that afterwards, by litle and litle, they tooke vpon them abſolute gouernment by themſelues. And for manifeſt proofe hereof, you ſee that at this preſent time when the Ephori do ſend for the king, the firſt and ſecond time, they refuſe to come, but the third time he riſeth and goeth vnto them. The firſt man that gaue the Ephores this authoritie, was Aſteropus, one of the Ephores many yeares after the firſt inſtitution of the kings: and yet if they had gouerned diſcreetely, peraduenture they might haue continued longer. But they licentiouſly abuſing their authoritie, by ſuppreſſing the lawfull Gouernors inſtituted of old time, taking vpon them to baniſh ſome of their kings, and putting other of them alſo to death, without law and iuſtice, and threatning others that deſire to reſtore that noble and former bleſſed gouernment vnto SPARTA againe: all theſe things I ſay, are in no wiſe to be ſuffered any longer. And therefore, if it had beene poſſible to haue baniſhed all theſe plagues of the common wealth out of SPARTA, brought from forreine nations: (I meane, pleaſures, paſtimes, money, debts, and vſuries, and others yet more auncient, pouertie and riches) he might then haue eſteemed himſelfe the happieſt king that euer was, if like a good Phiſitian he had cured his country in that infection, without griefe or ſorrow. But in that he was conſtrained to beginne with bloud, he followed Lycurgus example: who being neither king nor other Magiſtrate, but a priuate citizen only, taking vpon him the authoritie of the king, boldly came into the market place with force and armed men, and made king Charilaus that then raigned, ſo affraide, that he was driuen to take ſanctuarie in one of the temples. But the king being a Prince of a noble nature, and louing the honor of his country: tooke part with Lycurgus, adding to his aduiſe and counſell, for the alteration of the ſtate of the gouernment of the common wealth, which he did confirme. Hereby then it appeareth, that Lycurgus ſaw it was a hard thing to alter the common wealth without force & feare: the which he notwithſtanding had vſed with as great modeſtie and diſcretion as might be poſſible, baniſhing them that were againſt the profit and wealth of LACEDÆMON, giuing all the lands of the country alſo to be equally deuided amongſt them, and ſetting all men cleere that were in debt. And furthermore, that hee would make a choyſe and proofe of the ſtraungers, to make them free citizens of SPARTA, whom he knew to be honeſt men, thereby to defend their citie the better by force of armes: to the end that from henceforth we may no more ſee our country of LACONIA ſpoyled by the ÆTOLIANS and ILLYRIANS, for lacke of men to defend themſelues againſt them. Then he beganne firſt himſelfe to make all his goods common, and after him Megiſtonus his father in law, and conſequently all his other friends. Then he cauſed the landes alſo to be deuided, and ordeined euery baniſhed man a part, whom he himſelfe had exiled, promiſing that he would receiue them againe into the citie, when he had eſtabliſhed all things. So when he had repleniſhed the number of the citizens of SPARTA, with the choyceſt honeſt men their neigbours: he made foure thouſand footemen well armed, and taught them to vſe their pikes with both handes, in ſteade of their dartes with one hande, and to carie their targets with a good ſtrong handle, and not buckled with a leather thong. Afterwardes he tooke order for the education of children, and to reſtore the auncient LACONIAN diſcipline againe: and did all theſe things in maner by the helpe of Sphærus the Philoſopher. Inſomuch as he had quickely ſet vp againe ſchoole houſes for children, and alſo brought them to the old order of dyet: and all, but a very fewe, without compulſion were willing to fall to their old inſtitution of life. Then becauſe the name of one king ſhould not offend any mã, he made his brother Euclidas king with him. But this was the firſt time that euer the two kings were of one houſe but then. Furthermore, vnderſtanding that the ACHAIANS and Aratus were of opinion, that he durſt not come out of LACEDÆMON, for feare to leaue it in perill of reuolting, becauſe of the late change and alteration in the common wealth: he thought it an honorable attempt of him, to make his enemies ſee the readines and good will of his armie. Thereupon he inuaded the territories of the MEGALOPOLITANS, and brought away a great prey and booty, after he had done great hurt vnto his enemies. Then hauing taken certaine players and minſtrels that came from MESSINA, he ſet vp a ſtage within the enemies countrie, made a game of 40. Minas for the victor, and ſate a whole day to looke vpon them, for no pleaſure he tooke in the ſight of it, but more to deſpight the enemies withall, in making them ſee how much he was ſtronger then they, to make ſuch a Maygame in their owne country, in deſpight of them. For of al the armies otherwiſe of the GRECIANS, or kings in all GRECE, there was no armie onely but his, that was without players, minſtrels, fooles and iugglers: for his campe onely was cleane of ſuch rabble and foolerie, and all the young men fell to ſome exerciſe of their bodies, and the old men alſo to teach them. And if they chaunced to haue any vacant time, then they would pleaſantly be one merrie with an other, in giuing ſome pretie fine mocke after the LACONIAN manner. And what profit they got by that kinde of exerciſe, we haue written it at large in Lycurgus life. But of all theſe things, the king himſelfe was their ſchoolemaſter and example, ſhewing him ſelfe very temperate of life, and plaine without curioſitie, no more then any priuate ſouldier of all his campe: the which were great helpes vnto him in his enterpriſes he made in GRECE. For the GRECIANS hauing cauſe of ſute and negociation with other kings and princes, did not wonder ſo much at their pompe and riches, as they did abhorre and deteſt their pride and inſolencie: ſo diſdainfully they would anſwere them that had to doe with them. But contrarily when they went vnto Cleomenes, who was a king in name and deede as they were, finding no purple robes nor ſtately mantles, nor rich imbrodered beddes, nor a Prince to be ſpoken to but by meſſengers, gentlemen vſhers, and ſupplications, and yet with great a doo: and ſeeing him alſo come plainely apparelled vnto them, with a good countenance, and courteouſly anſwering the matters they came for: he thereby did maruellouſly win their hearts and good wils, that when they returned home, they ſaide he only was the worthy king, that came of the race of Hercules. Now for his dyet at his bord, that was very ſtraight & LACONIAN like, keeping only three bords: and if he chaunced to feaſt any Ambaſſadors or other his friendes that came to ſee him, he then added to two other bords, and beſides, made his men to ſee that his fare ſhould be amended, not with paſtrie and conſerues, but with more ſtore of meate, and ſome better wine then ordinarie. For he one day reproued one of his friendes, that bidding ſtrangers to ſupper, he gaue them nothing but blacke broth, & browne bread only, according to the Laconian maner. Nay, ſaid he, we may not vſe ſtrangers ſo hardly after our manner. The bord being taken vp, an other litle table was brought with three feete, whereupon they ſet a bolle of copper full of wine, and two ſiluer cuppes of a pottle a peece, and certaine other fewe ſiluer pots beſides: ſo euery man dranke what they liſted, and no man was forced to drinke more then he would. Furthermore, there was no ſport, nor any pleaſant ſong ſung to make the companie merrie, for it needed not. For Cleomenes ſelfe would entertaine them with ſome pretie queſtions or pleaſant tale: whereby, as his talke was not ſeuere and without pleaſure, ſo was it alſo pleaſant without inſolencie. For he was of opinion, that to winne men by gifts or money, as other kings and princes did, was but baſe and cloynelike: but to ſeeke their good wils by courteous means and pleaſantneſſe, and therewith to meane good faith, that he thought moſt fit and honorable for a Prince. For this was his minde, that there was no other difference betwixt a friend and hireling: but that the one is wonne with money, and the other with ciuility & good entertainment. The firſt therefore that receiued king Cleomenes into their citie, were the Mantinians, who opened him the gates in the night, and helping him to driue out the garriſon of the Achaians, they yeelded themſelues vnto him. But he referring them to the vſe and gouernment of their owne lawes and libertie, departed from thence the ſame day, and went vnto the citie of Tegea. Shortly after, he compaſſed about Arcadia, & came vnto Pheres in Arcadia determining one of the two, either to giue the Achaians battell, or to bring Aratus out of fauour with the people, for that he had ſuffred him to ſpoile and deſtroy their country. Hyperbatas was at that time Generall of the Achaians, but Aratus did beare all the ſway and authoritie. Then the Achaians comming into the field with all their people armed, and encamping by the citie of Dymes, neere vnto the temple of Hecatombæum: Cleomenes going thither, lay betwixt the citie of Dymes that was againſt him, and the campe of his enemies, which men thought a very vnwiſe part of him. Howbeit valiantly prouoking the Achaians, he procured them to the battell, ouerthrew them, made them flie, and ſlew a great number in the field, and tooke many of them alſo priſoners. Departing from thence, he went and ſet vpon the citie of Langon, and draue the garriſon of the Achaians out of it, and reſtored the citie againe vnto the Elians. The Achaians being then in verie hard ſtate, Aratus that of cuſtome was wont to be their Generall (or at the leaſt once in two yeares) refuſed now to take the charge, notwithſtanding the Achaians did ſpecially pray & intreate him: the which was an ill act of him, to let an other ſteere the rudder, in ſo dangerous a ſtorme and tempeſt. Therefore the Achaians ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Cleomenes to treate peace, vnto whom it ſeemed he gaue a very ſharpe aunſwere. After that, he ſent vnto them, and willed them only to reſigne the ſigniorie of Grece vnto him: and that for all other matters he would deale reaſonably with them, and preſently deliuer them vp their townes and priſoners againe, which he had taken of theirs. The Achaians being glad of peace with theſe conditions, wrote vnto Cleomenes that he ſhould come vnto the citie of Lerna, where the dyet and generall aſſembly ſhould be kept to conſult thereupon. It chaunced then that Cleomenes marching thither, being very hotte, dranke cold water, and fell on ſuch a bleeding withall, that his voice was taken from him, and he almoſt ſtifled. Wherefore he ſent the Achaians their chiefeſt priſoners home againe, proroging the parliament till an other time, and returned backe to Lacedæmon. It is ſuppoſed certainly, that this let of his comming to the dyet, was the onely cauſe of the vtter deſtruction of Grece: the which otherwiſe was in good way to haue riſen againe, and to haue bene deliuered from the preſent miſeries, and extreame pride and couetouſnes of the Macedonians. For Aratus, either for that he truſted not Cleomenes, or for that he was affraide of his power, or that he otherwiſe enuied his honor & proſperitie, to ſee him riſen to ſuch incredible greatnes in ſo ſhort a time, and thinking it alſo too great ſhame and diſhonor to him, to ſuffer this young man in a moment to depriue him of his great honor & power which he had poſſeſſed ſo long time, by the ſpace of thirtie yeares together, ruling all Grece: firſt, he ſought by force to terrifie the Achaians, and to make them breake off from this peace. But in fine, finding that they litle regarded his threats, & that he could not preuaile with them, for that they were affraide of Cleomenes valiantneſſe and courage, whoſe requeſt they thought reaſonable, for that he ſought but to reſtore PELOPONNESVS into her former ancient eſtate againe: he fell then into a practiſe farre vnhoneſt for a GRECIAN, very infamous for himſelfe, but moſt diſhonorable for the former noble actes he had done. For he brought Antigonus into GRECE, & in his age filled the coũtry of PELOPONNESVS with MACEDONIANS, whom he himſelf in his youth had driuen thence, had taken from them the caſtle of CORINTHE, and had alwayes bene an enemie of the kings (but ſpecially of Antigonus, of whom before he had ſpoken all the ill he could, as appeareth in his writings, ſaying that he tooke maruellous paines, and did put himſelfe into many daungers, to deliuer the citie of ATHENS from the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS) and yet notwithſtanding he brought them armed with his own hands, not into his country only, but into his owne houſe, yea euen into the Ladies chambers & cloſets: diſdaining that the king of LACEDÆMON, diſcending of the bloud royal of Hercules (who ſetting vp againe the auncient manner of life of his country, did temper it as an inſtrument of muſicke out of tune, and brought it to the good, ancient and ſober diſcipline and DORICAN life inſtituted by Lycurgus) ſhould be called and written king of the SICYONIANS, and of the TRICCÆIANS. And furthermore, flying them that were contented with browne bread, and with the plaine courſe capes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and that went about to take away riches (which was the chiefeſt matter they did accuſe Cleomenes for) and to prouide for the poore: he went and put himſelfe and all ACHAIA vnto the crowne and diademe, the purple robe, and proude imperious commandementes of the MACEDONIANS, fearing leaſt men ſhould thinke that Cleomenes could commaunde him. Furthermore his follie was ſuch, that hauing garlands of flowers on his head, he did ſacrifice vnto Antigonus, & ſing ſongs in praiſe of his honor, as if he had bene a god, where he was but a rotten man, conſumed away. This that we haue written of Aratus (who was indued with many noble vertues, & a worthy GRECIAN) is not ſo much to accuſe him, as to make vs ſee the frailtie and weakeneſſe of mans nature: the which, though it haue neuer ſo excellent vertues, can not yet bring forth ſuch perfect frute, but that it hath euer ſome mayme and bleamiſh. Now when the ACHAIANS were met againe in the citie of ARGOS, to hold the ſeſſion of their parlament before proroged, and Cleomenes alſo being come from TEGEA, to be at that parlament: euery man was in hope of good peace. But Aratus then, who was agreed before of the chiefeſt articles of the capitulations with Antigonus, fearing that Cleomenes by faire wordes or force would bring the people to graunt that he deſired: ſent to let him vnderſtande, that he ſhould but come himſelfe alone into the citie, and for ſafetie of his perſon, they would giue him three hundred hoſtages: or otherwiſe, if he would not leaue his armie, that then they would giue him audience without the citie, in the place of exerciſes, called Cyllarabium. When Cleomenes had heard their anſwere, he told them that they had done him wrong: for they ſhould haue aduertiſed him of it before he had taken his iorney, and not now when he was almoſt hard at their gates, to ſende him backe againe, with a flea in his eare. Thereuppon he wrote a letter vnto the councell of the ACHAIANS, altogether full of complaints againſt Aratus. On the other ſide alſo, Aratus in his oration to the councell, inueyed with bitter wordes againſt Cleomenes. Thereupon Cleomenes departing with ſpeede, ſent a Herauld to proclaime warres againſt the ACHAIANS, not in the city of ARGOS, but in the city of ÆGION, as Aratus writeth, meaning to ſet vpon them being vnprouided. Hereupon all ACHAIA was in an vprore: for diuerſe cities did preſently reuolt againſt the ACHAIANS, becauſe the common people hoped after the diuiſion of lands, and diſcharging of their debts. The noble men alſo in many places were offended with Aratus, becauſe he practiſed to bring the MACEDONIANS into the coũtry of PELOPONNESVS. Cleomenes therefore hoping well for all theſe reſpects, brought his armie into ACHAIA, and at his firſt comming tooke the citie of PALLENA, and draue out the garriſon of the ACHAIANS: and after that, wanne alſo the cities of PHENEVM, and PENTELIVM. Now the ACHAIANS fearing ſome treaſon in CORINTHE and SYCIONE, ſent certaine horſemen out of the citie of ARGOS, to keepe thoſe cities. The ARGIVES in the meane time, attending the celebration of the feaſt at the games Nemeea, Cleomenes thinking (which fell out true) that if he went to ARGOS, he ſhould finde the citie full of people that were come to ſee the feaſtes and games, and that aſſailing them vppon the ſodaine, he ſhould put them in a maruellous feare: brought his armie in the night hard to the wals of the citie of Argos, and at his firſt comming wanne a place they call Aſpis, a verie ſtrong place aboue the Theater, and ill to come vnto. The Argives were ſo amazed at it, that no man would take vpon him to defend the citie, but receiued Cleomenes garriſon, and gaue him twentie hoſtages, promiſing thenceforth to be true confederates vnto the Lacedæmonians, vnder his charge and conduct. The which doubtleſſe wanne him great fame, and increaſed his power: for that the auncient kings of Lacedæmon, could neuer before with any policie or deuiſe, winne the citie of Argos. For king Pyrrhus one of the moſt valianteſt and warlikeſt Princes that euer was, entring the citie of Argos by force, could not keepe it, but was ſlaine there, and the moſt part of his armie: wherby euery man wondred greatly at the diligence & counſel of Cleomenes. And where euery man did mocke him before, when Cleomenes ſaid that he would folow Solon and Lycurgus, in making the citizens goods common, and diſcharging all debts: they were then cleerely perſwaded that he onely was the cauſe and meane of that great chaunge; which they ſawe in the courage of the Spartans: who were before ſo weake and out of heart, that they hauing no courage to defend themſelues, the Ætolians entring Laconia with an armie, tooke away at one time, fiftie thouſand ſlaues. Whereupon an old man of Sparta pleaſantly ſaid at that time, that their enemies had done them a great pleaſure, to ridde their country of Laconia of ſuch a rabble of raſcals. Shortly after, they being entred againe into the former auncient diſcipline of Lycurgus, as if Lycurgus ſelfe had beene aliue to haue trained them vnto it: they ſhewed themſelues very valiant, and obedient alſo vnto their Magiſtrates, whereby they recouered againe the commaundement of all Grece, and the countrie alſo of Peloponnesvs. After Cleomenes had taken the citie of Argos, the cities alſo of Cleones, and Phliunta, did yeelde themſelues vnto him. Aratus in the meane time remained at Corinthe, & there did buſily accuſe them which were ſuſpected to fauor the Lacedæmonians. But when newes was brought him that Argos was taken, & that he perceiued alſo the citie of Corinthe did leane vnto Cleomenes part, and draue away the Achaians: he then calling the people to councell in Corinthe, ſecretly ſtale to one of the gates of the citie, and cauſing his horſe to be brought vnto him, tooke his backe, & gallopped for life vnto the citie of Sicyone. When the Corinthians heard of it, they tooke their horſebackes alſo ſtriuing who ſhould be there ſooneſt, and poſted in ſuch haſte vnto Cleomenes at the citie of Argos, that many of them (as Aratus writeth) killed their horſes by the way: howbeit Cleomenes was verie much offended with them, for that they had let him ſcape their handes. But Aratus ſaith further, that Megiſtonus came vnto him from Cleomenes, and offered him a great ſumme of money to deliuer him the caſtle of Corinthe, wherein there was a great garriſon of the Achaians. But he aunſwered againe, that things were not in his power, but rather that he was ſubiect to their power. Now Cleomenes departing from the citie of Argos, ouercame the Troezenians, the Epidavrians, and the Hermionians. After that, he came vnto Corinth, & preſently entrenched the caſtle there round about, and ſending for Aratus friends and factors, commaunded them to keepe his houſe and goods carefully for him, and ſent Tritymallus Messenian againe vnto him, to pray him to be contented that the caſtle might be kept indifferently betwixt the Achaians & Lacedæmonians, promiſing him priuately to double the pencion that king Ptolomy gaue him. But Aratus refuſing it, ſent his ſonne vnto Antigonus with other hoſtages, and perſwaded the Achaians to deliuer vp the caſtle of Corinthe, vnto Antigonus handes. Cleomenes vnderſtanding it, entred with his army into the country of the Sicyonians, and deſtroyed it as he went, and tooke Aratus goods and money, of the gift of the Corinthians by decree. Now Antigonus in the meane time, being paſſed the mountaine of Gerania with a great power: Cleomenes determined not to fortifie the Iſthmus or ſtraight of Peloponnesvs, but the wayes of the mountaines Onienes, determining to keepe euery one of them againſt the Macedonians, with intent to conſume them rather by time, than to fight a battell with an armie, ſo good ſouldiers and well trayned as they were. Cleomenes following this determination, did put Antigonus to great trouble, becauſe he had not in time prouided for corne: and could not win the paſſage alſo by force, for that Cleomenes kept it with ſuch guarde and ſouldiers. Then Antigonus ſtealing ſecretely into the hauen of Lechæum, he was ſtoutly repulſed, and loſt a number of his men: whereuppon Cleomenes and his men being couragious for this victory, went quietly to ſupper. Antigonus on the other ſide fell into diſpaire, to ſee him ſelfe brought by neceſſitie into ſuch hard termes. Wherefore hee determined to goe to the temple of Iuno, and from thence to paſſe his army by ſea into the city of SICYONE, the which required a long time, and great preparation. But the ſame night there came ſome of Aratus friendes of the ARGIVES, who comming from ARGOS by ſea, brought newes that the ARGIVES were rebelled againſt Cleomenes. The practiſer of this rebellion, was one Ariſtoteles, who eaſily brought the people vnto it, that were already offended with Cleomenes, that had promiſed to paſſe a law for the clearing of debtes, but performed it not according to their expectation. Wherefore, Aratus with a thouſande fiue hundred men which Antigonus gaue him, went by ſea vnto EPIDAVRVM. Howbeit Ariſtoteles taried not his comming, but taking them of the city with him, went and beſieged the garriſon of the LACEDÆMONIANS within the caſtell, being aided by Timoxenus, with the ACHAIANS that came from SICYONE. Cleomenes receiuing aduertiſement hereof, about the ſecond watch of the night, ſent for Megiſtonus in haſt, and commaunded him in anger ſpeedily to goe and aide their men that were in the city of ARGOS. For it was Megiſtonus him ſelfe that promiſed Cleomenes the fidelity of the ARGIVES, and that kept him from driuing them out of the city, which he ſuſpected. So ſending him away forthwith with two thouſand men, he attended Antigonus, and comforted the CORINTHIANS the beſt he could: aduertiſing them that it was but a litle mutiny of a few, that chaunced in the city of ARGOS. Megiſtonus being come to ARGOS, and ſlaine in battell, fighting for the LACEDÆMONIANS in garriſon there (who being in great diſtreſſe, ſcant able to keepe the caſtell againſt the enemies) ſent ſundry meſſengers vnto Cleomenes, to pray him to ſend them immediat aide. Cleomenes then being affrayd that the enemies hauing taken ARGOS, would ſtoppe his way to returne backe into his countrey, who hauing oportunity ſafely to ſpoile LACONIA, and alſo to beſiege the city ſelfe of SPARTA, that had but a few men to defend it, he departed with his armie from CORINTHE. Immediatly after came Antigonus, and tooke it from him, and put a ſtrong garriſon into it. When Cleomenes came before the city of ARGOS, hee ſcaled the walles, and breaking the vautes and arches of the place called Aſpis, entred into the city, and ioyned with his garriſon there, which yet reſiſted the ACHAIANS: and taking other partes of the ſame alſo, aſſaulted the walles, and cleared the ſtreetes in ſuch ſort, that not an enemy durſt be ſeene, for feare of the archers of the CRETANS. In the meane time, when he ſaw Antigonus a farre off, comming downe the hilles into the valley with his footmen, and that his horſemen alſo came vppon the ſpurre into the city: diſpayring then that he could any longer keepe it, he gathered all his men together, and ſafely going downe by the walles retired without loſſe of any man. So, when in ſhort time he had conquered much, and had almoſt wonne all within PELOPONNESVS: in ſhorter ſpace alſo, he loſt all againe. For, of the confederates that were in his campe, ſome did preſently forſake him: others alſo immediately after ſurrendered vp the townes vnto Antigonus. Cleomenes being thus oppreſſed with the fortune of warre, when he came backe to TEGEA with the reſt of his army, newes came to him in the night from LACEDÆMON, which grieued him as much as the loſſe of all his conqueſtes: for he was aduertiſed of the death of his wife Agiatis, whom he loued ſo dearly, that in the middeſt of his chiefeſt proſperity and victories, he made often iournies to SPARTA to ſee her. It could not but be a maruellous griefe vnto Cleomenes, who being a young man, had loſt ſo vertuous and faire a yong Lady, ſo dearely beloued of him: and yet he gaue not place vnto his ſorrow, neither did griefe ouercome his noble courage, but hee vſed the ſelfe ſame voice, apparell, and countenance, that he did before. Then taking order with his priuat Captaines, about his affaires, and hauing prouided alſo for the ſafety of the TEGEANS: he went the next morning by breake of day vnto SPARTA. After hee had priuately lamented the ſorrow of his wiues death, with his mother and children: he preſently bent his minde againe to publicke cauſes. Now Cleomenes had ſent vnto Ptolomie King of ÆGYPT, who had

promiſed him aide, but vppon demaund, to haue his mother and children in pledge. So he was a long time before hee would for ſhame make his mother priuy vnto it, and went oftentimes of purpoſe to lette her vnderſtand it: but when hee came he hadde not the heart to breake it to her. Shee firſt ſuſpecting a thing, asked Cleomenes friendes, if her ſonne had not ſomewhat to ſay vnto her, that he durſt not vtter. Whereupon, in fine he gaue the venture, and brake the matter to her. When ſhee heard it, ſhee fell a laughing, and tolde him: why, how commeth it to paſſe, that thou haſt kept it thus long, and wouldeſt not tell me? Come, come, ſayed ſhee, put me ſtraight into a ſhippe, and ſend me whither thou wilt, that this body of mine may doe ſome good vnto my countrey, before crooked age conſume my life without profite. Then all things being prepared for their iourney, they went by land, accompanied with the army, vnto the head of Tænarus. Where Crateſiclea being readie to imbarke, ſhee tooke Cleomenes aſide into the temple of Neptune, and imbracing and kiſſing him, perceiuing that his heart yerned for ſorrow of her departure, ſhee ſayed vnto him: O king of LACEDÆMON, lette no man ſee for ſhame when we come out of the temple, that we haue wept and diſhonoured SPARTA. For that onely is in our power, as for the reſt, as it pleaſeth the goddes, ſo lette it be. When ſhee had ſpoken theſe wordes, and faſhioned her countenaunce againe: ſhee went then to take her ſhip: with a litle ſonne of Cleomenes, and commaunded the maiſter of the ſhippe to hoyſe ſayle. Now when ſhee was arriued in ÆGYPT, and vnderſtoode that king Ptolomy receiued Ambaſſadours from Antigonus, and were in talke to make peace with him: and hearing alſo that Cleomenes being requeſted by the ACHAIANS to make peace with them, durſt not hearken to it, and end that warre, without king Ptolomyes conſent, and becauſe of his mother: ſhee wrote vnto him, that he ſhould not ſpare to doe any thing that ſhould be expedient for the honour of SPARTA, without feare of diſpleaſing Ptolomy, or for regard of an olde woman, and a young boy. Such was the noble minde of this worthie Ladie in her ſonne Cleomenes aduerſity. Furthermore, Antigonus hauing taken the citie of TEGEA, and ſacked the other cities of ORCHOMENVM, and MANTINEA: Cleomenes ſeeing him ſelfe brought to defend the borders onely of LACONIA, hee did manumiſſe all the ILOTES, (which were the ſlaues of LACEDÆMON) paying fiue Attica Minas a man. With that money he made the ſumme of fiue hundred talentes, and armed two thouſand of theſe freede ſlaues after the MACEDONIAN faſhion to fight againſt the LEVCASPIDES: (to witte, the white ſhieldes of Antigonus) and then there fell into his minde a maruellous great enterpriſe, vnlooked for of euery man. The city of MEGALIPOLIS at that time being as great as SPARTA, and hauing the aide of the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus at hand, (whom the ACHAIANS as it ſeemed had brought in, chiefly at the requeſt of the MEGALOPOLITANS) Cleomenes determining to ſacke this city, and knowing that to bring it to paſſe, nothing was more requiſite then celerity: he commanded his ſouldiers to victuall them ſelues for fiue dayes, and marching with the choiſe of all his army towardes SELASIA, as though he had ment to haue ſpoyled the ARGIVES, ſodainely turning from thence, he inuaded the country of the MEGALOPOLITANS, and ſupping by ROETIVM, went ſtraight by ELICVNTA vnto the city. When he was come neare vnto it, he ſent Panteas before with ſpeed, with two bandes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and commaunded him to take a certaine peece of the wall betweene two towers, which he knew was not kept nor garded, and he followed him alſo with the reſt of his army comming on faire and ſoftly. When Panteas came thither, finding not onely that place of the wal without gard or watch which Cleomenes had told him of, but alſo the moſt part of that ſide without defence: he tooke ſome part of the wall at his firſt comming, and manned it, & ouerthrew an other peece of it alſo, putting them all to the ſword that did defend it, and then came Cleomenes, and was within the city with his army, before the MEGALOPOLITANS knew of his comming. At length, the citizens vnderſtanding that the city was taken, ſome fled in haſt, conueying ſuch light things as came to hand, in ſo great a feare: and the others alſo arming them ſelues, ran together to reſiſt the enemies. But though they valiantly fought to repulſe them out of the city, and yet preuayled not: they gaue the reſt leiſure thereby to flie and ſaue them ſelues, ſo that there remained not behinde, aboue a thouſand men. For all the reſt were fled with their wiues and children, into the city of MESSINA.

Cleomenes wan the city of Megalipolis.

The moſt part of them alſo that fought with the enemies, ſaued them ſelues, and very fewe were taken, the chiefeſt whereof, were Lyſandridas, and Thearidas, the nobleſt perſons that were amongeſt the MEGALOPOLITANS: wherefore when thẽ ſouldiers had taken them, they brought them vnto Cleomenes. Lyſandridas, when he ſaw Cleomenes a good way off, cried out aloud vnto him: O king of LACEDÆMON, this day thou haſt an occaſion offered thee to do a more famous princely act, then that which thou haſt already done, and that will make thy name alſo more glorious. Cleomenes muſing what he would requeſt: well (quoth he) what is that thou requireſt? One thing I will tell thee before hand, thou ſhalt not make mee reſtore your city to you againe. Yet, quoth Lyſandridas, lette me requeſt thus much then, that ye doe not deſtroy it, but rather repleniſh it with friendes and confederates, which hereafter will be true and faithfull to you: and that ſhall you do, giuing the MEGALOPOLITANS their city againe, and preſeruing ſuch a number of people as haue forſaken it. Cleomenes pawſing a while, aunſwered, it was a hard thing to beleeue that: but yet quoth he, let honor take place with vs, before profite. After that he ſent a Herauld ſtraight vnto MESSENA vnto them that were fledde thither, and told them that he was contented to offer them their city againe, ſo that they would become good friends and confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS, forſaking the alliance of the ACHAIANS. Philopœmen woulde by no meanes ſuffer the MEGALOPOLITANS to accept this gracious offer of Cleomenes, nor alſo to leaue their alliance with the ACHAIANS: telling them, that he ment not to giue them their city againe, but to take them alſo with their city: and therefore draue Thearidas and Lyſandridas out of MESSENA, that moued this practiſe. It was that Philopœmen that afterwardes was the chiefeſt man of the ACHAIANS, and that wanne ſuch fame and honor among the GRECIANS, as wee haue particularly declared in his life. This word being brought to Cleomenes, who had kept the city from ſpoyling vntill that time: he was then ſo throughly offended, that he gaue the goods in preie to the ſouldiers, ſent away their goodly tables, images, and pictures vnto SPARTA, and defaced the chiefeſt parts of the city, and then returned home againe, being afraied of Antigonus, and the ACHAIANS. Howbeit they ſturred not, becauſe of the parliament that was kept at that time in the city of ÆGIVM, where Aratus being in the pulpit for orations, and holding his gowne a long time before his face, the people maruelling at it, willed him to tell what he ailed: he anſwered them, MEGALIPOLIS is taken, and raſed by Cleomenes. The ACHAIANS being amazed at the ſodainneſſe of this great loſſe, ſtraight brake off their parliament and aſſembly. But Antigonus thinking to aide them, ſent preſently for all his garriſons, who being long a comming, he willed them to ſtay where they were, and hee him ſelfe taking a few ſouldiers with him, went vnto the city of ARGOS. Therefore the ſecond enterpriſe of Cleomenes ſeemeth at the firſt ſight a very raſh and deſperate attempt: howbeit Polybius writeth, that it was an attempt of great wiſedome and policy. For Cleomenes vnderſtanding that the MACEDONIANS were diſperſed in garriſons in diuerſe places, and that Antigonus lay all the winter in the city of ARGOS, with a certaine number of footemen that were ſtrangers: he inuaded the countrey of the ARGIVES with his army, perſwading him ſelfe, that either Antigonus would for ſhame come and fight with him, or if he did not, that then hee ſhould put him in diſgrace with the ARGIVES: which in deede came ſo to paſſe. The ARGIVES ſeeing their countrey ſpoyled by Cleomenes, were in a maruellous rage, and gathering together at Antigonus lodging, they cried out vnto him, either to goe into the fielde and fight with the enemy: or elſe if he were affrayed, to reſigne his office of Generall of GREECE, vnto others that were valianter than him ſelfe. But Antigonus like a wiſe and excellent Captaine, thinking it a diſhonour to him raſhely to put him ſelfe in daunger, and his friendes alſo, though he were prouoked with many iniuries and opprobrious wordes: would not goe into the fielde, but ſtood conſtant in his firſt determination. Then Cleomenes hauing brought his army hard to the wals of the city of ARGOS, and ſpoyled and deſtroyed the countrey round about: without lette or daunger he ſafely returned home againe. Within a while after, Cleomenes being aduertiſed that Antigonus was come vnto TEGEA, with intent to inuade the country of LACONIA: he going another way with his army (vnwitting to his enemies) they wondred whẽ they ſaw him in the morning by the city of ARGOS, ſpoiling their country, & cutting down their corne, not with ſickles and kniues as other do vſe, but with long poles in forme of Sithes, that the ſouldiers as they went ſporting-wiſe, did ouerthrow and ſpoile it. But when they came to the place of exerciſes in the ſuburbes, called Cyllabris, certaine of the ſouldiers going about to haue ſette it a fire, Cleomenes would not ſuffer them, and tolde them, that what he had done at MEGALOPOLIS, it was rather angrily then honeſtly done.

The moderation of Cleomenes to his enemies.

Now Antigonus, preſently returning backe againe, being minded firſt to haue gone directly to the citie of ARGOS, but ſodainely altering his minde, did campe vppon the toppe of hilles and mountaines. Cleomenes ſeeming not to be affrayed of him, ſent Herauldes to him to deſire the keyes of the temple of Iuno, and then after he had done ſacrifice, he would depart his way. Thus mocking Antigonus, after he had ſacrificed vnto the goddeſſe, vnder the temple that was ſhut vp, he ſent his army vnto PHLIVNTA, and hauing driuen away the garriſon out of OLOGVNTA, he came vnto the city of ORCHOMENVM, hauing not onely incouraged his citizens, but gotten euen amongeſt the enemies them ſelues, a fame alſo to be a noble Captaine, and worthy to manage great affaires. For euery man iudged him to be a ſkillfull ſouldier, and a valiant Captaine, that with the power of one onely city, did maintaine warre againſt the kingdome of MACEDON, againſt all the people of PELOPONNESVS, and againſt the treaſure of ſo great a king: and withall, not onely to keepe his owne countrey of LACONIA vnſoyled, but farre otherwiſe to hurt his enemies countries, and to take ſo many great cities of theirs.

Money, the ſinew of wars.

But he that ſayed firſt, that money was the ſinew of all things, ſpake it chiefly in my opinion, in reſpect of the warres. Demades the Orator ſayed on a time, when the ATHENIANS commaunded certaine gallies ſhould be put out of the arſenall into the ſea, and preſently rigged and armed with all poſſible ſpeede, though they lacked money: he that rules the prowe, muſt firſt ſee before him. Meaning, munition and victuals muſt be prouided, before the ſhippes be ſet out.

The ſaying of Archidamus.

And it is reported alſo, that the auncient Archidamus, when the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS at the beginning of the warre at PELOPONNESVS required, that they might be ſeſſed at a certaine rate, aunſwered: the charges of warre haue no certaine ſtint. For like as wreſtlers that exerciſe their bodies continually in games, are better able to wreſtle, and ouerthrowe them with time, that haue no ſtrength, but onely Art and ſlight: euen ſo King Antigonus, who by the greatneſſe of his kingdome did defray the charge of this warre, did wearie and ouercome Cleomenes at the length, becauſe hee lacked money both to pay the ſtraungers that ſerued him, and alſo to maintaine his owne citizens.

Cleomenes ouercome by Antigonus, for lacke of money to pay his ſouldiers.

For otherwiſe doubtleſſe the time ſerued his turne well, becauſe the troubles that fell vppon Antigonus in his realm, did make him to be ſent for home. For the barbarous people his neighbours, in his abſence did ſpoile and deſtroy the realme of MACEDON, and ſpecially the ILLYRIANS of the high countrey that came downe then with a great army: whereuppon the MACEDONIANS being ſpoiled and harried on all ſides by them, they ſent poſte vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come home. If theſe letters had bene brought him but a litle before the battell, as they came afterwardes: Antigonus had gone his way, and left the ACHAIANS.

But fortune, that alwayes ſtriketh the ſtroke in all weightieſt cauſes, gaue ſuch ſpeede and fauour vnto him: that immediatly after the battell was fought at SELASIA, (where Cleomenes loſt his army and city) the very meſſengers arriued that came for Antigonus to come home, the which made the ouerthrow of king Cleomenes ſo much more lamentable. For if he had delayed battell but two dayes longer, when the MACEDONIANS had bene gone, he might haue made what peace he would with the ACHAIANS: but for lacke of money, he was driuen (as Polybius writeth) to giue battell, with twentie thouſand men, againſt thirtie thouſand: where hee ſhewed him ſelfe an excellent and ſkilfull Captaine, and where his citizens alſo fought like valiant men, and the ſtraungers in like caſe did ſhew them ſelues good ſouldiers. But his onely ouerthrow was, by the manner of his enemies weapons, and the force of their battell of footemen. But Phylarchus writeth, that treaſon was the cauſe of his ouerthrow. For Antigonus had appointed the ACARNANIANS, and the ILLYRIANS which he had in his army, to ſteale vppon the wing of his enemies army, where Euclidas, king Cleomenes brother was, to compaſſe him in behinde, whileſt he did ſette the reſt of his men in battell. When Cleomenes was got vp vpon ſome hill to looke about him, to ſee the countenaunce of the enemy, and ſeeing none of the ACARNANIANS, nor of the ILLYRIANS: he was then affrayed of Antigonus, that he went about ſome ſtratageme of warre. Wherefore he called for Demoteles, whoſe charge was to take heede of ſtratagemes and ſecrete ambuſhes, and commaunded him to looke to the rereward of his army, and to be very circumſpect all about. Demoteles, that was bribed before (as it is reported) with money, told him that all was cleare in the rereward, and bad him looke to ouerthrow his enemies before him. Cleomenes truſting this report, ſet forward againſt Antigonus, and in the end, his citizens of SPARTA which he had about him, gaue ſuch a fierce charge vpon the ſquadron of the MACEDONIAN footemen, that they draue them backe fiue furlongs off. But in the meane time, Euclidas his brother, in the other wing of his army, being compaſſed in behinde, Cleomenes turning him backe, and ſeeing the ouerthrow, cried out aloude: alas, good brother, thou art but ſlaine, yet thou dieſt valiantly, and honeſtly, and thy death ſhall be a worthy example vnto all poſterity, and ſhall be ſung by the praiſes of the women of SPARTA. So Euclidas and his men being ſlaine, the enemies came ſtraight to ſette vppon Cleomenes wing. Cleomenes then ſeeing his men diſcouraged, and that they durſt no longer reſiſt the enemy, fledde, and ſaued him ſelfe. Many of the ſtraungers alſo that ſerued him, were ſlaine at this battell: and of ſixe thouſand SPARTANS, there were left aliue but onely two hundred. Now Cleomenes being returned vnto SPARTA, the citizens comming to ſee him, he gaue them counſell to yeeld themſelues vnto Antigonus the conquerour: and for him ſelfe, if either aliue or dead he could do any thing for the honour and benefit of SPARTA, that he would willingly doe it. The women of the city alſo, comming vnto them that flying had eſcaped with him, when hee ſaw them vnarme the men, and bring them drinke to refreſh them with: he alſo went home to his own houſe. Then a maide of the houſe, which he had taken in the city of MEGALIPOLIS (and whom he had entertained euer ſince the death of his wife) came vnto him as her maner was, to refreſh him comming hot from the battell: howbeit he would not drinke though he was extreame dry, nor ſit being very weary, but armed as he was, layed his arme a croſſe vppon a piller, and leaning his head vpon it, repoſed him ſelfe a litle, and caſting in his mind all the waies that were to be thought of, he tooke his friends with him, and went to the hauen of Gythium, and there hauing his ſhippes which he had appointed for the purpoſe, he hoyſed ſayle, and departed his way. Immediatly after his departure, came Antigonus into the city of SPARTA, and curteouſly intreated the citizens and inhabitants he found, and did offend no man, nor proudly deſpiſe the ancient honor and dignity of SPARTA: but referring them to their owne lawes and gouernment, when he had ſacrificed to the goddes for his victory, hee departed from thence the third day, newes being brought him that the war was very great in MACEDON, and that the barbarous people did ſpoile his country. Now a diſeaſe tooke him, whereof he died afterwards, which appeared a tiſicke, mixt with a ſore catarre: but yet he yeelded not to his diſeaſe, and bare it out, that fighting for his country, & obtaining a famous victory, with great ſlaughter of the barbarous people, he might yet die honorably, as in deede he did, by Phylarchus teſtimony, who ſayth, that with the force of his voice, fiercely crying out in the middeſt of his fight, he tare his lungs and lightes, worſe then they were before. Yet in the ſchooles it is ſaied, that after he had wonne the battell, he was ſo ioyfull of it, that crying out, O bleſſed day: hee brake out into a great bleeding at the mouth, and a great feuer tooke him withall, that he died of it. Thus much touching Antigonus. Now Cleomenes departing out of the Iſle of CYTHERA, went and caſt ancker in an other Iland, called ÆGDALIA. Then determining to ſaile ouer to the city of CYRENA, Therycion, one of Cleomenes friends (a man that in warres ſhewed him ſelfe very valiant, but a boaſter beſides of his owne doings) tooke Cleomenes aſide, and ſaid thus vnto him: Truely O king, we haue loſt an honorable occaſion to die in battell, though euery man hath heard vs vaunt and ſay, that Antigonus ſhould neuer ouercome the king of SPARTA aliue, but dead. A ſecond occaſion yet is offered vs to die, with much leſſe honour and fame notwithſtanding, then the firſt. Whither doe we ſaile to no purpoſe? Why doe we flie the death at hand, and ſeeke it ſo farre off? If it be no ſhame nor diſhonour for the poſterity and race of Hercules to ſerue the ſucceſſors of Philip and Alexander: let vs ſaue then our labour, and long daungerous ſailing, and goe yeelde our ſelues vnto Antigonus, who in likelihood will better

" Thericion gaue no aunſwere, but as ſoone as he found oportunity to ſlippe from Cleomenes, he went to the ſea ſide, and ſlue him ſelfe. Cleomenes hoyſing ſaile from the Ile of ÆGIALIA, went into AFRICKE, and was brought by the kings ſeruauntes vnto the citie of ALEXANDRIA. King Ptolomy at his firſt comming, gaue Cleomenes no ſpeciall good, but indifferent intertainement: but after that he had ſhewed him ſelfe to be of great wiſdome and iudgement, and that Ptolomy ſaw in the ſimplicity of his LACONIAN life he had alſo a noble diſpoſition and courage, nothing degenerating from the princely race and bloud of Hercules, and that he yeelded not to his aduerſity: he tooke more delight in his company, then in all the company of his flatterers and hangers on him: and then repented him greatly, that hee had made no more account of him before, but had ſuffered him to be ouerthrowen by Antigonus, who through the victory of him, had maruellouſly enlarged his honour and power. Then he began to comfort Cleomenes, & doing him as great honor as could be, promiſed that he would ſend him with ſhips and money into GREECE, and put him againe into his kingdom: and further, gaue him an anuall pencion in the meane time, of foure and twenty talentes, with the which he ſimply and ſoberly entertained him ſelfe and his men about him: and beſtowed all the reſt vpon his coũtry men that came out of GREECE into ÆGYPT. But now, old king Ptolomy deceaſing before he could performe the promiſe he made vnto Cleomenes, to ſend him into GREECE: the realme falling then into great laſciuiouſnes, drunkennes, and into the gouernment of women, his caſe and miſery was cleane forgotten. For the young king his ſonne was ſo giuen ouer to women and wine, that when he was moſt ſober, and in his beſt wits, he moſt diſpoſed him ſelfe to make feaſtes and ſacrifices, and to haue the taber playing in his Court, to gather people together, like a ſtage player or iugler, whileſt one Agathoclea his lemman, and her mother, and Oenanthes a baude, did rule all the affaires of the ſtate. But when he came to be king, it appeared he had neede of Cleomenes: becauſe he was affrayed of his brother Magas, who by his mothers means, was very well eſteemed of among ſouldiers. Wherefore he called Cleomenes to him, & made him of his priuy counſell, where he deuiſed by practiſe, which way to kill his brother. All other his frends that were of counſell with him, did counſell him to do it: but Cleomenes onely vehemently diſſwaded him from it, and tolde him, that if it were poſſible, rather more brethren ſhould be begotten vnto the king for the ſafety of his perſon, and for deuiding of the affaires of the kingdome betweene them. Amongeſt the kings familiars that

that was chiefeſt about him,there was one Soſibius that ſaid vnto Cleomenes: ſo long as his brother Magas liued,the ſouldiers that be ſtraungers,whom the king entertained , would neuer be true to him. Cleomenes aunſwered him,for that matter there was no daunger: for ſayth he, of thoſe hyred ſtraungers , there are three thouſand PELOPONNESIANS, which he knew at the twinckling of an eye , would be at his commaundement, to come with their armour and weapon where he would appoint them . Theſe wordes of Cleomenes at that time ſhewed his faith and good will he bare vnto the king,and the force he was of beſides. But afterwards, Ptolomies fearefulneſſe increaſing his miſtruſt: (as it commonly hapneth , that they that lacke wit, thinke it the beſt ſafetie to be fearefull of euery wagging of a ſtraw,and to miſtruſt euery man) the remembraunce of Cleomenes wordes made him much ſuſpected of the Courtiers , vnderſtanding that he could do ſo much with the ſouldiers that were ſtraungers: in ſomuch as ſome of them ſayd,ſee (meaning Cleomenes) here is a lyon amongeſt ſheepe. Indeed, conſidering his faſhions and behauiour,they might well ſay ſo of him: for he would looke through his fingers as though he ſaw nothing,and yet ſaw all what they did. In fine,he required an armie & ſhips of the king: and vnderſtanding alſo that Antigonus was dead , and that the ACHAIANS & ÆTOLIANS were at great warres together, & that the affaires of his conntry did call him home, all PELOPONNESVS being in armes & vprore , he prayed that they would licence him to depart with his friends. But neuer a man would giue eare vnto him,and the king alſo heard nothing of it,becauſe he was continually entertained among Ladies,with banckets, dauncing, & maskes. But Soſibius that ruled all the realme,thought that to keepe Cleomenes againſt his will, were a hard thing,and alſo daungerous: and to let him go alſo,knowing that he was a valiant man,and of a ſturring minde,and one that knew the vices and imperfections of their gouernement : he thought that alſo no ſafe way , ſith no giftes nor preſents that could be offered him, could ſoftẽ him. For as the holy bull (which they call in ÆGYPT Apis) that is full fed in goodly paſture , doth yet deſire to follow his naturall courſe and libertie , to runne and leape at his pleaſure , and plainly ſheweth that it is a griefe to him to be kept ſtill by the Prieſt : euen ſo the courtly pleaſures did nothing delight Cleomenes,but as Homer writeth of Achilles:

Cleomenes vertue.

It irkt his noble hart to ſit at home in ſlothfull reſt,
VVhen martiall matters were in hand , the which he liked beſt.

Now Cleomenes ſtanding in theſe termes , there arriued in ALEXANDRIA one Nicagoras MESSENIAN , who maliced Cleomenes in his hart, but yet ſhewed as though he loued him. This Nicagoras on a time had ſold Cleomenes certaine land,but was not payed for it,either becauſe he had no preſent money , or elſe by occaſiõ of the warres which gaue him no leaſure to make payment. Cleomenes one day by chance walking vpon the ſandes,he ſaw Nicagoras landing out of his ſhip,being newly arriued,and knowing him,he curteouſly welcomed him , & asked what wind had brought him into ÆGYPT. Nicagoras gently ſaluting him againe , told him that he had brought the king excellent horſe of ſeruice. Cleomenes ſmiling,told him, thou haddeſt bene better haue brought him ſome curtiſans and daunſers, for they would haue pleaſed the king better. Nicagoras faintly laughed at his anſwer , but within few dayes after he did put him in remembraunce of the land he ſold him , and prayed him then that he would helpe him to money , telling him that he would not haue preſt him for it , but that he had ſuſteined loſſe by marchandiſe . Cleomenes aunſwered him , that all his penſion was ſpent he had of the king. Nicagoras being offended with this anſwer , he went & told Soſibius of the mocke Cleomenes gaue the king. Soſibius was glad of this occaſion,but yet deſiring further matter to make the king offended with Cleomenes,he perſwaded Nicagoras to writ a letter to the king againſt Cleomenes,as though he had conſpired to take the citie of CYRENA, if the king had giuẽ him ſhippes,money,and men of warre . When Nicagoras had written this letter, he tooke ſhippe, and hoyſed ſayle. Foure dayes after his departure, Soſibius brought his letter to the king , as though he had but newly receiued it . The king vpõ ſight of it was ſo offended with Cleomenes,that he gaue preſent order he ſhould be ſhut vp in a great houſe , where he ſhould haue his ordinarie dyed allowed him,howbeit that he ſhould keepe his houſe. This grieued Cleomenes much,but yet he was worſe affrayd of that which was to come , by this occaſion : Ptolomie the ſonne of Chryſermus,one of the kings familiars , who had ofentimes before bene very conuer-ſant & familiar with Cleomenes,and did franckly talke together in all matters : Cleomenes one day ſent for him,to pray him to come vnto him. Ptolomie came at his requeſt , and familiarly diſcourſing together , went about to diſſwade him from all the ſuſpitions he had , and excuſed the king alſo for that he had done vnto him : ſo taking his leaue he left him,not thinking that Cleomenes followed him (as he did) to the gate , where he ſharply tooke vp the ſouldiers , ſaying,that they were very negligẽt & careleſſe in looking to ſuch a fearefull beaſt as he was, and ſo ill to be taken,if he once ſcaped their handes . Cleomenes heard what he ſayd,and went into his lodging againe,Ptolomy knowing nothing that he was behind him: and reported the very wordes againe vnto his friends. Then all the SPARTANS conuerting their good hope into anger , determined to be reuenged of the iniurie Ptolomie had done them , and to dye like noble SPARTANS not tarying till they ſhould be brought to the ſhambles like fat weathers,to be ſold and killed. For it would be a great ſhame & diſhonor vnto Cleomenes,hauing refuſed to make peace with Antigonus,a noble Prince and warrier : to tary the kinges pleaſure till he had left his drunckenneſſe and daunſing,and then to come and put him to death . They being fully reſolued hereof,as you haue heard : king Ptolomie by chance went vnto the citie of CANOBVS, & firſt they gaue out in ALEXANDRIA,that the king minded to ſet Cleomenes at libertie. Thẽ Cleomenes friends obſeruing the cuſtom of the kings of ÆGYPT, whẽ they meant to ſet a priſoner at libertie(which was,to ſend the priſoners meate, and preſentes before to their ſupper) did ſend vnto him ſuch manner of preſents , & ſo deceiued the ſouldiers that had the keeping of him,ſaying,that they brought thoſe preſents from the king. For Cleomenes himſelfe did ſacrifice vnto the goddes , and ſent vnto the ſouldiers that kept him , part of thoſe preſents that were ſent vnto him , and ſupping with his friendes that night , made mery with them , euery man being crowned with garlands . Some ſay , that he made the more haſt to execute his enterpriſe , ſooner then he would haue done , by meanes of one of his men that was priuie vnto his conſpiracie: who went euery night to lye with a woman he kept, and therfore was affraid leſt he would bewray them. Cleomenes about noone,perceiuing the ſouldiers had takẽ in their cuppes , and that they were a ſleepe : he put on his coate , and vnripping it on the right ſhoulder,went out of the houſe with his ſword drawen in his hand , accompanied with his friends, following him in that ſort, which were thirty in all. Amongeſt them there was one called Hippotas,who being lame,went very liuely out with them at the firſt:but when he ſaw they went fayre & ſoftly becauſe of him,he prayed them to kill him, becauſe they ſhould not hinder their enterpriſe for a lame man,that could do them no ſeruice . Notwithſtanding,by chaunce they met with a townes man a horſe-backe,that came hard by their doore, whom they pluckt from his horſe , and caſt Hippotas vpon him : and then ranne through the citie,and cryed to the people,libertie,libertie . Now the people had no other courage in them, but onely commended Cleomenes,& wõdred at his valiantneſſe:but otherwiſe to follow him, or to further his enterpriſe,not a man of them had any hart in them . Thus running vp and downe the towne,they met with Ptolomie (the ſame whom we ſayd before was the ſonne of Chryſermus ) as he came out of the Court : Whereupon three of them ſetting on him, ſlue him preſently . There was alſo an other Ptolomie that was gouernour and Lieutenant of the citie of ALEXANDRIA:who hearing a rumour of this ſturre,came vnto them in his coche . They went and met him,& firſt hauing driuen away his garde and ſouldiers that went before him , they pluckt him out of his coche,and ſlue him alſo. After that they went towardes the caſtle , with intent to ſet all the priſoners there at libertie to take their part . Howbeit the iaylers that kept them had ſo ſtrongly locked vp the priſon doores,that Cleomenes was repulſed,and put by his purpoſe. Thus wandring vp and downe the citie , no man neither came to ioyne with him , nor to reſiſt him , for euery man fled for feare of him . Wherefore at length being weary with going vp and down, he turned him to his friends,and ſayd vnto them : it is no maruell though women commaund ſuch a cowardly people , that flye in this ſort from their libertie , Thereupon he prayed them all to dye like men,and like thoſe that were brought vp with him,and that were worthy of the fame of his ſo noble deedes . Then the firſt man that made himſelfe be ſlayne , was Hippotas, who dyed of a wound one of the young men of his companie gaue him with a ſword at his requeſt . After him euery man ſlue themſelues , one after an other, without any feare at all, ſa-

uing Panteas, who was the firſt man that entred the citie of MEGALIPOLIS. He was a fayre young man, and had bene very well brought vp in the LACONIAN diſcipline, and better then any man of his yeares. Cleomenes did loue him dearely, and commaunded him that when he ſhould ſee he were dead, and all the reſt alſo, that then he ſhould kill himſelfe laſt of all. Now they all being layed on the ground, he ſearched them one after an other with the poynt of his ſword, to ſee if there were any of them yet left aliue: and when he had pricked Cleomenes on the heele amongeſt others, and ſaw that he did yet knit his browes, he kiſſed him, & ſate down by him. Then perceiuing that he had yeelded vp the ghoſt, imbracing him when he was dead, he alſo ſlue himſelfe, and fell vpon him. Thus Cleomenes hauing raigned king of SPARTA ſixteen yeares, being the ſame manner of man we haue deſcribed him to be: he ended his dayes in this ſort as ye heare. Now, his death being preſently bruted through the citie, Crateſiclea his mother, though otherwiſe ſhe had a noble mind, did notwithſtanding a litle forget her greatneſſe, through the extreme ſorow ſhe felt for the death of her ſonne: and ſo imbracing Cleomenes ſonnes, ſhe fell to bitter lamentation. But the eldeſt of his ſonnes, (no man miſtruſting any ſuch matter) found meanes to get out of her handes, and running vp to the top of the houſe, caſt himſelfe headlong downe to the ground, that his head was all broken and ſplitted, yet dyed not, but was taken vp crying, & angry with them, that they would not ſuffer him to dye. This newes being brought to king Ptolomie, he commaunded they ſhould firſt flea Cleomenes, and then hang vp his body, and alſo, that they ſhould put his children, his mother, and all her women wayting on her to death: among the which was Panteas wife, one of the fayreſt & curteouſeſt women in her time. They had not bene long maried before, when theſe miſchieues lighted vpon them, at what time their loue was then in greateſt force. Her parents then would not let her depart, and imbarke with her husband, but had locked her vp, and kept her at home by force. Howbeit ſhortly after ſhe found the meanes to get her a horſe, and ſome money, and ſtale away in the night, and gallopped towardes the hauen of Tænarus, where finding a ſhippe ready bound for ÆGYPT, ſhe imbarked, and went to ſeeke her husband, with whom ſhe gladly and louingly led her life, forſaking her owne country, to liue in a ſtraunge Realme. Now when the Sergeaunts came to take Crateſiclea to put her to death, Panteas wife led her by the arme, carying vp her traine, and did comfort her, although Crateſiclea otherwiſe was not affrayd to dye, but onely asked this fauour, that ſhe might dye before her litle children. This notwithſtanding, when they came to the place of execution, the hangman firſt ſlue her children before her eyes, and then her ſelfe afterwardes, who in ſuch great griefe and ſorow, ſayd no more but thus: Alas, my poore children, what is become of you? And Panteas wife alſo, being a mighty tall woman, girding her clothes to her, tooke vp the ſlayne bodies one after an other, and wrapped them vp in ſuch things as ſhe could get, ſpeaking neuer a word, nor ſhewing any ſigne or token of griefe. And in fine, hauing prepared her ſelfe to dye, & plucked off her attyre her ſelfe, without ſuffering any other to come neare her, or to ſee her, but the hangman that was appointed to ſtrike off her head: in this ſort ſhe dyed as conſtantly, as the ſtouteſt man liuing could haue done, and had ſo couered her body, that no man needed after her death to touch her: ſo carefull was ſhe to her end, to keepe her honeſty, which ſhe had alwayes kept in her life, and in her death was mindefull of her honour, wherewith ſhe decked her body in her life time. Thus theſe LACEDÆMON Ladies playing their partes in this pitifull tragedie, contending at the time of death, euen with the courage of the ſlaine SPARTANS their countrymen, which of them ſhould dye moſt conſtantly: left a manifeſt proofe and teſtimony, that fortune hath no power ouer fortitude and courage. Shortly after, thoſe that were appointed to keepe the body of king Cleomenes that hung vpon the croſſe, they ſpied a great Serpent wreathed about his head, that couered all his face, in ſomuch as no rauening foule durſt come neare him to eate of it: whereupon the king fell into a ſuperſtitious feare, being affrayed that he had offended the goddes. Hereupon, the Ladies in his Court began to make many ſacrifices of purification, for the clearing of this ſinne: perſwading themſelues, that they had put a man to death, beloued of the gods, and that he had ſomething more in him then a man. The ALEXANDRINIANS thereupon went to the place of execution, and made their prayers vnto Cleomenes, as vnto a demy god, calling him the ſonne of the gods. Vntill that the learned men brought them from that errour, declaring vnto them, that like as of oxen being dead & rotten, there breed bees, and of horſe alſo come waſpes, and of aſſes likewiſe bitels: euen ſo mens bodies, when the marow melteth and gathereth together, do bring forth Serpents. The which comming to the knowledge of the auncients in old time, of all other beaſtes they did conſecrate the Dragon to Kings and Princes, as proper vnto man.

TIBERIVS, AND CAIVS Gracchi.

The worthines of Tiberius Gracchus the father.

Tiberius Gracchus the father, maried Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio Africā.

NOw that we haue declared vnto you the hiſtorie of the liues of theſe two GRECIANS, Agis, and Cleomenes aforeſayd: we muſt alſo write the hiſtorie of two ROMAINES, the which is no leſſe lamentable for the troubles and calamities that chanced vnto Tiberius & Caius, both of them the ſonnes of Tiberius Gracchus. He hauing bene twiſe Conſull, & once Cenſor, & hauing had the honour of two triumphs: had notwithſtanding more honour and fame onely for his valiantneſſe, for the which he was thought worthy to marie with Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio, who ouercame Hanniball after the death of his father: though while he liued he was neuer his friend, but rather his enemy. It is reported, that Tiberius on a time found two ſnakes in his bed, and that the Soothſayers and wiſards hauing conſidered the ſignification thereof, did forbid him to kill them both, and alſo to let them both eſcape, but one onely: aſſuring him that if he killed the male, he ſhould not liue long after: and if he killed the female, that then his wiſe Cornelia ſhould dye. Tiberius then louing his wiſe dearely, thinking it meeter for him alſo, that he being the elder of both, and ſhe yet a young woman, ſhould dye before her: he ſlue the male, and let the female eſcape, howbeit he dyed ſoone after, leauing twelue children aliue, all of them begotten of Cornelia. Cornelia after the death of her husband, taking vpon her the rule of her houſe and children, led ſuch a chaſt life, was ſo good to her children, and of ſo noble a minde: that euery man thought Tiberius a wiſe man for that he dyed, and left her behind him. She remaining widow, king Ptolomie made ſute vnto her, and would haue made her his wiſe and Queene. But ſhe refuſed, and in her widowhood loſt all her children, but one daughter, (whom ſhe beſtowed vpon the younger Scipio African) and Tiberius, and Caius, whoſe liues we preſently write. Thoſe ſhe ſo carefully brought vp, that they being become more ciuill, and better cōditioned, then any other ROMAINES in their time: euery man iudged, that education preuailed more in them, then nature. For, as in

The prayſe of Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi the fauours and pictures of Caſtor and Pollux, there is a certaine difference diſcerned, whereby a man may know that the one was made for wreſtling, and the other for running: euen ſo between theſe two young brethren, amongſt other the great likeneſſe between thẽ, being both happely borne to be valiant, to be temperate, to be liberall, to be learned, and to be nobly minded, there grew notwithſtanding great difference in their actions and doings in the common wealth: the which I thinke conuenient to declare, before I proceede any farther. Firſt of all, for the fauour of the face, the looke and mouing of the body, Tiberius was much more mild and tractable, and Caius more hot and earneſt. For the firſt in his orations was very modeſt, and kept his place: & the other of all the ROMAINES was the firſt, that in his oration ietted vp & downe the pulpit, & that plucked his gowne ouer his ſhoulders: as they write of Cleo ATHENIAN, that he was the firſt of all Oratours that opened his gown, and clapped his hand on his thigh in his oration. Furthermore, Caius wordes, and the vehemencie of his perſwaſion, were terrible and full of paſsion, but Tiberius wordes in contrary manner, were mild, moued men more to compaſsion, being very proper, and excellently applied, where Caius wordes were full of fineneſſe and curioſitie. The like difference alſo was between them in their fare & dyet. For Tiberius alwaies kept a conuenient ordinary: & Caius alſo in reſpect of other ROMAINES, liued very temperatly, but in reſpect of his brothers fare, curiouſly & ſuperfluouſly. In ſomuch as Druſus on a time reproued him, becauſe he had bought certaine Dolphins of ſiluer, to the value of a thouſand two hundred and fiftie Drachmas for euery pound waight. And now, as touching the manners and naturall diſpoſition of them both agreeing with the diuerſitie of their tongues, the one being milde and plauſible, and the other hot and chollericke: in ſomuch that otherwhile forgetting himſelfe in his Oration, againſt his will he would be very earneſt, & ſtrayne his voyce beyond his cõpaſſe, & ſo with great vncomelineſſe confound his wordes. Yet finding his owne fault, he deuiſed this remedie. He had a ſeruaunt called Licinius, a good wiſe man, who with an inſtrument of Muſicke he had, by the which they teach men to riſe & fall in their tunes, when he was in his oration, he euer ſtood behind him: & whẽ he perceiued that his maiſters voyce was a litle too loud, & that through choller he exceeded his ordinarie ſpeach: he played a ſoft ſtoppe behind him, at the ſound whereof Caius immediatly fell from his extremitie, & eaſily came to himſelfe againe. And here was the diuerſitie betweene them. Otherwiſe, for their hardineſſe againſt their enemies, the iuſtice vnto their tenaunts, the care and paynes in their offices of charge, and alſo their continencie againſt voluptuouſneſſe: in all theſe they were both alike. For age, Tiberius was elder by nine yeares, by reaſon whereof their ſeuerall authoritie and doings in the common wealth fell out at ſundry times. And this was one of the chiefeſt cauſes why their doings proſpered not, becauſe they had not both authoritie in one ſelfe time, neither could they ioyne their power together: the which if it had met at one ſelfe time, had bene of great force, & peraduenture inuincible. Wherefore we muſt write particularly of them both, but firſt of all we muſt begin with the elder. He, whẽ he came to mans ſtate, had ſuch a name and eſtimation, that immediatly they made him fellow, in the colledge of the Prieſts, which at ROME are called Augures: (being thoſe that haue the charge to conſider of ſignes & predictions of things to come) more for his valiantnes, then for nobilitie. The ſame doth Appius Clodius witneſſe vnto vs, one that hath bene both Conſull and Cenſor, & alſo Preſident of the Senate, and of greater authoritie then any man in his time. This Appius at a ſupper when all the Augures were together, after he had ſaluted Tiberius, & made very much of him, he offered him his daughter in mariage. Tiberius was very glad of the offer, and there withall the mariage was preſently concluded betweene them. Thereupon Appius comming home to his houſe, at the threſhold of his doore he called a loude for his wife, and told her: Antiſtia, I haue beſtowed our daughter Clodia. She wondring at it, ô gods ſaid ſhe, & what needed all this haſt? what couldeſt thou haue done more; if thou haddeſt gottẽ her Tiberius Gracchus for her husband? I know that ſome referre this hiſtorie vnto Tiberius, father of theſe two men we write of, and vnto Scipio the AFRICAN: but the moſt part of writers agree with that we write at this preſent. And Polybius himſelfe alſo writeth, that after the death of Scipio AFRICAN, his friends being met together, they choſe Tiberius before all the other yong men of the citie, to marie him vnto Cornelia, being free, and vnpromiſed, or beſtowed vpon any mã by her father. Now Tiberius the yonger being in the warres in AFRICKE vnder Scipio the ſecond, who had maried his ſiſter: lying in his tent with him, he found his Captaine indued with many noble gifts of nature, to allure mens harts to deſire to follow his valiantneſſe. So in a ſhort time he did excell all the young men of his time, aſwell in obedience, as in the valiantneſſe of his perſon: in ſomuch that he was the firſt man that ſcaled the walles of the enemies, as Fannius reporteth, who ſayth that he ſcaled the walles with him, and did helpe him in that valiant enterpriſe. So that being preſent, all the campe were in loue with him: and when he was abſent, euery man wiſhed for him againe. After this warre was ended, he was choſen Treaſurer, and it was his chaunce to go againſt the NVMANTINES, with Caius Mancinus one of the Conſuls, who was an honeſt man, but yet had the worſt lucke of any Captaine the ROMAINES had. Notwithſtanding, Tiberius wiſedome and valiantneſſe, in this extreme ill lucke of his Captaine, did not onely appeare with great glory to him, but alſo moſt wonderfull, the great obedience and reuerence he bare vnto his Captaine: though his misfortunes did ſo trouble and grieue him, that he could not tell himſelfe, whether he was Captaine or not. For when he was ouerthrowen in great foughten fieldes, he departed in the night, and left his campe. The NVMANTINES hearing of it, firſt tooke his campe, and then ranne after them that fled, and ſetting vpon the rereward, ſlue them, and enuironned all his armie. So that they were driuen into ſtraight and narrow places, where out they could by no meanes eſcape. Thereupon Mancinus diſpayring that he could get out by force, he ſent a Herauld to the enemies to treate of peace. The NVMANTINES made aunſwere, that they would truſt no man but Tiberius onely, and therefore they willed he ſhould be ſent vnto them. They deſired that, partly for the loue they bare vnto the vertues of the young man, becauſe there was no talke of any other in all this warre but of him: and partly alſo, as remembring his father Tiberius, who making warres in SPAYNE, and hauing there ſubdued many nations, he graunted the NVMANTINES peace, the which he cauſed the ROMAINES afterwardes to confirme and ratifie. Hereupon Tiberius was ſent to ſpeake with them, and partly obteyning that he deſired, and partly alſo graunting them that they required: he concluded peace with them, whereby aſſuredly he ſaued the liues of twentie thouſand ROMAINE Citizens, beſides ſlaues & other ſtragglers that willingly followed the campe. This notwithſtanding, the NVMANTINES tooke the ſpoyle of all the goods they found in the ROMAINES campe, among the which they founde Tiberius booke of account touching the money diſburſed of the treaſure in his charge. Tiberius being maruellous deſirous to haue his booke againe, returned backe to NVMANTIA with two or three of his friends onely, though the army of the ROMAINES were gone farre on their way. So comming to the towne, he ſpake vnto the gouernours of the citie, and prayed them to redeliuer him his bookes of account, becauſe his malitious enemies ſhould not accuſe him, calling him to account for his doings. The NVMANTINES were very glad of this good hap, and prayed them to come into the towne. He ſtanding ſtill in doubt with himſelfe what to do, whether he ſhould go into the towne or not: the gouernours of the citie came to him, and taking him by the hand, prayed he would thinke they were not his enemies, but good friends, and that he would truſt them. Whereupon Tiberius thought beſt to yeeld to their perſwaſion, being deſirous alſo to haue his bookes againe, and the rather, for feare of offending the NVMANTINES, if he ſhould haue denyed and miſtruſted them. When he was brought into the citie, they prouided his dinner, and were very earneſt with him, intreating him to dyne with them. Then they gaue him his bookes againe, and offered him moreouer to take what he would of all the ſpoyles they had gotten in the campe of the ROMAINES. Howbeit of all that, he would take nothing but franckenſence, which he vſed, when he did any ſacrifice for his country: and then taking his leaue of them, with thankes he returned. When he was returned to ROME, all this peace cõcluded was vtterly miſliked, as diſhonourable to the Maieſtie of the Empire of ROME. Yet the parents and friendes of them that had ſerued in this warre, making the greateſt part of the people: they gathered about Tiberius, ſaying that what faultes were committed in this ſeruice, they were to impute it vnto the Conſull Mancinus, and not vnto Tiberius, who had ſaued ſuch a number of ROMAINES liues. Notwithſtãding, they that were offended with this diſhonorable peace, would that therein they ſhould follow the example of their forefathers in the like caſe. For they ſent backe their Captaines naked vnto their enemies, becauſe they were contented the SAMNITS ſhould ſpoyle them of that they had, to eſcape with life. Moreouer, they did not onely ſend them the Captaines and Conſuls, but all thoſe alſo that bare any office in the field, and had conſented vnto that condition: to the end they might lay all the periurie and breach of peace vpon them. Herein therefore did manifeſtly appeare, the loue and good will the people did beare vnto Tiberius. For they gaue order, that the Conſull Mancinus ſhould be ſent naked, and bound vnto the NVMANTINES, & for Tiberius ſake, they pardoned all the reſt. I thinke Scipio, who bare great ſway at that time in ROME, & was a man of greateſt account, did helpe him at that pinch: who notwithſtanding was ill thought of, becauſe he did not alſo ſaue the Conſull Mancinus, and confirme the peace concluded with the NVMANTINES, cõſidering it was made by Tiberius his friend & kinſmã. But theſe miſlikings grew chiefly through the ambition of Tiberius friends, and certain learned men, which ſtirred him vp againſt Scipio. But yet it fell not out to open malice betweene them, neither followed there any hurt vpon it. And ſurely I am perſwaded, that Tiberius had not fallen into thoſe troubles he did afterwards, if Scipio AFRICAN had bene preſent, when he paſſed thoſe things he preferred. But Scipio was then in warres at the ſiege of NVMANTIA, when Tiberius vpon this occaſion paſſed theſe lawes. When the ROMAINES in old time had ouercome any of their neighbours, for raunſome they tooke oftentimes a great deale of their land from them, part whereof they ſold by the cryer, for the benefite of the common wealth, and part alſo they reſerued to their ſtate as demeane, which afterwardes was let out to farme for a ſmall rent yearely, to the poore Citizens that had no lands. Howbeit the rich men inhaunſed the rents, and ſo began to thruſt out the poore men. Thereupon was an ordinance made, that no Citizen of ROME ſhould haue aboue fiue hundred acres of land. This law for a time did bridle the couetouſneſſe of the rich men, and did eaſe the poore alſo that dwelt in the country, vpon the farmes they had taken vp of the common wealth, and ſo liued with their owne, or with that their Aunceſtors had from the beginning. But by proceſſe of time, their rich neighbours, by names of other men, got their farmes ouer their heades, and in the end, the moſt of them were openly ſeene in it in their owne names. Whereupon, the poore people being thus turned out of all, wẽt but with faint courage afterwards to the warre, nor cared any more for bringing vp of children: So that in ſhort time, the free men left ITALIE, and ſlaues and barbarous people did repleniſh it, whom the rich men made to plough thoſe landes, which they had taken from the ROMAINES. Caius Lælius, one of Scipioes friends, gaue an attempt to reform this abuſe: but becauſe the chiefeſt of the citie were againſt him, fearing it would breake out to ſome vprore, he deſiſted from his purpoſe, and therefore he was called Lælius the wiſe. But Tiberius being choſen Tribune, he did forthwith preferre the reformation aforeſayd, being allured vnto it (as diuers writers report) by Diophanes the Oratour, and Bloſsius the Philoſopher: of the which, Diophanes was baniſhed from the citie of MITYLENE, & Bloſsius the ITALIAN from the citie of CVMES, who was ſcholler and familiar vnto Antipater of TARSVS at ROME, by whom he was honored by certaine workes of Philoſophy he dedicated vnto him. And ſome alſo do accuſe their mother Cornelia, who did twit her ſons in the teeth, that the ROMAINES did yet call her Scipioes mother in law, and not the mother of the GRACCHI. Other ſay it was Spurius Poſthumius, a companion of Tiberius and one that contended with him in eloquence. For Tiberius returning from the warres, and finding him farre beyond him in fame and reputation, and well beloued of euery one: he ſought to excell him by attempting this noble enterpriſe, and of ſo great expectation. His owne brother Caius in a certaine booke, wrote, that as he went to the warres of NVMANTIA, paſsing through THVSCAN, he founde the country in manner vnhabited: and they that did follow the plough, or keepe beaſtes, were the moſt of them ſlaues, and barbarous people, come out of a ſtraunge country. Whereupon euer after it ranne in his minde to bring this enterpriſe to paſſe, which brought great troubles to their houſe. But in fine, it was the people onely that moſt ſet his hart a fire to couet honour, and that haſtened his determination: firſt bringing him to it by bylles ſet vp on euerie wall, in euerie porche, and vpon the tombes, praying him by them to cauſe the poore Citizens of ROME to haue their landes reſtored, which were belonging to the common wealth. This notwithſtanding he himſelfe made not the law alone of his owne head, but did it by the counſell and aduiſe of the chiefeſt men of ROME, for vertue and eſtimation: Among the which, Craſſus the high Biſhop was one, and Mutius Scæuola the Lawyer, that then was Conſull, and Appius Clodius his father in law. And truely it ſeemeth, that neuer law was made with greater fauour, then that which he preferred againſt ſo great iniuſtice, and auarice. For thoſe that ſhould haue bene puniſhed for tranſgreſsing the law, and ſhould haue had the landes taken from them by force, which they vniuſtly kept againſt the law of ROME, and that ſhould alſo haue bene amerſed for it: he ordeined that they ſhould be payed by the common wealth to the value of the landes, which they held vniuſtly, and ſo ſhould leaue them to the poore Citizens againe that had no land, and lacked helpe and reliefe. Now, though the reformation eſtabliſhed by this law, was done with ſuch great fauour: the people notwithſtanding were contented, and would forget all that was paſt, ſo that they might haue no more wrong offred them in time to come. But the rich men, and men of great poſſeſsions, hated the law for their auarice, and for ſpight and ſelfwill (which would not let them yeeld) they were at deadly foode with the Lawyer that had preferred the law, and ſought by all deuiſe they could to diſſwade the people from it: telling them that Tiberius brought in this law Agraria againe, to diſturbe the common wealth, and to make ſome alteration in the ſtate. But they preuailed not. For Tiberius defending the matter, which of it ſelfe was good and iuſt, with ſuch eloquence as might haue iuſtified an euill cauſe, was inuincible: and no man was able to argue againſt him to confute him, when ſpeaking in the behalfe of the poore Citizens of ROME, (the people being gathered round about the pulpit for Orations) he told them, that the wild beaſtes through ITALIE had their dennes & caues of abode, and that the men that fought, and were ſlaine for their country, had nothing elſe but ayre & light, & ſo were compelled to wander vp & down with their wiues & children, hauing no reſting place nor houſe to put their heads in: and that the Captaines do but mocke their ſouldiers, whẽ they encourage them in battell to fight valiantly for the graues, the temples, their own houſes, & their predeceſſours. For, ſayd he, of ſuch a number of poore Citizens as there be, there can not a man of them ſhew any auncient houſe or tombe of their aunceſtours: becauſe the poore men do go to the warres, & be ſlaine for the rich mens pleaſures and wealth: beſides, they falſly call them Lordes of the earth, where they haue not a handfull of ground, that is theirs. Theſe & ſuch other like wordes being vttered before all the people with ſuch vehemencie and troth, did ſo moue the common people withall, and put them in ſuch a rage, that there was no aduerſarie of his able to withſtand him. Therefore, leauing to contrary and deny the law by argument, the rich men did put all their truſt in Marcus Octauius, colleague and fellow Tribune with Tiberius in office, who was a graue and wiſe young man, and Tiberius very familiar friend. So that the firſt time they came to him, to oppoſe him againſt the confirmation of this law: he prayed them to hold him excuſed, becauſe Tiberius was his very friend. But in the end, being compelled vnto it through the great number of the riche men that were importunate with him: he did withſtand Tiberius law, the which was enough to ouerthrow it. For if any one of the Tribunes ſpeake againſt it, though all the other paſſe with it, he ouerthroweth it: becauſe they all can do nothing, if one of them be againſt it. Tiberius being very much offended with it, proceeded no further in this firſt fauourable law, & in a rage preferred an other more gratefull to the common people, as alſo more extreme againſt the rich. In that law he ordeined, that whoſoeuer had any landes contrary to the auncient lawes of ROME, that he ſhould preſently depart from them. But therupon there fell out cõtinuall brawles in the pulpit for orations, againſt Octauius: in the which, though they were very earneſt and vehement one againſt an other, yet there paſſed no fowle words from them, (how hot ſoeuer they were one with an other) that ſhould ſhame his companion. Whereby it appeareth, that to be well brought vp, breedeth ſuch a ſtay & knowledge in a man, not onely in things of pleaſure to make him regard his credit, both in word & deed: but in paſsion and anger alſo, and in their greateſt ambition of glory. Therupon Tiberius finding that this law among others touched Octauius, becauſe he enioyed a great deale of land that was the common wealthes: he prayed him ſecretly to contend no more againſt him, promiſing him to giue him of his own, the value of thoſe lands which he ſhould be driuen to forſake, although he was not very able to performe it. But when he ſaw Octauius would not be perſwaded, he then preferred a law, that all Magiſtrates and Officers ſhould ceaſe their authoritie, till the law were either paſt, or reiected, by voyces of the people: and thereupon he ſet his own ſeale vpõ the doores of the temple of Saturne, where the cofers of the treaſure lay, becauſe the treaſurers themſelues during that time, ſhould neither take out nor put in any thing, vpon great penalties to be forfeited by the Prætors or any other Magiſtrate of authoritie, that ſhould breake this order. Hereupon, all the Magiſtrates fearing this penaltie, did leaue to exerciſe their office for the time. But then the rich men that were of great liuings, chaunged their apparell, and walked very ſadly vp and downe the market place, and layed ſecret wait to take Tiberius, hauing hyred men to kill him: which cauſed Tiberius himſelfe, openly before them all, to weare a ſhort dagger vnder his long gowne, properly called in Latin, Dolon. When the day came that this law ſhould be eſtabliſhed, Tiberius called the people to giue their voyces: and the rich men on the other ſide, they tooke away the pots by force, wherein the papers of mens voyces were throwen, ſo that there was like to fall out great ſturre vpon it. For the faction of Tiberius was the ſtrõger ſide, by the number of people that were gathered about him for that purpoſe: had it not bene for Manlius & Fuluius, both the which had bene Cõſuls, who went vnto him, & beſought him with the teares in their eyes, & holding vp their hãds, that he would let the law alone. Tiberius thereupon, foreſeeing the inſtant daunger of ſome great miſchief, as alſo for the reuerence he bare vnto two ſuch noble perſons, he ſtayed a litle, and aſked them what they would haue him to do. They made aunſwere, that they were not able to counſell him in a matter of ſo great waight, but they prayed him notwithſtanding, he would be contented to referre it to the iudgement of the Senate. Thereupon he graunted them preſently. But afterwards perceiuing that the Senate ſate vpon it, and had determined nothing, becauſe the rich mẽ were of too great authoritie: he entred into an other deuiſe that was neither honeſt nor meete, which was, to depriue Octauius of his Tribuneſhip, knowing that otherwiſe he could not poſsibly come to paſſe the law. But before he tooke that courſe, he openly intreated him in the face of the people with curteous words, and tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to ſtand no more againſt him, and to do the people this pleaſure, which required a matter iuſt & reaſonable, & onely requeſted this ſmall recompence for the great paines they tooke in ſeruice abroad for their countrey. Octauius denied him plainly. Then ſaid Tiberius openly, that both of them being brethren in one ſelfe place and authoritie, and contrary one to an other in a matter of ſo great waight, this contention could not be poſsibly ended, without ciuill warre: & that he could ſee no way to remedy it, vnleſſe one of them two were depoſed from their office. Thereupon he bad Octauius begin firſt with him, and he would riſe from the bench with a good will, and become a priuate man, if the people were ſo contented. Octauius would do nothing in it. Tiberius then replied, that he would be doing with him, if he altered not his minde, vpon a better breath and conſideration: and ſo diſmiſſed the aſſembly for that day. The next morning the people being againe aſſembled, Tiberius going vp to his ſeate, attempted againe to perſwade Octauius to leaue off. In fine, finding him ſtill a man vnremoueable, he referred the matter to the voyce of the people, whether they were contented Octauius ſhould be depoſed from his office. Now there were fiue and thirtie tribes of the people, of the which ſeuenteen of them had already paſſed their voyces againſt Octauius, ſo that there remained but one tribe more to put him out of his office. Then Tiberius made them ſtay for proceeding any further, and prayed Octauius againe, imbracing him before all the people, with all the intreatie poſsible: that for ſelfewill ſake he would not ſuffer ſuch an open ſhame to be done vnto him, as to be put out of his office: neither alſo to make him the occaſion and inſtrument of ſo pitifull a deede. They ſay that Octauius at this laſt intreatie was ſomewhat moued and wonne by his perſwaſions, and that weeping, he ſtayed a long time, and made no aunſwere. But when he looked vpon the rich men that ſtood in a great companie together, he was aſhamed (I thinke) to haue their ill willes, and rather betooke himſelfe to the loſſe of his office, and ſo bad Tiberius do what he would. Thereupon he being depriued by voyces of the people, Tiberius commaunded one of his infranchiſed bondmen to pull him out of the pulpit for Orations: for he vſed his infranchiſed bondmen in ſteed of Sergeaunts. This made the ſight ſo much more lamentable, to ſee Octauius thus ſhamefully pluckt away by force. Yea furthermore, the common people would haue runne vpon him, but the riche men came to reſcue him, and would not ſuffer him to do him further hurt. So Octauius ſaued himſelfe running away alone, after he had bene reſcued thus from the furie of the people. Moreouer, there was a faithfull ſeruaunt of Octauius, who ſtepping before his maiſter to ſaue him from hurt, had his eyes pulled out, againſt Tiberius minde, who ranne to the reſcue with all ſpeede when he heard the noyſe. After that, the law Agraria paſſed for diuiſion of landes, and three Commiſsioners were appointed to make inquirie and diſtribution thereof. The Commiſsioners appointed were theſe: Tiberius himſelfe: Appius Clodius his father in law, and Caius Gracchus his brother: who was not at that time in ROME, but in the campe with Scipio AFRICAN, at the ſiege of the citie of NVMANTIA. Thus Tiberius very quietly paſſed ouer theſe matters, and no man durſt withſtand him: and furthermore, he ſubſtituted in Octauius place no man of qualitie, but onely one of his followers, called Mutius. Wherewith the noble men were ſo ſore offended with him, that fearing the increaſe of his greatneſſe, they being in the Senate houſe did what they could poſsible to do him deſpight & ſhame. For when Tiberius demaunded a tent at the charge of the common wealth, when he ſhould go abroad to make diuiſion of theſe landes, as they vſually graunted vnto others, that many times went in farre meaner commiſsions: they flatly denyed him, and through the procurement of P. Naſica (who being a great landed man in his country, ſhewed himſelfe in this action his mortall enemie, taking it grieuouſly to be compelled to depart from his land) onely graunted him nine of their oboli a day, for his ordinary allowance. But the people on the other ſide were all in an vprore againſt the rich. In ſomuch as one of Tiberius friendes being dead vpon the ſodaine, vpon whoſe body being dead there appeared very ill ſignes: the common people ranne ſodainly to his buriall, and cryed out that he was poyſoned. And ſo taking vp the beere whereon his body lay vpon their ſhoulders, they were preſent at the fire of his funerals, where immediatly appeared certaine ſignes to make them ſuſpect, that in deed there was vehement cauſe of preſumption he was poyſoned. For his belly burſt, whereout there iſſued ſuch aboundance of corrupt humours, that they put out the firſt fire, and made them fetch an other, the which alſo they could not make to burne, vntill that they were compelled to carie the body into ſome other place, where notwithſtanding they had much a do to make it burne. Tiberius ſeeing that, to make the common people mutine the more, he put on mourning apparell, and brought his ſonnes before them, and beſought the people to be good vnto them and their mother, as one that diſpaired of his health and ſafetie. About that time dyed Attalus, ſurnamed Philopater, and Eudemus PERGAMENIAN brought his will to ROME, in the which he made the people of ROME his heires. Wherefore Tiberius, ſtill to encreaſe the good will of the common people towards him, preferred a law immediatly, that the ready money that came by the inheritaunce of this king ſhould be diſtributed among the poore Citizens, on whoſe lot it ſhould fall to haue any part of the diuiſion of the landes of the common wealth, to furniſh them towardes houſe, and to ſet vp their tillage. Furthermore, he ſayd, that concerning the townes and cities of the kingdome of Attalus, the Senate had nothing to do to take any order with them, but that the people were to diſpoſe of them, and that he himſelfe would put it out. That made him againe more hated of the Senate then before, in ſomuch as there was one P*ompey* a Senator, that ſtanding vp, ſayd: that he was next neighbour vnto Tiberius, & that by reaſon of his neighbourhood he knew that Eudemus PERGAMENIAN had giuen him one of king Attalus royall bands, with a purple gowne beſides, for a tokẽ that he ſhould one day be king of ROME. And Quintus Metellus alſo reproued him, for that his father being Cenſor, the ROMAINES hauing ſupped in the town, and repairing euery man home to his houſe, they did put out their torches and lights, becauſe men ſeeing them returne, they ſhould not thinke they taryed too long in companie bancketing: and that in contrary manner, the ſeditious and needy rabble of the common people did light his ſonne home, and accompany him all night long vp and downe the towne. At that time there was one Titus Annius, a man that had no goodneſſe nor honeſty in him, howbeit taken for a great reaſoner

ner, and for a ſubtill queſtioner and aunſwerer. He prouoked Tiberius to aunſwere him, whether he had not committed a ſhamefull fact to his companion and brother Tribune, to defame him, that by the lawes of ROME ſhould haue bene holy, & vntouched. The people tooke this prouocation very angrily, and Tiberius alſo comming out, and hauing aſſembled the people, commaunded them to bring this Annius before him, that he might be endited in the market place. But he finding himſelfe farre inferiour vnto Tiberius, both in dignitie and eloquence, ranne to his fine ſubtill queſtions, to take a man at his word: and prayed Tiberius before he did proceede to his accuſation, that he would firſt aunſwer him to a queſtion he would aske him. Tiberius bad him ſay what he would. So ſilence being made, Annius asked him: if thou wouldeſt defame me, and offer me iniurie, and that I called one of thy companions to helpe me, and he ſhould riſe to take my part, and anger thee: wouldeſt thou therefore put him out of his office? It is reported that Tiberius was ſo grauelled with this queſtion, that though he was one of the readieſt ſpeakers, and the boldeſt in his Orations of any man: yet at that time he held his peace, and had no power to ſpeake, and therefore he preſently diſmiſſed the aſſemblie. Afterwards, vnderſtanding that of all the things he did, the depoſing of Octauius from his office was thought (not onely of the nobilitie, but of the common people alſo) as fowle and wilfull a part as euer he played, for that thereby he had imbaſed, and vtterly ouerthrowen the dignitie of the Tribunes, the which was alwayes had in great veneration vntill that preſent time: to excuſe himſelfe therefore, he made an excellent Oration to the people, whereby ſhall appeare vnto you ſome ſpeciall points thereof, to diſcerne the better the force and effect of his eloquence. The tribuneſhip ſayd he, indeede was a holy and ſacred thing, as particularly conſecrated to the people, and eſtabliſhed for their benefite and ſafetie: Where contrariwiſe, if the Tribune do offer the people any wrong, he thereby miniſheth their power, and taketh away the meanes from them to declare their wils by voyces, beſides that he doth alſo imbaſe his owne authoritie, leauing to do the thing for the which his authoritie firſt was giuen him. Or otherwiſe we could not chooſe but ſuffer a Tribune, if it pleaſed him, „ to ouerthrow the Capitoll, or to ſet fire on the arſenall: and yet notwithſtanding this wicked „ part, if it were committed, he ſhould be Tribune of the people ſtill, though a lewde Tribune. „
But when he goeth about to take away the authoritie and power of the people, then he is no „ more a Tribune. Were not this againſt all reaſon, thinke you, that a Tribune whē he liſt, may „ take a Conſull, and commit him to priſon: and that the people ſhould not withſtand the authoritie „ of the Tribune, who gaue him the ſame, when he would vſe his authoritie to the preiudice „ of the people? for the people are they that do chooſe, both Conſull and Tribune. Furthermore, „ the kingly dignitie (becauſe in the ſame is conteined the abſolute authoritie and „ power of all other kindes of Magiſtrates and offices together) is conſecrated with very great „ and holy ceremonies, drawing very neare vnto the godhead: and yet the people expulſed king „
Tarquin, becauſe he vſed his authoritie with crueltie, and for the iniurie he offered one man „ onely, the moſt auncient rule and gouernement, (by the which the foundation of ROME was „ firſt layed) was vtterly aboliſhed. And who is there in all the citie of ROME to be reckoned ſo „ holy as the Veſtall Nunnes, which haue the cuſtodie and keeping of the euerlaſting fire? and „ yet if any of theſe be taken in fornication, ſhe is buried aliue for her offence: for when they are „ not holy to the goddes, they loſe the libertie they haue, in reſpect of ſeruing the goddes. Euen „ ſo alſo it is vnmeete, that the Tribune if he offend the people, ſhould for the peoples ſake be „ reuerenced any more: Seeing that through his owne folly he hath depriued himſelfe of that „ authoritie they gaue him. And if it be ſo that he was choſen Tribune by the moſt part of the „ tribes of the people: then by greater reaſon is he iuſtly depriued, that by all the whole tribes „ together is forſaken and depoſed. There is nothing more holy nor inuiolate, then things „ offered vp vnto the goddes: and yet it was neuer ſeene that any man did forbid the people to „ take them, to remoue and tranſport them from place to place, as they thought good. Euen ſo, „ they may as lawfully transferre the office of the Tribune vnto any other, as any other offring „ conſecrated to the goddes. Furthermore, it is manifeſt that any Officer or Magiſtrate may „ lawfully depoſe himſelfe: For, it hath bene often ſeene, that men in office haue depriued themſelues, „ or otherwiſe haue ſued to be diſcharged. This was the effect of Tiberius purgation. „

The Oration of Tiberius Gracchus, touching the power and authoritie of the Tribune.

Other lawes made by Tiberius Gracchus.

Now his friendes perceiuing the threats the rich and noble men gaue out againſt him, they wiſhed him for the ſafetie of his perſon, to make ſute to be Tribune againe the next yeare. Whereupon he began to flatter the common people againe a freſh, by new lawes which he preferred: by the which he tooke away the time and number of yeares preſcribed, when euery citizen of ROME was bound to go to the warres being called, and his name billed. He made it lawfull alſo for men to appeale from ſentence of the Iudges vnto the people, and thruſt in alſo amongſt the Senatours (which then had abſolute authoritie to iudge among themſelues) a like number of the ROMAINE Knightes, and by this meanes ſought to weaken and imbaſe the authoritie of the Senate, increaſing alſo the power of the people, more of malice then any reaſon, or for any iuſtice or benefit to the common wealth. Furthermore, when it came to the gathering of the voyces of the people for the confirmation of his new lawes, finding that his enemies were the ſtronger in the aſſembly, becauſe all the people were not yet come together: he fell a quarelling with his brethren the Tribunes, alwayes to winne time, and yet in the end brake vp the aſſembly, commaunding them to returne the next morning. There he would be the firſt man in the market place apparelled all in blacke, his face beblubbered with teares, and looking heauily vpon the matter, praying the people aſſembled to haue compaſsion vpõ him, ſaying, that he was affrayed leaſt his enemies would come in the night, and ouerthrow his houſe to kill him. Thereupon the people were ſo moued withall, that many of them came and brought their tents, and lay about his houſe to watch it. At the breake of the day, the keeper of the chickins, by ſignes of the which they do diuine of things to come, brought them vnto him, and caſt them downe meate before them. None of them would come out of the cage but one onely, and yet with much a do, ſhaking the cage: and when it came out, it would eate no meate, but onely lift vp her left wing, and put forth her legge, and ſo ranne into the cage againe. This ſigne made Tiberius remember an other he had had before. He had a maruellous fayre helmet and very rich, which he ware in the warres: vnder it were crept two ſnakes vnwares to any, and layed egges, and hatched them. This made Tiberius wonder the more, becauſe of the ill ſignes of the chickins: notwithſtanding, he went out of his houſe, when he heard that the people were aſſembled in the Capitoll, but as he went out, he hit his foote ſuch a blow againſt a ſtone at the threſhold of the doore, that he brake the nayle of his great toe, which fell in ſuch a bleeding, that it bled through his ſhooe. Againe, he had not gone farre, but he ſaw vpon the toppe of a houſe on his left hand, a couple of rauens fighting together: and notwithſtanding that there paſt a great number of people by, yet a ſtone which one of theſe rauens caſt from them, came and fell hard at Tiberius foote. The fall therof ſtayed the ſtouteſt man he had about him. But Bloſsius the Philoſopher of Cumes that did accõpany him, told him it were a great ſhame for him, and enough to kill the harts of all his followers: that Tiberius being the ſonne of Gracchus, and nephew of Scipio the AFRICAN, and the chiefe man beſides of all the peoples ſide, for feare of a rauen, ſhould not obey his citizens that called him: and how that his enemies and ill willers would not make a laughing ſport of it, but would plainly tell the people that this was a tricke of a tyrant that raigned in deed, and that for pride and diſdaine did abuſe the peoples good wils. Furthermore, diuers meſſengers came vnto him, and ſayd that his friends that were in the Capitoll, ſent to pray him to make haſt, for all went well with him. When he came thither, he was honourably receiued: for the people ſeeing him comming, cried out for ioy to welcome him, and when he was gotten vp to his ſeate, they ſhewed themſelues both carefull and louing towardes him, looking warely that none came neare him, but ſuch as they knew well. While Mutius began againe to call the tribes of the people to giue their voyces, he could not proceede according to the accuſtomed order in the like caſe, for the great noyſe the hindmoſt people made, thruſting forward, and being driuen backe, and one mingling with an other. In the meane time Flauius Flaccus, one of the Senators, got vp into a place where all the people might ſee him, and when he ſaw that his voyce could not be heard of Tiberius, he made a ſigne with his hand that he had ſome matter of great importance to tell him. Tiberius ſtraight bad them make a lane through the preaſe. So, with much a do, Flauius came at length vnto him, and told him, that the rich men in open Senate, when they could not frame the Conſull to their wils, determined them ſelues to come and kill him, hauing a great number of their friends, and bondmen armed for the purpoſe. Tiberius immediatly declared this conſpiracie vnto his friends & followers: who ſtraight girt their long gownes vnto them, and brake the ſergeants iauelins which they caried in their hands to make roome among the people, and tooke the tronchions of the ſame to reſiſt thoſe that would ſet vpon them. The people alſo that ſtoode furdeſt off, maruelled at it, and asked what the matter was. Tiberius by a ſigne to tell them the danger he was in, laid both his hands on his head, becauſe they could not heare his voice for the great noyſe they made. His enemies ſeeing the ſigne he gaue, ranne preſently to the Senate, crying out, that Tiberius required a royall band or diademe of the people, and that it was an euident ſigne, becauſe they ſaw him clappe his hands vpon his head. This tale troubled all the companie. Whereupon Naſica beſought the Conſull, chiefe of the Senate, to helpe the common wealth, and to take away this tyrant. The Conſull gently anſwered againe, that he would vſe no force, neither put any citizen to death, but lawfully condemned: as alſo he would not receiue Tiberius, nor protect him, if the people by his perſwaſion or commandement, ſhould commit any act contrarie to the law. Naſica then riſing in anger, ſith the matter is ſo, ſaid he, that the Conſull regardeth not the common wealth: all you then, that will defende the authoritie of the lawe, followe me. Thereupon he caſt the skirt of his gowne ouer his head, and went ſtraight to the Capitoll. They that followed him alſo tooke their gownes, and wrapt them about their armes, and laid at as many as they might, to make them giue way: and yet very few of the people durſt meete with ſuch ſtates as they were to ſtay them, becauſe they were the chiefeſt men of the citie, but euery man flying from them, they fell one on an others necke for haſte. They that followed them, had brought from home great leauers and clubbes, and as they went, they tooke vp feet of treſtles and chaires which the people had ouerthrowen and broken, running away, and hyed them a pace to meete with Tiberius, ſtriking at them that ſtoode in their way: ſo that in ſhort ſpace they had diſperſed all the common people, and many were ſlaine flying. Tiberius ſeeing that, betooke him to his legges to ſaue himſelfe, but as he was flying, one tooke him by the gowne and ſtayed him: but he leauing his gowne behind him, ranne in his coat, and running fell vpon them that were downe before. So, as he was riſing vp againe, the firſt man that ſtrake him, and that was plainly ſeene ſtrike him, was one of the Tribunes his brethren, called Publius Satureius: who gaue him a great rappe on the head with the foote of a chaire, and the ſecond blow he had, was giuen him by Lucius Rufus that boaſted of it, as if he had done a notable act. In this tumult, there were ſlaine aboue three hundred men, and were all killed with ſtaues and ſtones, and not one man hurt with any iron. This was the firſt ſedition among the citizens of ROME, that fell out with murder and bloudſhead, ſince the expulſion of the kings. But for all other former diſſentions (which were no trifles) they were eaſily pacified, either partie giuing place to other: the Senate for feare of the commoners, and the people for reuerence they bare to the Senate. And it ſeemeth, that Tiberius himſelfe would eaſily haue yeelded alſo, if they had proceeded by faire meanes and perſwaſion, ſo they had ment good faith, and would haue killed no man: for at that time he had not in all, aboue 3000. men of the people about him. But ſurely it ſeemes this conſpiracie was executed againſt him, more for verie ſpight and malice the rich men did beare him, then for any other apparant cauſe they preſuppoſed againſt him. For proofe hereof may be alleaged, the barbarous crueltie they vſed to his bodie being dead. For they would not ſuffer his owne brother to haue his bodie to burie it by night, who made earneſt ſute vnto them for it: but they threw him amongſt the other bodies into the riuer, and yet this was not the worſt. For, ſome of his friends they baniſhed without forme of law, & others they put to death, which they could meete withall. Among the which they ſlew Diophanes the Orator, and one Caius Billius, whom they incloſed in a pipe among ſnakes and ſerpents, and put him to death in this ſort. Bloſsius alſo the Philoſopher of Cumes, was brought before the Conſuls, and examined about this matter: who boldly confeſſed vnto them, that he did as much as Tiberius commaunded him. When Naſica did aske him, and what if he had commaunded thee to ſet fire on the Capitoll? He made him anſwere, that Tiberius would neuer haue giuen him any ſuch commaundement. And when diuers others alſo were ſtill in hand with him about that queſtion: but if he had commanded thee? I would ſure

haue done it, ſaid he: for he would neuer haue cōmanded me to haue done it, if it had not bene for the commoditie of the people. Thus he ſcaped at that time, and afterwards fled into Asia vnto Ariſtonicus, whom misfortune hauing ouerthrowen, he ſlew himſelfe. Now, the Senate to pacifie the people at that preſent time, did no more withſtand the law Agraria, for diuiſion of the lands of the common wealth, but ſuffered the people to appoint an other Commiſſioner for that purpoſe, in Tiberius place. Thereupon Publius Craſſus was choſen, being allied vnto Tiberius, for Caius Gracchus (Tiberius brother) had maried his daughter Licinia. Yet Cornelius Nepos ſaith, that it was not Craſſus daughter Caius maried, but the daughter of Brutus, that triumphed for the Lusitanians. Howbeit the beſt writers and authoritie, agree with that we write. But whatſoeuer was done, the people were maruellouſly offended with his death, and men might eaſily perceiue, that they looked but for time and oportunitie to be reuenged, and did preſently threaten Naſica to accuſe him. Whereupon the Senate fearing ſome trouble towards him, deuiſed a way vpon no occaſion, to ſend him into Asia. For the common people did not diſſemble the malice they bare him when they met him, but were very round with him, and called him tyrant, and murderer, excommunicate, & wicked man, that had imbrued his hands in the bloud of the holy Tribune, and within the moſt ſacred temple of all the citie. So in the end he was inforced to forſake Rome, though by his office he was bound to ſolemniſe all the greateſt ſacrifices, becauſe he was then chiefe Biſhoppe of Rome. Thus, trauelling out of his country like a meane man, and troubled in his mind: he died ſhortly after, not farre from the citie of Pergamum. Truely it is not greatly to be wondred at, though the people ſo much hated Naſica, conſidering that Scipio the African himſelfe (whom the people of Rome for iuſter cauſes had loued better than any man elſe whatſoeuer) was like to haue loſt all the peoples good wils they bare him, becauſe that being at the ſiege of Numantia, when newes was brought him of Tiberius death, he rang out this verſe of Homer:

Naſica chiefe Biſhop of Rome

Such end vpon him euer light,
Which in ſuch doings doth delight.

Scipioes ſentence of the death of Tiberius Gracchus.

Furthermore, being asked in the aſſembly of the people, by Caius & Fuluius, what he thought of Tiberius death: he anſwered thē, that he did not like his doings. After that the people handled him very churliſhly, and did euer breake off his oration, which they neuer did before: and he himſelfe alſo would reuile the people euen in the aſſembly. Now Caius Gracchus at the firſt becauſe he feared the enemies of his dead brother, or otherwiſe for that he ſought meanes to make them more hated of the people: he abſented himſelfe for a time out of the common aſſembly, and kept at home and meddled not, as a man contented to liue meanely, without buſying himſelfe in the common wealth: inſomuch as he made men thinke and report both, that he did vtterly miſlike thoſe matters which his brother had preferred. Howbeit he was then but a young man, and nine yeares younger then his brother Tiberius, who was not thirtie yeare old when he was ſlaine. But in proceſſe of time, he made his manners and conditions (by litle and litle) appeare, who hated ſloth and curioſitie, and was leaſt of all giuen vnto any couetous minde of getting: for he gaue himſelfe to be eloquent, as preparing him wings afterwardes to practiſe in the common wealth. So that it appeared plainely, that when time came, he would not ſtand ſtill, and looke on. When one Vectius a friend of his was ſued, he tooke vpon him to defend his cauſe in court. The people that were preſent, and heard him ſpeake, they leaped for ioy to ſee him: for he had ſuch an eloquent tongue, that all the Orators beſides were but children to him. Hereupon the rich men beganne to be affraide againe, and whiſpered among themſelues, that it behoued them to beware he came not to be Tribune. It chaunced ſo that he was choſen Treaſurer, and it was his fortune to goe into the Ile of Sardinia, with the Conſull Oreſtes. His enemies were glad of that, and he himſelfe was not ſorie for it. For he was a martiall man, and as skilfull in armes as he was elſe an excellent Orator: but yet he was affraide to come into the pulpit for Orations, and miſliked to deale in matters of ſtate, albeit he could not altogether deny the people, and his friends that prayed his furtherance. For this cauſe therefore he was very glad of this voyage, that he might abſent himſelfe for a time out of Rome: though diuers were of opinion, that he was more popular, and deſirous of the common peoples good will and fauour, then his brother had bene before him. But in deede he was cleane contrarie: for it appeared that at the firſt he was drawen rather againſt his will, then of any ſpeciall deſire he had to deale in the common wealth. Cicero the Orator alſo ſaith, that Caius was bent altogether to flie from office in the common wealth, and to liue quietly as a priuate man. But Tiberius (Caius brother) appeared to him in his ſleepe, and calling him by his name, ſaid vnto him: brother, why doeſt thou prolong time, for thou canſt not poſſiblie eſcape? For we were both predeſtined to one maner of life and death, for procuring the benefite of the people. Now when Caius arriued in SARDINIA, he ſhewed all the proofes that might be in a valiant man, and excelled all the young men of his age, in hardines againſt his enemies, in iuſtice to his inferiors, and in loue & obedience towards the Conſull his Captaine: but in temperance, ſobrietie, and in painefulneſſe, he excelled all them that were elder then he. The winter by chance fell out very ſharpe, and full of ſickenes in SARDINIA: whereupon the Conſull ſent vnto the cities to helpe his ſouldiers with ſome clothes: but the townes ſent in poſte to ROME, to pray the Senate they might be diſcharged of that burden. The Senate found their allegation reaſonable, whereupon they wrote to the Conſull to finde ſome other meanes to cloth his people. The Conſull could make no other ſhift for them, and ſo the poore ſouldiers in the meane time ſmarted for it. But Caius Gracchus went himſelfe vnto the cities and ſo perſwaded them, that they of themſelues ſent to the ROMAINES campe ſuch things as they lacked. This being caried to ROME, it was thought ſtraight it was a pretie beginning to creepe into the peoples fauour, and in deede it made the Senate alſo affraide. In the necke of that, there arriued Ambaſſadors of AFRICKE at ROME, ſent from king Micipſa, who told the Senate that the king their maſter, for Caius Gracchus ſake, had ſent their armie corne into SARDINIA. The Senators were ſo offended withall, that they thruſt the Ambaſſadors out of the Senate, and ſo gaue order that other ſouldiers ſhould be ſent in their places that were in SARDINIA: and that Oreſtes ſhould ſtill remaine Conſull there, meaning alſo to continue Caius their Treaſurer. But when he heard of it, he ſtraight tooke ſea, and returned to ROME in choller. When men ſaw Caius returned to ROME vnlooked for, he was reproued for it not only by his enemies, but by the common people alſo: who thought his returne very ſtraunge before his Captaine, vnder whom he was Treaſurer. He being accuſed hereof before the Cenſors, prayed he might be heard. So, aunſwering his accuſation, he ſo turned the peoples mindes that heard him, that they all ſaid he had open wrong. For he tolde them, that he had ſerued twelue yeares in the warres, where others were enforced to remaine but ten yeres: and that he had continued Treaſurer vnder his Captaine, the ſpace of three yeares, where the law gaue him libertie to returne at the end of the yeare. And that he alone of all men elſe that had bene in the warres, had caried his purſe full, and brought it home emptie: where others hauing drunke the wine which they caried thither in veſſels, had afterwardes brought them home full of gold and ſiluer. Afterwards they went about to accuſe him as acceſſarie to a conſpiracie, that was reuealed in the citie of FREGELLES. But hauing cleared all that ſuſpicion, and being diſcharged, he preſently made ſute to be Tribune: wherein he had all the men of qualitie his ſworne enemies. On the other ſide alſo he had ſo great fauor of the common people, that there came men out of all partes of ITALY to be at his election, and that ſuch a number of them, as there was no lodging to be had for them all. Furthermore, the field of Mars not being large enough to hold ſuch a multitude of people, there were that gaue their voyces vpon the toppe of houſes. Nowe the noble men could no otherwiſe let the people of their will, nor preuent Caius of his hope, but where he thought to be the firſt Tribune, he was only pronounced the fourth. But when he was once poſſeſt officer, he became immediatly the chiefe man, becauſe he was as eloquent as any man of his time. And furthermore, he had a large occaſion of calamitie offred him: which made him bold to ſpeake, bewailing the death of his brother. For what matter ſoeuer he ſpake of, he alwaies fell in talke of that, remembring them what matters had paſſed: and laying before them the examples of their anceſtors: who in olde time had made warre with the PHALISCES, by the meanes of one Genutius Tribune of the people, vnto whom they had offered iniurie: who alſo did condemne Caius Veturius to death, becauſe that he onely would not giue a Tribune place, comming through the market place. Where theſe ſaid he, that ſtanding before you in ſight, haue ſlaine my brother

Caius Gracchus viſion and dreame.

Caius Gracchus, Tribune of the people.

Tiberius with ſtaues, and haue dragged his bodie from the mount of the Capitoll, all the citie ouer, to throw it into the riuer: and with him alſo haue moſt cruelly ſlaine all his friends they could come by, without any law or iuſtice at all. And yet by an ancient cuſtome of long time obſerued in this citie of Rome, when any man is accuſed of treaſon, and that of dutie he muſt appeare at the time appointed him: they doe notwithſtanding in the morning ſend a trumpet to his houſe, to ſummon him to appeare: and moreouer the Iudges were not wont to condemne him, before this ceremonie was performed: ſo carefull and reſpectiue were our predeceſſors, where it touched the life of any Romaine. Now Caius hauing firſt ſtirred vp the people with theſe perſwaſions (for he had a maruellous loud voice) he preferred two lawes.

The firſt, that he that had once beene put out of office by the people, ſhould neuer after be capable of any other office.

The ſecond, that if any Conſull had baniſhed any citizen without lawfull accuſation, the ſentence and hearing of the matter ſhould pertaine to the people.

Cornelia mother of the Gracchi, honored of the people of Rome.

The firſt of theſe two lawes did plainely defame Octauius, whom Tiberius his brother had by the people depoſed from the Tribuneſhippe. The ſecond alſo touched Popilius, who being Prætor, had baniſhed his brother Tiberius friendes: whereupon he ſtayed not the triall, but willingly exiled himſelfe out of Italy. And touching the firſt law, Caius himſelfe did afterwards reuoke it, declaring vnto the people, that he had ſaued Octauius at the requeſt of his mother Cornelia. The people were very glad of it, and confirmed it, honoring her no leſſe for reſpect of her ſonnes, then alſo for Scipioes ſake her father. For afterwards they caſt her image in braſſe, and ſet it vp with this inſcription: Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi. Many cōmon matters are found written touching Cornelia his mother, & eloquently pleaded in her behalfe, by Caius againſt her aduerſaries. As when he ſaide vnto one of them: how dareſt thou preſume to ſpeake euill of Cornelia, that had Tiberius to her ſonne? And the other partie alſo that ſlandered her, being ſorely ſuſpected for a Sodomite: and art thou ſo impudent, ſaid he, to ſhew thy face before Cornelia? Haſt thou brought foorth children as ſhe hath done? And yet it is well knowen to all men in Rome, that ſhe being but a woman, hath liued longer without a man, than thou that art a man. Thus were Caius words ſharpe and ſtinging, and many ſuch like are to be gathered out of his writings. Furthermore he made many other lawes afterwards to increaſe the peoples authoritie, and to imbaſe the Senates greatneſſe.

Other lawes preferred by Caius Gracchus.

The firſt was, for the reſtoring of the Colonies to Rome, in diuiding the lands of the common wealth vnto the poore citizens that ſhould inhabite there.

The other, that they ſhould apparell the ſouldiers at the charge of the common wealth, and that it ſhould not be deducted out of their pay: and alſo that no citizen ſhould be billed to ſerue in the warres, vnder ſeuenteene yeares of age at the leaſt.

An other law was, for their confederates of Italie: that through all Italie they ſhould haue as free voyces in the election of anie Magiſtrate, as the naturall citizens of Rome it ſelfe.

An other ſetting a reaſonable price of the corne that ſhould be diſtributed vnto the poore people.

An other touching iudgement, whereby he did greatly miniſh the authoritie of the Senate. For before, the Senators were only Iudges of al matters, the which made them to be the more honored and feared of the people, and the Romaine Knights: and now he ioyned three hundred Romaine Knightes vnto the other three hundred Senators, and brought it ſo to paſſe, that all matters iudiciall ſhould be equally iudged, among thoſe ſixe hundred men. After he had paſſed this lawe, it is reported he was very curious in obſeruing all other things, but this one thing ſpecially: that where all other Orators ſpeaking to the people turned them towards the pallace where the Senators ſate, and to that ſide of the market place which is called Comitium: he in contrarie manner when he made his Oration, turned him outwardes towards the other ſide of the market place, and after that kept it conſtantly, and neuer failed. Thus, by a litle turning and altering of his looke only, he remoued a great matter. For he ſo transferred all the gouernment of the common wealth from the Senate, vnto the iudgement of the people: to teach the Orators by his example, that in their Orations they ſhould beholde the people, not the Senate. Now, the people hauing not onely confirmed the law he made touching the Iudges, but giuen him alſo full power & authoritie to chooſe among the Romaine Knights ſuch Iudges as he liked of: he found thereby he had abſolute power in his owne hands, inſomuch as the Senators themſelues did aske counſell of him. So did he euer giue good counſell, and did preferre matters meete for their honor. As amongſt others, the law he made touching certaine wheate that Fabius Viceprætor had ſent out of Spayne: which was a good and honorable act. He perſwaded the Senate that the corne might be ſold, & ſo to ſend backe againe the money thereof vnto the townes and cities from whence the corne came: and therewithall to puniſh Fabius for that he made the Empire of Rome hateful and intollerable vnto the prouinces and ſubiectes of the ſame. This matter wanne him great loue and commendation of all the prouinces ſubiect to Rome. Furthermore, he made lawes for the reſtoring of the decaied townes, for mending of high waies, for building of garners for prouiſion of corne. And to bring all theſe things to paſſe, he himſelfe tooke vpon him the only care and enterpriſe, being neuer wearied with any paines taken in ordering of ſo great affaires. For, he followed all thoſe things ſo earneſtly and effectually, as if he had had but one matter in hand: inſomuch that they who moſt hated and feared him, wondred moſt to ſee his diligence and quicke diſpatch in matters. The people alſo wondred much to beholde him only, ſeeing alwaies ſuch a number of labourers, artificers, ambaſſadors, officers, ſouldiers, and learned men, whom he eaſily ſatisfied and diſpatched, keeping ſtill his eſtate, and yet vſing great courteſie and ciuilitie, entertaining euery one of them priuately: ſo that he made his accuſers to be found liers, that ſaid he was a ſtately man, and very cruell. Thus he wanne the good will of the common people, being more popular and familiar in his conuerſation and deedes, then he was otherwiſe in his Orations. But the greateſt paines and care he tooke vpon him was, in ſeeing the high wayes mended, the which he would haue as well done, as profitably done. For he would caſt the cawcies by the line in the ſofteſt ground in the fieldes, and then would paue them with hard ſtone, and caſt a great deale of grauell vpon it, which he cauſed to be brought thither. When he found any low or waterie places which the riuers had eaten into, he raiſed them vp, or elſe made bridges ouer them, with an euen height equall to either ſide of the caucie: ſo that all his worke caried a goodly leauen withall euen by the line or plummet, which was a pleaſure to behold it. Furthermore, he deuided theſe high waies by myles, euery myle conteining eight furlongs, and at euery miles end he ſet vp a ſtone for a marke. At either end alſo of theſe high waies thus paued, he ſet certaine ſtones of conuenient height, a pretie way a ſunder, to helpe the trauellers by to take their horſe backes againe without any helpe. The people for theſe things highly praiſing & extolling him, and being readie to make ſhew of their loue and good will to him any manner of way: he told them openly one day in his Oration, that he had a requeſt to make vnto thē, the which if it would pleaſe them to grant him, he would thinke they did him a maruellous pleaſure: and if they denied him alſo, he cared not much. Then euerie man thought it was the Conſulſhip he ment to aske, and that he would ſue to be Tribune and Conſull together. But when the day came to chooſe the Conſuls, euery man looking attentiuely what he would do: they maruelled when they ſaw him come downe the field of Mars, & brought Caius Fannius with his friends, to further his ſute for the Conſulſhip. Therein he ſerued Fannius turne, for he was preſently choſen Conſull: and Caius Gracchus was the ſeconde time choſen Tribune againe, not of his own ſute, but by the good wil of the people. Caius perceiuing that the Senators were his open enemies, and that Fannius the Conſul was but a ſlack friend vnto him, he began againe to currie fauor with the cōmon people, and to preferre new lawes, ſetting foorth the law of the Colonies, that they ſhould ſend of the poore citizens to repleniſh the cities of Tarentvm & Capva, and that they ſhould grant all the Latins the freedome of Rome. The Senate perceiuing his power grew great, & that in the end he would be ſo ſtrong that they could not withſtand him: they deuiſed a new and ſtrange way to pluck the peoples good will from him, in granting them things not altogether very honeſt. There was one of the Tribunes, a brother in office with Caius called Liuius Druſus, a man noblely borne, and as well brought vp as any other Romaine: who for wealth and eloquence was not inferior to the greateſt men of eſtimation in Rome. The chiefeſt Senators went vnto him, and perſwaded him to take part with them againſt Caius, not to vſe any force or violence againſt the people to withſtand them in any thing, but contrarily to graunt them thoſe things which were more honeſty for them to deny thē with their ill wil. Liuius offering to pleaſure the Senate with his authority, preferred lawes neither honorable nor profitable to the cōmon welth & were to no other end, but contending with Caius, who ſhould moſt flatter the people of thē two, as plaiers do in their cōmon plaies, to ſhew the people paſtime. Wherby the Senate ſhewed that they did not ſo much miſlike Caius doings, as for the deſire they had to ouerthrow him & his great credit with the people. For where Caius preferred but the repleniſhing of the two cities, and deſired to ſende the honeſteſt citizens thither: they obiected againſt him, that he did corrupt the common people. On the other ſide alſo they fauored Druſus, who preferred a law that they ſhould repleniſh twelue Colonies, and ſhould ſend to euery one of them three thouſande of the pooreſt citizens. And where they hated Caius for that he had charged the poore citizens with an annuall rent for the lands that were deuided vnto thē: Liuius in contrary maner did pleaſe them by diſburdening them of that rent & payment, letting them haue the lands ſcotfree. Furthermore alſo, where Caius did anger the people, becauſe he gaue all the Latines the freedome of ROME to giue their voices in chooſing of Magiſtrates as freely as the naturall ROMAINS: when Druſus on the other ſide had preferred a law that thenceforth no ROMAIN ſhould whip any ſouldier of the Latines with rods to the warres, they liked the law, & paſt it. Liuius alſo in euery law he put forth, ſaid in all his orations, that he did it by the counſell of the Senate, who were very carefull for the profit of the people: and this was all the good he did in his office vnto the cōmon wealth. For by his meanes the people were better pleaſed with the Senate, and where they did before hate all the noble men of the Senate, Liuius tooke away that malice, when the people ſaw that all that he propounded, was for the preferment & benefit of the common wealth, with the conſent & furtherance of the Senate. The onely thing alſo that perſwaded the people to thinke that Druſus ment vprightly, & that he only reſpected the profit of the common people was: that he neuer preferred any law for himſelfe, or for his owne benefit. For in the reſtoring of theſe Colonies which he preferred, he alwaies ſent other Commiſsioners, & gaue them the charge of it, and would neuer finger any money himſelfe: where Caius tooke vpon him the charge & care of al things himſelfe, & ſpecially of the greateſt matters. Rubrius alſo another Tribune, hauing preferred a law for the reedifying & repleniſhing of CARTHAGE againe with people, the which Scipio had raſed & deſtroied: it was Caius happe to be appointed one of the Commiſsioners for it. Whereupon he tooke ſhip and ſayled into AFRICK. Druſus in the meane time taking occaſion of his abſence, did as much as might be to ſeeke the fauor of the common people, and ſpecially by accuſing Fuluius, who was one of the beſt friends Caius had, & whom they had alſo choſen Cōmiſsioner with him for the diuiſion of theſe landes among the citizens, whom they ſent to repleniſh theſe Colonies. This Fuluius was a ſeditious man, & therefore maruelloully hated of the Senate, & withal ſuſpected alſo of them that tooke part with the people, that he ſecretly practiſed to make their confederates of ITALIE to rebell. But yet they had no euident proofe of it to iuſtifie it againſt him, more then that which he himſelf did verifie, becauſe he ſeemed to be offended with the peace & quietnes they enioyed. And this was one of the chiefeſt cauſes of Caius ouerthrow, becauſe that Fuluius was partly hated for his ſake. For when Scipio AFRICAN was found dead one morning in his houſe, without any manifeſt cauſe how he ſhould come to his death ſo ſodainely: (ſauing that there appeared certaine blinde markes of ſtripes on his body that had bene giuen him: as we haue declared at large in his life) the moſt part of the ſuſpition of his death was laide to Fuluius, being his mortall enemie, & becauſe the ſame day they had bene at great words together in the pulpit for orations. So was Caius Gracchus alſo partly ſuſpected for it. Howſoeuer it was ſuch a horrible murder as this, of ſo famous & worthy a mā as any was in ROME, was yet notwithſtanding neuer reuenged, neither any inquirie made of it: becauſe the common people would not ſuffer the accuſation to goe forwarde, fearing leaſt Caius would be found in fault, if the matter ſhould go forward. But this was a great while before. Now Caius at that time being in AFRICK about the reedifying & repleniſhing of the city of CARTHAGE againe, the which he named IVNONIA: the voice goeth that he had many ill ſignes & tokens appeared vnto him.

For the ſtaffe of his enſigne was broken with a vehement blaſt of wind, and with the force of the enſigne bearer that held it faſt on the other ſide. There came a flaw of wind alſo that caried away the ſacrifices vpon the aulters and blew them quite out of the circuit which was marked out for the compaſſe of the city. Furthermore, the wolues came and tooke away the markes which they had ſet down to limite the bounds of their circuit, & caried them quite away. This notwithſtanding, Caius hauing diſpatched all things in the ſpace of three ſcore & ten daies, he returned incontinently to ROME, vnderſtanding that Fuluius was oppreſſed by Druſus, & that thoſe matters required his preſence. For Lucius Hoſtilius that was all in all for the nobility, and a man of great credit with the Senate, being the yeare before put by the Conſulſhip, by Caius practiſe, who cauſed Fannius to be choſen: he had good hope this yeare to ſpeede, for the great number of friends that furthered his ſute. So that if he could obtaine it, he was fully bent to ſet Caius beſide the ſaddle, and the rather, becauſe his eſtimation and countenance he was wont to haue among the people, began now to decay, for that they were ful of ſuch deuiſes as his were: becauſe there were diuers others that preferred the like to pleaſe the people withal, & yet with the Senates great good wil and fauor. So Caius being returned to ROME, he remoued from his houſe, and where before he dwelt in mount Palatine, he came now to take a houſe vnder the market place, to ſhew him ſelf thereby the lowlier & more popular, becauſe many of the meaner ſort of people dwelt thereabouts. Then hee purpoſed to goe forward with the reſt of his lawes, and to make the people to eſtabliſh thẽ, a great number of people repairing to ROME out of all parts for the furtherance thereof. Howbeit the Senate counſelled the Conſull Fannius to make proclamatiõ, that al thoſe which were no natural ROMAINS, reſident & abiding within the city ſelf of ROME: that they ſhould depart out of ROME. Beſides all this, there was a ſtrange proclamation made, and neuer ſeene before: that none of all the friends and confederats of the ROMAINS, for certaine daies ſhould come into ROME. But Caius on the other ſide ſet vp bils on euery poſt, accuſing the Conſull for making ſo wicked a proclamatiõ: & further, promiſed the confederates of ROME to aide them, if they would remaine there againſt the Conſuls proclamation. But yet he performed it not. For when he ſaw one of Fannius ſergeants cary a friend of his to priſon, he held on his way, & would ſee nothing, neither did he helpe him: either of likelihood becauſe he feared his credite with the people, which began to decay, or elſe becauſe he was loth (as he ſaid) to picke any quarrell with his enemies, which ſought it of him. Furthermore, he chanced to fall at variance with his brethren the Tribunes, about this occaſion. The people were to ſee the paſtime of the ſword plaiers or ſenſers at the ſharpe, within the verie market place, & there were diuers of the officers that to ſee the ſport, did ſet vp ſcaffolds round about, to take money for the ſtanding. Caius commaunded them to take them downe againe, becauſe the poore men might ſee the ſport without any coſt. But not a man of thẽ would yeeld to it. Wherefore he ſtaid till the night before the paſtime ſhould be, and then he tooke all his laborers he had vnder him, and went & ouerthrew the ſcaffolds euery one of them: ſo that the next morning all the market place was clear for the common people, to ſee the paſtime at their pleaſure. For this fact of his, the people thanked him maruellouſly, and took him for a worthy man. Howbeit his brethren the Tribunes were very much offended with him, and tooke him for a bold preſumptuous man. This ſeemeth to be the chief cauſe why he was put frõ his third Tribuneſhip, where he had the moſt voices of his ſide: becauſe his colleagues, to be reuẽged of the part he had plaied thẽ, of malice and ſpight, made falſe report of the voices. Howbeit there is no great troth in this. It is true that he was very angry with this repulſe, and it is reported he ſpake ſomwhat too proudly to his enemies, that were mery with the matter, and laughed him to ſcorne: that they laughed a SARDONIANS laugh, not knowing how darkely his deeds had wrapt them in. Furthermore, his enemies hauing choſen Opimius Conſull, they began immediatly to reuoke diuers of Caius lawes: as among the reſt, his doings at CARTHAGE for the reedifying of that city, procuring thus all the waies they could to anger him, becauſe they might haue iuſt occaſion of anger to kil him. Caius notwithſtanding did patiently beare it at the firſt: but afterwards his frends, & ſpecially Fuluius, did encorage him ſo, that he began againe to gather men to reſiſt the Conſull. And it is reported alſo, that Cornelia his mother did help him in it, ſecretly hiring a great number of ſtraungers which ſhe ſent vnto ROME, as if they had bene reapers,or harueſt men. And this is that ſhe wrote ſecretly in her letter vnto her ſon in ciphers. And yet other write to the contrary, that ſhee was very angry he did attempt thoſe things. When the day came that they ſhould proceede to the reuocation of his lawes, both parties met by breake of day at the Capitoll. There when the Conſull Opimius had done ſacrifice,one of Caius ſergeants called Quintus Antyllius, carying the intrals of the beaſt ſacrificed, ſayd vnto Fuluius, and others of his tribe that were about him:giue place to honeſt men,vile citizens that ye be. Some ſay alſo,that beſides theſe iniurious words,in ſkorne and contempt he held out his naked arme to make thẽ aſhamed. Whereupon they ſlue him preſently in the field with great bodkins to write with,which they had purpoſely made for that intent. Hereupon the cōmon people were maruellouſly offended for this murther,and the chiefe men of both ſides alſo were diuerſly affected. For Caius was very ſory for it,& bitterly reproued them that were about him, ſaying,that they had giuen their enemies the occaſion they looked for,to ſet vpon thẽ. Opimius the Conſull in contrary maner,taking this occaſion,roſe vppon it,and did ſtir vp the people to be reuenged. But there fell a ſhower of raine at that time that parted them. The next morning the Conſull hauing aſſembled the Senat by breake of day,as he was diſpatching cauſes within, ſome had taken the body of Antyllius and laid it naked vpon the beere,and ſo caried it through the market place) as it was agreed vppon before amongeſt them) and brought it to the Senate dore: where they began to make great mone and lamentation, Opimius knowing the meaning of it,but yet he diſſembled it,and ſeemed to wonder at it. Whereupon the Senators went out to ſee what it was,and finding this beere in the market place, ſome fell a weeping for him that was dead,others cried out that it was a ſhamefull act,and in no wiſe to be ſuffred. But on the other ſide,this did reuiue the old grudge and malice of the people, for the wickednes of the ambitious noble men:who hauing themſelues before ſlaine Tiberius Gracchus that was Tribune and within the Capitoll it ſelfe,& had alſo caſt his body into the riuer,did now make an honorable ſhew openly in the market place,of the body of the ſergeaunt Antyllius (who though he were wrōgfully ſlaine,yet had himſelfe giuen them the cauſe that ſlue him, to do that they did) & all the whole Senat were about the beere to bewaile his death,and to honor the funerals of a hireling,to make the people alſo kill him,that was only left the protector and defender of the people. After this,they went again vnto the Capitol,& there made a decree,wherby they gaue the Conſull Opimius extraordinary power & authority, by abſolute power to prouide for the ſafety of the common wealth,to preſerue the city,& to ſuppreſſe the tyrants. This decree being eſtabliſhed,the Conſull preſently commanded the Senators that were preſent there,to go arme themſelues:and appointed the ROMAINE Knights, that the next morning betimes euery man ſhould bring two of their men armed with thẽ. Fuluius on the other ſide,he prepared his force againſt them,& aſſembled the common people together. Caius alſo returning from the market place,ſtaid before the image of his father,and looked earneſtly vppon it without euer a word ſpeaking,only he burſt out a weeping,and fetching a great ſigh,went his way. This made the people to pity him that ſaw him:ſo that they talked among thẽſelues,that they were but beaſts and cowards at ſuch a ſtraight to forſake ſo worthy a man. Thereupon they went to his houſe, ſtayed there all night and watched before his gate: not as they did that watched with Fuluius, that paſſed away the night in guzling and drinking drunk, crying out,and making noiſe, Fuluius him ſelfe being drunke firſt of all, who both ſpake and did many things farre vnmeete for his calling. For they that watched Caius on the other ſide, were very ſorrowfull, and made no noiſe,euen as in a common calamity of their country,deuiſing with thẽ ſelues what would fall out vppon it,waking,and ſleeping one after an other by turns. When the day brake, they with Fuluius did awake him,who ſlept yet ſoundly for the wine he drank ouer night,and they armed them ſelues with the ſpoiles of the GAVLS that hung round about his houſe,whom he had ouercome in battell the ſame yeare he was Conſull: and with great cries,and thundering threats,they went to take the mount Auentine. But Caius would not arme him ſelfe,but went out of his houſe in a long gowne, as if he would haue gone ſimply into the market place according to his wōted maner,ſauing that he caried a ſhort dagger at his girdle vnder his gown. So as he was going out of his houſe,his wife ſtaid him at the dore,and holding him by the one hand,and a litle child of his in her other hand,ſhe ſayd thus vnto him: Alas Caius,thou doſt not now go as thou wert wont, a Tribune into the market place to ſpeake to the people, neither to prefer any new laws: neither doſt thou go vnto an honeſt war, that if vnfortunatly that ſhould happen to thee that is common to all men, I might yet at the leaſt mourne for thy death with honor. But thou goeſt to put thy ſelf into bloudy butchers hands, who moſt cruelly haue ſlain thy brother Tiberius: and yet thou goeſt, a naked man vnarmed, intending rather to ſuffer, then to doe hurt. Beſides, thy death can bring no benefite to the common wealth. For the worſer part hath now the vpper hand, conſidering that ſentence paſſeth by force of ſword. Had thy brother bene ſlaine by his enemies, before the city of NVMANTIA: yet had they giuen vs his body to haue buried him. But ſuch may be my misfortune, that I may preſently goe to pray the riuer or ſea to giue me thy body, which as thy brothers they haue likewiſe throwen into the ſame. Alas, what hope or truſt is left vs now, in lawes or gods, ſithence they haue ſlaine Tiberius? As Licinia was making this pitifull mone vnto him, Caius faire and ſoftly pulled his hand from her, and left her, giuing her neuer a word, but went on with his friends. But ſhee reaching after him to take him by the gowne, fell to the ground, and lay flatling there a great while, ſpeaking neuer a word: vntill at length her ſeruants tooke her vp in a ſwoone, and caried her ſo vnto her brother Craſſus.

Now Fuluius, by the perſwaſion of Caius, when all their faction were met: ſent his yonger ſonne (which was a prety faire boy) with a Herauldsrod in his hand for his ſafety. This boy humbly preſenting his duety, with the teares in his eyes, before the Conſull and Senate, offered them peace. The moſt of them that were preſent thought very well of it. But Opimius made anſwere ſaying, that it became them not to ſend meſſengers, thinking with faire words to winne the Senate: but it was their duety to come themſelues in perſons, like ſubiects and offendors to make their triall, and ſo to craue pardon, and to ſeeke to pacifie the wrath of the Senate. Then he commaunded the boy he ſhould not returne againe to them, but with this condition he had preſcribed. Caius (as it is reported) was ready to goe and cleare him ſelfe vnto the Senate: but the reſidue would not ſuffer him to go. Whereupon Fuluius ſent his ſonne backe againe vnto them, to ſpeake for them as he had done before. But Opimius that was deſirous to fight, cauſed the boy to be taken, and committed him in ſafe cuſtody, and then went preſently againſt Fuluius with a great number of footemen well armed, and of CRETAN archers beſides: who with their arrowes did more trouble and hurt their enemies then with any thing elſe, that within a while they all beganne to flie.

The death of Fuluius his eldeſt ſonne.

Fuluius on the other ſide fled into an old hotte-houſe that no body made reckonning of, and there being found ſhortly after, they ſlue him, and his eldeſt ſonne. Now for Caius, he fought not at all, but being madde with him ſelfe, and grieued to ſee ſuch bloudſhed: he got him into the temple of Diana, where he would haue killed him ſelf, had not his very good frends Pomponius & Licinius ſaued him. For both they being with him at that time, tooke his ſword from him, and counſelled him to flie. It is reported that then he fell downe on his knees, and holding vp both his hands vnto the goddeſſe, he beſought her that the people might neuer come out of bondage, to be reuenged of this their ingratitude and treaſon. For the common people (or the moſt part of them) plainely turned their coates, when they heard proclamation made, that all men had pardon graunted them, that would returne.

So Caius fled vppon it, and his enemies followed him ſo neare, that they ouertooke him vpon the wodden bridge, where two of his friends that were with him ſtayed, to defend him againſt his followers, and bad him in the meane time make ſhift for him ſelfe, whileſt they fought with them vpon the bridge: and ſo they did, and kept them that not a man gotte the bridge of them, vntill they were both ſlaine. Now there was none that fled with Caius, but one of his men called Philocrates: notwithſtanding, euery man did ſtill encorage and counſell him, as they doe men to winne a game, but no man would helpe him, nor offer him any horſe, though he often required it, becauſe hee ſaw his enemies ſo neare vnto him. This notwithſtanding, by their defence that were ſlaine vppon the bridge, he got ground on them ſo, that he had leyſure to creepe into a litle groue of wod, which was conſecrated to the furies. There his ſeruaunt Philocrates ſlue him, and then ſlue him ſelfe alſo, and fell dead vpon him.

The faithfulnes of Caius Gracchus ſeruaunts.

Other write notwithſtanding, that both the maiſter and ſeruant were ouertaken, and taken aliue: and that his ſeruaunt did ſo ſtraight imbrace his maiſter that none of the enemies could ſtrike him for all the blowes they gaue, before he was ſlaine him ſelfe. So one of the murderers brake off Caius Gracchus head to carie to the Conſull. Howbeit one of Opimius friends called Septimuleius, tooke the head from the other by the way, becauſe proclamation was made before they fought by trumpet, that whoſoeuer brought the heads of Fuluius and Caius, they ſhould be paid the waight of them in gold. Wherefore this Septimuleius caried Caius head vpon the top of his ſpeare vnto Opimius: whereupon the ſkales being brought to wey it, it was found that it weyed ſeuenteene pound waight and two third parts of a pound, becauſe Septimuleius beſides the horrible murder he had committed, had alſo holpen it with this villany, that he had taken out his braine, and in liew thereof had filled his ſcull with lead. Now the other alſo that brought Fuluius head, becauſe they were poore men, they had nothing. The bodies of theſe two men, Caius Gracchus and Fuluius, and of other their followers (which were to the number of three thouſand that were ſlain) were al throwen into the riuer, their goods confiſcate, and their widowes forbidden to mourne for their death. Furthermore, they tooke from Licinia Caius wife, her ioynter: but yet they dealt more cruelly & beaſtly with the yong boy, Fuluius ſon: who had neither lift vp his hand againſt them, nor was in the fight among them, but only came to them to make peace before they fought, whō they kept as priſoner, & after the battell ended, they put him to death. But yet that which moſt of all other grieued the people, was the tēple of concord, the which Opimius cauſed to be built: for it appeared that he boaſted, and in manner triumphed, that he had ſlaine ſo many citizens of ROME. And therefore there were that in the night wrote vnder the inſcription of the temple theſe verſes:

A furious fact and full of beaſtly ſhame,
This temple built, that beareth concordes name.

The temple of concord built by Opimius the Conſull.

This Opimius was the firſt man at ROME, that being Conſull, vſurped the abſolute power of the Dictator: and that without law or iuſtice condemned three thouſand citizens of ROME, beſides Fuluius Flacchus, (who had alſo bene Conſull, and had receiued the honor of triumph) and Caius Gracchus a yong man in like caſe, who in vertue and reputation excelled all the men of his yeares. This notwithſtanding, could not keepe Opimius from theeuery and extorcion. For when he was ſent ambaſſador vnto Iugurthe king of NVMIDIA, he was bribed with money: & thereupon being accuſed, he was moſt ſhamefully conuicted, and condemned. Wherefore he ended his dayes with this reproch and infamy, hated, and mocked of all the people: becauſe at the time of the ouerthrow he dealt beaſtly with them that fought for his quarrell. But ſhortly after, it appeared to the world, how much they lamented the loſſe of the two brethren of the Gracchi. For they made images and ſtatues of them, and cauſed them to be ſet vp in an open & honorable place, conſecrating the places where they had bene ſlaine: and many of them alſo came & offred to them, of their firſt fruits and flowers, according to the time of the yeare, and went thither to make their praiers on their knees, as vnto the temple of the gods. Their mother Cornelia, as writers report, did beare this calamity with a noble heart: and as for the chappels which they built and conſecrated vnto them in the place where they were ſlaine, ſhe ſaid no more, but that they had ſuch graues, as they had deſerued. Afterwards ſhe dwelt continually by the mount of Miſene, and neuer changed her maner of life. Shee had many friendes, and becauſe ſhe was a noble Lady, and loued euer to welcome ſtraungers, ſhe kept a very good houſe, and therefore had alwayes great repaire vnto her, of GRECIANS and learned men: beſides, there was no king nor Prince, but both receiued gifts from her, and ſent her againe. They that frequented her company, delighted maruellouſly to heare her report the deeds and maner of her fathers life, Scipio AFRICAN: but yet they wondred more, to heare her tell the actes and death of her two ſons, Tiberius and Caius Gracchi, without ſheading teare, or making any ſhew of lamentation or griefe, no more then if ſhe had told an hiſtory vnto them that had requeſted her. Inſomuch ſome writers report, that age, or her great misfortunes, had ouercome and taken her reaſon and ſence from her, to feele any ſorrow. But in deede they were ſenceleſſe to ſay ſo, not vnderſtanding, how that to be nobly borne, and vertuouſly brought vp, doth make men temperatly to digeſt ſorrow, and that fortune oftentimes ouercomes vertue, which regardeth honeſty in all reſpectes, but yet with any aduerſity ſhe can not take away the temperaunce from them, whereby they patientlie beare it.

THE COMPARISON OF Tiberius and Caius Gracchi, with Agis and Cleomenes.

The wiſedome of the Gracchi.

NOw that we be come to the end of this hiſtory, we are to compare the liues of theſe two men the one with the other. Firſt, as touching the two Gracchi: their enemies that moſt hated them, and ſpake the worſt they could of them, could not deny but that they were the beſt giuen to vertue, and as well taught and brought vp, as any ROMAINES that were in their time. But yet it appeareth, that nature had the vpper hand of them, in Agis and Cleomenes. For they hauing bene very ill brought vp, both for learning and good manners, for lacke whereof the oldeſt men were almoſt ſpoyled: yet did they notwithſtanding make them ſelues the firſt maiſters and example of ſobriety, temperaunce, and ſimplicity of life. Furthermore, the two firſt hauing liued in that time, when ROME floriſhed moſt in honor and vertuous deſires: they were more then aſhamed to forſake the vertues inherited from their aunceſters. Theſe two laſt alſo being borne of fathers that had a cleane contrary diſpoſition, and finding their countrey altogether without any order, and infected with diſſolute life: were not therefore any whit the more moued with deſire to doe well. Furthermore, the greateſt praiſe they gaue vnto the two Gracchi, was, their abſtinence and integrity from taking of money all the time they were in office, and dealt in matters of ſtate, euer keeping their hands cleane, and tooke not a penny wrongfully from any man. Where Agis on the other ſide was offended if any man praiſed him: for that he tooke nothing from an other man: ſeeing that he diſpoſſeſſed him ſelfe of his owne goods, and gaue it to his citizens, which amounted in ready coine to the value of ſix hundred talents. Whereby men may eaſily iudge, how grieuous a ſinne he thought it to take any thing wrongfully from any man: ſeeing that he thought it a kinde of auarice, lawfully to be richer then others. Furthermore, there was maruellous great difference in their alterations, and renuing of the ſtate, which they did both preferre. For the actes of the two ROMAINES were to mend high waies and to reedifie and repleniſh decayed townes: and the worthieſt act Tiberius did, was the law Agraria, which he brought in for diuiding of the lands of the common wealth amongeſt the poore Citizens. And the beſt acte his brother Caius alſo did, was the mingling of the Iudges: adding to the three hundred Senators, three hundred ROMAINE knights to be indifferent Iudges with them. Whereas Agis and Cleomenes in contrary maner were of opinion, that to reforme ſmall faults, & to redreſſe them by litle and litle, was (as Plato ſayd) to cut off one of the Hydraes heads, of the which came afterwards ſeuen in the place: and therefore they tooke vpon them a chaunge and innouation, euen at once to roote out all the miſchiefs of their country, (or to ſpeake more truly, to take away the diſorder which brought in all vice and miſchiefe to the common wealth) and ſo to reſtore the city of SPARTA againe to her former auncient honourable eſtate. Now this may be ſaid againe, for the gouernment of the GRACCHI: that the chiefeſt men of ROME euer were againſt their purpoſes. Where, in that that Agis attempted, and Cleomenes ended, they had the nobleſt ground that could be, and that was the ancient lawes and ordinances of SPARTA, touching temperance and equality: the firſt, inſtituted in old time by Lycurgus, the other confirmed by Apollo. Furthermore, by the alterations of the firſt, ROME became no greater then it was before. Where, by that which Cleomenes did, al GREECE in ſhort time ſaw that SPARTA commaunded all the reſt of PELOPONNESVS, and fought at that time againſt thoſe that were of greateſt power in all GREECE, for the ſigniory thereof. Whereby their onely marke and purpoſe was, to rid all GREECE from the warres of the GAVLES and ILLYRIANS, and to reſtore it againe to the honeſt gouernment of the race and line of Hercules. Their deaths, me thinkes, do ſhew great difference of their corages. For the GRACCHI fighting with their own Citizens, were ſlaine flying. Of theſe two alſo, Agis, becauſe he would put neuer a Citizen to death, was ſlaine in manner voluntarily: and Cleomenes receiuing iniury ſtood to his defence, and when he had no oportunity to doe it, he ſtoutly killed him ſelfe. And ſo may it be ſaid on the other ſide, that Agis did neuer any noble acte of a Captaine or ſouldier, becauſe hee was ſlaine before he could come to it. And for the victories of Cleomenes on the other ſide, may be oppoſed the ſcaling of the walles of CARTHAGE, where Tiberius was the firſt man that at the aſſault got vp vpon the wall, which was no ſmall exploit: and the peace which he made alſo at the ſiege of NVMANTIA, whereby he ſaued twenty thouſand fighting men of the ROMAINES, the which had no means otherwiſe to ſaue their liues. And Caius alſo in the ſelfe ſame warre, at the ſiege of NVMANTIA, and afterwardes in SARDINIA, did many noble feates of war: ſo that there is no doubt, but if they had not bene ſlaine ſo ſoone as they were, they might haue bene compared with the excellenteſt Captaines that euer were in ROME. Againe, touching their doings in ciuill policy, it appeareth that Agis dealt more ſlackly, being abuſed by Ageſilaus: who likewiſe deceiued the poore Citizens of the diuiſion of the lands which he had promiſed thẽ. In fine, for lacke of corage, becauſe he was very yong, he left the things vndone which he had purpoſed to haue performed. On the other ſide, Cleomenes went too roundly to worke to renue the ancient gouernment of the common wealth againe, by killing the Ephores with too much cruelty, whom he might eaſily haue wonne, or otherwiſe by force haue gotten the vpper hand. For it is not the part of a wiſe Phiſitian, nor of a good gouernour of a common wealth to vſe the ſword, but in great extremity, where there is no other helpe nor remedy: and there lacked iudgement in them both, but worſt of all in the one, for iniury is euer ioyned with cruelty. The GRACCHI on the other ſide, neither the one nor the other, began to imbrue their handes in the bloud of their Citizens. For it is reported, that though they did hurt Caius, yet he would neuer defend him ſelfe: and where it was knowen that he was very valiant in battell with his ſword in his hand againſt the enemy, he ſhewed him ſelfe as could againe in the vprore againſt his Citizens. For he went out of his houſe vnarmed, and fled when he ſaw them fight: being more circumſpect not to doe hurt, then not to ſuffer any. Therefore they are not to be thought cowards for their flying, but rather men fearfull to offend any man. For they were driuen, either to yeeld to them that followed them, or els if they ſtayd, to ſtand to their defence, becauſe they might keepe them ſelues from hurt. And where they accuſe Tiberius for the faults he committed, the greateſt that euer he did, was whẽ he depoſed Octauius his colleague from the Tribuneſhip, and that he him ſelfe made ſute for the ſecond. And as for Caius, they falſely accuſed him for the death of Antilius the Sergeant, who indeed was ſlaine vnknown to him, & to his great griefe. Where Cleomenes on the other ſide, although we ſhould forget the murther he committed vpon the Ephores, yet he ſet ſlaues at libertie, and ruled the kingdom in manner himſelfe alone: but yet for manners ſake onely he ioyned his owne brother with him, which was of the ſelfeſame houſe. And when he had perſwaded Archidamus, (who was next heire to the kingdom of the other royall houſe) to be bolde to returne home from Messena vnto Sparta: he ſuffred him to be ſlaine, and becauſe he did not reuenge his death, he did confirme their opinion that thought he was conſenting to his death. Lycurgus on the other ſide, whoſe example he did counterfeate to follow, becauſe he did willingly reſigne the kingdome vnto his brothers ſonne Charilaus, and being afraid alſo, that if the yong childe ſhould chaunce to miſcarie, they would ſuſpect him for his death: he exiled himſelfe out of his own country a long time trauelling vp and downe, and returned not to Sparta again, before Charilaus had gotten a ſonne to ſucceed him in his kingdome. But we can not ſet another Grecian by Lycurgus comparable vnto him. We haue declared alſo that amongeſt Cleomenes deeds, there were many other greater alterations then theſe, and alſo many other breaches of the law. So they that doe condemne the manners of the one and the other, ſaye, that the two Grecians from the beginning had an aſpiring minde to be tirants, ſtill practiſing warres. Whereas the two Romains onely, euen by their moſt mortall enemies, could be blamed for nothing els, but for an extreame ambition, and did confeſſe that they were too earneſt and vehement aboue their nature, in any ſtrife or contention they had with their aduerſaries, and that they yeelded vnto that choller & paſſion, as vnto ill windes, which brought them to doe thoſe things they did in the ende. For what more iuſt or honeſt intent could they haue had, then the firſt was: had not the rich men (euen through ſtoutneſſe and authoritie to ouerthrowe the lawes) brought them againſt their wils into quarrell: the one to ſaue his life, the other to reuenge his brothers death, who was ſlaine without order, iuſtice, or the authoritie of any officer? Thus thou maieſt thy ſelfe ſee the difference that was betwixt the Grecians and the Romaines: and now to tell you plainly my opinion of both, I thinke that Tiberius was the ſtouteſt of the foure, that the young king Agis offended leaſt, and that for boldnes and courage, Caius came nothing neere vnto Cleomenes.

THE LIFE OF Demoſthenes.

DEMOSTENES

HE that made the litle booke of the praiſe of Alcibiades, touching the victory he wanne at the horſe race of the Olympian games, (were it the Poet Euripides as ſome thinke, or any other) my friend Soſsius: ſaid, that to make a man happy, he muſt of neceſſitie be borne in ſome famous citie. But to tell you what I thinke hereof, doubtles, true happines chiefly conſiſteth in the vertue and qualities of the mind, being a matter of no moment, whether a man be borne in a pelting village, or in a famous citie: no more then it is for one to be borne of a faire or foule mother. For it were a madnes to thinke that the litle village of IVLIDE, being the leaſt part of the Ile of CEO (the whole Ilande of it ſelfe being but a ſmall thing) and that the Ile of ÆGINA (which is of ſo ſmall a length, that a certaine ATHENIAN on a time made a motion it might be taken away, becauſe it was but as a ſtraw in the ſight of the hauen of Piræa) could bring forth famous Poets, and excellent Comedians: and not breede an honeſt, iuſt, and wiſe man, and of noble corage. For, as we haue reaſon to thinke that artes and ſciences which were firſt deuiſed and inuented to make ſome things neceſſary for mens vſe, or otherwiſe to winne fame and credit, are drowned, and caſt away in litle poore villages: So are we to iudge alſo, that vertue, like a ſtrong and fruitefull plant, can take roote, and bring forth in euery place, where it is graffed in a good nature, and gentle perſon, that can patiently away with paines. And therefore if we chaunce to offend, and liue not as we ſhould: we can not accuſe the meanenes of our country where we were borne, but we muſt iuſtly accuſe our ſelues. Surely he that hath taken vpon him to put forth any worke, or to write any hiſtory, into the which he is to thruſt many ſtrange things vnknown to his country, and which are not ready at his hand to be had, and diſperſed abroad in diuerſe places, and are to be gathered out of diuers bookes and authorities: firſt of all, he muſt needes remaine in ſome great and famous city throughly inhabited, where men doe delight in good and vertuous things, becauſe there are commonly plenty of all ſortes of bookes: and that peruſing them, and hearing talke alſo of many things beſides, which other Hiſtoriographers peraduenture haue not written of, and which will cary ſo much more credit, becauſe men that are aliue may preſently ſpeake of them as of their owne knowledge, whereby he may make his worke perfect in euery point, hauing many and diuers neceſſary things contained in it. But I my ſelfe that dwell in a poore litle towne towne, and yet do remaine there willingly leaſt it ſhould become leſſe: whileſt I was in ITALY, and at ROME, I had no leaſure to ſtudy and exerciſe the latine tongue, aſwell for the great buſines I had then to doe, as alſo to ſatiſfie them that came to learne Philoſophie of me: ſo that euen ſomewhat too late and now in my latter time, I began to take my Latine bookes in my hand. And thereby a ſtrange thing to tell you, but yet true: I learned not nor vnderſtood matters ſo much by the words, as I came to vnderſtand the words, by common experience & knowledge I had in things. But furthermore, to knowe howe to pronounce the Latine tongue well, or to ſpeake it readily, or to vnderſtand the ſignification, tranſlations, and fine ioyning of the ſimple words one with another, which do beautifie & ſet forth the tongue: ſurely I iudge it to be a maruellous pleaſant and ſweet thing, but withall, it requireth a long and laborſome ſtudy, meet for thoſe that haue better leiſure then I haue, & that haue young yeares on their backes to follow ſuch pleaſure. Therfore, in this preſent book, which is the fifth of this worke, where I haue taken vpon me to compare the liues of noble men one with another: vndertaking to write the liues of Demoſthenes and Cicero, we will conſider and examine their nature, manners and conditions, by their acts and deedes in the gouernment of the common wealth, not meaning otherwiſe to conferre their workes and writings of eloquence, neither to define which of them two were ſharper or ſweeter in his oration. For as the Poet Ion ſayeth,

In this behalfe a man may rightly ſay,

Demoſthenes compared with Cicero.

The which Cæcilius litle vnderſtanding, being a man very raſh in all his doings, hath vnaduiſedly written and ſet foorth in print, a compariſon of Demoſthenes eloquence with Ciceroes. But if it were an eaſie matter for euery man to know himſelfe, then the goddes needed haue giuen vs no commandement, neither could men haue ſaid that it came from heauen. But for my opinion, methinkes fortune euen from the beginning hath framed in maner one ſelfe mould of Demoſthenes and Cicero, and hath in their natures faſhioned many of their qualities one like to the other: as, both of them to be ambitions, both of them to loue the libertie of their countrie, and both of them very fearefull in any danger of wars. And likewiſe their fortunes ſeeme to me, to be both much alike. For it is hard to finde two Orators againe, that being ſo meanely borne as they, haue come to be of ſo great power and authoritie as they two, nor that haue deſerued the ill will of kings & noble men ſo much as they haue done, nor that haue loſt their daughters, nor that haue beene baniſhed their countries, and that haue beene reſtored againe with honor, and that againe haue fled, and haue bene taken againe, nor that haue ended their liues with the libertie of their countrie. So that it is hard to be iudged, whether nature haue made them liker in maners, or fortune in their doings, as if they had both like cunning workmaiſters ſtriued one with the other, to whom they ſhould make them beſt reſemble. But firſt of all we muſt write of the elder of them two.

Demoſthenes why he was called Battalus

Demoſthenes the father of this Orator Demoſthenes, was as Theopompus writeth, one of the chiefe men of the city, and they called him Macharopœus, to weete, a maker of ſword blades, becauſe he had a great ſhoppe where he kept a number of ſlaues to forge them. But touching Æſchines, the Orators report of his mother, who ſaid that ſhe was the Daughter of one Gelon (that fled from ATHENS being accuſed of treaſon) and of a barbarous woman that was her mother: I am not able to ſay whether it be true, or deuiſed of malice to do him deſpite. Howſoeuer it was, it is true that his father died, leauing him ſeauen yeare olde, and left him reaſonable well: for his goods came to litle leſſe then the value of fifteene talents. Howbeit his gardians did him great wrong: for they ſtale a great part of his goods them ſelues, and did let the reſt runne to naught, as hauing litle care of it, for they would not pay his ſchoolemaiſters their wages. And this was the cauſe that he did not learne the liberall ſciences which are vſually taught vnto honeſt mens ſonnes: and to further that want alſo, he was but a weakling, and very tender, and therefore his mother would not much let him goe to ſchoole, neither his maiſters alſo durſt keepe him too hard to it, becauſe he was but a ſickly childe at the firſt, and very weake. And it is reported alſo, that the ſurname of Battalus was giuen him in mockery by other ſchoole boyes his companions, becauſe of his weakenes of body. This Battalus (as diuers men doe report) was an effeminate player on the flute, againſt whom the Poet Antiphanes to mocke him, deuiſed a litle play. Others alſo doe write of one Battalus, a diſſolute Orator, and that wrote laſciuious verſes: and it ſeemeth that the ATHENIANS at that time did call a certaine part of mans body vncomly to be named, Battalus. Now for Argas (which ſurname men ſay was alſo giuen him) he was ſo called, either for his rude and beaſtly maners (becauſe ſome Poets doe call a ſnake Argas) or elſe for his maner of ſpeech: which was very vnpleaſant to the eare, for Argas is the name of a Poet that made alwayes bawdy and ilfauored ſongs. But hereof enough as Plato ſaid. Futthermore, the occaſion (as it is reported) that moued him to giue himſelfe to eloquence, was this. Calliſtratus the Orator was to defend the cauſe of one Oropus before the iudges, and euery man longed greatly for this day of pleading, both for the excellencie of the Orator, that then bare the bell for eloquence: as for the matter, and his accuſation, which was manifeſtly knowen to all. Demoſthenes hearing his ſchoolemaſters agree together to goe to the hearing of this matter, he praied his ſchoolemaſter to be ſo good, as to let him goe with him. His Maiſter graunted him, and being acquainted with the keepers of the hall dore where this matter was to be pleaded, he ſo intreated thẽ, that they placed their ſcholler in a very good place, where being ſet at his eaſe, he might both heare and ſee all that was done, and no man could ſee him. Thereupon when Demoſthenes had heard the caſe pleaded, he was greatly in loue with the honor which the Orator had gotten, when he ſaw how he was waited vpon home with ſuch a traine of people after him: but yet he wondred more at the force of his great eloquence, that could ſo turne and conuey all things at his pleaſure. Thereuppon he left the ſtudie of all other ſciences, and all other exerciſes of witte and bodie, which other children are brought vp in: and beganne to labor continually, and to frame him ſelfe to make orations, with intent one day to be an Orator among the reſt. His maiſter that taught him Rethoricke was Iſæus, notwithſtanding that Iſocrates alſo kept a ſchoole of Rethoricke at that time: either becauſe that being an orphane he was not able to pay the wages that Iſocrates demaunded of his ſchollers, which was ten Minas: or rather for that he founde Iſæus manner of ſpeech more proper for the vſe of the eloquence he deſired, becauſe it was more fine, & ſubtill. Yet Hermippus writeth notwithſtanding, that he had read certain books, hauing no name of any author, which declared that Demoſthenes had bene Platoes ſcholler, & that by hearing of him, he learned to frame his pronunciation and eloquence. And he writeth alſo of one Cteſibius, who reporteth that Demoſthenes had ſecretly read Iſocrates workes of Rethoricke, and alſo Alcidamus bookes, by meanes of one Callias SYRACVSAN, and others. Wherefore when he came out of his wardeſhippe, he beganne to put his gardians in ſute, and to write orations and pleas againſt them: who in contrarie manner did euer vſe delayes and excuſes, to ſaue themſelues from giuing vp any account vnto him, of his goods and patrimony left him. And thus, following this exerciſe (as Thucydides writeth) it proſpered ſo well with him, that in the end he obtained it, but not without great paines and daunger: and yet with all that he could doe, he could not recouer all that his father left him, by a good deale. So hauing now gotten ſome boldnes, and being vſed alſo to ſpeake in open preſence, and withall, hauing a feeling and delight of the eſtimation that is wonne by eloquence in pleading: afterwards he attempted to put forward him ſelfe, and to practiſe in matters of ſtate. For, as there goeth a tale of one Laomedon an ORCHOMENIAN, who hauing a grieuous pain in the ſplene, by aduiſe of the Phiſitions was willed to runne long courſes to helpe him: and that following their order, he became in the end ſo luſty & nimble of body, that afterwardes he would needes make one to runne for games, & in deed grew to be the ſwifteſt runner of all men in his time. Euen ſo the like chaunced vnto Demoſthenes. For at the firſt, beginning to practiſe oratory for recouery of his goods, and thereby hauing gotten good ſkill and knowledge how to pleade: he afterwards tooke vppon him to ſpeake to the people in aſſemblies, touching the gouernment of the common wealth, euen as if he ſhould haue contended for ſome game of price, and at length did excell all the Orators at that time that got vp into the pulpit for orations: notwithſtanding that when he firſt ventred to ſpeake openly, the people made ſuch a noiſe, that he could ſcant be heard, and beſides they mocked him for his manner of ſpeach that was ſo ſtraunge, becauſe he vſed ſo many long confuſed periods, and his matter he ſpake of was ſo intricate with arguments one vppon an other, that they were tedious, and made men weary to heare him. And furthermore, he had a very ſoft voice, an impediment in his tongue, and had alſo a ſhort breath, the which made that men could not well vnderſtand what he ment, for his long periods in his oration were often times interrupted, before he was at the end of his ſentence. So that at length perceiuing he was thus reiected, he gaue ouer to ſpeake any more before the people, and halfe in deſpaire withdrewe himſelfe into the hauen of Pirea. There Eunomus the THESSALIAN being a very olde man, found him, and ſharply reproued him, and tolde him, that he did himſelfe great wrong, conſidering, that hauing a manner of ſpeeche much like vnto Pericles, he drowned himſelfe by his faint hart, becauſe he did not ſeeke the waye to be bold againſt the noiſe of the common people, and to arme his bodie to away with the paines and burthen of publike orations, but ſuffering it to growe feebler, for lacke of vſe and practiſe. Furthermore, being once againe repulſed and whiſtled at, as he returned home, hanging downe his heade for ſhame, and vtterly diſcouraged: Satyrus an excellent player of comedies being his familiar friend, followed him, and went and ſpake with him. Demoſthenes made his complaint vnto him, that where he had taken more paines then all the Orators beſides, and had almoſt euen worne himſelfe to the bones with ſtudie, yet he coulde by no meanes deuiſe to pleaſe the people: whereas other Orators that did nothing but bibbe all day long, and marriners that vnderſtood nothing, were quietly heard, and continually occupied the pulpit with orations: and on the other ſide that they made no account of him. Satyrus then aunſwered him, thou ſaieſt true Demoſthenes, but care not for this, I will helpe it ſtraight, and take away the cauſe of all this: ſo thou wilt but tell me without booke certaine verſes of Euripides, or of Sophocles. Thereuppon Demoſthenes preſently rehearſed ſome vnto him, that came into his minde. Satyrus repeating them after him, gaue them quite an other grace, with ſuch a pronunciation, comely geſture, and modeſt countenance becomming the verſes, that Demoſthenes thought them cleane chaunged. Whereby perceiuing how much the action (to wit, the comely manner and geſture in his oration) doth giue grace and comlines in his pleading: he then thought it but a trifle, and almoſt nothing to ſpeake of, to exerciſe to pleade well, vnleſſe therewithall he doe alſo ſtudie to haue a good pronunciation and geſture. Thereupon he built him a celler vnder the ground, the which was whole euen in my time, & he would daily go downe into it, to faſhion his geſture and pronunciation, and alſo to exerciſe his voice, and that with ſuch earneſt affection, that oftentimes he would be there two or three monethes one after another, and did ſhaue his head of purpoſe, becauſe he durſt not goe abroad in that ſort, although his will was good. And yet he tooke his theame and matter to declame vpon, and to practiſe to pleade of the matters he had had in hand before, or elſe vpon occaſion of ſuch talke as he had with them that came to ſee him, while he kept his houſe. For they were no ſooner gone from him, but he went downe into his celler, & repeated from the firſt to the laſt all matters that had paſſed betwene him and his friendes in talke together, and alleaged alſo both his owne and their aunſwers. And if peraduenture he had beene at the hearing of any long matter, he would repeate it by him ſelfe: and would finely couche and conuey it into propper ſentences, and thus chaunge and alter euery way any matter that hee had heard, or talked with others. Thereof came the opinion men had of him, that he had no very quicke capacity by nature, and that his eloquence was not naturall, but artificially gotten with extreame labor. And for proofe hereof, they make this probable reaſon. That they neuer ſaw Demoſthenes make any oration on the ſodaine, and that oftentimes when he was ſette in the aſſembly, the people would call him by his name, to ſay his opinion touching the matter of counſell then in hand: Howbeit that he neuer roſe vpon their call, vnles he had firſt ſtudied the matter well he would ſpeake of. So that all the other Orators would many times giue him a taunt for it: as Pytheas among other, that taunting him on a time, tolde him, his reaſons ſmelled of the lampe. Yea, replied Demoſthenes ſharply againe: ſo is there great difference, Pytheas, betwixt thy labour and mine by lampelight. And him ſelfe alſo ſpeaking to others, did not altogether deny it, but told them plainly, that he did not alwaies write at length all that he would ſpeake, neither did he alſo offer to ſpeake, before he had made briefes of that he would ſpeake. He ſayd furthermore, that it was a token the man loued the people well, that he would be carefull before what he would ſay to them. For this preparatiue (ꝗ he) doth ſhew that he

doth honor and reuerence them. In contrary manner alſo, he that paſſeth not how the people take his words, it is a plaine token that he deſpiſeth their authoritie, & that he lacketh no good will (if he could) to vſe force againſt them, rather then reaſon and perſwaſion. But yet further to enlarge the proofes, that Demoſthenes had no hart to make any oration on the ſodaine, they doe alleage this reaſon: that Demades many times roſe vpon the ſodaine to maintaine Demoſthenes reaſons, when the people otherwhile did reiect him: and that Demoſthenes on the other ſide, did neuer riſe to make Demades words good, which he had ſpoken in his behalf. But now might a man aske again: if Demoſthenes was ſo timerous to ſpeake before the people vpon the ſodaine: what ment Aeſchines then to ſay, that he was maruellous bold in his words: and how chaunceth it, that he riſing vpon the ſodaine, did preſently anſwer the Orator Python Bizantine in the field, that was very luſty in ſpeech, (& rough like a vehement running ſtreame) againſt the Athenians: and how chanced it that Lamachus Myrrhenian, hauing made an oration in the praiſe of Philip & Alexander, kings of Macedon, in the which he ſpake all the ill he could of the Thebans, & of the Olynthians, and when he had read & pronounced it in the open aſſembly of the Olympian games: Demoſthenes vpon the inſtant riſing vp on his feete, declared, as if he had read ſome hiſtorie, & pointed as it were with his finger vnto all the whole aſſembly, the notable great ſeruice & worthy deeds the which the Chalcidians had done in former times, for the benefit & honor of Grece? And in contrary maner alſo, what miſchiefe and inconuenience came by meanes of the flatterers that altogether gaue themſelues to currie fauor with the Macedonians? With theſe and ſuch like perſwaſions, Demoſthenes made ſuch ſturre amongſt the people, that the Orator Lamachus being affraide of the ſodaine vprore, did ſecretly conuey himſelfe out of the aſſembly. But yet to tell you what I thinke, Demoſthenes in my opinion faſhioning himſelfe euen from the beginning, to followe Pericles ſteppes and example, he thought that for other qualities he had, they were not ſo requiſite for him, and that he would counterfaite his grauitie and ſober countenance, and to be wiſe, not to ſpeake ouer lightly to euery matter at all aduentures: Iudging, that by that manner of wiſedome he came to be great. And like as he would not let ſlippe any good occaſion to ſpeake, where it might be for his credit: ſo would he not likewiſe ouer raſhly hazard his credite and reputation to the mercie of fortune. And to proue this true, the orations which he made vpon the ſodaine without premeditation before, doe ſhew more boldneſſe and courage, then thoſe which he had written, and ſtudied long before: if we may beleeue the reports of Eratoſthenes, Demetrius Phalerian, and of the other comicall Poets. For Eratoſthenes ſaid, that he would be often caried away with choller and furie. Demetrius alſo ſaith, that ſpeaking one day to the people, he ſware a great othe in ryme, as if he had bene poſſeſſed with ſome diuine ſpirite, and ſaid,

By ſea and land, by riuers, ſprings, and pondes.

There are alſo certaine comicall Poets that do call him Ropoperperethra, as who would ſay, a great babbler that ſpeaketh all things, that commeth to his tongues end. An other mocked him for too much affecting a figure of Rethoricke called, Antitheton: which is, oppoſition, with ſaying, Sic recepit ſicut cepit, (which ſignifieth, he tooke it as he found it.) In the vſe of this figure Demoſthenes much pleaſed him ſelfe, vnleſſe the poet Antiphanes ſpeaketh it of pleaſure, deriding the counſel he gaue the people, not to take the Ile of Halonesus of king Philip, as of gift: but to receiue it as their owne reſtored. And yet euery body did grant, that Demades of his owne naturall wit, without arte, was inuincible: and that many times ſpeaking vpon the ſodaine, he did vtterly ouerthrow Demoſthenes long ſtudied reaſons. And Ariſto, of the Ile of Chio, hath written Theophraſtus iudgement of the Orators at that time. Who being asked what maner of Orator he thought Demoſthenes: he anſwered, worthy of this city. Then again, how he thought of Demades: aboue this city, ſaid he. The ſame Philoſopher writeth alſo, that Polyeuctus Sphettian, (one of thoſe that practiſed at that time in the common wealth) gaue this ſentence: that Demoſthenes in deede was a great Orator, but Phocions tongue had a ſharper vnderſtanding, becauſe in few wordes, he comprehended much matter. And to this purpoſe, they ſay that Demoſthenes him ſelfe ſaid alſo, that as oft as he ſaw Phocion get vp into the pulpit for orations to ſpeake againſt him, he was wont to ſay to his friends: ſee, the axe of my words riſeth. And yet it is hard to iudge, whether he ſpake that in reſpect of his tongue, or rather for the eſtimation he had gotten, becauſe of his great wiſdome: thinking (as indeede it is true) that one word only, the twinckling of an eye, or a nod of his head of ſuch a man (that through his worthines is attained to that credit) hath more force to perſuade, then all the fine reaſons & deuiſes of Rethoricke. But now for his bodily defects of nature, Demetrius PHALERIAN writeth, that he heard Demoſthenes himſelfe ſay, being very olde, that he did helpe them by theſe meanes. Firſt touching the ſtammering of his tongue, which was very fat, and made him that he could not pronounce all ſyllables diſtinctly: he did helpe it by putting of litle pibble ſtones into his mouth, which he found vpon the ſands by the riuers ſide, & ſo pronoūced with open mouth the orations he had without booke. And for his ſmal and ſoft voice, he made that louder, by running vp ſteep and high hils, vttering euen with full breath ſome orations or verſes that he had without book. And further it is reported of him, that he had a great looking glaſſe in his houſe, and euer ſtanding on his feet before it, he would learne and excerciſe himſelfe to pronounce his orations. For proofe hereof it is reported, that there came a man vnto him on a time, and prayed his helpe to defend his cauſe, and tolde him that one had beaten him: and that Demoſthenes ſayd againe vnto him, I doe not beleeue this is true thou telleſt me, for ſurely the other did neuer beate thee. The plaintiſe then thruſting out his voice aloude, ſayed what, hath he not beaten me? yes indeed quoth Demoſthenes then: I beleue it now, for I heare the voice of a man that was beaten indeede. Thus he thought that the ſounde of the voyce, the pronunciation or geſture in one ſorte or other, were things of force to beleeue or diſcredit that a man ſayeth. His countenaunce when he pleaded before the people, did maruellouſly pleaſe the common ſorte: but the noble men, and men of vnderſtanding, found it too baſe and meane, as Demetrius Phalerius ſayed, amongſt others. And Hermippus writeth that one called AEſion, being asked of the ancient Orators, and of thoſe of his time, anſwered: that euery man that had ſeene them, would haue wondred with what honor, reuerence and modeſtie, they ſpake vnto the people: howbeit that Demoſthenes orations (whoſoeuer read them) were too artificiall and vehement. And therfore we may eaſily iudge, that the orations Demoſthenes wrote are very ſeuere and ſharpe. This notwithſtanding, otherwhiles he would giue many pleaſant and witty anſwers vpon the ſodaine. As when Demades one day ſayd vnto him, Demoſthenes will teach me: after the common prouerbe, the ſow will teach Minerua. He aunſwered ſtraight againe. This Minerua not long ſince was in Collitus ſtreete, taken in adulterie. A certein theefe alſo called Chalcus (as much to ſay, as of copper) ſtepping foorth to ſay ſomewhat of Demoſthenes late ſitting vp a nights, and that he wrote and ſtudied the moſt part of the night by lampe light: in deede, quoth Demoſthenes, I know it grieues thee to ſee my lampe burne all night. And therfore you my Lords of ATHENS, me thinkes you ſhould not wonder to ſee ſuch robberies in your citie, conſidering we haue theeues of copper, and the walles of our houſes be but of claye. We could tell you of diuerſe others of his like pleaſant and wittie aunſwers, but theſe may ſuffice for this preſent: and therfore we will proceede to conſider further of his nature and conditions, by his actes and deedes in the affayres of the common wealth. Now Demoſthenes firſt beginning whē he came to deale in the affaires of the ſtate, was in the time of the warre made with the PHOCIANS, as himſelfe reporteth: and as appeareth further in his orations which he made againſt Philip: of the which, the laſt were made after the warre was ended, and the firſt doe touch alſo ſome particular doings of the ſame. He made the oration againſt Midias, when he was but 32 yeare old, and was of ſmall countenance & reputation in the common wealth: the want whereof was the chiefeſt cauſe (as I thinke) that induced him to take money for the iniurie he had done him, & to let his action fall againſt him.

But, knowing that it was no ſmall enterpriſe, nor that could take effect by a man of ſo ſmall power & authoritie as himſelfe, to ouerthrow a man ſo wealthy, ſo befriended, and ſo eloquent as Midias: he therfore yeelded himſelf vnto thoſe that did ſpeake and intreat for him. Neither do I thinke that the three thouſand Drachmas which he receiued, could haue brideled the bitternes of his nature, if other wiſe he had ſeene any hope or likelihood that he could haue prerailled againſt him. Now at his firſt cōming vnto the cōmon wealth, taking a noble matter in hand to ſpeak againſt Philip, for the defence & maintenāce of the lawes & liberties of the GRECIANS, wherein he handled himſelfe ſo worthely: that in ſhort ſpace he wan him maruellous fame for his great eloquence and plaine manner of ſpeech. Thereby he was maruellouſly honored alſo through all GREECE, and greatly eſteemed with the king of PERSIA: & Philip him ſelfe made more account of him, then of all the Orators in ATHENS, & his greateſt foes which were moſt againſt him, were driuen to confeſſe that they had to doe with a famous man. For, in the orations which Aeſchines & Hyperides made to accuſe him, they write thus of him. And therfore I maruell what Theopompus ment, when he wrote that Demoſthenes had a ſubtill vnconſtant mind, & could not long continue with one kind of men, nor in one mind for matters of ſtate. For in contrarie maner, in my iudgement he continued conſtant ſtill to the end, in one ſelfe maner & order, vnto the which he had betaken himſelf at the beginning: & that not onely he neuer changed all his life time, but to the contrarie he loſt his life, becauſe he would be no chaungling. For he did not like Demades, who to excuſe himſelf for that he had oft turned coate in matters of gouernment, ſaid that he went often times againſt his own ſayings, as matters fell out: but neuer againſt the benefit of the cōmon wealth. And Melanopus alſo, who was euer againſt Challiſtratus, hauing his mouth many times ſtopped with money, he would vp to the pulpit for orations, & tell the people, that indeed Calliſtratus, which maintaineth the contrary opinion againſt me, is my enemy, & yet I yeeld vnto him for this time: for, the benefit of the cōmon wealth muſt cary it. And another alſo, Nicodemus MESSENIAN, who being firſt of Caſſanders ſide, tooke part afterward with Demetrius, & then ſaid, that he did not ſpeak againſt himſelfe, but that it was meete he ſhould obey his ſuperiors. They cannot detect Demoſthenes with the like, that he did euer halt or yeeld, either in word or deed. For he euer continued firm and conſtant in one mind in his orations. Inſomuch that Panætius the Philoſopher ſaith, that the moſt part of all his orations are grounded vpon this maxime and principle: that for it ſelfe, nothing is to be taken or accepted, but that which is honeſt. As, the oration of the crowne, the which he made againſt Ariſtocrates: that alſo which he made for the franches and freedom: and in fine, all his orations againſt Philip of MACEDON. And in al thoſe he doth not perſwade his conntriemen to take that which is moſt pleaſant, eaſieſt, or moſt profitable: but he proueth that often times honeſtie is to be preferred aboue ſafetie or health. So that, had he in all his orations and doings, ioyned to his honeſtie, courteſie, and francke ſpeech, valiantnes in warres, and cleane hands from briberie: he might deſeruedly haue bene compared, not with Myrocles, Polyeuctus, Hyperides & ſuch other Orators: but euen with the higheſt, with Cimon, Thucidides, and Pericles. For Phocion, who tooke the worſt way in gouernment of the cōmon wealth, becauſe he was ſuſpected that he took part with the MACEDONIANS: yet for valiantnes, wiſdom & iuſtice, he was euer thought as honeſt a man, as Ephialtes, and Ariſtides. But Demoſthenes on the other ſide (as Demetrius ſayth) was no man to truſt to for wars, neither had he any power to refuſe giftes and bribes. For though he would neuer be corrupted with Philip king of MACEDON, yet he was bribed with gold & ſiluer that was brought from the cities of SVSA & ECBATANA, and was very readie to praiſe & commend the deeds of their anceſtors, but not to follow them. Truly, yet was he the honeſteſt man of all other Orators in his time, excepting Phocion. And beſides he did euer ſpeake more boldly and plainely vnto the people then any man elſe, and would openly contrary their mindes, and ſharply reproue the ATHENIANS for their faultes, as appeareth by his orations. Theopompus alſo writeth, that the people on a time would haue had him to accuſe a man, whom they would needs haue condemned. But he refuſing to doe it, the people were offended, and did mutine againſt him Thereupon he riſing vp ſaid openly vnto them: my Lords ATHENIANS, I will alwaies counſell you to that which I thinke beſt for the benefit of the common wealth, although it be againſt your mindes: but falſely to accuſe one to ſatiſfie your mindes, though you command me, I will not do it. Furthermore, that which he did againſt Antiphō, ſheweth plainly, that he was no people pleaſer, and that he did leane more vnto the authoritie of the Senate. For when Antiphon was quit by the people in an aſſembly of the citie: Demoſthenes notwithſtanding took him and called him againe into the court of the Areopagites, and did not paſſe vpon the peoples ill will, but there conuinced him for promiſing Philip of MACEDON to burn the arſenall of ATHENS: ſo by ſentence of that court he was condemned, & ſuffred for it. He did alſo accuſe the Nunne Theorides for many leud parts committed, & amongſt others, for that ſhe taught ſlaues to deceiue their maſters: & ſo following the matter againſt her to death, ſhe was condemned, and executed. It is thought alſo, that he made the oration Apollodorus ſpake againſt the Prætor Timotheus, & proued therby that he was a debtor to the cōmon wealth, & ſo naughtie a man: & that he wrote thoſe orations alſo intituled to Formio & Stephanus, for the which he was iuſtly reproued. For Formio pleaded againſt Apollodorus with the oration which Demoſthenes ſelfe had made for him: which was euen alike, as if out of one ſelfe cutlers ſhoppe he had ſold his enemies ſwords one to kil another: and for his known orations, thoſe which he made againſt Androcion, Timocrates and Ariſtocrates: he cauſed them to giue them vnto others, when he had not yet dealt in matters of ſtate. For indeede when he did put them forth, he was not paſſing ſeuen or eight and twentie yeare old. The oration which he made againſt Ariſtogiton, and the other alſo of libertie, againſt Cteſippus the ſon of Chabrias, he ſpake them, as he ſaith himſelf, (or as others write) openly vnto the people, becauſe he intended to marrie Chabrias mother. Howbeit he did not, but maried a SAMIAN womã, as Demetrius Magneſius writeth in his book he made, intituled Synonyma, and in that he wrote againſt Aeſchines: where he accuſeth him that he dealt falſely when he was Ambaſſador. It is not knowen whether it was recited or not, although Idomeneus writeth, that there lacked but thirtie voices onely to haue quitte Aeſchines. But in this me thinkes he ſpake not truely, and doth but coniecture it, by that the one & the other haue ſaid in their orations againſt the crowne, in the which, neither the one nor the other doe ſaye preciſely, that this accuſation proceeded to iudgement. But let other that liſt decide this doubt. Now before the warre beganne, it was euident enough, to which part Demoſthenes would incline in the common wealth. For, he would neuer leaue to reproue and withſtand Philips doings. Therefore he being more ſpoken of in Philips Court, then any man elſe, he was ſent vnto him the tenth perſon with nine others in ambaſſade. Philippe gaue them all audience one after another: howbeit he was more carefull and circumſpect to anſwer Demoſthenes oration, then all the reſt. But otherwiſe out of that place, he did not Demoſthenes ſo much honor, nor gaue him ſo good entertainment, as to his other companions. For Philip ſhewed more kindnes, and gaue better countenance vnto Aeſchines, & Philocrates, then vnto him. Wherefore when they did highly praiſe Philip, and ſayd that he was a well ſpoken Prince, a faier man, and would drinke freely, and be pleaſant in company: Demoſthenes ſmiled at it, and turned all things to the worſt, ſaying, that thoſe qualities were nothing commendable nor meete for a king. For the firſt was a qualitie meete for a pleader, the ſecond for a woman, and the third for a ſponge. In fine, warres falling out betwene them, becauſe Philip of the one ſide could not liue in peace, & the ATHENIANS on the other ſide were ſtill incenſed & ſtirred vp by Demoſthenes daily orations. Wherupon the ATHENIANS firſt ſent into the Ile of EVBOEA, (the which by meanes of certen priuate tirants that had taken the townes, became ſubiect againe vnto Philip) following a decree Demoſthenes had preferred, & ſo went to expulſe the MACEDONIANS againe. After that alſo he cauſed them to ſend aide vnto the BIZANTINES, and to the PERINTHIANS, with whom Philip made war. For he ſo perſwaded the ATHENIANS, that he made them forget the malice they did beare vnto thoſe two nations, & the faults which either of both the cities had committed againſt them in the warres, touching the rebellion of their confederats: & he cauſed them to ſend them aide, which kept them from Philips force & power. Furthermore, going afterwards vnto all the great cities of GRECE as Ambaſſador, he did ſo ſolicite & perſwade them, that he brought them all in manner to be againſt Philip. So that the armie which their tribe ſhould find at their common charge, was fifteene thouſand footemen, all ſtrangers, and two thouſand horſemen, beſides the Cittizens of euery citie which ſhould alſo ſerue in the warres at their charge, and the money alſo leauied for the maintenance of this warre, was very willingly diſburſed. Theophraſtus writeth, that it was at that time their confederates did praye that they would ſet downe a certaine ſumme of money, what euery citie ſhoulde paye: and that Crobylus an Orator ſhoulde make aunſwer, that the warre had no certaine maintenance: inferring that the charges of warre was infinite. Now all GRECE being in armes, attending what ſhould happen, and all theſe people and cities being vnite in one league together: as the EVBOEIANS, the ATHENIANS, the CORINTHIANS, the MEGARIANS, the LEVCADIANS, & the CORCYRIÆIANS: the greateſt matter Demoſthenes had to do, was to perſwade the THEBANS alſo to enter into this league, becauſe their countrie confined and bordered with ATTICA, beſides their force and power was of great importance, for that they caried the fame of all GRECE at that time, for the valianteſt ſouldiers. But it was no trifling matter to win the THEBANS, and to make them breake with Philip, who but lately before had bound them vnto him by many great pleaſures which he had done to them, in the warre of the PHOCIANS: beſides alſo that betwixt ATHENS and THEBES, by reaſon of vicinitie, there fell out daily quarrels and debates, the which with euery litle thing were ſoone renued. This notwithſtanding Philip being proud of the victory he had wonne by the citie of AMPHISSE, when he came and inuaded the countrie of ELATIA, and was entred into PHOCIDE: the ATHENIANS were then ſo amaſed with it, that no man durſt occupie the pulpit for orations, neither could they tell what way to take. Thus the whole aſſembly ſtanding in a doubt with great ſilence, Demoſthenes only ſtept vp, and did againe giue them counſell to ſeeke to make league and alliance with the THEBANS: and ſo did further encourage the people, and put them in good hope, as he was alwaies wont to do. Then with others he was ſent ambaſſador into THEBES: & Philip alſo for his part, ſent ambaſſadors vnto the THEBANS, Amintas & Clearchus, two gentlemen MACEDONIANS, and with them, Daochus, Theſſalus and Thracydæus, to aunſwer and withſtand the perſwaſions of the ATHENIAN Ambaſſadors. Thereupon the THEBANS beganne to aduiſe themſelues for the beſt, and layed before their eyes the miſerable frutes and calamities of warre, their wounds being yet greene and vncured, which they got by the warres of PHOCIDE. Notwithſtanding, the great force of Demoſthenes eloquence (as Theopompus writeth) did ſo inflame the THEBANS courage with deſire of honor, that it trode vnder their feet all manner of conſiderations, and did ſo rauiſh them with the loue and deſire of honeſtie: that they caſt at their heeles, all feare of daunger, all remembrance of pleaſures receiued, and all reaſon perſwading the contrarie. This act of an Orator was of ſo great force, that Philip forthwith ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the GRECIANS, to intreat for peace, and all GRECE was vppe to ſee what would become of this ſturre. Thus, not onely the Captaines of ATHENS obeyed Demoſthenes, doing all that he commanded them: but the gouernors alſo of THEBES, & of all the countrie of BOEOTIA beſides. And the aſſemblies alſo of the councell of THEBES were as well gouerned by him, as the aſſemblies of ATHENS, being alike beloued both of the one and the other, and hauing a like authority to command both, and not vndeſeruedly, as Theopompus ſaith, but by iuſt deſert. But ſome fatall deſtinie, and the reuolution of times had determined the finall ende of the libertie of GRECE at that time, cleane contrarie to his purpoſe and intent. There were alſo many celeſtiall ſignes that did foreſhewe and prognoſticate what ende ſhould enſue thereof. And amongſt others, Apolloes Nunne gaue theſe dreadfull oracles: and this old prophecie of the SIBYLS was commonly ſong in euery bodies mouth.

Demoſthenes force of eloquence ioyned the Thebans with the Athenians and wan them from Philip king of Macedon.

For there the vanquiſht ſide ſhall weepe, and Conquerer ſhall dye.

Men doe report that this Thermodon is a litle riuer of our coũtrie of CHÆRONEA, which falleth into the riuer of Cephiſus: howbeit at this preſent time there is neuer a riuer nor brook in all our coũtrie, that I know called Thermodon. And I thinke, that that riuer which we call now Hæmon, was in old time Thermodõ: for it runneth by the temple of Hercules, where the GRECIANS lay in campe. And it may be, that becauſe it was filled with dead bodies, & that it ranne blood at the day of the battell, it changed her name & was ſurnamed Hæmon, becauſe Hæma in the Greeke tongue, ſignifieth blood. Yet Duris writeth notwithſtanding, that this Thermodon was no riuer, but that certaine men ſetting vp their tent, and trenching it about, found a litle image of ſtone, whereupon were engrauen theſe letters, whereby it appeareth that it was a man called Thermodon, who caried an AMAZON hart in his armes, & that for this

This notwithſtanding, it is very hard to tell the troth of theſe things. But Demoſthenes truſting to the valiantnes and power of the GRECIANS, and being maruellouſly incoraged to ſee ſuch a great number of valiant and reſolute men, ſo willing to fight with the enemie: he bad them be of good courage, and not to buz about ſuch oracles, and to giue eare to ſuch prophecies. And furthermore he tolde them plainely, that he did miſtruſt the Nunne Pythia did leane vnto Philip, as fauoring him, and did put the THEBANS in minde of their Captaine Epaminondas, and the ATHENIANS of Pericles, and perſwaded them, that thoſe two famous men were alwaies of opinion, that ſuch prophecies were no other, but a fine cloke for cowardes, and that taking no heed to them, they did diſpatch their matters according to their own diſcretion. Vntill this preſent time, Demoſthenes ſhewed himſelf alwaies an honeſt man. But when it came to the battell, he fled like a coward, and did no valiant acte any thing anſwerable to the orations whereby he had perſwaded the people. For he left his rancke, and cowardly caſt away his weapons to runne the lighter, and was not aſhamed at all, as Pythias ſaid, of the words written vpon his ſhield in golden letters, which were, Good fortune. Now Philip hauing wonne the battell, he was at that preſent ſo ioyfull, that he fell to commit many fond parts. For after he had druncke well with his friends, he went into the place where the ouerthrow was giuen, & there in mockery began to ſing the beginning of the decree which Demoſthenes had preferred, (by the which the ATHENIANS accordingly proclaimed warres againſt him) riſing and falling with his voice, and dancing it in meaſure with his foote:

Demoſthenes the ſonne of Demoſthenes Pæanian did put forth this.

But afterwards beginning to wax ſober, and leauing his drunckennes, and that he had remembred himſelf what danger he had bene in: then his hair ſtood bolt vpright vpon his head, conſidering the force and power of ſuch an orator, that in a peece of a day had inforced him to hazard his realme and life at a battell. Now Demoſthenes fame was ſo great, that it was caried euen to the great king of PERSIAES court, who wrote vnto his Lieutenants & gouernors, that they ſhould feed Demoſthenes with money, and ſhould procure to entertaine him aboue all the men in GRECE, as he that could beſt withdraw Philip & trouble him with the warres and tumults of GRECE. And this was afterwardes proued by letters found of Demoſthenes himſelfe, the which came to king Alexanders hands in the citie of SARDIS, & by other writings alſo of the gouernors and Lieutenants of the king of PERSIA: in the which were named directly the expreſſe ſummes of money which had bene ſent & giuen vnto him. Now the GRECIANS being thus ouerthrowen by battell, the other Orators, aduerſaries vnto Demoſthenes in the common wealth, began to ſet vpon him, & to prepare to accuſe him. But the people did not onely cleare him of all the accuſations obiected againſt him, but did continue to honor him more then before, and to call him to aſſemblies, as one that loued the honor & benefit of his coũtrie. So that when the bones of their countrymen which were ſlain at the battell of CHERONEA, were brought to be openly buried according to the cuſtom: the people gaue him the honor to make the funerall oration in praiſe of the dead, and made no ſhew of ſorrowe or griefe for the loſſe they had receiued: (as Theopompus witneſſeth, and doth nobly declare) but rather in contrary manner ſhewed that they did not repent them in following of his counſel, but did honor him that gaue it. Demoſthenes then did make the funerall oration. But afterwards in all the decrees he preferred to the people, he would neuer ſubſcribe any, to preuent the ſiniſter lucke and misfortune of his name, but did paſſe it vnder his friends names one after another, vntill he grew couragious againe, ſhortly after that he vnderſtood of the death of Philip, who was ſlain immediatly after the victorie he wanne at CHÆRONEA. And it ſeemeth this was the meaning of the prophecie or oracle in the two laſt verſes:

Demoſthenes praiſeth them that were ſlain at the battell of Chæronea.

The death of Philip king of Macedon.

The vanquiſhed bewailes his luckleſſe lot,
And he that winnes, with life eſcapeth not.

Now Demoſthenes hearing of Philips death, before the newes were openly known, to preuẽt them, he would put the people againe into a good hope of better luck to come. Thereupon he went with a cheerfull countenance into the aſſembly of the councell, and told them there, that he had a certaine dreame that promiſed great good hap, & that out of hand vnto the Athenians: and immediatly after, the meſſengers arriued that brought certaine newes of king Philips death. Therupon the Athenians made ſacrifices of ioy to the gods for this happy newes, & appointed a crowne vnto Pauſanias that had ſlaine him. Demoſthenes alſo came abroade in his beſt gowne, and crowned with flowers, ſeauen daies after the death of his daughter, as Aeſchines reporteth: who reproueth him for it, and noteth him to be a man hauing litle loue or charitie vnto his owne children. But indeed Aeſchines ſelfe deſerueth more blame, to haue ſuch a tender womaniſh hart, as to beleeue, that weeping and lamenting, are ſignes of a gentle and charitable nature, condemning them that with patience and conſtancie doe paſſe awaye ſuch misfortunes. But now to the Athenians againe. I can neither thinke nor ſay that they did wiſely to ſhew ſuch open ſignes of ioy as to weare crownes & garlands vpon their heads, nor alſo to ſacrifice vnto the gods for the death of a Prince, that behaued himſelfe ſo Princely and curteouſly vnto them in the victories he had won of them. For though indeed all cruelty be ſubiect to the reuenge of the gods, yet is this an act of a vile and baſe minde, to honor a man, and while he liued to make him free of their citie, and now that another hath ſlain him, they to be in ſuch an exceeding iolitie withall, and to exceede the bonds of modeſtie ſo farre, as to rampe in manner with both their feete vpon the dead, and to ſing ſongs of victorie, as if they themſelues had bene the men that had valiantly ſlaine him. In contrary manner alſo, I praiſe and commend the conſtancy and courage of Demoſthenes, that he leauing the teares and lamentation of his home trouble vnto women, did himſelf in the meane time that he thought was for the benefit of the common wealth: and in my opinion, I thinke he did therein like a man of courage, and worthy to be a gouernor of a common wealth, neuer to ſtoop nor yeeld, but alwaies to be found ſtable and conſtant, for the benefit of the common wealth, reiecting all his troubles, cares, and affections, in reſpect of the ſeruice of his countrie, and to keepe his honor much more carefully, then common players vſe to doe, when they play the partes of Kings and Princes, whom we ſee neither weepe nor laugh when they liſt, though they be on the ſtage: but when the matter of the play falleth out to giue them iuſt occaſion. But omitting thoſe reaſones, if there be no reaſon (as indeede there is not) to leaue and forſake a man in his ſorrow and trouble, without giuing him ſome wordes of comfort, and rather to deuiſe ſome matter to aſſwage his ſorrowe, and to withdraw his minde from that, to thinke vpon ſome pleaſanter things: euen as they ſhould keepe ſore eyes from ſeing bright and glaring colours, in offring them greene and darker. And from whence can a man take greater comfort for his troubles and griefes at home, when the common wealth doth well: then to ioyne their priuate griefes with common ioyes, to the end that the better may obſcure and take away the worſe? But thus farre I digreſſed from my hiſtorie, enlarging this matter, becauſe Aeſchines in his oration touching this matter, did moue the peoples hartes too much vnto womaniſh ſorrow. But now to the reſt. The cities of Grece being againe ſtirred vp by Demoſthenes, made a new league againe together: and the Thebans alſo hauing armed themſelues by his practiſe, did one day ſet vpon the garriſon of the Macedonians within their citie, and ſlue many of thē. The Athenians prepared alſo to maintaine war on the Thebans behalfe and Demoſthenes was daily at all the aſſemblies of councell, in the pulpit, perſwading the people with his orations: and he wrote alſo into Asia vnto the king of Persiaes Lieutenants and Captaines, to make warre with Alexander on their ſide, calling him child, and Margites, as much to ſay, as foole. But after that Alexander hauing ſet all his things at ſtay within his realme, came himſelfe in perſon with his armie, and inuaded the countrie of Boeotia: then fell the pride of the Athenians greatly, & Demoſthenes alſo plied the pulpit no more as he was wont. At length the poore Thebans being left vnto themſelues forſaken of euery man: they were compelled themſelues alone to beare the brunt of this warre, and ſo came their city to vtter ruine and deſtruction. Therby the Athenians being in a maruellous feare and perplexitie, did ſodainly chooſe Ambaſſadors to ſend vnto this young king, and Demoſthenes chiefly among others: who being affraid of Alexanders furie and wrath, durſt not goe to him, but returned from mount Cythæron, and gaue vp the Ambaſſade. But Alexander ſent to ſummone the Athe-

NIANS, to ſend vnto him ten of their Orators, as Idomeneus and Duris both do write: or eight as the moſt writers and beſt hiſtoriographers doe report, which were theſe: Demoſthenes, Polyeuctus, Ephialtes, Lycurgus, Myrocles, Damon, Calliſthenes and Charidemus. At which time, they write that Demoſthenes tolde the people of ATHENS, the fable of the ſheepe and wolues, howe that the wolues came on a time, and willed the ſheepe, if they would haue peace with them, to deliuer them their maſtiues that kept them. And ſo he compared himſelfe, and his companions that trauelled for the benefit of the countrie, vnto the dogges that keepe the flocks of ſheepe, and calling Alexander the wolfe. And ſo forth, ſaide he, like as you ſee theſe corne maiſters bringing a ſample of their corne in a diſh or napkin to ſhew you, and by that litle do ſell all that they haue: ſo I thinke you will all wonder, that deliuering of vs, you will alſo deliuer your ſelues into the handes of your enemies. Ariſtobulus of CASSANDRA reporteth this matter thus. Now the ATHENIANS being in conſultation, not knowing how to reſolue: Demades hauing taken fiue talents of them whom Alexander demanded, did offer himſelfe, and promiſed to goe in this Ambaſſage vnto Alexander, and to intreate for them, either becauſe he truſted in the loue the king did beare him, or elſe for that he thought he hoped he ſhould finde him pacified, as a Lyon glutted with the bloud of beaſtes which he had ſlaine. Howſoeuer it happened, he perſwaded the people to ſend him vnto him, and ſo handled Alexander, that he got their pardon, and did reconcile him with the citie of ATHENS. Thereupon Alexander being retyred, Demades and his fellowes bare all the ſway and authoritie, and Demoſthenes was vnder foot. In deede when Agis king of LACEDÆMON, came with his army into the field, he began a litle to rowſe himſelfe, and to lift vp his head: but he ſhrunke choller againe ſoone after, becauſe the ATHENIANS would not riſe with the LACEDÆMONIANS, who were ouerthrowen, & Agis ſlaine in battell. At that time was the cauſe of the crowne pleaded againſt Cteſiphon, and the plea was written a litle before the battell of CHÆRONEA, in the yeare when Charondas was Prouoſt of ATHENS: howbeit no ſentence was giuen but ten yeres after that Ariſtophon was Prouoſt. This was ſuch an open iudgement, and ſo famous, as neuer was any, as well for the great fame of the Orators that pleaded in emulation one of the other, as alſo for the worthines of the Iudges that gaue ſentence thereof: who did not leaue Demoſthenes to his enemies, although in deede they were of greater power then he, and were alſo ſupported with the fauour and good will of the MACEDONIANS: but they did notwithſtanding ſo well quit him, that Aeſchines had not ſo much as the fifth part of mens voices and opinions in his behalfe. Wherefore immediatly after ſentence giuen, he went out of ATHENS for ſhame, and trauelled into the country of IONIA, and vnto the RHODES, where he did teach Rethoricke. Shortly after, Harpalus flying out of Alexanders ſeruice, came vnto ATHENS, being to be charged with many foule matters he had committed by his exceeding prodigalitie: and alſo becauſe he feared Alexanders furie, who was growen ſeuere and cruell vnto his chiefeſt ſeruantes. He comming now amongſt the ATHENIANS with ſtore of gold and ſiluer, the Orators being greedie and deſirous of the golde and ſiluer he had brought: beganne ſtraight to ſpeake for him, and did counſell the people to receiue & protect a poore ſuter that came to them for ſuccour. But Demoſthenes gaue counſell to the contrarie, and bad them rather driue him out of the citie, and take heede they brought not warres vpon their backes, for a matter that not onely was not neceſſarie, but furthermore meerely vniuſt. But within fewe daies after, inuentory being taken of all Harpalus goods, he perceiuing that Demoſthenes tooke great pleaſure to ſee a cuppe of the kings, and conſidered very curiouſly the faſhion & workemanſhippe vpon it: he gaue it him in his hand, to iudge what it weyed. Demoſthenes peaſing it, wondered at the great weight of it, it was ſo heauie: ſo he asked how many pound weight it weyed. Harpalus ſmiling, anſwered him: it will wey thee twentie talents. So when night was come, he ſent him the cuppe, with the twentie talents. This Harpalus was a very wiſe man, and found ſtraight by Demoſthenes countenance that he loued money, and could preſently iudge his nature by ſeeing his pleaſant countenance, and his eyes ſtill vpon the cuppe. So Demoſthenes refuſed not his gift, and being ouercome withall, as if he had receiued a garriſon into his houſe, he tooke Harpalus part. The next morning, he went into the aſſembly of the people, hauing his necke bound vp with wooll and rolles. So when they called him by his name to ſteppe vp into the pulpit, to ſpeake to the people as he had done before: he made a ſigne with his head, that he had an impediment in his voice, & that he could not ſpeake. But wiſe men laughing at his fine excuſe, tolde him it was no ſinanche that had ſtopped his weſill that night, as he would make them beleeue: but it was Harpalus argentſynanche which he had receiued, that made him in that caſe. Afterwardes when the people vnderſtoode that he was corrupted, Demoſthenes going about to excuſe himſelfe, they would not abide to heare him: but made a noyſe and exclamation againſt him. Thereuppon there roſe vp a pleaſant conceited man, that ſaid: why my maiſters, doe ye refuſe to heare a man that hath* ſuch a golden tongue? The people thereuppon did immediatly baniſh Harpalus, and fearing leaſt king Alexander would require an account of the gold and ſiluer which the Orators had robbed and pilfred away among them: they made very diligent ſearch and inquirie in euerie mans houſe, excepting Callicles houſe, the ſonne of Arrenidas, whoſe houſe they would haue ſearched by no meanes, becauſe he was but newly married, and had his new ſpouſe in his houſe, as Theopompus writeth. Now Demoſthenes deſiring to ſhewe that he was in fault, preferred a decree that the court of the Areopagites ſhould heare the matter, and puniſh them that were founde faultie, and therewithall ſtraight offered himſelfe to be tried. Howbeit he was one of the firſt whom the court condemned in the ſumme of fiftie talents, and for lacke of paiment, they put him in priſon: where he could not endure long, both for the ſhame of the matter for the which he was condemned, as alſo for his ſickely body. So he brake priſon, partly without the priuitie of his keepers, and partly alſo with their conſent: for they were willing he ſhould make a ſcape. Some doe report that he fled not farre from the citie: where it was tolde him that certaine of his enemies followed him, whereuppon he would haue hidden himſelfe from them. But they themſelues firſt called him by his name, and comming to him, prayed him to take money of them, which they had brought him from their houſes to helpe him in his baniſhment: and that therefore they ran after him. Then they did comfort him the beſt they could, & perſwaded him to be of good cheere, and not to diſpaire for the misfortune that was come vnto him. This did pearce his heart the more for ſorow, that he anſwered them: why, would you not haue me be ſorie for my misfortune, that compelleth me to forſake the citie where in deede I haue ſo curteous enemies, that it is hard for me to finde any where ſo good friends? So he tooke his baniſhment vnmanly, and remained the moſt part of his baniſhment in the citie of ÆGINA, or at the citie of TROEZEN, where oftentimes he would caſt his eyes towards the country of ATTICA, and weepe bitterly. And ſome haue written certaine words he ſpake, which ſhewed no minde of a man of courage, nor were aunſwerable to the noble things he was wont to perſwade in his Orations. For it is reported of him, that as he went out of ATHENS, hee looked backe againe, and holding vp his handes to the caſtle, ſaid in this ſort: O Ladie Minerua, Ladie patroneſſe of this citie: why doeſt thou delight in three ſo miſchieuous beaſtes: the owle, the dragon, and the people? Beſides, he perſwaded the young men that came to ſee him, and that were with him, neuer to meddle in matters of ſtate, aſſuring them, that if they had offred him two waies at the firſt, the one to goe into the aſſembly of the people, to make orations in the pulpit, and the other to be put to death preſently, and that he had knowen as he did then, the troubles a man is compelled to ſuffer that medleth with the affaires of the ſtate, the feare, the enuie, the accuſations, and troubles in the ſame: he would rather haue choſen the way to haue ſuffered death. So, Demoſthenes continuing in his exile, king Alexander dyed, and all GRECE was vp againe: inſomuch as Leoſthenes being a man of great valour, had ſhut vp Antipater in the citie of LAMEA, and there kept him ſtraightly beſieged. Then Pytheas and Callimedon, ſurnamed Carabos, two Orators, and both of them baniſhed from ATHENS, they tooke part with Antipater, and went from towne to towne with his Ambaſſadors and friendes, perſwading the GRECIANS not to ſturre, neither to take part with the ATHENIANS. But Demoſthenes in contrarie maner, ioyning with the Ambaſſadors ſent from ATHENS into euerie quarter, to ſolicite the cities of GRECE, to ſeeke to recouer their libertie: he did aide them the beſt he could, to ſolicite the GRECIANS, to take armes with the ATHENIANS, to driue the MACEDONIANS out of GRECE. And Phylarchus writeth, that Demoſthenes encountered with Pytheas words in an open aſſembly of the people in a certaine towne of ARCADIA. Pytheas hauing ſpoken before him, had ſaid: like as we preſume alwaies that there is ſome ſickneſſe in the houſe whither we doe ſee aſſes milke brought: ſo muſt that towne of neceſſitie be ſicke, wherein the Ambaſſadors of ATHENS doe enter. Demoſthenes aunſwered him againe, turning his compariſon againſt him: that in deede they brought aſſes milke, where there was neede to recouer health: and euen ſo, the Ambaſſadors of ATHENS were ſent, to heale and cure them that were ſicke. The people at ATHENS vnderſtanding what Demoſthenes had done, they ſo reioyced at it, that preſently they gaue order in the fielde, that his baniſhment ſhould be reuoked. He that perſwaded the decree of his reuocation, was called Dæmon PÆANIAN, that was his nephew: and thereupon the ATHENIANS ſent him a galley to bring him to ATHENS, from the citie of ÆGINA. So Demoſthenes being arriued at the hauen of Piræa, there was neither Gouernor, Prieſt, nor almoſt any towns man left in the citie, but went out to the hauen to welcome him home. So that Demetrius MAGNESIAN writeth, that Demoſthenes then lifting vp his handes vnto heauen ſaide, that he thought himſelfe happie for the honour of that iorney, that the returne from his baniſhment was farre more honorable, then Alcibiades returne in the like caſe had bene. For Alcibiades was called home by force: & he was ſent for with the good will of the citizens. This notwithſtanding, he remained ſtill condemned for his fine: for by the law, the people could not diſpence withall, nor remit it. Howbeit they deuiſed a way to deceiue the law: for they had a manner to giue certaine money vnto them that did prepare and ſet out the aulter of Iupiter ſauior, for the day of the ſolemnitie of the ſacrifice, the which they did yearely celebrate vnto him: ſo they gaue him the charge to make this preparation for the ſumme of fiftie talents being the ſumme of the fine aforeſaide wherein he was condemned. Howbeit, he did not long enioy the good happe of his reſtitution to his country and goods. For the affaires of the GRECIANS were immediatly after brought to vtter ruine. For the battell of Cranon which they loſt, was in the moneth Munichyon (to wit, Iulie) and in the moneth Boedromion next enſuing, (to wit, Auguſt) the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS entred into the fort of Munichya. And in the moneth Pyanepſion (to wit, the October following) Demoſthenes died in this maner. When newes came to ATHENS, that Antipater and Craterus were comming thither with a great army, Demoſthenes and his friendes got out of the towne a litle before they entred, the people by Demades perſwaſion, hauing condemned them to die. So, euery man making ſhift for himſelfe, Antipater ſent ſouldiers after them to take them: and of them Archias was Captaine, ſurnamed Phygadotheras, as much to ſay, as a hunter of the baniſhed men. It is reported that this Archias was borne in the citie of THVRIES, and that he had bene ſometimes a common plaier of tragedies: and that Polus alſo who was borne in the citie of ÆGINES, (the excellenteſt craftes maiſter in that facultie of all men) was his ſcholler. Yet Hermippus doth recite him amongſt the number of the ſchollers of Lacritus the Orator And Demetrius alſo writeth, that he had bene at Anaximenes ſchoole. Now this Archias hauing found the Orator Hyperides in the city of ÆGINA, Ariſtonicus MARATHONIAN, and Himeræus the brother of Demetrius the PHALERIAN, which had taken ſanctuary in the temple of Aiax: he took them out of the temple by force, and ſent them vnto Antipater, who was at that time in the citie of CLEONES, where he did put them all to death: and ſome ſay, that he did cut off Hyperides tongue. Furthermore, hearing that Demoſthenes had taken ſanctuary in the Ile of CALAVRIA, he tooke litle pinnaſies, and a certaine number of THRACIAN ſouldiers, and being come thither, he ſought to perſwade Demoſthenes to be contented to goe with him vnto Antipater, promiſing him that he ſhould haue no hurt. Demoſthenes had a ſtrange dreame the night before, and though that he had plaied a tragedie contending with Archias, and that he handled himſelfe ſo well, that all the lookers on at the Theater did commende him, and gaue him the honor to be the beſt player: howbeit that otherwiſe, he was not ſo well furniſhed as Archias and his plaiers, and that in all manner of furniture he did farre exceede him. The next morning when Archias came to ſpeake with him, who vſing gentle wordes vnto him, thinking thereby to winne him by faire meanes to leaue the ſanctuarie: Demoſthenes looking him full in the face, ſitting ſtill where he was, without remouing, ſaid vnto him: O Archias, thou diddeſt neuer perſwade me when thou playedſt a play, neither ſhalt thou now perſwade me, though thou promiſe me. Then Archias began to be angry with him, and to threaten him. O ſaid Demoſthenes, now thou ſpeakeſt in good earneſt, without diſſimulation, as the Oracle of MACEDON hath commaunded thee: for before, thou ſpakeſt in the clouds, and farre from thy thought. But I pray thee ſtay a while, till I haue written ſomewhat to my friends. After he had ſaid ſo, he went into the temple as though he would haue diſpatched ſome letters, and did put the end of the quill in his mouth which he wrote withall, and bit it as his maner was when he did vſe to write any thing, and held the end of the quill in his mouth a pretie while together: then he caſt his gowne ouer his head, and laid him downe. Archias ſouldiers ſeeing that, being at the dore of the temple, laughing him to ſcorne (thinking he had done ſo for that he was affraid to die) called him coward, and beaſt. Archias alſo comming to him, prayed him to riſe, and beganne to vſe the former perſwaſions to him, promiſing him that he would make Antipater his friend. Then Demoſthenes feeling the poyſon worke, caſt open his gowne, and boldly looking Archias in the face, ſaid vnto him: Now when thou wilt, play Creons part, and throw my bodie to the dogges, without further graue or buriall. For my part, O god Neptune, I do go out of thy temple being yet aliue, becauſe I will not prophane it with my death: but Antipater, and the MACEDONIANS, haue not ſpared to defile thy ſanctuarie with bloud, and cruell murder. Hauing ſpoken theſe wordes, he prayed them to ſtay him vp by his armeholes, for his feete beganne alreadie to faile him, and thinking to go forward, as he paſt by the aulter of Neptune, he fell downe, and giuing one gaſpe, gaue vp the ghoſt Now touching the poyſon, Ariſto reporteth, that he ſucked and drew it vp into his mouth out of his quill, as we haue ſaid before. But one Pappus (from whom Hermippus hath taken his hiſtorie) writeth, that when he was laid on the ground before the aulter, they found the beginning of a letter which ſaid: Demoſthenes vnto Antipater, but no more. Now his death being thus ſodaine, the THRACIAN ſouldiers that were at the temple dore, reported that they ſawe him plucke the poyſon which he put into his mouth, out of a litle cloth he had, thinking to them that it had beene a peece of gold he had ſwallowed downe. Howbeit a maide of the houſe that ſerued him, being examined by Archias about it: told him that he had caried it about him a long time, for a preſeruatiue for him. Eratoſthenes writeth, that he kept this poyſon in a litle boxe of golde made hollow within, the which he ware as a bracelet about his arme. There are many writers alſo that do report his death diuerſly, but to recite them all it were in vaine: ſauing that there was one called Demochares (who was Demoſthenes very friend ſaid, that he died not ſo ſodainly by poyſon, but that it was the ſpeciall fauour of the gods (to preſerue him from the crueltie of the MACEDONIANS) that ſo ſodainly tooke him out of his life, and made him feele ſo litle paine. Demoſthenes dyed the ſixteenth day of the moneth Pynepſion (to wit, October) on the which day they do celebrate at ATHENS the feaſt of Ceres, called Teſmophoria, which is the dolefulleſt feaſt of all the yeare: on the which day alſo, the women remaine all day long in the temple of the goddeſſe, without meate or drinke. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS to honour him according to his deſerts, did caſt his image in braſſe, and made a law beſides, that the oldeſt man of his houſe ſhould for euer be kept within the pallace, at the charge of the common wealth: and ingraued theſe verſes alſo vpon the baſe of his image.

Hadſt thou Demoſthenes had ſtrength according to thy hart,
The Macedons ſhould not haue wrought the Greekes ſuch woe and ſmart.

For they that thinke that it was Demoſthenes himſelfe that made the verſes in the Ile of CALAVRIA, before he tooke his poyſon: they are greatly deceiued. But yet a litle before my firſt comming to ATHENS, there went a report that ſuch a thing happened. A certaine ſouldier being ſent for to come vnto his Captaine, did put ſuch peeces of golde as he had into the handes of Demoſthenes ſtatue, which had both his hands ioyned together: and there grew hard by it a great plane tree, diuers leaues whereof either blowen off by winde by chance, or elſe put there of purpoſe by the ſouldier, couered ſo this golde, that it was there a long time, and no man found it: vntill ſuch time as the ſouldier came againe, and found it as he left it. Hereuppon this matter running abroad in euery mans mouth, there were diuers wiſe men that tooke occaſion of this ſubiect, to make epigrammes in the praiſe of Demoſthenes, as one who in his life was neuer corrupted. Furthermore, Demades did not long enioy the honor he thought he had newly gotten. For the iuſtice of the goddes, reuenger of the death of Demoſthenes, brought him into Macedon, to receiue iuſt puniſhment by death of thoſe whom he diſhoneſtly flattered: being before growen hatefull to them, and afterwardes committed a fault whereby he could not eſcape. For there were letters of his taken, by the which he did perſwade, and pray * Perdiccas, to make himſelfe king of Macedon, & to deliuer Grece from bondage, ſaying that it hong but by a threede, and yet it was halfe rotten, meaning thereby, Antipater. Dinarchus Corinthian accuſed him, that he wrote theſe letters: the which ſo grieuouſly offended Caſſander, that firſt he ſlew his owne ſonne in his armes, and then commanded they ſhould afterwards kill Demades, making him feele then by thoſe miſeries (which are the cruelleſt that can happen vnto man) that traitors betraying their owne countrie doe firſt of all betray themſelues. Demoſthenes had often forewarned him of his end, but he would neuer beleeue him. Thus, my friend Soſſius, you haue what we can deliuer you, by reading, or report, touching Demoſthenes life and doings.

Marcus Tullius Cicero.

AS touching Ciceroes mother, whoſe name was Heluia, it is reported ſhe was a gentlewoman borne, and liued alwaies very honeſtly: but for his father, the reports of him are diuers and infinite. For ſome ſay that he was borne and brought vp in a fullers ſhop: others report that he came of Tullius Actius, who while he liued was honored among the Volsces as king, and made very ſharpe and cruell warres with the Romaines. But ſurely it ſeemes to me, that the firſt of that name called Cicero, was ſome famous man, and that for his ſake his offſpring continued ſtill that ſurname, and were glad to keepe it, though many men ſcorned it, becauſe Cicer in Engliſh ſignifieth a rich peaſe. That Cicero had a thing vpon the tippe of his noſe, as it had beene a litle wart, much like to a rich peaſe, whereupon they ſurnamed him Cicero. But this Cicero, whoſe life we write of now, nobly anſwered certaine of his friends on a time giuing him counſell to chaunge his name, when he firſt made ſute for office, and beganne to practiſe in matters of ſtate: that hee would endeuour himſelfe to make the name of Ciceroes more noble and famous, than the Scauri, or Catuli. After that, Cicero being made Treaſurer in Sicile, he gaue an offering of certaine ſiluer plate vnto the goddes, and at large engraued on it his two firſt names, Marcus Tullius: and in place of his thirde name, he pleaſantly commaunded the workeman to cut out the forme and faſhion of a rich peaſe. Thus much they write of his name. Nowe for his birth, it was ſaide that his mother was brought a bedde of him without any paine, the thirde day of Ianuarie: on which day the Magiſtrates and Gouernours of Rome doe vſe at this preſent, yearely to make ſolemne prayers and ſacrifices vnto the goddes, for the health and proſperitie of the Emperour. Further, it is reported, that there appeared an image to his nurſe, that did prognoſticate vnto her ſhe gaue a childe ſucke, which in time to come ſhould doe great good vnto all the Romaines. Nowe though ſuch things may ſeeme but dreames and fables vnto many, yet Cicero himſelfe ſhortly after prooued this prophecie true: becauſe that when he came of age to learne, he grew ſo toward, and wanne ſuch fame among the boyes, for his excellent wit and quicke capacitie. For thereupon came the other boyes fathers themſelues to the ſchoole to ſee his face, and to be eye witneſſes of the report that went of him, of his ſharpe and quicke wit to learne. But others of the rude and baſer ſort of men were offended with their ſonnes, becauſe to honour Cicero, they did alwaies put him in the middeſt betweene them, as they went in the ſtreetes. Cicero in deede had ſuch a naturall witte and vnderſtanding, as Plato thought meete for learning, and apt for the ſtudie of Philoſophie. For he gaue himſelfe to all kinde of knowledge, and there was no arte nor any of the liberall ſciences, that he diſdained: notwithſtanding in his firſt young yeares he was apter, and better diſpoſed to the ſtudie of Poetrie then any other. There is a pretie poeme of his in verſes of eight ſtaues, called Pontius Glaucus, extant at this day, the which he made when he was but a boy. After that, being giuen more earneſtly vnto this ſtudie, he was not onely thought the beſt Orator, but the beſt Poet alſo of all the Romaines in his time: and yet doth the excellencie of his eloquence, and commendation of his tongue continue euen to this day, notwithſtanding the great alteration and chaunge of the Latine tongue. But his Poetrie hath loſt the name and eſtimation of it, becauſe there were many after him that became farre more excellent therein then he. After he had left his childiſh ſtudies, he became then Philoes ſcholler, the Academicke Philoſopher, the onely ſcholler of all C*litomachus* ſchollers, whom the Romaines eſteemed ſo much for his eloquence, and loued more for his gentle behauiour and conuerſation. He gaue himſelfe alſo to be a follower of Mutius Scæuola, who at that time was a great man in Rome, and Prince of the Senate, and who did alſo inſtruct Cicero in the lawes of Rome. He did alſo follow Sylla for a time, in the warres of the Marsians. But when he ſawe that the common wealth of Rome fell to ciuill warres, and from ciuill warres to a monarchie: then he returned againe to his booke and contemplatiue life, and frequented the learned men of Grece, and alwayes ſtudied with them, vntill Sylla had gotten the vpper hande, and that he ſawe all the common wealth againe at ſome ſtay. About that time, Sylla cauſing the goods of one that was ſaide to be ſlaine, to be ſold by the crier: (being one of the outlawes and proſcriptes, to wit, baniſhed by billes ſette vp on poſtes) C*hryſogonus*, one of Syllaes freed bondmen, and in great fauour with his maiſter, bought them for the ſumme of two thouſande Drachmaes. Therewithall the ſonne and heire of the dead perſon called Roſcius, being maruellouſly offended, he ſhewed that it was too ſhamefull an abuſe: for his fathers goods amounted to the ſumme of two hundred and fiftie talentes. Sylla finding himſelfe thus openly touched with publike fraude and deceite, for the onely gratifying of his man: he procured C*hryſogonus* to accuſe him, that he had killed his owne father. Neuer an Orator durſt ſpeake in Roſcius behalfe to defend his cauſe, but ſhrunke colour, fearing Syllaes crueltie and ſeueritie. Wherefore poore Roſcius the young man, ſeeing euery man forſake him, had no other refuge but to goe to C*icero*, whom his friends did counſell and perſwade boldly to take vpon him the defence of Roſcius cauſe: for he ſhould neuer haue a happier occaſion, nor ſo noble a beginning to bring himſelfe into eſtimation, as this. Thereuppon C*icero* determined to take his cauſe in hand, and did handle it ſo well, that he obtained the thing he ſued for: whereby he wanne him great fame and credit. But yet being afraied of Syllaes diſpleaſure, he abſented him ſelfe from ROME, and went into GREECE, giuing it out that his trauaile was for a diſeaſe he had vpon him. In deede Cicero was dogge leane, a litle eater, and would alſo eate late, becauſe of the great weakeneſſe of his ſtomacke: but yet he had a good loude voyce, though it was ſomewhat harſhe, and lacked grace and comelineſſe. Furthermore, he was ſo earneſt and vehement in his oration that hee mounted ſtill with his voice into the higheſt tunes: inſomuch that men were afraied it would one day put him in hazard of his life. When he came to ATHENS, he went to heare Antiochus of the city of ASCALONA, and fell in great liking with his ſweete tongue, and excellent grace, though otherwiſe he miſliked his new opinions in Philoſophy. For Antiochus hadde then forſaken the opinions of the new Academicke Philoſophers, and the ſect of the Carneades: being moued thereunto, either through the manifeſt proofe of things, or by his certaine iudgement, or (as ſome ſay) for that of an ambition or diſſention againſt the ſchollers and followers of Clitomachus and Philo, he had reproued the reſolutions of the Academickes, which he had of long time defended, onely to leane for the moſt part to the Stoickes opinions. Howbeit Cicero had moſt affection vnto the Academickes, and did ſtudy that ſect more then all the reſt, of purpoſe, that if he ſaw he were forbidden to practiſe in the common wealth at ROME, hee would then goe to ATHENS (leauing all pleas and Orators in the common wealth) to beſtow the reſt of his time quietly in the ſtudy of Philoſophy. At length, when hee heard newes of Syllaes death, and ſaw that his body was growen to good ſtate and health by exerciſe, and that his voyce became daily more and more to fill mens eares with a ſweete and pleaſaunt ſound, and yet was loude enough for the conſtitution of his body: receiuing letters daily from his friendes at ROME, that prayed him to returne home, and moreouer, Antiochus ſelfe alſo earneſtly perſwading him to practiſe in the common wealth: hee beganne againe to fall to the ſtudie of Rethoricke, and to frame him ſelfe to be eloquent, being a neceſſary thing for an Orator, and did continually exerciſe him ſelfe in making orations vppon any ſpeache or propoſition, and ſo frequented the chiefe Orators and maiſters of eloquence that were at that time. To this end therefore he went into ASIA vnto RHODES, and amongeſt the Orators of ASIA, he frequented Xenocles ADRAMETTIN, and Dionyſius MAGNESIAN, and ſtudied alſo with Menippus CARIAN: at RHODES he heard Apollonius Molon, and the Philoſopher Poſidonius. And it is reported alſo, that Apollonius wanting the Latine tongue, he did pray Cicero for exerciſe ſake, to declame in Greeke. Cicero was very well contented with it, thinking that thereby his faultes ſhould be the better corrected. When he had ended his declamation, all thoſe that were preſent were amazed to heare him, and euery man praiſed him one after an other. Howbeit Apollonius all the while Cicero ſpake, did neuer ſhew any glad countenaunce: and when he had ended, he ſtayed a great while and ſayed neuer a word. Cicero miſliking withall, Apollonius at length ſayed vnto him. As for me Cicero, I doe not only praiſe thee, but more then that, I wonder at thee: and yet I am ſorie for poore GREECE, to ſee that learning and eloquence (which were the two onely giftes and honour left vs) are by thee obtained with vs, and caried vnto the ROMAINES. Now Cicero being very well diſpoſed, to goe with good hope to practiſe at ROME, he was a litle diſcouraged by an Oracle that was tolde him. For, inquiring of the god Apollo DELPHIAN, how he might doe to winne fame and eſtimation: the Nunne Pythias aunſwered him he ſhould obtaine it, ſo that in his doings he would rather follow the diſpoſition of his owne nature, then the opinion of the common people. Wherefore when he came to ROME, at the firſt he proceeded verie warely, and diſcreetely, and did vnwillingly ſeeke for any office, and when he did, he was not greatly eſteemed: for they commonly called him the GRECIAN, and ſcholler, which are two wordes, the which the artificers, (and ſuch baſe mechanicall people at ROME,) haue euer ready at their tongues end. Now hee being by nature ambitious of honour, and pricke forward alſo by the perſwaſion of his father and friendes: in the end hee beganne to pleade, and there obtained not the chiefeſt place by litle and litle, but ſo ſoone as he fell to practiſe, he was immediatly eſteemed aboue all the other Orators and pleaders in his time, and did excell them all. Yet it is reported notwithſtanding, that for his geſture and pronunciation, ha-

uing the ſelfeſame defectes of nature at the beginning, which Demoſthenes had: to reforme them, he carefully ſtudied to counterfeite Roſcius, an excellent commediant, and AEſope alſo a player of tragedies. Of this AEſope men write, that he playing one day Atrius part vpon a ſtage (who determined with him ſelfe how he might be reuenged of his brother Thyeſtes) a ſeruaunt by chaunce hauing occaſion to runne ſodainely by him, he forgetting him ſelfe, ſtriuing to ſhew the vehement paſſion and fury of this king, gaue him ſuch a blow on his head with the ſcepter in his hand, that he ſlue him dead in the place. Euen ſo Ciceroes words were of ſo great force to perſwade, by meanes of his grace and pronunciation. For he mocking the Orators that thruſt out their heads, and cried in their orations, was wont to ſay that they were like to lame men, who were driuen to ride, becauſe they could not goe a foote: euen ſo (ſaid he) they cry out, becauſe they can not ſpeake. Truely pleaſaunt taunts doe grace an Orator, and ſheweth a fine witte: but yet Cicero vſed them ſo commonly, that they were offenſiue vnto many, and brought him to be counted a malicious ſcoffer and ſpightfull man. He was choſen Treaſurer in the time of dearth, where there was great ſcarcity of corne at Rome: and the prouince of Sicile fell to his lotte. At his firſt comming thither, the Sicilians miſliked him very much, becauſe he compelled them to ſend corne vnto Rome: but after they had found his diligence, iuſtice, and lenity, they honoured him aboue any Gouernour that euer was ſent from Rome. Now there were diuerſe young gentlemen of Rome of noble houſes, who being accuſed for ſundry faultes committed in warres againſt their honour, and martiall diſcipline, had bene ſent backe againe vnto the Prætor of Sicile: for whom Cicero pleaded, and did ſo excellently defend their cauſe, that they were pardoned euery man. Thereuppon, thinking well of him ſelfe, when his time was expired, he went to Rome, & by the way there happened a prety ieaſt vnto him. As he paſſed through the countrey of Campania (otherwiſe called the land of labour) he met by chaunce with one of the chiefeſt Romaines of all his friendes. So falling in talke with him, he asked him what they ſayed of him at Rome, and what they thought of his doings: imagining that all Rome had bene full of the glory of his name and deedes. His friend asked him againe: and where haſt thou bene Cicero all this while, that we haue not ſeene thee at Rome? This killed his heart ſtraight, when he ſaw that the report of his name and doings, entring into the city of Rome as into an infinite ſea, was ſo ſodainely vanquiſhed away againe, without any other fame or ſpeach. But after that, when he looked into him ſelfe, and ſaw that in reaſon he tooke an infinite labour in hand to attaine to glory, wherein he ſaw no certaine end whereby to attaine vnto it: it cut off a great part of the ambition he had in his head. And yet the great pleaſure hee tooke to heare his owne praiſe, and to be euermuch giuen to deſire of honor and eſtimation: thoſe two things continued with him euen to his dying day, and did eftſoones make him ſwarue from iuſtice. Furthermore, when he beganne throughly to practiſe in the affaires of the ſtate, he thought it an ill thing that artificers and craftes men ſhould haue many ſortes of inſtrumentes and tooles without life, to know the names of euery one of them, the places where they ſhould take them, and the vſe whereto they ſhould employ them: and that a man of knowledge and quality (who doth all things with the helpe and ſeruice of men) ſhould be ſlothfull, and careleſſe, to learne to know the names of his citizens. Therefore hee gaue him ſelfe to know, not onely mens names of quality, but the ſtreetes alſo they dwelt in, what part of the city ſoeuer it was: their goodly houſes in the country, the friends they made of, and the neighbours whom they companied with. So that when hee went abroad into Italie, whereſoeuer he became, Cicero coulde ſhew and name his friendes houſes. He was not very rich, and yet he had enough to ſerue his turne: the which made men muſe the more at him, and they loued him the better, becauſe he tooke no fee nor gift for his pleading, what cauſe ſoeuer he tooke in hand, but then ſpecially, when he defended a matter againſt Verres. This Verres hadde bene Prætor of Sicilia, and had committed many lewd partes there, for the which the Sicilians did accuſe him. Cicero taking vppon him to defend their cauſe, made Verres to be condemned, not by pleading, but in maner without pleading, and in this ſort. The Prætors being his Iudges, and fauouring Verres, had made ſo many reiornementes and delayes, that they had driuen it off to the laſt day of hearing. Cicero perceiuing then hee ſhoulde not haue anie light to ſpeake all that he had to ſay againſt him, and that thereby nothing ſhould be done and iudged: he roſe vp, and ſayed, that there needed no further plea in this matter, but onely brought foorth the witneſſes before the Iudges, and hauing cauſed their depoſitions to be taken, he prayed they would proceede to ſentence, according to their euidence giuen on that behalfe. Yet ſome doe report, that Cicero gaue many pleaſaunt tauntes and girdes, in pleading the accuſation of the SICILIANS againſt Verres. The ROMAINES doe call a bore, Verres. There was one Cæcilius, the ſonne of a freed bondman, who was ſuſpected to holde with the ſuperſtition of the IEVVES. This Cæcilius would haue put by the SICILIANS from following the accuſation of Verres, and woulde haue had the matter of his accuſation only referred to him, for the proſecuting of it againſt him. Cicero skorning his ſute, ſayd vnto him: what hath a IEVVE to doe with a ſwine? This Verres had a ſonne ſomewhat aboue twentie yeares of age, who (as the report went) had a verie ill name for his beautie. And therefore when Verres one day thought to mocke Cicero, ſaying that he was too womanly: his children (ſayd he) are to be reproued of that ſecretly at home. In this accuſation, Hortenſius the Orator durſt not directly defende Verres: but touching the condemnation of his fine, he was then contented to aunſwere for him, for he had a Sphinx of Yuory giuen him by Verres for his reward. Thereuppon Cicero gaue him a pretie nippe by the way: but Hortenſius not vnderſtanding him: ſayd he coulde no skill of darke ſpeaches. Well, ſayd Cicero, yet haſt thou a ſphinx in thy houſe. In the ende Verres being condemned, and a fine ſette on his heade to the value of ſeuentie fiue Myriades, Cicero notwithſtandinge was ſuſpected to be bribed with mony for agreeing to caſt him in ſo ſmall a ſumme. But yet when hee came to be Ædilis, the SICILIANS to ſhew them ſelues thankefull to him, both brought and ſent him many preſentes out of SICILE. Of all that he tooke nothing to his owne vſe, but onely beſtowed their liberality in bringing downe the priſes of victuals at ROME. He had a goodly houſe within the confines of the city of ARPOS, a farme alſo by NAPLES, and an other about the city of POMPEII: but all theſe were no great things. Afterwardes alſo he had the ioynter of his wife Terentia, which amounted to the ſumme of twelue Myriades, and beſides all this, there came to him by inheritaunce, eleuen Myriades of their Denarij. Thereuppon he liued very honeſtly and ſoberly, without exceſſe, with his familiar friendes that loued him, both GRECIANS and ROMAINS, and would neuer goe to ſupper till after ſunne ſet, not ſo much for any great buſineſſe he had, as for the weakeneſſe of his ſtomacke. But otherwiſe he was very curious, and carefull of his perſon, and would be rubbed and noynted, and hee would vſe alſo to walke a certaine number of turns by proportion: and ſo exerciſing his body in that ſort, he was neuer ſicke, and beſides was alſo very ſtrong and luſty of body, able to abide great paines and ſorrowes which he fell into afterwardes. He gaue his fathers chiefe manſion houſe to his brother, and went to dwell him ſelfe in the mount Palatine: becauſe ſuch as came to waite vppon him to doe him honour, ſhould not take the paines to goe ſo farre to ſee him. For, he had as many men dailie at his gate euery morning, as either Craſſus had for his wealth, or Pompey for his eſtimation among the ſouldiers both of them being at that time the chiefeſt men of ROME. Yea furthermore, Pompeys ſelfe came vnto Cicero, becauſe his Orations ſtoode him to great purpoſe, for the increaſe of his honour and authority. Now when Cicero came to make ſute to be Prætor (which is, to be as an ordinary Iudge) though he had many competitors, and fellowe ſuters with him, yet was he firſt choſen affore them all: and he did ſo honeſtly behaue him ſelfe in that office, that they did not ſo much as once ſuſpect him of bribery or extortion. And for proofe hereof, it is reported, that Licinius Macer (a man that of him ſelfe was of great power, and yet fauoured and ſupported beſides by Craſſus) was accuſed before Cicero of theft and extortion in his office: but he truſting much to his ſuppoſed credite, and to the great ſute and labour his friendes made for him, went home to his houſe before ſentence proceeded againſt him (the Iudges being yet to giue their opinions) and there ſpeedily trimmed his beard, and put a new gowne vppon his backe, as though he had bene ſure to haue beene quitte of his accuſation, and then returned againe into the market place. But Craſſus went to meete him, and tolde him all the Iudges had condemned him. Licinius Macer tooke ſuch a griefe and conceite vppon it, that he went home to his houſe againe, layed him downe on his bedde, and neuer roſe after. This iudgement wanne Cicero great fame, for they praiſed him exceedingly for the great paines he tooke, to ſee iuſtice duely executed. An other called alſo Vatinius, (a bedlem fellow, and one that behaued him ſelfe very vnreuerently to the Magiſtrates in his pleading, and beſides had a ſwollen necke) came very arrogantly one day vnto Cicero being in his Prætoriall ſeate, and asked him a thing which Cicero woulde not graunt him there, but would thinke of it at better leyſure. Thereuppon Vatinius told him, that he would not be ſcrupulous to graunt that, if he were Prætor. Cicero turning to him, aunſwered him againe: no more haue I (ſayed he) ſuch a ſwollen necke as thou haſt. Towardes the end of his office, two or three dayes before his time expired, there was one accuſed Manilius before him, that he alſo had robbed the common wealth. This Manilius was very well beloued of the common people, who were perſwaded that he was put in ſute, not for any fault he had committed, but onely to deſpight Pompey with, whoſe familiar friend he was. So he required certaine dayes to anſwer the matter he was accuſed of: but Cicero would giue him no further reſpit, but to aunſwer it the next day. The people therewith were maruellouſly offended, becauſe the other Prætors in ſuch like caſes, were wont to giue tenne daies reſpit vnto others. The next morning when the Tribunes had brought him before the Iudges, and alſo accuſed him vnto them: hee beſought Cicero to heare him patiently. Cicero made him aunſwere, that hauing alwayes vſed as much fauour and curteſie as he poſſibly might by law, vnto thoſe that were accuſed, he thought hee ſhould offer Manilius too great wrong, if he ſhould not doe the like to him: wherefore, becauſe he had but one day more to continue Prætor in office, he had purpoſely giuen him that day to make his aunſwere before him. For he thought that to leaue his accuſation to the hearing of an other Prætor, he could not haue bene thought a man that had borne him good will, and ment to pleaſure him. Theſe wordes did maruellouſly chaunge the peoples opinion and affection towardes him, and euery man ſpeaking well of him, they prayed him to defend Manilius cauſe. Hee willingly graunted them: and comming from the bench, ſtanding at the barre like an Orator to plead for him, he made a notable Oration, and ſpake both boldly and ſharpely againſt the chiefe men of the city, and thoſe ſpecially that did enuy Pompey. This notwithſtanding, when he came to ſue to be Conſull, he found as great fauour amongeſt the Nobility, as he did with the communalty. For they did further his ſute, for the common wealths ſake, vppon this occaſion. The chaunge and alteration of gouernment the which Sylla brought in, was thought ſtraunge at the firſt among the people: but now men by proceſſe of time being vſed to it, it was throughly eſtabliſhed, and no man miſliked it. At that time many men practiſed to ſubuert the gouernment, not for the benefite of the common wealth, but to ſerue their owne couetous mindes. For Pompey being then in the Eaſt parts, made wars with the kings of PONTVS and ARMENIA, and had not left ſufficient force at ROME to oppreſſe theſe ſeditious perſons, that ſought nothing but rebellion. Theſe men had made Lucius Catilina their Captaine: a deſperate man to attempt any great enterpriſe, ſubtile, and malicious of nature. He was accuſed before (beſides many other vile faults) for deflouring of his own daughter, and killing his brother: and being affrayed to be put in ſute for it, he prayed Sylla to put his brother amongeſt the number of the outlawes (or proſcriptes) as if he had bene then aliue. Theſe wicked rebels hauing choſen them ſuch a Captaine, were ſworne and bound one to an other in this manner. They killed a man, and did eate of his fleſhe together, and had beſides corrupted the moſt part of all the youth. For Catiline their Captaine ſuffered euerie man to take his pleaſure, as his youth was inclined vnto: as to banket, to followe harlottes, and gaue them money largely to beſtow in theſe vaine expences. Furthermore all THVSCAN beganne to riſe, and the moſt part of GAVLE alſo, lying betweene the Alpes and ITALY. The city of ROME it ſelfe was alſo in great daunger of riſing, for the inequality of the goods of the inhabitaunts. For the noble men, and of greateſt courage, had ſpent all their landes in playes and feaſts, or in buildings and common works, which they built at their owne charge, to curry fauour with the common people, that they might obtaine the chiefe offices: ſo that thereby they became very poore, and their goodes were in the handes of the meane men and wretches. Thus the ſtate of ROME ſtood in great hazard of vprore, the which any man might eaſely haue procured, that durſt haue taken vppon him any change or alteration of gouernment, there was then ſuch diuiſion among them in the ſtate. Catiline notwithſtanding, to prouide him of a ſtrong bulwarke to proſecute his intent, came to ſue to be Conſull, hoping that he ſhould be choſen with Caius Antonius, a man that of him ſelfe was apt neither to doe any great good, nor much hurt, and yet that could be a great ſtrength and aide vnto him that would attempt any thing. Diuers noble and wiſe men forſeeing that, did procure Cicero to ſue for the Conſulſhippe. The people accepted him, and reiected Catiline. Antonius and Cicero thereuppon were created Conſuls, although that Cicero of all the ſuters for the Conſulſhippe was but onely a Knightes ſonne, and not the ſonne of a Senator of ROME. Now, though the common people vnderſtoode not the ſecrete practiſe and meaning of Catiline: yet at the beginning of Ciceroes Conſulſhippe, there fell out great trouble and contention in the common wealth. For they of the one ſide, whom Sylla had by his ordinaunces depoſed from their dignities and offices in ROME (who were no ſmall men, neither few in number) beganne to creepe into the peoples good wil, alleadging many true and iuſt reaſons againſt the tyrannicall power of Sylla: howbeit ſpoken in ill time, when it was out of time to make any chaunge or alteration in the common wealth. The Tribunes on the other ſide preferred lawes and ordinaunces to further this deuiſe. They preferred the law to chooſe the Decemuiri, with ſoueraigne power and authority through all ITALY and SYRIA, and alſo through all the countries and prouinces which Pompey had newly conquered to the Empire of ROME: to ſell, and releaſe all the landes belonging to the ſtate of ROME, to accuſe any man whom they thought good, to baniſhe any man, to reſtore the Colonies with people, to take what money they would out of the treaſury, to leauy men of warre, and to keepe them in pay as long as they thought good. For this great and abſolute power of the Decemuiri, there were many men of great accompt that fauored this law, but Antonius chiefly, being colleague and fellowe Conſull with Cicero, for he had good hope to be choſen one of theſe ten Commiſſioners: and furthermore, it was thought that he was priuy vnto Catilines conſpiracy, and that he miſliked it not, becauſe he was ſo much in debt. And this was it that the noble men moſt feared of all other things. Thereuppon Cicero, to prouide firſt to preuent this daunger, graunted him the prouince of the realme of MACEDON: and the prouince of GAVLE being offered vnto him ſelfe, he refuſed it. By this good turne, he wanne Antonius like a hiered player making him to promiſe him that he would aſſiſt & aide him for the benefite of the common wealth, and that he would ſay no more, then he ſhould will him. When he had brought him to this, and had wonne him to his minde: he then beganne to be the bolder, and more ſtoutly to reſiſt them that were authors of this innouation and new lawes. Cicero therefore in open Senate, did one day ſharpely reproue, and inueigh againſt this law of the Decemuiri, which the Tribunes would haue eſtabliſhed. But thereby he did ſo terrifie the authors thereof, that there was not one man durſt ſpeake againſt him. This notwithſtanding, the Tribunes afterwards attempted once againe to haue it to paſſe, and appointed the Conſuls to appeare before the people. Howbeit Cicero being nothing abaſhed at it, he commaunded the Senate to follow him. So he did not only ouerthrow this law of the Decemuiri, which the Tribunes did preferre: but furthermore they were vtterly diſcoraged and out of hope to bring any of their matters to paſſe they intended, he ſtrooke them ſo dead with his eloquence. For Cicero onely of all men in ROME made the ROMAINS know, how much eloquence doth grace and beautifie that which is honeſt, and how inuincible right and iuſtice are, being eloquently ſet forth: and alſo how that a man that will be counted a wiſe Gouernor of a common weale, ſhould alwayes in his doings rather preferre profit, then to ſeeke to curry fauour with the common people: yet ſo to vſe his words, that the thing which is profitable, may not be alſo vnpleaſant. And to proue his ſweete and pleaſant tong, may be alleadged that which he did in the time of his Conſulſhip, touching the placing of men at the Theater to ſee the paſtimes. For before, the knights of ROME did ſit mingled one with another amongſt the common people, and tooke their place as they came. The firſt that made the difference betweene them, was* Marcus Otho, at that time Prætor: who made a law, by the which he appointed ſeuerall ſeates for the knights, where they might from thenceforth ſee the paſtimes. The people tooke this grieuouſly, as a thing done to diſcounte-

nance them: inſomuch that Otho comming afterwards into the Theater, all the common people fell a whiſtling at him, to ſhame him withall. The knights alſo in contrariwiſe made him roome amongſt them, with great clapping of hands, in token of honor. Therewith the people fell a whiſtling louder then before, and the knights in like manner to clapping of their hands, and ſo grew to wordes one with an other: that all the Theater was ſtraight in vprore with it. Cicero vnderſtanding it, went thither him ſelfe, and calling the people to the temple of the goddeſſe Bellona, he there ſo ſharpely reproued them, and therewith ſo perſwaded them, that returning preſently to the Theater, they did then welcome and receiue Otho with clapping of their hands, and contended with the knights which of them ſhould doe him greateſt honour. But now againe, the rebels of Catilines conſpiracy (who were pretily cooled at the firſt for the fear they ſtoode in) beganne to be luſty againe, and to gather together, boldly incoraging one another to broach their practiſe, before Pompey returned, who was ſayed to be on the way towards ROME with his army. But beſides them, thoſe ſouldiers that had ſerued before in the warres vnder Sylla, being diſperſed vp and downe ITALY, (but ſpecially the beſt ſouldiers among them dwelling in the good towns of THVSCAN) did ſtirre vp Catiline to haſten the enterpriſe, perſwading them ſelues that they ſhould once againe haue goods enough at home, to ſpoyle and ranſacke at their pleaſure. Theſe ſouldiers hauing one Manlius to their Captaine, that had borne office in the field vnder Sylla, conſpired with Catilin, & came to ROME to aſſiſt him in his ſuite: who purpoſed once againe to demaund the Conſulſhip, being determined at the election to kill Cicero, in the tumult and hurly burly. The goddes alſo did plainely ſhew by earthquakes, lightning and thunder, and by viſion of ſpirits that did appeare, the ſecrete practiſe and conſpiracy: beſides alſo, there fell out manifeſt coniectures and proofes by men that came to reueale them, howbeit they had no power ſufficient to encounter ſo noble a man, and of ſo great power as Catilin was. Cicero therefore deferring the day of election, called Catilin into the Senate, and there did examine him of that which was reported of him. Catiline ſuppoſing there were many in the Senate that had good wils to rebell, and alſo becauſe he would ſhew him ſelfe ready vnto them that were of his conſpiracy: he gaue Cicero a gentle anſwer, and ſaid thus. What doe I offend, ſayd he, if that being two bodies in this towne, the one leane and weake, and throughly rotten, and hath a head: and the other being great, ſtrong, and of power, hauing no head, I doe giue it one? meaning vnder this darke anſwer, to ſignifie the people and Senate. This aunſwer being made, Cicero was more afrayd then before, inſomuch that he put on a brigantine for the ſafety of his body, and was accompanied with the chiefeſt men of ROME, and a great number of yong men beſides going with him from his houſe vnto the field of Mars, where the elections were made: and had of purpoſe left open his iacket loſe at the choller, that his brigantine he had on might be ſeene, thereby to let euery man that ſaw him, know the danger he was in. Euery man miſliked it when they ſaw it, and came about him to defend him, if any offred to aſſaile him. But it ſo came to paſſe, that by voyces of the people, Catilin was againe reiected from the Conſulſhip, and Syllanus & Muræna choſen Conſuls. Shortly after this election, the ſouldiers of THVSCAN being ioyned, which ſhould haue come to Catilin, and the day appointed being at hand to broache their enterpriſe: about midnight there came three of the chiefeſt men of ROME to Ciceroes houſe (Marcus Craſſus, Marcus Marcellus, and Scipio Metellus) and knocking at his gate, called his porter, and bad him wake his maiſter preſently, and tell him how they three were at the gate to ſpeake with him, about a matter of importance. At night after ſupper, Craſſus porter brought his maiſter a packet of letters, deliuered him by a ſtraunger vnknowen, which were directed vnto diuerſe perſons, among the which one of them had no name ſubſcribed, but was only directed vnto Craſſus himſelfe. The effect of the letter was, that there ſhould be a great ſlaughter in ROME made by Catiline, and therefore he prayed him that he would depart out of ROME to ſaue him ſelfe. Craſſus hauing red his owne letter, would not open the reſt, but went forthwith vnto Cicero, partly for feare of the danger, and partly alſo to cleare him ſelfe of the ſuſpition they had of him for the friendſhip that was betwixt him & Catiline. Cicero counſelling with them what was to be done, the next morning aſſembled the Senate very earely, and carrying the letters with him, he did deliuer them according to their direction, and commaunded they ſhould read them out aloude.

All theſe letters, & euery one of them particularly, did bewray the conſpiracie. Furthermore, Quintus Arrius, a man of authoritie, and that had bene Prætor, told openly the ſouldiers and men of warre that were leauied in THVSCAN. And it is reported alſo, that Manlius was in the field with a great number of ſouldiers about the cities of THVSCAN, gaping daily to heare newes of ſome chaunge at ROME. All theſe things being throughly conſidered, a decree paſſed by the Senate, that they ſhould referre the care of the common wealth vnto the Conſuls, to the end that with abſolute authoritie they might (as well as they could) prouide for the ſafetie and preſeruation thereof. Such manner of decree and authoritie, was not often ſeene concluded of in the Senate, but in time of preſent feare and daunger. Now Cicero hauing this abſolute power, he referred all forreine matters to Quintus Metellus charge, and did himſelf take vpon him the care and gouernement of all ciuill affaires within ROME. On the day time whẽ he went vp and downe the towne, he had ſuch a troupe of men after him, that when he came through the great market place, he almoſt filled it with his trayne that followed him. Thereupon Catiline would no longer delay time, but reſolued to go himſelfe vnto Manlius where their army lay. But before he departed, he had drawen into his confederacie one Martius, and an other called Cethegus, whom he commaunded betimes in the morning to go to Ciceroes houſe with ſhort daggers to kill him, pretending to come to ſalute him, & to giue him a good morow. But there was a noble womã of ROME, called Fuluia, who went ouer night vnto Cicero, and bad him beware of that Cethegus, who indeede came the next morning betimes vnto him: and being denied to be let in, he began to chafe and raile before the gate. This made him the more to be ſuſpected. In the end Cicero comming out of his houſe, called the Senate to the temple of Iupiter Stator, (as much to ſay, a ſtaire) which ſtandeth at the vpper end of the holy ſtreete as they go to the Mount Palatine. There was Catiline with others, as though he meant to cleare himſelfe of the ſuſpition that went of him: howbeit there was not a Senator that would ſit downe by him, but they did all riſe from the benche where Catiline had taken his place. And further, when he began to ſpeake, he could haue no audience for the great noyſe they made againſt him. So at length Cicero roſe, & commaunded him to auoid out of ROME: ſaying, that there muſt needes be a ſeparation of walles betweene them two, conſidering that the one vſed but wordes, and the other force of armes. Catiline thereupon immediatly departing the citie with three hundred armed men, was no ſooner out of the precinct of the walles, but he made his Sergeaunts cary axes and bundles of roddes before him, as if he had bene a Conſull lawfully created, & did diſplay his enſignes of warre, & ſo went in this order to ſeeke Manlius. When they were ioyned, he had not much leſſe then twenty thouſand men together, with the which he went to practiſe the townes to rebell. Now open warre being thus proclaimed, Antonius, Ciceroes colleage and fellow Conſul, was ſent againſt him to fight with him. In the meane ſpace, Cornelius Lentulus ſurnamed Sura (a man of a noble houſe, but of a wicked diſpoſition, and that for his ill life was put off the Senate) aſſembled all the reſt which were of Catilines conſpiracy, and that remained behind him in ROME, and bad them be affrayd of nothing. He was then Prætor the ſecond time, as the manner is when any man comes to recouer againe the dignitie of a Senator which he had loſt. It is reported that this ſurname of Sura was giuen him vpon this occaſion. He being Treaſurer in Syllaes Dictatorſhip, did fondly waſt & conſume a maruellous ſumme of money of the common treaſure. Sylla being offended with him for it, and demaunding an account of him before the Senate: he careleſly and contemptuouſly ſtepped forth, ſaying he could make him no other account, but ſhewed him the calfe of his legge, as children do, when they make a fault at tennys. And thereof it came that euer after that they called him Sura, becauſe Sura in Latin ſignifieth, the calfe of the legge. Another time alſo being accuſed for a lewde part he had committed, he bribed ſome of the Iudges with money, and being onely quit by two voyces more, which he had in his fauour, he ſayd he had loſt his money he had giuen to one of thoſe two Iudges, becauſe it was enough for him to be cleared by one voice more. This man being of this diſpoſition, was firſt of all incenſed by Catiline, and laſtly marred by certain wiſards & falſe prognoſticators that had mocked him with a vayne hope, ſinging verſes vnto him which they had fayned and deuiſed, and falſe prophecies alſo, which they bare him in hand they had taken out of Sybilles bookes of propheсie, which ſayd: that there ſhould raigne three Cornelij at ROME, of the which, two had already fulfilled the prophecie, Cinna and Sylla, and for the third, ſortune layd it vpon him, and therefore bad him go through withall, and not to dreame it out loſing oportunitie as Catiline had done. Now this Lentulus vndertooke no ſmall enterpriſe, but had an intent with him to kill all the whole Sanate, and as many other Citizens as they could murther, and to ſet fire of ROME, ſparing none but Pompeys ſonnes, whom they would reſerue for pledges, to make their peace afterwardes with Pompey. For the rumour was very great & certaine alſo, that he returned frō very great warres & conqueſts which he had made in the Eaſt countryes. So they layd a plot to put their treaſon in execution, in one of the nightes of Saturnes feaſtes. Further, they had brought flaxe and brimſtone, and a great number of armours and weapons into Cethegus houſe. Beſides all this prouiſion, they had appointed a hundred men in an hundred partes of the citie, to the end that fire being rayſed in many places at one time, it ſhould the ſooner runne through the whole citie. Other men alſo were appointed to ſtoppe the pypes and water conduits which brought water to ROME, and to kill thoſe alſo that came for water to quench the fire. In all this ſturre, by chaunce there were two Ambaſſadors of the ALLOBROGES, whoſe country at that time did much miſlike of the ROMAINES, & were vnwilling to be ſubiect vnto them. Lentulus thought theſe men very fit inſtruments to cauſe all GAVLE to rebell. Thereupon practiſing with them, he wanne them to be of their conſpiracie, and gaue them letters directed to the counſell of their country, & in them did promiſe them freedome. He ſent other letters alſo vnto Catiline, and perſwaded him to proclaime libertie to all bondmen, and to come with all the ſpeede he could to ROME: and ſent with them one Titus of the citie of CROTONA, to cary theſe letters. But all their counſels and purpoſes (like fooles that neuer met together but at feaſtes, drinking druncke with light women) were eaſily founde out by Cicero: who had a carefulll eye vpon them, and very wiſely and diſcreetly ſaw through them. For he had appointed men out of the citie to ſpy their doings, which followed them to ſee what they intended. Furthermore he ſpake ſecretly with ſome he truſted, (the which others alſo tooke to be of the conſpiracie) and knew by them that Lentulus and Cethegus had practiſed with the Ambaſſadours of the ALLOBROGES, and drawen them into their conſpiracie. At length he watched them one night ſo narrowly, that he tooke the Ambaſſadours, and Titus CROTONIAN with the letters he caried, by helpe of the Ambaſſadours of the ALLOBROGES, which had ſecretly informed him of all before. The next morning by breake of day, Cicero aſſembled the Senate in the temple of Concorde, and there openly read the letters, and heard the euidence of the witneſſes. Further, there was one Iunius Syllanus a Senator that gaue in euidence, that ſome heard Cethegus ſay they ſhould kill three Conſuls, and foure Prætors. Piſo a Senator alſo, and that had bene Conſull, told in manner the ſelfe ſame tale. And Caius Sulpitius a Prætor, that was ſent into Cethegus houſe, reported that he had found great ſtore of darts, armour, daggers and ſwords new made. Laſtly, the Senate hauing promiſed Titus CROTONIAN he ſhould haue no hurt, ſo he would tell what he knew of this conſpiracie: Lentulus thereby was conuinced, and driuen to giue vp his office of Prætor before the Senate, and chaunging his purple gowne, to take an other meete for his miſerable ſtate. This being done, Lentulus and his conſorts were committed to ward, to the Prætors houſes. Now growing towards euening, the people waiting about the place where the Senate was aſſembled, Cicero at length came out, and told them what they had done within. Thereupon he was conueyed by all the people vnto a friendes houſe of his hard by: for that his owne houſe was occupied by the Ladies of the citie, who were buſie ſolemnly celebrating a ſecret ſacrifice in the honour of the goddeſſe, called of the ROMAINES the good goddeſſe, and of the GRECIANS Gynæcia, to wit feminine: vnto her this yearely ſacrifice is done at the Conſuls houſe, by the wife or mother of the Conſull then being, the Veſtal Nunnes being preſent at it. Now Cicero being come into his neighbours houſe, begau to bethinke him what courſe he were beſt to take in this matter. For, to puniſh the offenders with ſeueritie, according to their deſerts, he was affrayd to do it: both becauſe he was of a curteous nature, as alſo for that he would not ſeeme to be glad to haue occaſion to ſhew his abſolute power and authoritie, to puniſh (as he might) with rigour, Citizens that were of the nobleſt houſes of the citie, & that had beſides many friendes.

And contrariwiſe alſo, being remiſſe in ſo waightie a matter as this, he was affrayd of the danger that might enſue of their raſhnes, miſtruſting that if he ſhould puniſh them with leſſe then death, they would not amend for it, imagining they were well rid of their trouble, but would rather become more bold and deſperate then euer they were: adding moreouer the ſtyng and ſpight of a new malice vnto their accuſtomed wickedneſſe, beſides that he himſelfe ſhould be thought a coward and timerous man, whereas they had already not much better opinion of him. Cicero being perplexed thus with theſe doubts, there appeared a miracle to the Ladies, doing ſacrifice at home in his houſe. For the fire that was thought to be cleane out vpon the aulter where they had ſacrificed, there ſodainely roſe out of the imbers of the ryend or barkes which they had burnt, a great bright flame, which amaſed all the other Ladies. Howbeit the Veſtall Nunnes willed Terentia (Ciceroes wife) to go ſtraight vnto her husband, & to bid him not to be affrayd to execute that boldly which he had conſidered of, for the benefit of the common wealth, and that the goddeſſe had raiſed this great flame, to ſhew him that he ſhould haue great honour by doing of it. Terentia, that was no timerous nor faint harted woman, but very ambitious, and furthermore had gotten more knowledge from her husband of the affaires of the ſtate, then otherwiſe ſhe had acquainted him with her houſewiuery in the houſe, as Cicero himſelfe reporteth: ſhe went to make report thereof vnto him, and prayed him to do execution of thoſe men. The like did Quintus Cicero his brother, and alſo Publius Nigidius, his friend and fellow ſtudent with him in Philoſophie, and whoſe counſell alſo Cicero followed much in the gouernement of the common wealth. The next morning, the matter being propounded to the arbiterment of the Senate, how theſe malefactours ſhould be puniſhed: Syllanus being asked his opinion firſt, ſayd that they ſhould be put in priſon, and from thence to ſuffer execution. Others likewiſe that followed him, were all of that minde, but Caius Cæſar, that afterwards came to be Dictator, and was then but a young man, and began to come forward, but yet ſuch a one, as by his behauiour & the hope he had, tooke ſuch a courſe, that afterwards he brought the common wealth of ROME into an abſolute Monarchie. For at that time, Cicero had vehement ſuſpicions of Cæſar, but no apparant proofe to conuince him. And ſome ſay, that it was brought ſo neare, as he was almoſt conuicted, but yet ſaued himſelfe. Other write to the contrary, that Cicero wittingly diſſẽbled, that he either heard or knew any ſignes which were told him againſt Cæſar, being affrayd indeed of his friends and eſtimation. For it was a cleare caſe, that if they had accuſed Cæſar with the reſt, he vndoubtedly had ſooner ſaued all their liues, then he ſhould haue loſt his owne. Now when Cæſar came to deliuer his opinion touching the puniſhment of theſe priſoners: he ſtood vp and ſayd, that he did not thinke it good to put them to death, but to confiſcate their goods: and as for their perſons, that they ſhould beſtow them in priſon, ſome in one place, ſome in an other, in ſuch cities of ITALIE, as pleaſed Cicero beſt, vntill the warre of Catilin were ended. This ſentence being very mild, and the author thereof maruellous eloquent to make it good: Cicero himſelfe added thereunto a counterpeaſe, inclining vnto either of both the opinions, partly allowing the firſt, and partly alſo the opinion of Cæſar. His friends thinking that Cæſars opinion was the ſafeſt for Cicero, becauſe thereby he ſhould deſerue leſſe blame for that he had not put the priſoners to death: they followed rather the ſecond. Whereupon Syllanus alſo recanted that he had ſpoken, and expounded his opinion: ſaying, that when he ſpake they ſhould be put to death, he meant nothing ſo, but thought the laſt puniſhment a Senatour of ROME could haue, was the priſon. But the firſt that contraried this opinion, was Catulus Luctatius, and after him Cato, who with vehement words enforced Cæſars ſuſpition, and furthermore filled all the Senate with wrath and courage: ſo that euen vpon the inſtant it was decreed by moſt voyces, that they ſhould ſuffer death. But Cæſar ſtept vp again, and ſpake againſt the confiſcation of their goods, miſliking that they ſhould reiect the gentleſt part of his opinion, and that contrariwiſe they ſhould ſticke vnto the ſeuereſt onely: howbeit becauſe the greateſt number preuailed againſt him, he called the Tribunes to ayde him, to the end they ſhould withſtand it: but they would giue no eare vnto him. Cicero thereupon yeelding of himſelfe, did remit the confiſcation of their goods, and went with the Senate to fetche the priſoners: who were not all in one houſe, but euery Prætor had one of them. So he went firſt to take C. Lentulus, who was in the Mount Palatine, and brought him through the holy ſtreete and the market place, accompanied with the chiefeſt men of the citie, who compaſſed him round about, and garded his perſon. The people ſeeing that, quaked and trembled for feare, paſſed by, and ſayd neuer a word: and ſpecially the young men, who thought it had bene ſome ſolemne miſterie for the health of their country, that was ſo accompanied with the chiefe Magiſtrate, and the noble men of the citie, with terrour and feare.

So when he had paſſed through the market place, and was come to the priſon, he deliuered Lentulus into the handes of the hangman, and commaunded him to do execution. Afterwardes alſo Cethegus, and then all the reſt one after an other, whom he brought to the priſon him ſelfe, and cauſed them to be executed. Furthermore, ſeeing diuers of their accomplices in a troupe together in the market place, who knew nothing what he had done, and watched onely till night were come, ſuppoſing then to take away their companions by force from the place where they were, thinking they were yet aliue: he turned vnto them, and ſpake aloud, they liued.

They liued: A word vſurped for the dead.

This is a phraſe of ſpeach which the ROMAINES vſe ſometime, when they will finely conuey the hardneſſe of the ſpeach, to ſay he is dead.

When night was come, and that he was going homeward, as he came through the market place, the people did wait vpon him no more with ſilence as before, but with great cryes of his prayſe, and clapping of handes in euery place he went, and called him Sauiour, and ſecond founder of ROME. Beſides all this, at euery mans doore there were lynckes and torches lighted, that it was as light in the ſtreetes, as at noone dayes. The very women alſo did put lightes out of the toppes of their houſes to do him honour, and alſo to ſee him ſo nobly brought home, with ſuch a long trayne of the chiefeſt men of the citie, (of the which many of them had ended great warres for the which they had triumphed, and had obteined many famous conqueſtes to the Empire of ROME, both by ſea and land) confeſsing between themſelues one to an other, that the ROMAINES were greatly bound to many Captaines and generals of armies in their time, for the wonderfull riches, ſpoyles, & increaſe of their power which they had wonne: howbeit that they were to thanke Cicero onely, for their health and preſeruation, hauing ſaued them from ſo great and extreme a daunger. Not for that they thought it ſo wonderfull an acte to haue ſtriken dead the enterpriſe of the conſpiratours, and alſo to haue puniſhed the offenders by death: but becauſe the conſpiracie of Catiline being ſo great and daungerous an inſurrection as euer was any, he had quenched it, and pluckt it vp by the rootes, with ſo ſmall hurt, and without vprore, trouble, or actuall ſedition. For, the moſt part of them that were gathered together about Catiline, when they heard that Lentulus and all the reſt were put to death, they preſently forſooke him:

and Catiline himſelfe alſo fighting a battell with them he had about him, againſt Antonius the other Conſull with Cicero, he was ſlayne in the field, and all his armie defeated.

Metellus and Beſtia, Tribunes of the people.

This notwithſtanding, there were many that ſpake ill of Cicero for this fact, and meant to make him repent it, hauing for their heades Cæſar, (who was already choſen Prætor for the yeare to come) Metellus & Beſtia, who ſhould alſo be choſen Tribunes. They, ſo ſoone as they were choſen Tribunes, would not once ſuffer Cicero to ſpeake to the people, notwithſtanding that he was yet in his office of Conſull for certaine dayes. And furthermore, to let him that he ſhould not ſpeake vnto the people, they did ſet their benches vpon the pulpit for orations, which they call at ROME, Roſtra: and would neuer ſuffer him to ſet foote in it, but onely to reſigne his office, and that done, to come downe againe immediatly. He graunted thereunto, and went vp to the pulpit vpon that condition.

So ſilence being made him, he made an othe, not like vnto other Conſuls othes when they reſigne their office in like manner, but ſtraunge, and neuer heard of before: ſwearing, that he had ſaued the citie of ROME, and preſerued all his country and the Empire of ROME from vtter ruine and deſtruction. All the people that were preſent, confirmed it, and ſware the like othe. Wherewith all Cæſar and the other Tribunes his enemies were ſo offended with him, that they deuiſed to breed him ſome new ſturre and trouble: & amongeſt others, they made a decree, that Pompey ſhould be ſent for with his army to bridle the tyranny of Cicero. Cato, (who at that time was alſo Tribune) did him great pleaſure in the furtherance of the common wealth, oppoſing himſelfe againſt all their practiſes, with the like authoritie and power that they had, being a Tribune and brother with them, and of better eſtimation then they.

So that he did not onely eaſily breake all their deuiſes, but alſo in a goodly oration he made in a full aſſembly of the people, he ſo highly prayſed and extolled Ciceroes Conſulſhip vnto them, and the things he did in his office: that they gaue him the greateſt honours that euer were decreed or graunted vnto any man liuing. For by decree of the people he was called, father of the country, as Cato himſelfe had called him in his oration: the which name was neuer giuen to any man, but onely vnto him, & alſo he bare greater ſway in ROME at that time, then any man beſide him. This notwithſtanding, he made himſelfe enuyed and miſliked of many men, not for any ill acte he did, or meant to do: but onely becauſe he did too much boaſt of himſelfe. For he neuer was in any aſſembly of people, Senate, or iudgement, but euery mans head was full ſtill to heare the ſound of Catulus and Lentulus brought in for ſport, and filling the bookes and workes he compiled beſides full of his owne prayſes: the which made his ſweet and pleaſant ſtile, tedious, and troubleſome to thoſe that heard them, as though this misfortune euer followed him to take away his excellent grace. But now, though he had this worme of ambition, and extreme couetous deſire of honor in his head, yet did he not malice or enuie any others glory, but would very franckly prayſe excellent men, as well thoſe that had bene before him, as thoſe that were in his time. And this appeareth plainly in his writings. They haue written alſo certaine notable wordes he ſpake of ſome auncient men in old time, as of Ariſtotle: that he was like a golden flowing riuer: and of Plato, that if Iupiter himſelfe would ſpeake, he would ſpeake like him: and of Theophraſtus, he was wont to call him his delight: & of Demoſthenes orations, when one asked him on a time which of them he liked beſt: the longeſt ſayd he. There be diuers writers alſo, who to ſhew that they were great followers of Demoſthenes, do follow Ciceroes ſaying in a certaine epiſtle he wrote vnto one of his friends, wherein he ſaid that Demoſthenes ſlept in ſome of his orations: but yet they forget to tell how highly he prayſed him in that place, and that he calleth the orations which he wrote againſt Antonius (in the which he tooke great paines, and ſtudied more then all the reſt) PHILIPPIANS: to follow thoſe which Demoſthenes wrote againſt Philip king of MACEDON. Furthermore, there was not a famous man in all his time, either in eloquence, or in learning, whoſe fame he hath not commended in writing, or otherwiſe in honourable ſpeach of him. For he obteined of Cæſar, when he had the Empire of ROME in his hands, that Cratippus the PERIPATICKE Philoſopher was made Citizen of ROME. Further, he procured that by decree of the court of the Areopagites, he was intreated to remaine at ATHENS, to teach and inſtruct the youth there: for that he was a great honour and ornament vnto their citie. There are extant alſo of Ciceroes epiſtles vnto Herodes, & others vnto his ſonne, willing him to follow Cratippus in his ſtudie and knowledge. He wrote an other letter alſo vnto Gorgias the Rethoritian, and forbad him his ſonnes companie: becauſe he vnderſtood he intiſed him to drunkenneſſe, and to other great diſhoneſty. Of all his epiſtles he wrote in Greeke, there is but that only written in choller, and an other which he wrote vnto Pelops BYZANTINE. And for that he wrote to Gorgias, he had great reaſon to be offended with him, and to taunt him in his letter: becauſe (as it ſeemed) he was a man of very lewde life and conuerſation. But in contrary manner, writing as he did to Pelops, finding himſelfe grieued with him, for that he was negligent in procuring the BYZANTINES to ordeine ſome publike honours in his behalfe: that me thinks proceeded of ouermuch ambition, the which in many things made him too much forget the part of an honeſt man, and onely becauſe he would be commended for his eloquence. When he had on a time pleaded Munatius cauſe before the Iudges, who ſhortly after accuſed Sabinus a friend of his: it is reported that he was ſo angry with him, that he told him, what Munatius, haſt thou forgottẽ that thou wert diſcharged the laſt day of thine accuſatiõ, not for thine innocencie, but for a miſt I caſt before the Iudges eyes, that made them they could not diſcerne the fault? An other time alſo, hauing openly prayſed Marcus Craſſus in the pulpit, with good audience of the people: ſhortly after he ſpake to the contrary, all the euill he could of him, in the ſame place. Why, how now, ſayd Craſſus: didſt thou not thy ſelfe highly prayſe me in this place, the laſt day? I cã not deny it, ſayd Cicero: but indeed I tooke an ill matter in hand to ſhew mine eloquence. An other time Craſſus chaunced to ſay in an open aſſembly, that none of all the Craſſi of his houſe that euer liued aboue lx. yeares: and afterwardes againe repenting him ſelfe, he called it in againe, and ſayd, Sure I knew not what I did, when I ſayd ſo. Cicero aun-ſwered him againe : thou kneweſt well enough the people were glad to heare it, and therefore ſpakeſt it to pleaſe them. An other time Craſſus liking the opinion of the Stoicke Philoſophers, that ſayd the wiſe man was euer rich: Cicero aunſwered him, and bad him conſider whether they meant not thereby, that the wiſe man had all things. Craſſus couetouſneſſe was defamed of euery man. Of Craſſus ſonnes, one of them did much reſemble Actius, and therefore his mother had an ill name by him: one day this ſonne of Craſſus made an Oration before the Senate, which diuers of them commended very much. So, Cicero being asked how he liked it: me thinkes, ſayd he, it is* Actius of Craſſus. About this time, Craſſus being ready to take his iourney into SYRIA, he deſired to haue Cicero his friend, rather then his enemy. Therefore one night making much of him, he told Cicero that he would come and ſuppe with him. Cicero ſayd he ſhould be welcome. Shortly after ſome of his friendes told him of Vatinius, how he was deſirous to be made friendes with him, for he was his enemy. What, quoth Cicero, & will he come to ſupper too? Thus he vſed Craſſus. Now this Vatinius hauing a ſwollen necke, one day pleading before Cicero: he called him the ſwollen Oratour. An other time when he heard ſay that he was dead, and then that he was aliue againe: a vengeance on him, ſayd he, that hath lyed ſo ſhamefully. An other time when Caſar had made a law for the deuiding of the landes of CAMPANIA vnto the ſouldiers: diuers of the Senate were angry with him for it, and among other, Lucius Gellius (a very old man) ſayd, he would neuer graunt it while he liued. Cicero pleaſantly aunſwered againe, alas, tary a litle, the good old man will not trouble you long. An other time there was one Octauius, ſuppoſed to be* an AFRICAN borne. He when Cicero on a time pleaded a matter, ſayd that he heard him not: Cicero preſently aunſwered him againe, and yet haſt thou a hole bored through thine eare. An other time Metellus Nepos told him, that he had ouerthrowen mo men by his witneſſe, then he had ſaued by his eloquence. I graunt ſayd Cicero, for indeede I haue more fayth, then eloquence in me. So was there alſo a young man that was ſuſpected to haue poyſoned his father with a tarte, that boaſted he would reuile Cicero: I had rather haue that of thee, quoth Cicero, then thy tarte. Publius Sextius alſo hauing a matter before the Iudges, enterteined Cicero, with other of his Counſellers: but yet he would ſpeake all himſelfe, and giue none of the Oratours leaue to ſay any thing. In the end, when they ſaw plainly that the Iudges would diſcharge him, being ready to giue ſentence: Cicero ſayd vnto him, beſturre thee hardily to day for to morrow Sextius thou ſhalt be a priuate man. An other, one Publius Scotta, who would faine haue bene thought a wiſe Lawyer, and yet had litle wit and vnderſtanding: Cicero appealed to him as a witneſſe in a matter, and being examined, he aunſwered he knew nothing of it. Cicero replied to him againe: thou thinkeſt peraduenture they aske thee touching the law. Againe, Metellus Nepos, in a certaine diſputation he had with Cicero, did many times repeate, who is thy father? Cicero anſwered him againe: thy mother hath made this queſtion harder for thee to aunſwere. This Nepos mother was reported to be a light houſewife, and he as ſubtil witted and vnconſtant. For he being Tribune, left in a geere the exerciſe of his office, and went into SYRIA to Pompey, vpon no occaſion: and as fondly againe he returned thence, vpon a ſodaine. His Schoolemaiſter Philager alſo being dead, he buried him very honeſtly, and ſet a crow of ſtone vpon the toppe of his tombe. Cicero finding it, told him thou haſt done very wiſely: for thy Maiſter hath taught thee rather to flie, then to ſpeake. An other time Appius Clodius pleading a matter, ſayd in his preamble that his friend had earneſtly requeſted him to employ all his knowledge, diligence, and faith vpon this matter. O goddes, ſayd Cicero, and haſt thou ſhewed thy ſelfe ſo hard harted to thy friend, that thou haſt performed none of all theſe he requeſted thee? Now to vſe theſe fine taunts and girds to his enemies, it was a part of a good Oratour: but ſo commonly to gird euery man to make the people laugh, that wanne him great ill will of many, as ſhall appeare by ſome examples I will tell you. Marcus Aquinius had two ſonnes in law, who were both baniſhed: Cicero therefore called him Adraſtus. Lucius Cotta by chaunce alſo was Cenſor at that time, when Cicero ſued to be Conſull: and being there at the day of the election, he was a thirſt, and was driuen to drinke. But while he dranke, all his friends ſtood about him, and after he had drunke, he ſayd vnto them. It is well done of ye, ſayd he, to be affrayed leaſt the Cenſor ſhould be angry with me, becauſe I drinke water: for it was reported the Cenſor loued wine well. An other time Cicero meeting one Voconius, with three fowle daughters of his with him, he cryed out aloud:

It was thought in ROME that Marcus Gellius was not borne of free parents by father and mother, who reading certaine letters one day in the Senate very loude: Cicero ſayd vnto them that were about him, wonder not at it, quoth he, for this man hath bene a cryer in his dayes. Fauſtus, the ſonne of Sylla Dictator at ROME, which ſet vp billes outlawing diuers ROMAINES, making it lawfull for any man to kill them without daunger where they founde them; this man after he had ſpent the moſt part of his fathers goodes, was ſo ſore in debt, that he was driuen to ſell his houſbold ſtuffe, by billes ſet vp on euery poſt. Cicero when he ſaw them, yea mary ſayd he, theſe billes pleaſe me better, then thoſe which his father ſet vp. Theſe tauntes and common quippes without purpoſe, made diuers men to malice him. The great ill will that Clodius bare him, began vpon this occaſion. Clodius was of a noble houſe, a young man, and very wild and inſolent. He being in loue with Pompeia Cæſars wife, founde the meanes ſecretly to get into Cæſars houſe, apparelled like a young ſinging wenche, becauſe on that day the Ladyes of ROME did ſolemnly celebrate a ſecret ſacrifice in Cæſars houſe, which is not lawfull for men to be preſent at. So there was no man there but Clodius, who thought he ſhould not haue bene knowen, becauſe he was but a young man without any haire on his face, and that by this meanes he might come to Pompeia amongeſt the other women. He being gotten into this great houſe by night, not knowing the roomes and chambers in it: there was one of Cæſars mothers maydes of her chamber called Aurelia, who ſeeing him wandring vp and downe the houſe in this ſort, asked him what he was, and how they called him. So being forced to aunſwere, he ſayd he ſought for Aura, one of Pompeias maides. The maide perceiued ſtraight it was no womans voyce, and there withall gaue a great ſhriche, and called the other women: the which did ſee the gates faſt ſhut, and then ſought euery corner vp and downe, ſo that at length they founde him in the maides chamber, with whom he came in. His offence was ſtraight blowen abroad in the citie, whereupon Cæſar put his wife away: and one of the Tribunes alſo accuſed Clodius, and burdened him that he had prophaned the holy ceremonies of the ſacrifices. Cicero at that time was yet his friend, being one that had very friendly done for him at all times, and had euer accompanied him to garde him, if any man would haue offered him iniurie in the buſie time of the conſpiracie of Catiline. Clodius ſtoutly denied the matter he was burdened with, and ſayd that he was not in ROME at that time, but farre from thence. Howbeit Cicero gaue euidence againſt him, and depoſed, that the ſelfe ſame day he came home to his houſe vnto him, to ſpeake with him about certaine matters. This indeede was true, though it ſeemeth Cicero gaue not this euidence ſo much for the truthes ſake, as to pleaſe his wife Terentia: for ſhe hated Clodius to the death, becauſe of his ſiſter Clodia that would haue maried Cicero, and did ſecretly practiſe the mariage by one Tullius, who was Ciceroes very friend, and becauſe he repayred very often to this Clodia that dwelt hard by Cicero, Terentia began to ſuſpect him. Terentia being a cruell woman, and wearing her huſbandes breeches: allured Cicero to ſet vpon Clodius in his aduerſitie, and to witneſſe againſt him, as many other honeſt men of the citie alſo did: Some that he was periured, others that he committed a thouſand lewde partes, that he bribed the people with money, that he had intiſed and deflowred many women. Lucullus alſo brought forth certaine maydens which depoſed that Clodius had deflowred the youngeſt of his owne ſiſters, ſhe being in houſe with him, and maried. And there went a great rumour alſo, that he knew his two other ſiſters, of the which the one was called * Terentia, and maried vnto king Martius: and the other Clodia, whom Metellus Celer had maried, & whom they commonly called Quadrantaria: becauſe one of her Paramours ſent her a purſe full of quadrynes (which are litle peeces of copper money) in ſtead of ſiluer. Clodius was ſlaundered more by her, then with any of the other two. Notwithſtãding, the people were very much offended with them, that gaue euidence againſt him, and accuſed him. The Iudges being affrayed of it, got a great number of armed men about them, at the day of his iudgement, for the ſafetie of their perſons:

and in the tables where they wrote their ſentences, their letters for the moſt part were confuſedly ſet down. This notwithſtanding, it was found that he was quit by the greateſt number: and it was reported alſo that ſome of them were cloſe fiſted. Catulus therefore meeting with ſome of them going home, after they had giuen their ſentence, told them: ſurely ye had good reaſon to be well garded for your ſafetie, for you were affrayed your money ſhould haue bene takē from you, which you tooke for bribes. And Cicero ſaid vnto Clodius, who reproued him that his witneſſe was not true he gaue againſt him: cleane contrary, quoth Cicero, for fiue and twentie of the Iudges haue beleeued me, being ſo many that haue condemned thee, and the thirty would not beleeue thee, for they would not quit thee before they had fingered money. Notwithſtandig, in this iudgement Cæſar neuer gaue euidence againſt Clodius: & ſaid moreouer, that he did not thinke his wife had committed any adultery, howbeit that he had put her away, becauſe he would that Cæſars wife ſhould not onely be cleane from any diſhoneſtly, but alſo voide of all ſuſpition. Clodius being quit of this accuſation & trouble, & hauing alſo foūd meanes to be choſen Tribune: he began ſtraight to perſecute Cicero, chaunging all things, and ſtirring vp all manner of people againſt him. Firſt he wanne the good will of the common people by deuiſing of new lawes which he preferred, for their benefite and commoditie: to both the Conſuls he graunted great and large Prouinces: vnto Piſo, MACEDON, and to Gabinius, SYRIA. He made alſo many poore men free Citizens, and had alwayes about him a great number of ſlaues armed. At that preſent time there were three notable men in ROME, which caried all the ſway: Craſſus, that ſhewed himſelfe an open enemie vnto Cicero: Pompey the other, made much both of the one and the other: the third was Cæſar, who was prepared for his iorney into GAVLE with an army. Cicero did leane vnto him, (though he knew him no faſt friend of his, and that he miſtruſted him for matters paſt in Catilines conſpiracie) and prayed him that he might go to the warres with him, as one of his Lieutenants. Cæſar graunted him. Thereupon Clodius perceiuing that by this meanes he got him out of the daunger of his office of Tribuneſhip for that yeare, he made fayre weather with him (as though he meant to reconcile himſelfe vnto him) and told him that he had cauſe rather to thinke ill of Terentia, for that he had done againſt him, then of himſelfe, and alwayes ſpake very curteouſly of him as occaſion fell out, and ſayd he did thinke nothing in him, neither had any malice to him, howbeit it did a litle grieue him, that being a friend, he was offered vnkindneſſe by his friend. Theſe ſweete wordes made Cicero no more affrayed, ſo that he gaue vp his Lieutenancie vnto Cæſar, and began againe to pleade as he did before. Cæſar tooke this in ſuch diſdaine, that he hardned Clodius the more againſt him, and beſides, made Pompey his enemy. And Cæſar himſelfe alſo ſayd before all the people, that he thought Cicero had put Lentulus, Cethegus, and the reſt, vniuſtly to death, and contrary to law, without lawfull triall and condemnation. And this was the fault for the which Cicero was openly accuſed. Thereupon Cicero ſeeing himſelfe accuſed for this fact, he chaunged his vſuall gowne he wore, and put on a mourning gowne: and ſo ſuffering his beard and haire of his head to grow without any combing, he went in this humble manner, and ſued to the people. But Clodius was euer about him in euery place and ſtreete he went, hauing a ſight of raſcals and knaues with him that ſhamefully mocked him for that he had chaunged his gowne and countenance in that ſort, and oftentimes they caſt durt and ſtones at him, breaking his talke and requeſtes he made vnto the people. This notwithſtanding, all the Knights of ROME did in manner chaunge their gownes with him for companie, and of them there were commonly twentie thouſand young Gentlemen of noble houſe which followed him with their haire about their eares & were ſuters to the people for him. Furthermore, the Senate aſſembled to decree that the people ſhould mourne in blackes, as in a common calamitie: But the Conſuls were againſt it. And Clodius on the other ſide was with a band of armed mē about the Senate, ſo that many of the Senators ranne out of the Senate, crying, & tearing their clothes for ſorow. Howbeit theſe men ſeeing all that, were nothing the more moued with pitie and ſhame: but either Cicero muſt needes abſent himſelf, or elſe determine to fight with Clodius. Then went Cicero to intreat Pompey to ayde him: But he abſented himſelfe of purpoſe out of the citie, becauſe he would not be intreated, and lay at one of his houſes in the countrey, neare vnto the citie of

Alba. So he firſt of all ſent Piſo his ſonne in law vnto him to intreate him, and afterwardes went himſelfe in perſon to him. But Pompey being told that he was come, had not the hart to ſuffer him to come to him, to looke him in the face: for he had bene paſt all ſhame to haue refuſed the requeſt of ſo worthy a man, who had before ſhewed him ſuch pleaſure, and alſo done and ſayd ſo many things in his fauour. Howbeit Pompey being the ſonne in law of Cæſar, did vnfortunately (at his requeſt) forſake him at his neede, vnto whom he was bounde for ſo many infinite pleaſures, as he had receiued of him afore: and therefore when he heard ſay he came to him, he went out at his backe gate and would not ſpeake with him. So Cicero ſeeing himſelfe betrayed of him, and now hauing no other refuge to whom he might repayre vnto: he put himſelfe into the handes of the two Conſuls. Of them two, Gabinius was euer cruell, and churliſh vnto him. But Piſo on the other ſide ſpake alwayes very curteouſly vnto him, and prayed him to abſent himſelfe for a time, and to giue place a litle to Clodius furie, and patiently to beare the chaunge of the time: For in ſo doing, he might come againe an other time to be the preſeruer of his country, which was now for his ſake in tumult and ſedition. Cicero vpon this aunſwere of the Conſull, conſulted with his friendes: among the which Lucullus gaue him aduiſe to tary, and ſayd that he ſhould be the ſtronger. But all the reſt were of contrary opinion, and would haue him to get him away with ſpeede: for the people would ſhortly wiſh for him againe, when they had once bene beaten with Clodius furie and folly. Cicero liked beſt to follow this counſell. Whereupon hauing had a ſtatue of Minerua a long time in his houſe, the which he greatly reuerenced: he caried her himſelfe, and gaue her to the Capitoll with this inſcription: Vnto Minerua, Protector of Rome. So, his friends hauing giuen him ſafe cōduct, he went out of Rome about midnight, and tooke his way through the countrey of Lvke by land, meaning to go into Sicile. When it was knowen in Rome that he was fled, Clodius did preſently baniſh him by decree of the people, and cauſed billes of inhibition to be ſet vp, that no man ſhould ſecretly receiue him within fiue hundred myles compaſſe of Italie. Howbeit diuers men reuerencing Cicero, made no reckoning of that inhibition: but when they had vſed him with all manner of curteſie poſsible, they did conduct him beſides at his departure, ſauing one citie onely in Lvke, called at that time Hipponivm, and now Vibone: where a Sicilian called Vibius, (vnto whom Cicero before had done many pleaſures, and ſpecially among others, had made him Maiſter of the workes in the yeare that he was Conſull) would not once receiue him into his houſe, but promiſed him he would appoint him a place in the country that he might go vnto. And Caius Virgilius alſo, at that time Prætor and gouernour of Sicile, who before had ſhewed himſelfe his very great friend: wrote then vnto him, that he ſhould not come neare vnto Sicile. This grieued him to the hart. Thereupon he went directly vnto the citie of Brvndvsivm, and there imbarked to paſſe ouer the ſea vnto Dyrrachivm, and at the firſt had wind at will: but when he was in the mayne ſea, the wind turned, and brought him backe againe to the place from whence he came. But after that, he hoyſed ſayle againe, and the report went, that at his arriuall at Dyrrachivm when he tooke land, the earth ſhooke vnder him, and the ſea gaue backe together: Whereby the Soothſayers interpreted, that his exile ſhould not be long, becauſe both the one and the other was a token of chaunge. Yet Cicero, notwithſtanding that many men came to ſee him for the good will they bare him, and that the cities of Grece contended who ſhould moſt honour him, he was alwayes ſad, and could not be merie, but caſt his eyes ſtill towardes Italie, as paſsioned louers do towardes the women the loue: ſhewing himſelfe faint harted, and tooke this aduerſitie more baſely, then was looked for of one ſo well ſtudied and learned as he. And yet he oftentimes prayed his friends, not to call him Orator, but rather Philoſopher: ſaying, that Philoſophie was his chiefeſt profeſsion, and that for his eloquence he did not vſe it, but as a neceſſary inſtrument to one that pleadeth in the common wealth. But glory, and opinion, hath great power to take mans reaſon from him, euen like a colour, from the mindes of them that are cōmō pleaders in matters of ſtate, and to make them feele the ſelfe ſame paſsions that common people do, by dayly frequenting their companie: vnleſſe they take great heede of them, and that they come to practiſe in the common wealth with this reſolute minde , to haue to do with the like matters that the common people haue, but not to entangle themſelues with the like paſsions and moodes, by the which their matters do riſe. Now Clodius was not contented that he had baniſhed Cicero out of Italie, but further he burnt all his houſes in the countrey, and his houſe alſo in Rome ſtanding in the market place, of the which he built a temple of libertie, and cauſed his goodes to be ſold by the cryer: ſo that the cryer was occupied all day long crying the goodes to be ſold, and no man offered to buy any of them. The chiefeſt men of the citie beginning to be affrayed of theſe violent partes, and hauing the common people at his commaundement, whom he had made very bold and inſolent: he began to inuey againſt Pompey, and ſpake ill of his doings in the time of his warres, the which euery man elſe but himſelfe did commend. Pompey then was very angry with himſelfe that he had ſo forſaken Cicero, and repented him of it, and by his friends procured all the meanes he could to call him home againe from his baniſhmẽt. Clodius was againſt it all he could. The Senate notwithſtanding with one full conſent ordeined, that nothing ſhould be eſtabliſhed for the common wealth, before Ciceroes baniſhment were firſt repealed. Lentulus was at that time Conſull, and there grew ſuch an vprore and ſturre vpon it, that ſome of the Tribunes were hurt in the market place, and Quintus Cicero (the brother of Cicero) was ſlaine and hidden vnder the dead bodies. Then the people began to chaunge their mindes. And Annius Milo, one of the Tribunes, was the firſt man that durſt venture vpon Clodius, and bring him by force to be tryed before the Iudges. Pompey himſelfe alſo hauing gotten a great number of men about him, aſwell of the citie of Rome as of other townes adioyning to it, being ſtrongly garded with them: he came out of his houſe, and compelled Clodius to get him out of the market place, and then called the people to giue their voyces, for the calling home againe of Cicero. It is reported that the people neuer paſſed thing with ſo great good will, nor ſo wholly together, as the returne of Cicero. And the Senate for their partes alſo, in the behalfe of Cicero, ordeined that the cities which had honored and receiued Cicero in his exile, ſhould be greatly commended: and that his houſes which Clodius had ouerthrowen and raſed, ſhould be reedified at the charge of the common wealth. So Cicero returned the ſixteenth moneth after his baniſhment, and the townes and cities he came by, ſhewed themſelues ſo ioyfull of his returne, that all manner of men went to meete and honour him, with ſo great loue and affection, that Ciceroes report thereof afterwardes came indeede ſhort of the very truth as it was. For he ſayd, that Italia brought him into Rome vpon their ſhoulders. In ſomuch as Craſſus himſelfe, who before his baniſhment was his enemy, went then with very good will vnto him, and became his friend, ſaying: that he did it for the loue of his ſonne, who loued Cicero with all his hart. Now Cicero being returned, he found a time when Clodius was out of the citie, and went with a good company of his friends vnto the Capitoll, and there tooke away the tables, and brake them, in the which Clodius had written all his actes that he had paſſed and done in the time of his Tribuneſhip. Clodius would afterwardes haue accuſed Cicero for it: But Cicero aunſwered him, that he was not lawfully created Tribune, becauſe he was of the Patricians, and therefore all that he had done in his Tribuneſhip was voide, and of none effect. Therewith Cato was offended, and ſpake againſt him, not for that he liked of Clodius doings: (but to the contrary, vtterly miſliked all that he did) but becauſe he thought it out of all reaſon, that the Senate ſhould cancell all thoſe things which he had done and paſſed in his Tribuneſhip, and ſpecially, becauſe amongeſt the reſt that was there which he himſelfe had done in the Ile of Cyprus, and in the citie of Byzantium. Hereupon there grew ſome ſtraungeneſſe betwixt Cicero and Cato, the which notwithſtanding brake not out to open enmitie: but onely to an abſtinence of their wonted familiaritie, and acceſſe one to an other. Shortly after, Milo ſlue Clodius. Milo being accuſed of murther, prayed Cicero to plead his cauſe. The Senate fearing that this accuſation of Milo, (who was a hardie man, and of qualitie beſides) would moue ſome ſedition and vprore in the citie: they gaue commiſsion to Pompey to ſee iuſtice executed aſwell in this cauſe, as in other offences, that the citie might be quiet, and iudgement alſo executed with ſafetie. Thereupon Pompey the night before tooke the higheſt places of the market place, by his ſouldiers that were armed, whom he placed thereabout. Milo fearing that Cicero would be affrayed to ſee ſuch a number of harneſt men about him, being no vſuall matter, and that it might peraduenture hinder him to pleade his cauſe well: he prayed him he would come betimes in the morning in his litter into the market place, and there to ſtay the comming of the Iudges, till the place were full. For Cicero was not onely fearefull in warres, but timerous alſo in pleading. For indeede he neuer began to ſpeake, but it was in feare: and when his eloquence was come to the beſt proofe and perfection, he neuer left his trembling and timerouſneſſe. In ſomuch that pleading a caſe for Mutius Murana (accuſed by Cato,) ſtriuing to excell Hortenſius, whoſe pleading was very well thought of: he tooke no reſt all night, and what through watching, and the trouble of his minde he was not very well, ſo that he was not ſo well liked for his pleading, as Hortenſius. So, going to defend Miloes cauſe, when he came out of his litter, and ſaw P*ompey* ſet aloft as if he had bene in a campe, and the market place compaſſed about with armed men, gliſtering in euery corner: it ſo amated him, that he could ſcant faſhion himſelfe to ſpeake, all the partes of him did ſo quake and tremble, and his voyce could not come to him. But Milo on the other ſide ſtood boldly by him himſelfe, without any feare at all of the iudgement of his cauſe, neither did he let his haire grow, as other men accuſed did: neither did he weare any mourning gowne, the which was (as it ſeemed) one of the chiefeſt cauſes that condemned him. Yet many held opinion that this timerouſneſſe of Cicero came rather of the good will he bare vnto his friendes, then of any cowardly minde of himſelfe. He was alſo choſen one of the Prieſtes of the Soothſayers, which they call Augures, in the roome of P. Craſſus the younger, who was ſlaine in the Realme of PARTHIA. Afterwardes, the prouince of CILICIA being appointed to him, with an armie of twelue thouſand footemen, and two thouſand fiue hundred horſemen, he tooke the ſea to go thither. So when he was arriued there, he brought CAPPADOCIA againe into the ſubiection and obedience of king Ariobarzanes according to his commiſsion and commaundement giuen by the Senate: moreouer, both there and elſewhere he tooke as excellent good order as could be deuiſed, in reducing of things to quietneſſe without warres. Furthermore, finding that the CILICIANS were growen ſomewhat ſtout and vnruly, by the ouerthrow the ROMAINES had of the PARTHIANS, and by reaſon of the riſing and rebellion in SYRIA: he brought them vnto reaſon by gentle perſwaſions, and neuer receiued giftes that were ſent him, no not from Kinges and Princes. Furthermore, he did diſburden the prouinces of the feaſtes and banckets they were wont to make other gouernours before him. On the other ſide alſo, he would euer haue the company of good and learned men at his table, and would vſe them well, without curioſitie and exceſſe. He had neuer porter to his gate, nor was ſeene by any man in his bed: For he would alwayes riſe at the breake of day, and would walke or ſtand before his doore. He would curteouſly receiue all them that came to ſalute and viſite him. Further they report of him, that he neuer cauſed man to be beaten with roddes, nor to teare his owne garments. In his anger he neuer reuiled any man, neither did deſpightfully ſet fine vpon any mans head. Finding many things alſo belonging to the common wealth, which priuate men had ſtollen and imbecelled to their owne vſe: he reſtored againe vnto the cities, whereby they grew very rich and wealthy: and yet did ſaue their honor and credit that had taken them away, and did them no other hurt, but onely conſtrained them to reſtore that which was the common wealthes. He made a litle warre alſo, and draue away the theeues that kept about the Mountaine Amanus, for the which exploit his ſouldiers called him Imperator, to ſay, chiefe Captaine. About that time there was an Orator called Cæcilius, who wrote vnto him from ROME, to pray him to ſend him ſome Leoperds, or Panthers out of CILICIA, becauſe he would ſhew the people ſome paſtime with them. Cicero boaſting of his doings, wrote to him againe, that there were no more Leoperds in CILICIA, but that they were all fled into CARIA for anger, that ſeeing all things quiet in CILICIA, they had leaſure now to hunt them. So when he returned towardes ROME, from the charge of his gouernement, he came by RHODES and ſtayed a few dayes at ATHENS, with great delight, to remember how pleaſauntly he liued there before, at what time he ſtudied there. Thither came to him the chiefeſt learned men of the citie, and his friends alſo, with whom he was acquainted at his firſt being there. In fine, hauing receiued all the honorable enterteinmẽt in GRECE that could be: he returned vnto ROME, where at his arriuall he found great factions kindled, the which men ſaw plainly would grow in the end to ciuill warre. Thereupon the Senate hauing decreed that he ſhould enter in triumphe into the citie: he aunſwered, that he would rather (all parties agreed) follow Cæſars coche in triumphe. So he trauelled very earneſtly betweene Pompey and Cæſar, eftſoones writing vnto Cæſar, & alſo ſpeaking vnto Pompey that was preſent, ſeeking all the meanes he could, to take vp the quarrell and miſliking betwixt them two. But it was ſo impoſsible a matter, that there was no ſpeach of agreement would take place. So Pompey hearing that Cæſar was not farre from ROME, he durſt no longer abide in ROME, but fled with diuers of the greateſt men in ROME. Cicero would not follow him whẽ he fled, and therefore men thought he would take part with Cæſar: but this is certaine, that he was in a maruellous perplexitie, and could not eaſely determine what way to take. Whereupon he wrote in his Epiſtles: what way ſhould I take? Pompey hath the iuſter and honeſter cauſe of warre, but Cæſar can better execute, and prouide for himſelfe and his friendes with better ſafetie: ſo that I haue meanes enough to flie, but none to whom I might repaire. In all this ſturre, there was one of Cæſars friends called Trebatius, which wrote a letter vnto Cicero, and told him that Cæſar wiſhed him in any caſe to come to him, and to run with him the hope and fortune he vndertooke: but if he excuſed himſelfe by his age, that then he ſhould get him into GRECE, & there to be quiet from them both. Cicero maruelling that Cæſar wrote not to him himſelfe, aunſwered in anger, that he would do nothing vnworthy of his actes all the dayes of his life thitherto: and to this effect he wrote in his letters. Now Cæſar being gone into SPAYNE, Cicero imbarked immediatly to go to Pompey. So when he came vnto him, euery man was very glad of his comming, but Cato. Howbeit Cato ſecretly reproued him for comming vnto Pompey, ſaying: that for himſelfe he had bene without all honeſty at that time to haue forſaken that part, the which he had alwayes taken and followed from the beginning of his firſt practiſe in the commõ wealth: but for him on the other ſide, that it had bene better for the ſafetie of his country, and chiefly for all his friends, that he had bene a newter to both, & ſo to haue taken things as they had fallen out: and that he had no manner of reaſon nor inſtant cauſe to make him to become Cæſars enemie, and by comming thither to put himſelfe into ſo great perill. Theſe perſwaſions of Cato ouerthrew all Ciceroes purpoſe and determination, beſides that Pompey himſelfe did not employe him in any matter of ſeruice or importance. But hereof himſelfe was more in fault then Pompey, becauſe he confeſſed openly that he did repent him he was come thither. Furthermore, he ſcorned and diſdained all Pompeys preparations and counſels, the which indeede made him to be had in ielouſie and ſuſpition. Alſo he would euer be fleering and gybing at thoſe that tooke Fompeys part, though he had no liſt himſelfe to be merie. He would alſo go vp and downe the campe very ſad and heauie, but yet he would euer haue one ieſt or other to make men laugh, although they had as litle luſt to be merie as he: and ſurely, it ſhall do no hurt to call ſome of them to minde in this place. Domitius being very deſirous to preferre a gentleman to haue charge of men, to recommende him, he ſayd he was an honeſt, wiſe, and ſober man. Whereto Cicero preſently anſwered: Why doeſt thou not keepe him thẽ to bring vp thy children? An other time when they commended Theophanes LESBIAN, (that was maiſter of all the artificers of the campe) becauſe he had notablie comforted the RHODIANS when they had receiued a great loſſe of their nauy: ſee, ſayd Cicero, what a goodly thing it is to haue a GRECIAN, maiſter of artificers in the campe? When both battels came to ioyne together, and that Cæſar had in manner all the aduantage, and kept them as good as beſieged: Lentulus told him on a time, that he heard ſay all Cæſars friends were mad, and melancholie men. Why, quoth Cicero to him again: doeſt thou ſay that they do enuie Cæſar? An other called Martius, comming lately out of ITALIE, ſaid, that there ranne a rumor in ROME, that Pompey was beſieged. What, quoth Cicero to him againe: and diddeſt thou take ſhippe to come and ſee him thy ſelfe, becauſe thou mighteſt beleeue it, when thou haddeſt ſeene it? Pompey being ouerthrowen, one Nonius ſayd there was yet good hope left, becauſe they had taken ſeuẽ Eagles within Pompeys campe. Thy perſwaſiõ were not ill, quoth Cicero, ſo we were to fight but with pyes or dawes. Labienus repoſed all his truſt in certaine Oracles, that Pompey of neceſsitie muſt haue the vpper hand. Yea ſayd Cicero, but

but for all this goodly ſtratageme of warre, we haue not long ſince loſt our whole campe.

Cato gaue place to Cicero, and offered him the charge of the nauie at Dyrrachium.

After the battell of Pharſalia, where Cicero was not by reaſon of his ſickeneſſe: Pompey being fled, and Cato at that time at DYRRACHIVM, where he had gathered a great number of men of warre, & had alſo prepared a great nauie: he prayed Cicero to take charge of all this army, as it pertained vnto him, hauing bene Conſull. Cicero did not onely refuſe it, but alſo told them he would meddle no more with this warre. But this was enough to haue made him bene ſlaine: for the younger Pompey and his friendes called him traitor, and drewe their ſwordes vpon him to kill him, which they had done, had not Cato ſtepped betweene them and him, and yet had he much a doe to ſaue him, and to conuey him ſafely out of the campe. When Cicero came to BRVNDVSIVM, he ſtaied there a certaine time for Cæſars comming, who came but ſlowly, by reaſon of his troubles he had in ASIA, as alſo in ÆGYPT. Howbeit newes being brought at length that Cæſar was arriued at TARENTVM, and that he came by lande vnto BRVNDVSIVM: Cicero departed thence to goe meete him, not miſtruſting that Cæſar would not pardon him, but rather being aſhamed to come to his enemie being a conqueror, before ſuch a number of men as he had about him. Yet he was not forced to doe or ſpeake any thing vnſeemely to his calling. For Cæſar ſeeing him comming towardes him farre before the reſt that came with him: he lighted from his horſe and imbraced him, and walked a great way a foote with him, ſtill talking with him only, and euer after he did him great honor & made much of him. Inſomuch as Cicero hauing written a booke in praiſe of Cato: Cæſar on the other ſide wrote an other, and praiſed the eloquence and life of Cicero, matching it with the life of Pericles, and Theramenes. Ciceroes booke was intituled Cato, & Cæſars booke called Anticato, as much to ſay as againſt Cato. They ſay further, that Quintus Ligarius being accuſed to haue bene in the field againſt Cæſar, Cicero tooke vpon him to defend his cauſe: and that Cæſar ſaid vnto his friends about him, what hurt is it for vs to heare Cicero ſpeake, whom we haue not heard of long time? For otherwiſe Ligarius (in my opinion) ſtandeth alreadie a condemned man, for I know him to be a vile man, and mine enemie.

The force of Ciceroes eloquence, how it altered Cæſar.

But when Cicero had begunne his Oration, he moued Cæſar maruellouſly, he had ſo ſweete a grace, and ſuch force in his wordes: that it is reported Cæſar chaunged diuers colours, and ſhewed plainely by his countenance, that there was a maruellous alteration in all the parts of him. For, in the end when the Orator came to touch the battell of Pharſalia, then was Cæſar ſo troubled, that his bodie ſhooke withall, and beſides, certaine bookes he had, fell out of his handes, and he was driuen againſt his will to ſet Ligarius at libertie.

Afterwardes, when the common wealth of ROME came to be a kingdome, Cicero leauing to practiſe any more in the ſtate, he gaue himſelfe to reade Philoſophie to the young men that came to heare him: by whoſe acceſſe vnto him (becauſe they were the chiefeſt of the nobilitie in ROME) he came againe to beare as great ſway and authoritie in ROME, as euer he had done before. His ſtudie and endeuour was, to write matters of Philoſophie dialogue wiſe, and to tranſlate out of Greeke into Latine, taking paines to bring all the Greeke wordes, which are proper vnto logicke and naturall cauſes, vnto Latin. For he was the firſt man by report that gaue Latin names vnto theſe Greeke words, which are proper vnto Philoſophers, as, φαντασία, he termed, Viſio. Κατάϑεσις Aſſenſus. Ἐποχὴ, Aſſenſus cohibitio. Κατάληψις, Comprehenſio. Τὸ ἄτομον Corpus indiuiduum. Τὸ ἀμερὲς Corpus ſimplex. Τὸ κενὸν Vacuum, & many other ſuch like words. But though he were not the firſt, yet was it he that moſt did deuiſe and vſe them, and turned ſome of them by tranſlation, others into proper termes: ſo that at length they came to be well taken, knowen, and vnderſtanded of euerie man. And for his readineſſe in writing of verſes, he would vſe them many times for his recreation: for it is reported, that whenſoeuer he tooke in hand to make any, he would diſpatch fiue hundred of thē in a night. Nowe, all that time of his recreation and pleaſure, he would commonly be at ſome of his houſes in the country, which he had neere vnto THVSCVLVM, from whence he would write vnto his friends, that he led Laertes life: either ſpoken merily as his maner was, or elſe pricked forward with ambition, deſiring to returne againe to be a practiſer in the common wealth, being wearie with the preſent time and ſtate thereof. How ſoeuer it was, he came oftentimes to ROME, only to ſee Cæſar to keepe him his friend, and would euer be the firſt man to confirme any honors decreed vnto him, and was alwaies ſtudious to vtter ſome newe matter to prayſe him and his doings. As that was he ſaide touching the ſtatues of Pompey, the which being ouerthrowen, Cæſar commaunded them to be ſet vp againe, and ſo they were. For Cicero ſaid, that by that curteſie in ſetting vp of Pompeys ſtatues againe, he did eſtabliſh his owne. So Cicero being determined to write all the ROMAINE hiſtorie, and to mingle with them many of the GRECIANS doings, adding thereunto all the fables and deuiſes which they doe write and report: he was hindered of his purpoſe againſt his will, by many open and priuate troubles that came vpon him at once: whereof notwithſtanding he himſelfe was cauſe of the moſt of them.

For firſt of all, he did put away his wife Terentia, becauſe ſhe had made but ſmall account of him in all the warres: ſo that he departed from ROME hauing no neceſſary thing with him to entertaine him out of his country, and yet when he came backe againe into ITALIE, ſhe neuer ſhewed any ſparke of loue or good will towardes him. For ſhe neuer came to BRVNDVSIVM to him, where he remained a long time: and worſe then that, his daughter hauing the heart to take ſo long a iorney in hand to goe to him, ſhe neither gaue her company to conduct her, nor money or other furniture conuenient for her, but ſo handled the matter, that Cicero at his returne to ROME found bare walles in his houſe and nothing in it, and yet greatly brought in debt beſides. And theſe were the honeſteſt cauſes alleaged for their diuorſe.

But beſides that Terentia denyed all theſe, Cicero himſelfe gaue her a good occaſion to cleare her ſelfe, becauſe he ſhortly after maried a young maiden, being fallen in fancie with her (as Terentia ſaid) for her beautie: or, as Tyro his ſeruant wrote, for her riches, to the ende that with her goods he might pay his debts. For ſhe was very rich, and Cicero alſo was appointed her gardian, ſhe being left ſole heire. Now, becauſe he ought a maruelous ſumme of mony, his parents & friends did counſell him to marry this young maiden, notwithſtanding he was too old for her, becauſe that with her goods he might ſatisfie his creditors. But Antonius ſpeaking of this mariage of Cicero, in his anſwers & orations he made againſt the PHILIPPIANS: he doth reproue him for that he put away his wife, with whom he was growen olde, being merry with him by the way for that he had bene an idle man, and neuer went from the ſmoke of his chimney, nor had bene abroade in the warres in any ſeruice of his country or common wealth. Shortly after that he had maried his ſecond wife, his daughter died in labor of child, in Lentulus houſe, whoſe ſecond wife ſhe was, being before maried vnto Piſo, who was her firſt husband. So the Philoſophers and learned men came of all ſides to comfort him: but he tooke her death ſo ſorowfully, that he put away his ſecond wife, becauſe he thought ſhe did reioyce at the death of his daughter. And thus much touching the ſtate and troubles of his houſe.

Now touching the conſpiracie againſt Cæſar, he was not made priuie to it, although he was one of Brutus greateſt friendes, and that it grieued him to ſee things in that ſtate they were brought vnto, and albeit alſo he wiſhed for the time paſt, as much as any other man did. But in deede the conſpirators were affraide of his nature, that lacked hardineſſe: and of his age, the which oftentimes maketh the ſtouteſt and moſt hardieſt natures, faint hearted & cowardly. Notwithſtanding, the conſpiracie being executed by Brutus and Caſſius, Cæſars friends being gathered together, euerie man was affraide that the citie would againe fall into ciuill warres. And Antonius alſo, who was Conſull at that time, did aſſemble the Senate, and made ſome ſpeech and motion then to draw things againe vnto quietneſſe. But Cicero hauing vſed diuers perſwaſions fit for the time, in the ende he moued the Senate to decree (following the example of the ATHENIANS) a generall obliuion of things done againſt Cæſar, and to aſſigne vnto Brutus and Caſſius ſome gouernements of prouinces. Howbeit nothing was concluded: for the people of themſelues were ſorie, when they ſawe Cæſars bodie brought through the market place. And when Antonius alſo did ſhew them his gowne all bebloudied, cut, & thruſt through with ſwordes: then they were like madde men for anger, and ſought vp and downe the market place if they could meete with any of them that had ſlaine him: and taking fire brandes in their handes, they ranne to their houſes to ſet them a fire. But the conſpirators hauing preuented this danger, ſaued themſelues: and fearing that if they taried at ROME, they ſhould haue many ſuch alaroms, they forſooke the citie.

Priuate grudge betwixt Antonius and Cicero.

Then Antonius began to looke aloft, and became fearefull to all men, as though he ment to make himſelfe king: but yet moſt of all vnto Cicero, aboue all others. For Antonius perceiuing that Cicero began againe to increaſe in credit and authoritie, and knowing that he was Brutus very friend: he did miſlike to ſee him come neere him, and beſides, there was at that time ſome gealouſie betwixt them, for the diuerſitie and difference of their manners and diſpoſitions. Cicero being affraid of this, was firſt of all in minde to goe with Dolabella to his prouince of SYRIA, as one of his Lieutenants. But they that were appointed to be Conſuls the next yeare following after Antonius, two noble citizens, & Ciceroes great friends, Hircius & Panſa: they intreated him not to forſake them, vndertaking that they would plucke downe this ouergreat power of Antonius, ſo he would remaine with them. But Cicero, neither beleuing nor altogether miſtruſting them, forſooke Dolabella, and promiſed Hircius and Panſa, that he would ſpend the ſommer at ATHENS, and that he would returne againe to ROME ſo ſoone as they were entred into their Conſulſhippe. With this determination Cicero tooke ſea alone, to goe into GRECE. But as it chaunceth oftentimes, there was ſome let that kept him he could not ſaile, and newes came to him daily from ROME, as the manner is, that Antonius was wonderfully changed, and that now he did nothing any more without the authoritie and conſent of the Senate, and that there lacked nothing but his perſon, to make all things well. Then Cicero condemning his daſtardly feare, returned forthwith to ROME, not being deceiued in his firſt hope. For there came ſuch a number of people out to meete him, that he could doe nothing all day long, but take them by the handes, and imbrace them: who to honour him, came to meete him at the gate of the citie, as alſo by the way to bring him to his houſe. The next morning Antonius aſſembled the Senate, and called for Cicero by name. Cicero refuſed to goe, and kept his bedde, fayning that he was wearie with his iorney and paines he had taken the day before: but indeede, the cauſe why he went not, was, for feare and ſuſpition of an ambuſh that was laide for him by the way, if he had gone, as he was informed by one of his very good friends. Antonius was maruellouſly offended that they did wrongfully accuſe him, for laying of any ambuſh for him: and therefore ſent ſouldiers to his houſe, and commaunded them to bring him by force, or elſe to ſette his houſe a fire. After that time, Cicero and he were alwaies at iarre, but yet coldly enough, one of them taking heede of an other: vntill that the young Cæſar returning from the citie of APOLLONIA, came as lawfull heire vnto Iulius Cæſar Dictator, and had contention with Antonius for the ſumme of two thouſande fiue hundred Myriades, the which Antonius kept in his handes of his fathers goods. Thereupon, Philip who had married the mother of this young Cæſar, and Marcellus, who had alſo married his ſiſter, went with young Cæſar vnto Cicero, & there agreed together, that Cicero ſhould helpe young Cæſar with the fauour of his authoritie and eloquence, as well towardes the Senate, as alſo to the people: and that Cæſar in recompence of his good will ſhould ſtand by Cicero, with his money and ſouldiers. For this young Cæſar, had many of his fathers old ſouldiers about him, that had ſerued vnder him. Now there was an other cauſe that made Cicero glad to imbrace the friendſhippe of this young Cæſar, and that was this. Whileſt Pompey and Iulius Cæſar were aliue, and in good caſe: Cicero dreamed one night that the Senators ſonnes were called into the Capitoll, becauſe Iupiter had appointed to ſhew them him, that one day ſhould come to be Lord and king of ROME, and that the ROMAINES being deſirous to ſee who it ſhould be, ranne all vnto the temple: and that all the children likewiſe were waiting there in their goodly garded gownes of purple, vntill that ſodainely the dores of the temple were open, & then that all the children roſe one after an other, & went and paſſed by the image of Iupiter, who looked vpon them all, and ſent them diſcontented, ſauing this young Cæſar, vnto whom he put forth his hande as he paſſed by, and ſaide: My Lordes of ROME this child is he that ſhall end all your ciuill warres, when he commeth to be Lord of ROME. Some ſay, that Cicero had this viſion in his dreame, and that he caried in good memory the looke of this child, howbeit that he knew him not: and that the next morning he went of purpoſe into the field of Mars, where theſe young boyes did exerciſe them ſelues, who, when they came thither, had broken vp from playing, and were going home, and that amongſt them he firſt ſaw him whom he had dreamed of, and knew him very well, and muſing at him the more, aſked him whoſe ſonne he was. The boy anſwered, that he was the ſonne of one Octauius (a man otherwiſe of no great calling) & of Accia, the ſiſter of Iulius Cæſar: who hauing no childe, made him his heire by his laſt will and teſtament, and left him all his landes and goods. After that time, it is reported, that Cicero was very glad to ſpeake to him when he met with him, and that the boy alſo liked Ciceroes friendſhippe, and making of him: for by good happe the boy was borne the ſame yeare that Cicero was Conſull. And theſe be the reaſons alleaged, why Cicero did fauor this young Cæſar. But in truth, firſt of all the great malice he bare vnto Antonius, and ſecondly his nature that was ambitious of honor, were (in my opinion) the chiefeſt cauſes why he became young Cæſars friend: knowing that the force and power of his ſouldiers, would greatly ſtrengthen his authoritie and countenance in manedging the affaires of the ſtate, beſides that the young man could flatter him ſo well, that he called him father. But Brutus being offended with him for it, in his Epiſtles he wrote vnto Atticus, he ſharply reproueth Cicero, ſaying, that for feare of Antonius he flattered this young Cæſar: whereby it appeared, he did not ſo much ſeeke for the libertie of ROME, as he did procure himſelfe a louing and gentle maiſter. This notwithſtanding, Brutus brought with him Ciceroes ſonne that ſtudied Philoſophie at ATHENS, and gaue him charge of men vnder him and imployed him in great affaires, wherein he ſhewed himſelfe very forwarde and valiant. Now Ciceroes authoritie & power grew againe to be ſo great in ROME, as euer in was before. For he did what he thought good, and ſo vexed Antonius, that he draue him out of the citie, and ſent the two Conſuls Hircius and Panſa againſt him, to fight with him: and cauſed the Senate alſo to decree, that young Cæſar ſhould haue ſergeantes to carie roddes and axes before him, and all other furniture for a Prætor, as a man that fighteth for his country. After that Antonius had loſt the battell, and that both the Conſuls were ſlaine, both the armies came vnto Cæſar. The Senate then being affraid of this young man, that had ſo great good fortune, they practiſed by honors and gifts to call the armies from him, which he had about him, and ſo to miniſh the greatneſſe of his power: ſaying, that their country now ſtood in no neede of force nor feare of defence, ſith her enemie Antonius was fled and gone. Cæſar fearing this, ſent men ſecretly vnto Cicero, to pray him to procure that they two together might be choſen Conſuls and that when they ſhould be in office, he ſhould doe and appoint what he thought good, hauing the young man at his commaundement, who deſired no more but the honor only of the name. Cæſar himſelfe confeſſed afterwardes, that being affraide he ſhould haue beene vtterly caſt away, to haue bene left alone: he finely ſerued his turne by Ciceroes ambition, hauing perſwaded him to require the Conſulſhip, through the helpe and aſſiſtance that he would giue him. But there was Cicero finely colted, as old as he was, by a young man, when he was contented to ſue for the Conſulſhip in his behalfe, and to make the Senate agreeable to it: wherefore his friends preſently reproued him for it, and ſhortly after he perceiued he had vndone himſelfe, and together alſo loſt the libertie of his countrie. For this young man Octauius Cæſar being growen to be very great by his meanes and procurement: when he ſaw that he had the Conſulſhip vpon him, he forſooke Cicero, and agreed with Antonius and Lepidus. Then ioyning his armie with theirs, he deuided the Empire of ROME with them, as if it had bene lands left in common betwene them: and beſides that, there was a bill made of two hundred men and vpwards, whom they had appointed to be ſlaine. But the greateſt difficultie and difference that fell out betwene them, was about the outlawing of Cicero. For Antonius would hearken to no peace betwene them, vnleſſe Cicero were ſlaine firſt of all: Lepidus was alſo in the ſame mind with Antonius: but Cæſar was againſt them both. Their meeting was by the citie of BOLONIA, where they continued three dayes together, they three only ſecretly conſulting in a place enuironed about with a litle riuer. Some ſay that Cæſar ſtucke hard with Cicero the two firſt dayes, but at the third, that he yeelded and forſooke him. The exchaunge they agreed vpon betwene them, was this. Cæſar forſooke Cicero: Lepidus, his owne brother Paulus: and Antonius, Lucius Cæſar his vncle by the mothers ſide. Such place tooke wrath in them, as they regarded no kinred nor bloud, and to ſpeake more properly, they ſhewed that no brute or ſauage beaſt is ſo cruell as man, if with his licentiouſnes he haue libertie to execute his wil. While theſe matters were a brewing, Cicero was at a houſe of his in the country, by the city of THVSCVLVM, hauing at home with him alſo his brother Q. Cicero. Newes being brought them thither of theſe proſcriptions or outlawries, appointing men to be ſlaine: they determined to goe to ASTYRA, a place by the ſea ſide where Cicero had an other houſe, there to take ſea, and from thence to goe into MACEDON vnto Brutus. For there ranne a rumor that Brutus was very ſtrong, and had a great power. So, they cauſed themſelues to be conueyed thither in two litters, both of them being ſo weake with ſorrow and griefe, that they could not otherwiſe haue gone their waies. As they were on their way, both their litters going as neere to ech other as they could, they bewailed their miſerable eſtate: but Quintus chiefly, who tooke it moſt grieuouſly. For, remembring that he tooke no money with him when he came from his houſe, and that Cicero his brother alſo had very litle for himſelfe: he thought it beſt that Cicero ſhould holde on his iorney, whileſt he himſelfe made an arrant home to fetch ſuch things as he lacked, and ſo to make haſte againe to ouertake his brother. They both thought it beſt ſo, and then tenderly imbracing one an other, the teares falling from their eyes, they tooke leaue of each other. Within few daies after, Quintus Cicero being betrayed by his owne ſeruants, vnto them that made ſearch for him: he was cruelly ſlaine, and his ſonne with him.

But Marcus Tullius Cicero being caried vnto ASTYRA, and there finding a ſhippe ready, imbarked immediatly, and ſayled alongſt the coaſt vnto mount Circe, hauing a good gale of winde. There the mariners determining forthwith to make ſaile againe, he came a ſhore, either for feare of the ſea, or for that he had ſome hope that Cæſar had not altogether forſaken him: and therewithall returning towardes ROME by land, he had gone about a hundred furlong thence. But then being at a ſtraight how to reſolue, and ſodainely chaunging his minde: he would needes be caried backe againe to the ſea, where he continued all night maruellous ſorowfull, and full of thoughts. For one while he was in minde to goe ſecretly vnto Octauius Cæſars houſe, & to kill himſelfe by the hearth of his chimney, to make the furies of hell to reuenge his bloud: but being affraid to be intercepted by the way, & cruelly handled, he turned from that determination. Then falling into other vnaduiſed determinations, being perplexed as he was, he put himſelfe againe into his ſeruantes handes, to be conueyed by ſea to an other place called *CAPITES. There he had a very proper pleaſant ſommer houſe, where the North windes, called Eteſiæ, doe giue a trimme freſh aire in the ſommer ſeaſon.

In that place alſo there is a litle temple dedicated vnto Apollo, not farre from the ſea ſide. From thence there came a great ſhole of crowes, making a maruellous noyſe, that came flying towards Ciceroes ſhippe, which rowed vpon the ſhore ſide. This ſhole of crowes came and lighted vppon the yard of their ſaile, ſome crying, and ſome pecking the cords with their bils: ſo that euery man iudged ſtraight, that this was a ſigne of ill lucke at hand.

A wonderous matter foreſhewed by crowes vnto Cicero.

Cicero notwithſtanding this, came a ſhore, and went into his houſe, and laide him downe to ſee if he could ſleepe. But the moſt part of theſe crowes came and lighted vpon the chamber windowe where he lay, making a wonderfull great noyſe: and ſome of them got vnto Ciceroes bedde where he lay, the clothes being caſt ouer his head, and they neuer left him, till by litle and litle they had with their bils pluckt off the clothes that couered his face. His men ſeeing that, and ſaying to themſelues that they were too vile beaſts, if they would tarie to ſee their maſter ſlaine before their eyes, conſidering that brute beaſts had care to ſaue his life, ſeeing him ſo vnworthily intreated, and that they ſhould not doe the beſt they could to ſaue his life: partly by intreatie, and partly by force, they put him againe into his litter to carie him to the ſea. But in the meane time came the murderers appointed to kil him, Herennius a Centurion, and Popilius Læna, Tribune of the ſouldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thouſande men, whoſe cauſe Cicero had once pleaded before the Iudges, when he was accuſed for the murther of his owne father) hauing ſouldiers attending vpon them.

Herennius, & Popilius, ſent to kill M. T. Cicero.

So Ciceroes gate being ſhut, they entred the houſe by force, and miſſing him, they asked them of the houſe what was become of him. They aunſwered, they could not tell. Howbeit there was a young boy in the houſe called Philologus, a ſlaue infranchiſed by Quintus Cicero, whom Tullius Cicero had brought vp in the Latin tongue, and had taught him the liberall ſciences: he tolde this Herennius, that his ſeruants caried him in a litter towardes the ſea, through darke narrowe lanes, ſhadowed with wood on either ſide. Popilius the Colonell taking ſome ſouldiers with him, ranne about on the outſide of the lanes to take him at his comming out of them: and Herennius on the other ſide entred the lanes. Cicero hearing him comming, commaunded his men to ſet downe his litter, and taking his beard in his left hande, as his manner was, he ſtoutly looked the murtherers in the faces, his head and beard being all white, and his face leane and wrinckled, for the extreame ſorrowes he had taken: diuerſe of them that were by, helde their handes before their eyes, whileſt Herennius did cruelly murder him. So Cicero being three ſcore and foure yeares of age, thruſt his necke out of the litter, and had his head cut off by Antonius commandement, and his hands alſo, which wrote the orations (called the Philippians) againſt him. For ſo did Cicero call the orations he wrote againſt him, for the malice he bare him: and doe yet continue the ſame name vntill this preſent time. When theſe poore diſmembred members were brought to ROME, Antonius by chaunce was buſily occupied at that time about the election of certaine officers: who when he heard of them and ſaw them, he cried out aloude that now all his outlawries and proſcriptions were executed: and thereupon commaunded his head and his handes ſhould ſtraight be ſet vp ouer the pulpit for orations, in the place called Roſtra. This was a fearefull and horrible ſight vnto the ROMAINES, who thought they ſaw not Ciceroes face, but an image of Antonius life and diſpoſition: who among ſo many wicked deedes as he committed, yet he did one act onely that had ſome ſhew of goodneſſe, which was this. He deliuered Philologus into the hands of Pomponia, the wife of Quintus Cicero: and when ſhe had him, beſides other cruell torments ſhe made him abide, ſhe compelled him to cut his owne fleſh off by litle morſels, and to broyle them, and then to eate them. Some hiſtoriographers do thus report it. But Tyro who was a ſlaue infranchiſed by Cicero, made no mention of the treaſon of this Philologus. Howbeit I vnderſtood that Cæſar Auguſtus long time after that, went one day to ſee one of his Nephewes, who had a booke in his hande of Ciceroes: and he fearing leaſt his Vncle would be angrie to finde that booke in his handes, thought to hide it vnder his gowne. Cæſar ſaw it, and tooke it from him, and read the moſt part of it ſtanding, and then deliuered it to the young boy, and ſaide vnto him: he was a wiſe man in deede, my childe, and loued his countrie well. After he had ſlaine Antonius, being Conſull: he made Ciceroes ſonne his colleague and fellow Conſull with him, in whoſe time the Senate ordained that the images of Antonius ſhould be throwen downe, and depriued his memory of all other honors: adding further vnto his decree, that from thence foorth none of the houſe and family of the Antonij ſhould euer after beare the chriſten name of Marcus. So, Gods iuſtice made the extreame reuenge and puniſhment of Antonius to fall into the houſe of Cicero.

THE COMPARISON OF Cicero with Demoſthenes.

THis is as much as we could gather by our knowledge touching the notable actes and deedes worthy of memory, written of Cicero and Demoſthenes. Furthermore, leauing the compariſon a ſide of the difference of their eloquence in their Orations: me thinkes I may ſay thus much of them. That Demoſthenes did wholly imploy all his wit and learning (naturall or artificiall) vnto the art of Rethoricke, and that in force, and vertue of eloquence, he did excell all the Orators in his time: and for grauity and magnificent ſtile, all thoſe alſo that onely write for ſhew or oſtentation: and for ſharpeneſſe and art, all the Sophiſters and Maiſters of Rethoricke. And that Cicero was a man generally learned in all ſciences, and that had ſtudied diuerſe bookes, as appeareth plainely by the ſundry bookes of Philoſophy of his owne making, written after the manner of the Academicke Philoſophers. Furthermore, they may ſee in his Orations he wrote in certaine cauſes to ſerue him when he pleaded: that he ſought occaſions in his by-talke to ſhew men that he was excellently well learned. Furthermore, by their phraſes a man may diſcerne ſome ſparke of their manners and conditions. For Demoſthenes phraſe hath no maner of fineneſſe, geaſtes, nor grace in it, but is altogether graue and harſhe, and ſmelleth not of the lampe, as Pytheas ſaied when he mocked him: but ſheweth a great drinker of water, extreame paines, and therewith alſo a ſharpe and ſower nature. But Cicero oftentimes fell from pleaſaunt tauntes, vnto plaine ſcurrility: and turning all his pleadings of matters of importaunce, to ſport and laughter, hauing a grace in it, many times he did forget the comlineſſe that became a man of his calling. As in his Oration for Cælius, where he ſayeth, it is no maruell if in ſo great aboundance of wealth and fineneſſe he giue him ſelfe a litle to take his pleaſure: and that it was a folly not to vſe pleaſures lawfull and tollerable, ſith the famouſeſt Philoſophers that euer were, did place the chiefe felicity of man, to be in pleaſure. And it is reported alſo that Marcus Cato hauing accuſed Muræna, Cicero being Conſull, defended his cauſe, and in his Oration pleaſauntly girded all the ſect of the Stoicke Philoſophers for Catoes ſake, for the ſtraunge opinions they holde, which they call Paradoxes: inſomuch as he made all the people and Iudges alſo fall a laughing a good. And Cato him ſelfe alſo ſmiling a litle, ſayed vnto them that ſate by him: what a laughing and mocking Conſull haue we, my Lords? but letting that paſſe, it ſeemeth that Cicero was of a pleaſaunt and merry nature: for his face ſhewed euer great life and mirth in it. Whereas in Demoſthenes countenaunce on the other ſide, they might diſcerne a maruellous diligence and care, and a penſiue man, neuer weary with paine: inſomuch that his enemies, (as he reporteth him ſelfe) called him a peruerſe and froward man. Furthermore, in their writings is diſcerned, that the one ſpeaketh modeſtly in his owne praiſe, ſo as no man can iuſtly be offended with him: and yet not alwayes, but when neceſſity enforceth him for ſome matter of great importaunce, but otherwiſe very diſcreete and modeſt to ſpeake of him ſelfe. Cicero in contrary maner, vſing too often repetition of one ſelfe thing in all his Orations, ſhewed an extreame ambition of glorie, when inceſſantly he cried out:

Let ſpeare and ſhield giue place to gowne,
And giue the tongue the laurell crowne.

Yea furthermore, he did not onely praiſe his owne actes and deedes, but the Orations alſo which he had written or pleaded, as if he ſhould haue contended againſt Iſocrates, or Anaximenes, a maiſter that taught Rethoricke, and not to goe about to reforme the people of ROME:

VVhich were both fierce and ſtout in armes,
And fit to worke their enemies harmes.

Authority ſheweth ment vertues and vices.

For, as it is requiſite for a Gouernour of a common wealth to ſeeke authority by his eloquence: ſo, to couet the praiſe of his owne glorious tongue, or as it were to beg it, that ſheweth a baſe mind. And therefore in this point we muſt confeſſe that Demoſthenes is farre grauer, and of a nobler minde: who declared him ſelfe, that all his eloquence came only but by practiſe, the which alſo required the fauor of his auditory: and further, he thought them fooles and madde men (as in deede they be no leſſe) that therefore would make any boaſt of them ſelues. In this they were both alike, that both of them had great credit and authority in their Orations to the people, and for obtayning that they would propound: Inſomuch as Captaines, and they that had armies in their hands, ſtood in neede of their eloquence. As Chares, Diopithes, and Leoſthenes, they all were holpen of Demoſthenes: and Pompey, and Octauius Cæſar the yong man, of Cicero: as Cæſar him ſelfe confeſſeth in his Commentaries he wrote vnto Agrippa, and Mæcenas. But nothing ſheweth a mans nature and condition more, (as it is reported, and ſo is it true) then when one is in authority: for that bewraieth his humor, and the affections of his minde, and layeth open alſo all his ſecret vices in him. Demoſthenes could neuer deliuer any ſuch proofe of him ſelfe, becauſe he neuer bare any office, nor was called forward. For hee was not Generall of the army, which he him ſelfe had prepared againſt king Philip. Cicero on the other ſide being ſent Treaſurer into CICILE, and Proconſull into CILICIA and CAPPADOCIA, in ſuch a time as couetouſnes raigned moſt: (inſomuch that the Captains and Gouernors whom they ſent to gouerne their prouinces, thinking it villany and daſtardlineſſe to rob, did violently take things by force, at what time alſo to take bribes was reckonned no ſhame, but to handle it diſcreetly, he was the better thought of, and beloued for it) he ſhewed plainely that he regarded not money, and gaue foorth many proofes of his curteſie and goodneſſe. Furthermore, Cicero being created Conſull by name, but Dictator in deede, hauing abſolute power and authority ouer all things to ſuppreſſe the rebellion and conſpirators of Catiline: he proued Platoes prophecy true, which was: That the cities are ſafe from danger, when the chiefe Magiſtrates and Gouernours (by ſome good diuine fortune) doe gouerne with wiſedome and iuſtice. Demoſthenes was reproued for his corruption, and ſelling of his eloquence: becauſe ſecretly he wrote one Oration for Phormio, and an other in the ſelfe ſame matter for Apollodorus, they being both aduerſaries. Further, he was defamed alſo for receiuing money of the king of PERSIA, and therewithall condemned for the money which he had taken of Harpalus. And though ſome peraduenture would obiect, that the reports thereof (which are many) doe lye: yet they can not poſſibly deny this, that Demoſthenes had no power to refrain from looking of the preſents which diuers kings did offer him, praying him to accept them in good part for their ſakes: neither was that the part of a man that did take vſury by trafficke on the ſea, the extreameſt yet of all other. In contrary manner (as we haue ſaied before) it is certaine that Cicero being Treaſurer, refuſed the gifts which the SICILIANS offered him, there: and the preſents alſo which the king of the CAPPADOCIANS offred him whileſt he was Proconſull in CILICIA, and thoſe eſpecially which his friends preſſed vpon him to take of them, being a great ſumme of money, when he went as a baniſhed man out of Rome. Furthermore, the baniſhment of the one was infamous to him, becauſe by iudgement he was baniſhed as a theefe. The baniſhment of the other was for as honorable an act as euer he did, being baniſhed for ridding his countrey of wicked men. And therefore of Demoſthenes, there was no ſpeach after he was gone: but for Cicero, all the Senate chaunged their apparell into blacke, and determined that they would paſſe no decree by their authority, before Ciceroes baniſhment was reuoked by the people. In deede Cicero idlely paſſed his time of baniſhment, and did nothing all the while he was in Macedon: and one of the chiefeſt actes that Demoſthenes did, in all the time that he dealt in the affaires of the common wealth, was in his baniſhment. For he went into euery city, and did aſſiſt the Ambaſſadours of the Grecians, and refuſed the Ambaſſadours of the Macedonians. In the which he ſhewed him ſelfe a better citizen, then either Themiſtocles, or Alcibiades, in their like fortune and exile. So when he was called home, and returned, hee fell againe to his olde trade which he practiſed before, and was euer againſt Antipater, and the Macedonians. Where Lælius in open Senate ſharpely tooke vp Cicero, for that he ſate ſtill and ſayed nothing, when that Octauius Cæſar the young man made petition againſt the law, that he might ſue for the Conſulſhippe, and being ſo young, that he had neuer a haire on his face. And Brutus ſelfe alſo doth greatly reproue Cicero in his letters, for that he hadde maintained and nouriſhed, a more grieuous and greater tyranny, then that which they had put downe. And laſt of all, me thinketh the death of Cicero moſt pittifull, to ſee an old man caried vp and downe, (with tender loue of his ſeruauntes) ſeeking all the waies that might be to flie death, which did not long preuent his naturall courſe: and in the end, old as he was, to ſee his head ſo pittifully cut off. Whereas Demoſthenes, though he yeelded a litle, intreating him that came to take him: yet for that he had prepared the poyſon long before, that he had kept it long, and alſo vſed it as he did, he can not but be maruellouſly commended for it. For ſith the god Neptune denied him the benefite of his ſanctuarie, he betooke him to a greater, and that was death: whereby he ſaued him ſelfe out of the ſouldiers handes of the tyraunt, and alſo ſcorned the blouddy cruelty of Antipater.

DEMETRIVS MACED REX

How ſences and arts do agree & differ.

WHo firſt likened arts to our ſenſes, ſeemeth to haue reſpected eſpecially that one property of them both, in receiuing obiects of contrary quality: for, in the vſe and end of their operation, there is great difference. The ſenſes receiue indifferently, without diſcretion and iudgement, white and blacke, ſweete and ſower, ſoft and hard: for their office is only to admit their ſeuerall obiects, and to cary and referre the iudgement thereof to the common ſenſe. But artes being the perfection of reaſon, receiue and allow thoſe things only which make for their operatiõ, regarding and eſchewing the contraries. The one chiefly, and for vſe: the other by the way, and with intent to auoide them. So Phiſicke dealeth with diſeaſes, Muſicke with diſcords, to the end to remoue them, and worke their contraries, & the great Ladies of all other artes. Temperance, iuſtice, and wiſedome, doe not onely conſider honeſty, vprightnes, and profit: but examine withall, the nature and effects of lewdnes, corruption, and damage. And innocency, which vaunteth her want of experience in vndue practiſes: men call ſimplicity, and ignorance of things, that be neceſſary and good to be knowen. And therefore the ancient LACEDÆMONIANS in their ſolemne feaſtes forced their ILOTES the bondmen, to ouercharge themſelues with wine: and ſuch they ſhewed them vnto their youth, by the apparant beaſtlines of drunken men, to work in them an abhorring of ſo lothſome vice. Wherein, although I can not much praiſe them for humanity or wiſdome, that corrupt and ſpoile one man, by example of him, to correct and reclaime an other: yet (as I hope) it ſhall not be reprehended in me, if amongeſt the reſt I put in one or two paire of ſuch, as liuing in great place and accompt, haue increaſed their fame with infamy. Which in trueth, I do not, to pleaſe & draw on the reader with variety of report: but as Iſmenias the THEBAN Muſitian ſhewed his ſchollers, both thoſe that ſtrake a cleane ſtroke, with, do ſo, and ſuch as bungled it, with, doe not ſo: and Antigenidas thought men ſhould like better, & with greater deſire contend for skil, if they heard and diſcerned vntuneable notes: ſo thinke I, we ſhall be the forwarder in reading and following the good, if we know the liues, and ſee the deformity of the wicked. This treaty containeth the liues of Demetrius, ſurnamed the Fortgainer, and M. Anthony the Triumuir, and great examples to confirme the ſaying of Plato: That from great minds, both great vertues and great vices do proceed. They were both giuen ouer to women & wine, both valiant & liberal, both ſumptuous and high minded, fortune ſerued thẽ both alike, not only in the courſe of their

liues, in attempting great matters, ſometimes with good, ſomtimes with ill ſucceſſe, in getting and loſing things of great conſequence, ouerthrowing both when they feared not, reſtoring both when they hoped not. But alſo in their end there was no great difference, the one brought to his death by his mortall enemies, and the others fortune not much vnlike. But now to our hiſtory. Antigonus had two ſonnes by his wife Stratonice, the daughter of Corraus, the one of them he named Demetrius, and the other Philip, after his fathers name. Thus farre the moſt writers doe agree: howbeit ſome hold opinion, that Demetrius was not the ſonne of Antigonus, but his Nephew. But becauſe his father died leauing him a childe, and that his mother was ſtraight maried againe vnto Antigonus: thereupon came the report that he was Antigonus ſonne. Howſoeuer it was, Philip, that was not much younger then Demetrius, died. Now for Demetrius, though he was a very bigge man, he was nothing ſo high as his father, but yet ſo paſſing and wonderfull faire, that no painter could poſſibly draw his picture and counterfeate to his likenes. For they ſaw a ſweete countenaunce, mixed with a kinde of grauity in his face, a feare with curteſie, and an incomparable Princely maieſty accompanied with a liuely ſpirit and youth; and his witte and manners were ſuch, that they were both fearefull, and pleaſaunt vnto men that frequented him. For as he was moſt pleaſaunt in company hauing leyſure, and moſt giuen to banketting, pleaſant life, and more wantonly giuen to follow any luſt and pleaſure, then any king that euer was: yet was he alwayes very carefull and diligent in diſpatching matters of importance. And therefore he maruellouſly commended, and alſo endeuoured to follow Dionyſius, (as much to ſay, as Bacchus) aboue all the other goddes, as he that had beene a wiſe and valiant Captaine in warre, and that in peace inuented and vſed all the pleaſure that might be. He maruellouſly loued and reuerenced his father, and it ſeemeth that the duetifulnes he ſhewed vnto his mother, was more to diſcharge the due obedience and duety of a ſonne, then otherwiſe to entertaine his father, for feare of his power, or hope to be his heire. And for proofe hereof we read, that one day as he came home from hunting, he went vnto his father Antigonus, giuing audience to certaine Ambaſſadors, and after he had done his duetie to him, and kiſſed him: he ſate downe by him euen as he came from hunting, hauing his dartes in his hand, which he caried out a hunting with him. Then Antigonus calling the Ambaſſadors aloude as they went their way, hauing receiued their aunſwere: my Lords, ſaid he, you ſhall cary home this report of my ſonne and me, be witneſſes I pray you, how wee liue one with another. As meaning to ſhew thereby, that the agreement betwixt the father and the ſonne together, is a great ſafety to the affaires of a king, as alſo a manifeſt proofe of his greatneſſe: ſo iealous is a king to haue a companion, beſides the hate and miſtruſt it ſhould breede. So that the greateſt Prince and moſt auncienteſt of all the ſucceſſors of Alexander, boaſted that he ſtoode not in feare of his ſonne, but did ſuffer him to ſitte by him, hauing a dart in his hand. So was this houſe onely of all other the MACEDONIAN kings, leaſt defiled with ſuch villany, many ſucceſſions after: and to confeſſe a troth, in all Antigonus race there was not one, but Philip onely, that ſlue his owne ſonne. But we haue many examples of diuers other houſes of kings, that haue put their ſonnes, wiues, and mothers to death: and for their brethren, it was an ordinary thing with them to kill them, and neuer ſticke at it. For like as Geometricians would haue men graunt them certaine propoſitions which they ſuppoſe without proofe: euen ſo was this holden for a generall rule, to kill their brethren, for the ſafety of their eſtate. But further, to ſhew you more plainely that Demetrius was of a noble and curteous nature, and that he dearely loued his friendes: we may alleadge this example. Mithridates, the ſonne of Ariobarzanes, was his familiar friend and companion (for they were both in manner of an age) and he commonly followed Antigonus court, and neuer practiſed any villany or treaſon to him, neither was he thought ſuch a man: yet Antigonus did ſomewhat ſuſpect him, becauſe of a dreame he had. He thought that being in a goodly great field, he ſowed of theſe ſcrapings of gold, and that of that ſeede, firſt of all came vp goodly wheate which had eares of gold: howbeit that ſhortly after returning that way againe, he found nothing but the ſtraw, and the eares of the wheate cut off, and that he being angry and very ſory for it, ſome tolde him that Mithridates had cut off theſe golden eares of wheate, and had caried them with him into the realme of PONT. Antigonus being maruellouſly troubled with this dream, after he had made his ſonne ſweare vnto him that he would make no man aliue priuy to that he would tell him: he told him all his dreame what he had dreamed, and therewith that he was determined to put this young man Mithridates to death. Demetrius was maruellous ſory for it, and therefore the next morning, this young noble Prince going as he was wont to paſſe the time away with Mithridates, he durſt not by word of mouth vtter that he knew, becauſe of his oth: howbeit, taking him aſide from his other familiars, when they were both together by them ſelues, he wrote on the ground with the end of his dart, Mithridates looking on him: flie Mithridates. Mithridates found ſtraight what he ment, and fled the very ſame night into Cappadocia: and ſhortly after it was his deſtiny to fulfill Antigonus dreame. For he conquered manie goodly countries, and it was he only that eſtabliſhed the houſe of the kingdome of Pont, the which the Romaines afterwardes ouerthrew, about the eight ſucceſſion. By theſe examples we may eaſily coniecture the good nature and curteſie of Demetrius. For like as the elementes (according to Empedocles opinion) are euer at * ſtrife together, but ſpecially thoſe that are neareſt each to other: euen ſo, though all the ſucceſſors of Alexander were at continual warres together, yet was it ſooneſt kindled, and moſt cruell betweene them which bordered neareſt vnto each other, and that by being neare neighbours, had alwaies occaſion of brawle together, as fell out at that time betweene Antigonus and Ptolomy. This Antigonus lay moſt commonly in the countrey of Phrygia: who hauing intelligence that Ptolomy was gone into Cyprus, and that he ouerranne all Syria, winning by force, or faire meanes, all the townes and cities ſubiect vnto them: he ſent his ſonne Demetrius thither, being at that time but two and twenty yeares of age, and it was the firſt time that euer he tooke charge as generall to his father, in matters of great importaunce. But he being a young man, and that had no skill of warres, fighting a battell with an old ſouldier (trained vp in the diſcipline of warres vnder Alexander the great, and that through him, and in his name, had fought many great battels) was ſoone ouerthrowen, and his army put to flight, by the city of Gaza. At which ouerthrow were ſlaine fiue thouſand men, and almoſt eight thouſand taken: and beſides, Demetrius loſt his tents and pauilions, his gold and ſiluer, and to be ſhort, all his whole cariage. But Ptolomy ſent him all his things againe, and his friendes alſo that were taken after the battell, with great curteous wordes: that he would not fight with them for all things together, but onely for honor, and Empire. Demetrius receiuing them at his handes, beſought the gods that hee might not long liue a debter vnto Ptolomy for this great curteſie, but that he might quickly requite it with the like again. Now Demetrius tooke not this ouerthrow like a yong man, though it was his firſt ſouldierfare: but like an olde and wiſe Captaine, that had abidden many ouerthrowes, he vſed great diligence to gather men againe to make new armors, and to keepe the cities and countries in his handes vnder obedience, and did traine and exerciſe his ſouldiers in armes, whom he had gathered together. Antigonus hauing newes of the ouerthrow of his ſon Demetrius, ſaid no more, but that Ptolomy had ouercome beardles men: and that afterwardes he ſhould fight with bearded men. But now, becauſe he would not diſcorage his ſonne altogether, who craued leaue once againe to fight a battell with Ptolomy: he graunted him. So, ſhortly after came Cilles, Ptolomyes generall, with a great puiſant army, to driue him altogether out of Syria. For they made no great accompt of Demetrius, becauſe he had bene once ouerthrowen before. Howbeit Demetrius ſtale vpon him, gaue him charge on the ſodaine, and made him ſo afraid, that he tooke both the campe, and the generall, with ſeuen thouſand priſoners beſides, and wanne a maruellous treaſure of money: which made him a glad man, not ſo much for the gaine he ſhould haue by it, as for the oportunity hee had thereby to come out of Ptolomyes debt, nothing regarding the treaſure nor the honour he had gotten by this victory, but onely the benefite of this requitall of Ptolomyes curteſie towardes him. But yet he did nothing of his owne head, before he had written to his father: and then receiuing full graunt and commiſſion from him to diſpoſe of all things as he thought good, he ſent backe Cilles vnto Ptolomy, and al his other friends beſides, with great and rich gifts which he bountifully beſtowed on them. This misfortune and ouerthrow did vtterly put Ptolomy out of all Syria, and brought Antigonus alſo from the city of Celænes, for the exceeding ioy he had of this victory, as alſo for the great deſire he had to ſee his ſonne. After that, he ſent Demetrius into Arabia, againſt a people people called the NABATHÆIANS, to conquer them: but there he was in great daunger and diſtreſſe in the deſerts for lacke of water, howbeit he neuer ſhewed any ſigne that he was afraid. Thereby he ſo aſtonied the barbarous people, that he had leaſure enough to retire with ſafety, and with a great bootie of a thouſand camels, which he brought away with him. About that time Seleucus (whom Antigonus had driuen from BABYLON) returning thither againe, he came and conquered it without other ayd then of himſelfe: and went with a great armie againſt the people and nations confining vpon the INDIANS, and the prouinces adioyning vnto mount Caucaſus, to conquer them. Thereupon Demetrius hoping to find MESOPOTAMIA without any gard or defence, ſodainly paſſed ouer the riuer of Euphrates, & came vnlooked for vnto BABYLON, & there diſtreſſed the garriſon of Seleucus, that kept one of the caſtells or citadels of the citie, being two of them: and then putting in ſeuen thouſand ſouldiers to keepe them, he commanded the reſt of his men to get what they could, and to bring it away with them. After that he marched towardes the ſea to returne home, leauing thereby the Realme and kingdome of Seleucus in better ſtate and ſafetie, then it was when he inuaded it. For it appeared that he had taken all the coūtrie from Seleucus, leauing him nothing in it, by ſpoyling and foraging all that was there. At his returne home, newes were brought him that Ptolomy lay at the ſiege of the citie of HALYCARNASSVS: whereupon he drew thither with ſpeed to make him raiſe the ſiege, and thereby ſaued the citie from him. Now becauſe by this exploite they wanne great fame, both of them (Antigonus and Demetrius) fell into a maruellous deſire to ſet all GRECE at libertie, the which Ptolomy and Caſſander kept in ſeruitude and bondage. Neuer king tooke in hand a more honorable nor iuſter warre and enterpriſe, then that was. For, what power or riches he could gather together, in oppreſſing of the barbarous people: he beſtowed it all in reſtoring the GRECIANS to their libertie, and onely to winne fame and honor by it. So, they being in conſultation what way to take, to bring their purpoſe and deſire to paſſe, and hauing taken order to begin firſt at ATHENS: one of Antigonus chiefeſt friends about him, told him that he ſhould take the citie, and place a good garriſon there for themſelues, if they could once winne it: for, ſaid he, it will be a good bridge to paſſe further into all GRECE. Antigonus would not harken to that, but ſaid, that the loue and good will of men was a ſurer bridge, & that the citie of ATHENS was as a beacon to all the land, the which would immediatly make his doings ſhine through the world, as a creſſet light, vpon the toppe of a keepe or watch tower. Thus Demetrius hoyſed ſaile, hauing fiue thouſand ſiluer talents, and a fleete of two hundred and fiftie ſaile, and ſailed towardes the citie of ATHENS: in the which Demetrius PHALERIAN was gouernor in the behalf of Caſſander, & kept a great ſtrong garriſon there within the hauen and caſtle of MVNICHEA. He had an excellent good winde to further his iorney, ſo that with his good foreſight and ſpeede he made, he arriued in the hauen of PIRÆA, the fiue and twentie day of the moneth Thargelion (now called May) before any man knew of his comming. Now when this fleete was within a kenning of the city, and leſſe, that they might eaſily ſee them from thence: euery man prepared him ſelfe to receiue them, taking them to be Ptolomyes ſhippes. But in fine, the Captaines and gouernours vnderſtanding too late who they were, did what they could to helpe them ſelues: but they were all in hurly burly, as men compelled to fight out of order, to keepe their enemies from landing, and to repulſe them, comming ſo ſodainely vpon them. Demetrius hauing found the barre of the hauen open, launched in preſently. Then being come to the view of them all, and ſtanding vppon the hatches of his galley, he made ſignes with his hand that he prayed ſilence. The tumult being pacified, he proclaimed aloud by one of his Heraulds, that his father had ſent him in a happy hower to deliuer the ATHENIANS from all their garriſons, and to reſtore them againe to their auncient liberty and freedome, to enioy their lawes and auncient gouernment of their forefathers. After the proclamation made, all the common people ſtraight threwe downe their weapons and targets at their feete, to clappe their handes with great ſhoutes of ioy: praying him to land, and calling him aloud their Sauior, and benefactor. Now for them that were with Demetrius PHALERIAN, they all thought good to let the ſtronger in, although he performed not that he promiſed, and alſo ſent Ambaſſadours vnto him to treate of peace. Demetrius receiued them very curteouſly, and ſent with them for pledge, one of the deareſt friends his father had, Ariſtodemus MILESIAN. Furthermore, he was not careles of the health and ſafety of Demetrius PHALERIAN, who by reaſon of the change and alteration of the gouernment of the common wealth of ATHENS, ſtood more in feare of the people of ATHENS, than of his enemies. Therefore Demetrius regarding the fame and vertue of the man, cauſed him to be conueyed (according to his deſire) vnto THEBES, with good and ſufficient ſafe conduct. And for Demetrius himſelfe, although he was very deſirous to ſee the citie, he ſayed he would not come into it, before he had firſt reſtored it vnto her ancient libertie and freedome, and alſo driuen away the garriſon thence: and thereuppon he caſt trenches round about the caſtle of MVNYCIA. In the meane ſeaſon becauſe he would not be idle, he hoyſed ſayle, and coaſted toward the citie of MEGARA, within the which Caſſander alſo kept a ſtrong garriſon. Demetrius buſily following theſe matters, was aduertiſed that Crateſipolis, ſurnamed Polyperchon, (who had bene Alexanders wife) a Lady of paſſing fame and beautie, and lay at that time in the citie of PATRAS, would be glad to ſee him: he leauing his armie within the territorie of the MEGARIANS, took his iorney preſently vnto her, with a few of his lighteſt armed men, and yet he ſtole from them, and made his tent to be ſet vp a good way from them, becauſe this Ladie might not be ſeene when ſhe came vnto him. Some of his enemies hauing preſent intelligence thereof, came and ſet vpon him before he knew it. Demetrius was ſo ſcared, that he had no further leyſure, but to caſt an ill fauored cloke about him, the firſt that came to hand, and diſguiſing himſelfe to flie for life, and ſcaped very hardly, that he was not ſhamefully taken of his enemies for his incontinencie. But though they miſſed him, they took his tent and all his money in it. After that, the citie of MEGARA was taken and won from Caſſanders men, where Demetrius ſouldiers would haue ſacked all: howbeit the ATHENIANS made humble interceſſion for them, that they might not be ſpoyled. Demetrius thereupon, after that he had driuen out Caſſanders garriſon, he reſtored it againe to her former libertie. In doing that he called to mind the Philoſopher Stilpo, a famous man in MEGARA, though he liued a quiet and contemplatiue life. He ſent for him, and asked him if any of his men had taken any thing of his. Stilpo aunſwered him, they had not: For, ꝙ he, I ſaw no man that tooke my learning from me. This notwithſtanding, all the ſlaues of the citie were in manner caried away. Another time, Demetrius making much of him, as he was going his way ſaid vnto him: well, Stilpo, I leaue you your citie free. It is true, Ò king, ꝙ he, for thou haſt left vs neuer a ſlaue. Shortly after, he returned againe vnto ATHENS, and laide ſiege to the caſtle of MVNICHIA, the which he tooke, and draue out the garriſon, & afterwards raſed it to the ground. After that, through the intreatie and earneſt deſire of the ATHENIANS, who praied him to come and refreſh himſelfe in their citie: he made his entry into it, and cauſed all the people to aſſemble, and then reſtored vnto them their auncient lawes and libertie of their country, promiſing them beſides, that he would procure his father to ſende them an hundred and fiftie thouſande buſhels of wheate, and as much wodde and timber as ſhould ſerue to make them a hundred and fiftie gallies. Thus, the ATHENIANS through Demetrius means, recouered the Democratia againe, (to wit, their populer gouernment) fifteene yeares after they had loſt it, and liued all the time betweene their loſſe and reſtitution from the warre called Lamiacus warre, and the battell that was fought by the city of CRANON, in the ſtate of Oligarchia, to wit, vnder the gouernment of a few gouernors in ſight, but in truth a Monarchy or kingdome, becauſe they were vnder the gouernment of one man Demetrius PHALERIAN, that had abſolute authority ouer them. But by this meanes they made their ſauior and preſeruer of their country, Demetrius (who ſeemed to haue obtained ſuch honor and glory through his goodnes and liberality) hatefull and odious to all men, for the ouergreat and vnmeaſurable honors which they gaue him. For firſt of all, they called Antigonus and Demetrius kings, who before that time had alwaies refuſed the name, and the which, (among all other princely honors and prerogatiues graunted) they that had deuided betweene them the Empire of Philip and Alexander, durſt neuer once preſume to chalenge, nor to take vppon them. So vnto them onely they gaue the ſtile and names of the goddes ſauiors, and tooke away their yearely Maior, whom they called Eponymos, becauſe they did ſhew the yeares of old time, by the names of them that had bene Maiors. Furthermore, in ſtead thereof they ordained in the councell of the city, that there ſhould yearely be

be choſen one by voices of the people, whom they ſhoulde name the Prieſt of their Sauiors whoſe name they ſhould write and ſubſcribe in all publike grants and couenantes, to ſhewe the yeare: and beſides all this, that they ſhould cauſe their pictures to be drawen in the veyle or holy banner, in the which were ſet out the images of their goddes, the patrons and protectors of their citie. And furthermore they did conſecrate the place where Demetrius firſt came out of his coch, and there did ſet vp an aulter, and called it Demetrius aulter comming out of his coch: and vnto their tribes they added two other, the ANTIGONIDES, and the DEMETRIADES. Their great councell at large which they created yearely of fiue hundreth men, was then firſt of all brought into ſixe hundreth, becauſe euery tribe muſt needes furniſh of themſelues, fifty counſellers. But yet the ſtrangeſt acte, and moſt newe found inuention of flatterie, was that of Stratocles, (being the common flatterer and people pleaſer) who put forth this decree, by the which it was ordained: that thoſe whom the common wealth ſhould ſend vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, ſhould in ſtead of Ambaſſadors be called Theori, as much to ſay as miniſters of the ſacrifices. For ſo were they called, whom they ſent to DELPHES, to Apollo Pythias, or vnto ELIDE, to Iupiter Olympias, at the common and ſolemne feaſts of all GRECE, to doe the ordinarie ſacrifices and oblations for the health and preſeruation of the cities. This Stratocles in all things elſe was a deſperate man, and one that had alwayes led a wicked and diſſolute life: and for his ſhameles boldnes, he ſeemed wholly to followe the ſteps of Cleons foole hardines, and old inſolencie, which (when he liued) he ſhewed vnto the people. He openly kept a harlot in his houſe called Phylacion. One day ſhe hauing bought for his ſupper, beaſtes heads and neckes commonly eaten, he ſaid vnto her: why, how now? thou haſt bought me acates which we toſſe like bals, that haue to doe in the common wealth. Another time when the armie of the ATHENIANS was ouerthrowen by ſea, by the Ile of AMORGOS: he would needes preuent the newes of this ouerthrowe, and came through the ſtreete of Ceranicus, crowned with garlands of flowers, as if the ATHENIANS had wonne the battell: and was alſo the author of a decree, whereby they did ſacrifice vnto the goddes, to giue them thankes for the victorie: and meate was giuen amongſt euery tribe, in token of common ioy. But ſhortly after the Meſſengers arriued, which brought report of the ſhipwracke and ouerthrowe. The people were in an vprore withal, and ſent for Stratocles in a maruellous rage. But he with a face of braſſe came vnto them, and arrogantly defended the peoples ill will, and angrily told them: well, and what hurt haue I done you, If I haue made you mery theſe two daies? Such was Stratocles impudencie and raſhneſſe. But, as the Poet Ariſtophanes ſaith:

But whotter matters were that time in hand,
Than fire that waſteth both by ſea and land.

For there was another that paſſed Stratocles in knauerie. Who procured a decree, that as often as Demetrius came into the citie of ATHENS, he ſhould be receiued with all ceremonies and like ſolemnitie, as they vſe in the feaſtes of Ceres and Bacchus: and further that they ſhould giue vnto him that did excell all the reſt in ſumptuouſnes and riches, at ſuch time as Demetrius made his entry into the citie, ſo much money out of the common treaſure, as ſhould ſerue to make an image or other offring, which ſhould be conſecrated to the temples in memorie of his liberalitie. And laſt of all, they chaunged the name of the moneth Munichion (to wit the moneth of Ianuarie) and called it Demetrion: and the laſt day of the moneth which they called before the new and old moone, they then called it the Demetriade: and the feaſtes of Bacchus alſo called then Dionyſia, they preſently named Demetria. But the goddes by diuers ſignes and tokens ſhewed plainely, that they were offended with theſe chaunges and alterations. For the holy banner in the which (according to the order ſet downe) they had painted the images of Antigonus and Demetrius, with the pictures of Iupiter and Minerua: as they caried it a proceſſion through the ſtreete Ceranicus, it was torne a ſunder in the middeſt by a tempeſt of winde. And furthermore, about the aulters which were ſet vp in the honor of Demetrius and Antigonus, there grew a great deale of hemlock, the which otherwiſe was vnpoſſible to grow there. On the feaſt day alſo of Bacchus, they were compelled to leaue the pompe or proceſſion for that day, it was ſuch an extreame hard froſt out of all ſeaſon: and beſides, there fell ſuch a myll dew and great froſt vpon it, that not onely their vines and oliues were killed with it, but alſo the moſt part of the wheate blades which were newly ſprong vp. And therefore the Poet Philippides ( an enemie of the aforeſaide Stratocles ) in one of his comedies writeth certaine verſes againſt him to this effect.

The party for whoſe wickednes the vayle was rent in twaine,
VVhich with the honor due to God did worſhip men moſt vaine,
Is he for whom our budding vines were blaſted with the froſt.
Thoſe things and not our comedies haue vs ſo derely coſt.

This Philippides was very well beloued of king Lyſimachus, inſomuch that for his ſake the king had done many pleaſures to the common wealth of ATHENS. For he loued him ſo dearly, that as often as he ſawe him, or met with him at the beginning of any warre, or matter of great importance: he was of opinion that he brought him good lucke. For in deed he did not ſo much eſteeme him for the excellencie of his arte, but he was much more to be beloued and eſteemed, for his vertuous and honeſt conditions. He was no troubleſom man, neither was he infected with the finenes of court, as he ſhewed one day when the king made much of him, and giuing him good countenance ſayed vnto him: what wilt thou haue me giue thee of my things Philippides? euen what it ſhall pleaſe thee, O king, ſo it be none of thy ſecretes. Thus much we thought good to ſpeake of him in bytalke, becauſe an honeſt player of comedies ſhould match with a ſhameleſſe and impudent Orator of the people. But yet there was another Democlides, of the village of SPHETTVS, that dreamed out a more ſtranger kinde of honor, touching the conſecration of their targets, which they dedicated to the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, that is to ſay, that they ſhould go & aske the oracle of Demetrius. But I wil ſhew you the very effect and forme of the law as it was ſet downe. In good houre: the people ordeine that he ſhould be choſen one of the Citizens of ATHENS, which ſhall goe vnto our ſauiour: and after that he hath done due ſacrifice vnto him, he ſhall aske Demetrius our ſauior, after what ſort the people ſhall with greateſt holines and deuotion, without delay, make conſecration of their holieſt giftes and offerings: and according to the oracle it ſhall pleaſe him to giue them, the people ſhall duely execute it. Thus, laying vpon Demetrius al theſe fooliſh mockeries, who beſides was no great wiſe man, they made him a very foole. Demetrius being at that time at leaſure in ATHENS, he maried a widow called Eurydice, which came of that noble and ancient houſe of Miltiades, and had bene married before vnto one Opheltas Prince of the CYRENIANS, and that after his death returned againe to ATHENS. The ATHENIANS were very glad of this marriage, and thought it the greateſt honor that came to their citie, ſuppoſing he had done it for their ſakes. Howbeit he was ſoone wonne to be married, for he had many wiues, but amongſt them all, he loued Phila beſt, and gaue her moſt honor and preheminence aboue them all: partly for the reſpect of her father Antipater, and partly alſo for that ſhe had bene firſt maried vnto Craterus, whom the MACEDONIANS loued beſt when he liued, and moſt lamented after his death, aboue all the other ſucceſſors of Alexander. His father I ſuppoſe made him to mary her by force, although in deede her yeares was not meet for him: for he was maruellous young, and ſhee very old. And when Demetrius ſeemed not to be contented withall, his father rowned him ſoftly in the eare with this ſaying:

Demetrius had many wiues together.

The iudgement of mariage, and obedience.

Refuſe no woman nere ſo old,
VVhoſe mariage bringeth ſtore of gold.

Wherein he alluded cunningly to theſe verſes of Euripides.

Refuſe not to become a thrall,
VVhere lucre may inſue withall.

But ſo much did Demetrius honor his wife Phila, and all his other wiues he maried, that he was not aſhamed to keepe a number of Curtiſans, and other mens wiues beſides: ſo that hee onely of all other kings in his time, was moſt detected with this vice of lechery. While theſe things paſſed on in this ſort, he was commanded by his father, to fight with Ptolomy for the Realme of CYPRVS. So there was no remedy but he muſt needes obey him, although otherwiſe he was very ſory to leaue the warre he had begunne, to ſet the GRECIANS at liberty, the which had bene farre more honorable and famous. Howbeit, before he departed from ATHENS, hee ſent vnto Cleonides Ptolomyes generall, that kept the cities of CORINTHE and

SICYONE,

ONE, to offer him money if he would ſet their cities at liberty. But Cleonides would not be delt withall that way. Thereupon Demetrius ſtraight way tooke ſea, and ſayled with all his armie towards CYPRVS, where at his firſt comming he ouercame Menelaus Ptolomyes brother. But ſhortly after, Ptolomy went thither in perſon with a great armie both by ſea and land, and there paſſed betwixt them fierce threatnings and proud words to ech other. For Ptolomy ſent to Demetrius to bid him to depart if he were wiſe, before all his army came together: which would tread him vnder their feet, and martch vpon his belly, if he taried his comming. Demetrius on the other ſide ſent him word, that he would doe him this fauor to let him eſcape, if he would ſweare and promiſe vnto him to withdrawe his garriſons which he had in the cities of CORINTHE, and SYCIONE. So the expectation of this battell made theſe two Princes not only very penſiue to fight one with the other, but alſo all the other Lordes, Princes, and Kings: becauſe the ſucceſſe therof was vncertaine, which of them two ſhould preuaile. But euery man iudged this, that which of them obtained the victory, he ſhould not only be Lord of the realm of CYPRVS and SYRIA, but therewith alſo of greater power then all the reſt. Ptolomy in perſon with fifty ſaile began to row againſt his enemie Demetrius, and commanded his brother Menelaus that when he ſawe them faſt grappled in fight together, he ſhould lanch out of the hauen of SALAMINA, and giue charge vpon the rereward of Demetrius ſhips, to breake their order, with the threeſcore gallies he had in charge. Demetrius on the other ſide prepared tenne gallies againſt theſe three ſcore, thinking them enow to choke vp the hauen mouth being but narrow, ſo that none of the gallies that were within could come out: and furthermore, he diſperſed his armie by land vpon the foreland points which reach into the ſea, and went him ſelfe into the maine ſea with nine ſcore gallies, and gaue ſuch a fierce charge vppon Ptolomy, that he valiantly made him flie. Who when he ſawe his armie broken, fled as ſpeedily as he could with eight gallies only: for all the reſt were either broken or ſuncke in fight, and thoſe eight only eſcaped, beſides three ſcore and tenne which were taken, and all their ſouldiers in them. And as for his cariage, his traine, his friends, his officers, & houſhold ſeruants, his wiues, his gold and ſiluer, his armor, engines of batterie, and all ſuch other warlike furniture & munition as was conueyed abord his carects and great ſhips riding at anker: of all theſe things nothing eſcaped Demetrius hands, but all was brought into his campe. Among thoſe ſpoiles alſo was taken that famous curtiſan Lamia, who at the firſt had her name only, for her paſſing playing vpon the flute: but after ſhe fell to curtiſan trade, her countenance and credit increaſed the more. So that euen then when her beautie through yeares fell to decay, and that ſhe founde Demetrius much younger than her ſelfe: yet ſhe ſo wan him with her ſweete conuerſation and good grace, that he only liked her, and al the other women liked him. After this victory by ſea, Menelaus made no more reſiſtance, but yeelded vp SALAMINA and his ſhips vnto Demetrius, and put into his hands alſo twelue hundred hotſmen, and twelue thouſand footemen well armed. This ſo famous and triumphant victory was yet much more beautified, by Demetrius great bounty and goodnes which he ſhewed in giuing his enemies ſlaine in battell honorable funerals, ſetting the priſoners at liberty without ranſom paying, and giuing moreouer twelue hundred complet armors vnto the ATHENIANS. After this, Demetrius ſent Ariſtodemus MILESIAN vnto his father Antigonus, to tell him by word of mouth the newes of this victory. Ariſtodemus was the greateſt flatterer in all Antigonus Court, who deuiſed then, as it ſeemeth to me, to adde vnto this exploit the greateſt flattery poſſible. For when he had taken land after he was come out of the Ile of CYPRVS, he would in no wiſe haue the ſhip he came in to come near the ſhoare, but commanded them to ride at anker, and no man ſo hardy to leaue the ſhip: but he him ſelfe got into a litle boat, and went vnto Antigonus, who all this while was in maruellous feare & perplexity for the ſucceſſe of this battell, as men may eaſily iudge they are, which hope after ſo great incertainties. Now when word was broght him that Ariſtodemus was comming to him all alone, then was he worſe troubled then afore, inſomuch that he could ſcant keepe within dores him ſelfe, but ſent his ſeruaunts and friends one after an other to meete Ariſtodemus, to aske him what newes, and to bring him word preſently againe how the world went. But not one of them could get any thing out of him, for he went on ſtill faire and ſoftly with a ſad countenance, and verie demurely, ſpeaking neuer a worde. Wherefore Antigonus heart being cold in his belly, he could ſtay no longer, but would himſelfe goe and meet with Ariſtodemus at the gate, who had a maruellous preaſe of people following of him, beſides thoſe of the court which ranne out to heare his anſwer. At length when he came neare vnto Antigonus, holding out his right hand vnto him, he cryed out aloud, God ſaue thee, ô king Antigonus: we haue ouercome king Ptolomy in battell by ſea, and haue wonne the realme of CYPRVS, with ſixteen thouſand and eight hundreth priſoners. Then anſwered Antigonus, & God ſaue thee to. Truly Ariſtodemus thou haſt kept vs in a traunce a good while, but to puniſh thee for the paine thou haſt put vs to, thou ſhalt the later receiue the reward of thy good newes. Then was the firſt time that the people with a loude voice called Antigonus and Demetrius kings. Now for Antigonus, his friends and familiars did at that preſent inſtant put on the royal band or diadeame vpon his head: but for Demetrius, his father ſent it vnto him, and by his letters called him king. They alſo that were in EGYPT with Ptolomy, vnderſtāding that, did call and ſalute him by the name of king: becauſe it ſhould not ſeeme that for one ouerthrow receiued, their hartes were dead. Thus this ambition by iealouſie and emulation, went from man to man to all Alexanders ſucceſſors. For Lyſimachus then alſo began to weare the diadeame, and likewiſe Seleucus, as often as he ſpake with the GRECIANS: for before that time, he dealt in matters with the barbarous people as a king. But Caſſander, though others wrote themſelues kings, he only ſubſcribed after his wonted manner. Now this was not onely an increaſe of a new name, or changing of apparell, but it was ſuch an honor, as it liſt vp their hearts, and made them ſtand vpon themſelues: and beſides it ſo framed their maner of life and conuerſation with men, that they grew more proud and ſtately, then euer they were before: like vnto common players of tragedies, who apparelling themſelues to play their partes vpon the ſtage doe change their gate, their countenance, their voice, their manner of ſitting at the table, and their talke alſo. So that afterwardes they grewe more cruell in commaunding their ſubiects, when they had once taken away the viſer & diſſimulation of their abſolute power, which before made them farre more lowly and gentle in many matters vnto them. And all this came through one vile flatterer, that brought ſuch a wonderfull chaunge in the world. Antigonus therefore puffed vp with the glory of the victorie of his ſonne Demetrius, for the conqueſt of CYPRVS: he determined forthwith to ſet vpon Ptolomy. Himſelfe led the army by lande, hauing his ſonne Demetrius ſtill rowing by the ſhore ſide with a great fleete of ſhips. But one of his familiars called Medius, being a ſleepe had a viſion one night that told him, what ſhould be the end and ſucceſſe of this iorney. He thought he ſawe Antigonus runne with all his armie who ſhould haue the vpper hand, and that at the firſt he ranne with great force and ſwiftneſſe: but that afterwardes his ſtrength and breath failed him ſo much, that when he ſhould returne, he had ſcant any poulſe or breath, and with much a doe retyred againe. And euen ſo it chanced vnto him. For Antigonus by land, was eftſoones in great danger: and Demetrius alſo by ſea was often in hazard to leaue the coaſt, and by ſtorme and weather to be caſt into places, where was neither hauen, creekes, nor harbarough for his ſhippes. And at length, hauing loſt a great number of his ſhippes, he was driuen to returne without any attempt giuen. Now Antigonus was at that time litle leſſe then foure ſcore yeare old, but yet his fatte and corpulent body was more comberſome to him then his yeares: therefore being growen vnmeete for wars, he vſed his ſonne in his place. Who for that he was fortunate, as alſo ſkilfull through the experience he had gotten, did wiſely gouerne the waightieſt matters. His father beſides did not paſſe for his youthfull partes, lauiſhe expences, and common drunkennes he gaue himſelfe vnto. For in time of peace, he was giuen ouer to all thoſe vices: but in time of warre, he was as ſober and continent, as any man ſo borne by nature. And therefore it is reported, that Lamia being manifeſtly knowen to be Miſtreſſe ouer him, one day when he was come from hunting, he came (as his manner was) to kiſſe his father: and that Antigonus ſmiling vppon him ſaied, what, how now Sonne, doeſt thou thinke thou art kiſſing of Lamia? Another time Demetrius was many daies together drinking and ryoting, and ſaw not his father: and then to excuſe him ſelfe vnto him, he tolde him he had gotten a rewme that made him keepe his chamber, that he could not come to him. So I heard, ſayed Antigonus: but was it of THASOS or CHIOS, that rewme? he ſpake it, becauſe that in either of thoſe two Ilandes, there were excellent good wines: another time Demetrius ſent his father word that he was not wel. Thereupon Antigonus went to ſee him, and comming thither, he met a faier young boye at his dore. So he went vp to his chamber, and ſitting down by his beddes ſide, he tooke him by the hand to feele his poulſe. Demetrius told him that his feuer had left him but a litle before. I know it well ſaied Antigonus: for I met the young boy euen at the dore as I came in. So Antigonus did gently beare with his ſonnes faults, in reſpect of his many other vertues he had. The voice goeth that the SCYTHIANS, when they are diſpoſed to drink drunk together, do diuerſe times twang the ſtrings of their bowes, as though that would ſerue to keepe the ſtrength of their courage & hardines, which otherwiſe the pleaſantnes of the wine would take frō them. But Demetrius gaue himſelfe to one thing at one ſelfe time. Somtime to take his pleaſure, ſometime to deale in matters of waight, and in all extremity he euer vſed but one of them, & would neuer mingle the one with the other: and yet this notwithſtanding he was no leſſe politike and circumſpect to prepare all maner of munition for warres. For as he was a wiſe Captaine to leade an armie, ſo was he alſo very carefull to prouide all things meet for their furniture, and would rather haue too much, then too litle. But aboue al, he exceeded in ſumptous building of ſhips, and framing of all ſorts of engines of batterie, and ſpecially for the delight he tooke to inuent and deuiſe them. For he had an excellent naturall witte to deuiſe ſuch workes, as are made by witte and hand, and did not beſtow his witte and inuention in handie craftes, in trifling toyes and bables: as many other kings that haue giuen themſelues to playe on flutes, others to paint and draw, and others alſo to Turners crafte. As Aeropus king of MACEDON, who delighted to make fine tables, and pretie lampes. And Attalus, ſurnamed Philometor (to ſay, as louer of his mother) that would plant and ſet phiſicall herbes, as Helleborum, Lingwort, or Beares foote: Hoſcynamum, Henbane, Cicuta, Hemlocke, Aconitum, Libardbaine or Woolſebaine, and Dorycinum: for the which we haue no Engliſh word: all theſe would he ſet himſelfe with his owne handes in the gardaines of his owne pallace, and alſo gather them in time of the yeare, to know the vertue and power of them. As: Arſaces the kings of PARTHIA, that boaſted they could themſelues make their arrowes heades, and ſharpen them, But the artificers workes which Demetrius practiſed, ſhewed that they came from a King. For his manner of workemanſhippe had a certen greatneſſe in it, the which euen with the ſubtiltie and fineneſſe of his workes, ſhewed the trimme handling of the workeman: So that they appeared not onely worthie the vnderſtanding and riches of a king, but alſo the forging and making by the handes of a great king. For his friends did not onely wonder at their greatneſſe, but his very enemies alſo were delighted with the beautie of them. And this is more true then meet to be ſpoken: the enemies could not but maruell when they ſawe his gallies rowing alongeſt the coaſt, with fifteene or ſixteene bancks of owers: and his engines of batterie which they called Elepolis (as much to ſaye, engines to take cities) were a ſpectacle of great admiration vnto thoſe whom he beſieged, as the euents following did throughly witneſſe. For Lyſimachus who of all other kings did malice Demetrius moſt comming to raiſe the ſiege from the citie of SOLI in CILICIA, the which Demetrius beſieged: he ſent vnto him to pray him to let him ſee his engines of batterie, & his gallies rowing vpon the ſea. Demetrius granting him, Lyſimachus returned with wonderfull admiration. The RHODIANS alſo hauing long time defended his ſiege, at the laſt made peace with him, and prayed him to leaue ſome one of his engines with them, for a perpetuall teſtimonie and remembrance both of his power, & alſo of their corage and valiantnes. The cauſe why Demetrius made war with the RHODIANS was, becauſe they were confederates with king Ptolomy, he brought againſt their walles the greateſt engine he had, the foot whereof was like a tile, more long then broad, and at the baſe on either ſide it was eight and fortie cubits long, and threeſcore and ſixe high, riſing ſtill narrow euen to the very top: ſo that the vpper parts were narrower then the nether, and within it were many pretie roomes and places conueied for ſouldiers. The forepart of it was open towards the enemy, & euery roome or partition had windowes out of which they beſtowed all kind of ſhot, becauſe they were full of armed men fighting with all ſorts of weapons. But nowe, becauſe it was ſo well framed and counterpeaſed, that it gaue no waye nor reeld on either ſide, which way ſoeuer they remoued it, but that it ſtood faſt and vpright vpon her ſoundation,making a terrible noiſe and ſound : that made the worke as wonderfull to behold,as it was a maruellous pleaſure for men to ſee it. In this warre were brought vnto Demetrius two notable armors weighing forty pound a peece, and made by one Zoilus an armorer, who to ſhew the hardnes and goodnes of the temper, ſuffered them to be proued and ſhot at, at ſixe ſcore paces,with the engines of their battrie : and albeit the armors were ſhot at and hit, yet were they neuer pierced, and but onely a litle race or ſcratch ſeene,as it were of a bodkin or penknife,and had no more hurt. Demetrius alwaies wore one of them in theſe warres,and Alcimus Albanian the other,the ſtrongeſt and valianteſt man he had in all his hoaſt, and that onely caried a complet armor weighing ſix ſcore pound,where all other ſouldiers wore none aboue three ſcore. This Alcimus was ſlaine at Rhodes valiantly fighting by the Theater. In this ſiege the Rhodians did valiantly defend themſelues, that Demetrius could doe no acte worthy memorie. This notwithſtanding,although he ſaw he could not preuaile, but loſe his time, yet was he the more obſtinately bent againſt them , to be euen with them : becauſe they had taken a ſhip of his, in the which his wife Phila had ſent vnto him certen hangings of tapeſtrie, linnen, apparell , and letters , and becauſe they had ſent them all vnto Ptolomy,aſſoone as they had taken them. But therein they did not follow the honeſt curteſie of the Athenians: who hauing intercepted certaine currers of king Philips that made war againſt them, they opened all the letters they caried, and read them, ſauing onely his wife Olympiaes letters ſhe ſent him,the which they ſent vnto king Philip ſealed,as they were when they receiued them. Now though this part did much grieue and offend him, yet he could not find in his hart to ſerue thē in that ſort,when he might haue done it not long after. For by chance at that time,Protogenes an excellent painter,borne in Caunus,did paint them the draught of the citie of Ialysus. Demetrius found this table in a houſe in the ſuburbes of the citie, being almoſt ended. The Rhodians thereupon ſending an Herauld vnto him, to beſeech him to ſpare the defacing of ſo goodly a worke : he returned them anſwer, that he would rather ſuffer his fathers images to be burnt, then ſo excellent and paſſing a worke as that to be loſt, and brought to nothing. For it is reported,that Protogenes was ſeuen yeares drawing of the ſame:and it is ſaid alſo that Apelles himſelfe when he ſaw it, did ſo wonder at it , that his ſpeech failed him , and he ſtood mute a long time, and at laſt ſayed : ſurely there is a wonderfull peece of worke and of great labor, yet they want thoſe graces and ornamentes whereby thoſe that I paint doe reach vnto heauen. This table afterwardes being brought to Rome, and hanged vp with others , was in the end burnt by fire. Now as the Rhodians were deſirous to be rid of this warre,and that Demetrius alſo was willing to take any honeſt occaſion to doe it: the Ambaſſadors of the Athenians came happely to ſerue both their deſires , who made peace betwene them with theſe conditions. That the Rhodians ſhould be confederates with Antigonus and Demetrius againſt all men,but Ptolomy only. The Athenians ſent for Demetrius,vpon Caſſanders comming to laye ſiege to their citie. Whereupon Demetrius immediately hoyſed ſayle towards Athens, with three hundreth and thirtie gallies,and a great number of men of warre beſides: ſo that he did not only driue Caſſander out of the prouince of Attica,but followed him euen to the ſtraight of Thermopyles, & there ouerthrew him in ſet battell,and receiued the citie of Heraclea,which willingly yeelded vnto him, & ſix thouſand Macedonians that came vnto him to take his part. So in his returne backe,he ſet all the Grecians at libertie on this ſide the ſtraight: he made league with the Boeotians, and tooke the citie of Cencrees,and the caſtles of Phyle and Panactos, in the fronters and confines of Attica,in the which Caſſander had left garriſons to keepe the country in ſubiection : and after he had driuen them out of the countrie,he rendred the forts again vnto the Athenians. Therfore though it ſeemed the Athenians had before beſtowed to their vttermoſt power al kinds of honors that could be offred him , euery man ſtriuing for life to preferre the ſame : yet they found out new deuiſes to flatter and pleaſe him. For they ordained that the place behind the temple of Minerua called Parthenon ( as who would ſay, the temple of the virgin ) ſhould be prepared for his houſe to lye in : and they ſayd, that the goddeſſe Minerua did lodge him with her. But to ſay truly, he was too vnchaſt a gheſt, to thinke that a maiden goddeſſe would be content he ſhould lye with her. And yet his father Antigonus perceiuing that they had lodged his ſonne Philip on a time in a houſe, where there were three young women, he ſayd nothing to Philip himſelfe, but before him he ſent for the harbinger, and ſayed vnto him: wilt thou not remoue my ſonne out of this ſtraight lodging, and prouide him of a better? And Demetrius, that ſhould haue reuerenced the goddeſſe Minerua, though for no other reſpect but becauſe he called her his eldeſt ſiſter, (for ſo he would ſhe ſhould be called) he defiled all the caſtle where was the temple of theſe holy virgins, with horrible and abhominable inſolencies, both towards young boyes of honeſt houſes, as alſo vnto yong women of the citie. So that this place ſeemed to be moſt pure and holy, at ſuch time as he lay with his common curtiſans, Chryſis, Lamia, Demo, and Anticyra. It ſhall not be greatly for the honor of the citie of ATHENS, to tell particularly all the abhominable partes he committed there. But Democles vertue and honeſtie deſerueth worthy and condigne remembrance. This Democles was a young boye that had no haire on his face, of whoſe beautie Demetrius being informed by the ſurname he had, as commonly called through the citie, Democles the faire: he ſought diuerſe wayes to intiſe him, both by faire meanes, large promiſes and giftes, and alſo with threates beſides. But when he ſaw no man could bring him to the bent of his bow, and that the young boy in the end ſeeing him ſo importunate vpon him, came no more to the common places of exerciſe, where other children vſed to recreate themſelues, and that to auoide the common ſtooues, he went to waſh himſelfe in another ſecret ſtooue: Demetrius watching his time and hower of going thither, followed him, and got in to him being alone. The boy ſeing himſelfe alone, and that he could not reſiſt Demetrius, tooke off the couer of the kettle or cauldron where the water was boyling, and leaping into it, drowned himſelfe. Truely he was vnworthie of ſo lamentable an end, but yet he ſhewed a noble hart, worthy of his beautie and countrie. But he did not as another called Cleanetus, the ſon of Cleomedon, who brought letters from Demetrius, directed to the people, whereby through Demetrius interceſſion and requeſt, his fathers fine of fiftie talents in the which he was condemned (and for nonpayment remained priſoner) was cleerly remitted and forgiuen. But by this acte, he not onely ſhamed and diſhonored himſelfe, but alſo troubled all the citie. For the people thereupon releaſed Cleomedon of his fine, but therwith they made a decree that no Citizen ſhould thenceforth bring any more letters from Demetrius. But afterward vnderſtanding that Demetrius was maruellouſly offended with this decree: they did not only reuoke their firſt decree, but they did alſo put ſome of them to death, which were the procurers and authors of the decree, and others alſo they baniſhed. And further they made a law, that the people of ATHENS ſhould account all religions to the gods, and iuſt vnto men, whatſoeuer it pleaſed Demetrius to order and appoint. At that time there was one of the chiefeſt men of the citie, that ſayd Stratocles was a mad man to preferre ſuch matters. Indeed quoth Demochares ſurnamed LACONIAN, he were a mad man if he were otherwiſe. and he ſpake it, becauſe this Stratocles had many great pleaſures at Demetrius hands for this flatterie. Howbeit, Demochares being accuſed & condemned vpon theſe words, he was baniſhed ATHENS. See the ATHENIANS how they vſed themſelues, who ſeemed to be deliuered from the garriſon they had before, and to be reſtored vnto their former libertie and freedome. From thence Demetrius went into PELOPONNESVS, and neuer an enemie of his durſt tarie his comming, but al fled before him, and left him their caſtles & towns. This Demetrius wan vnto himſelf all the countrie called ACTE, and all ARCHADIA, ſauing the citie of MANTINEA: and for the ſum of an hundreth talents giuen amongſt them: he deliuered the cities of ARGOS, SICYONE, and of CORINTHE, from the garriſons that laye amongſt them. About that time fell out the great feaſt of Iuno in ARGOS, called Heræa. Therefore Demetrius, to honor this feaſt with the GRECIANS, married Deidamia (the daughter of Eacides, king of the MOLOSSIANS, & ſiſter of Pyrrhus) and perſwaded the SICYONIANS to leaue their citie, and to come and build in another goodly place neare vnto it, where they nowe doe dwell: and ſo with the place and ſituation, he changed alſo the name of the citie. For in ſtead of SICYONE, he made it to be called DEMETRIADE. Then at a generall aſſemblie of the ſtates of GRECE, which was kept in the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, called ISTHMOS: Demetrius was choſen Lieutenant generall of all the GRECIANS, as Philip and Alexander (both kings of MACEDON) had bene before him, vnto whom he did not only compare himſelfe, but thought himſelfe greater then they, becauſe fortune ſmiled on him, and for that he had ſo good ſucceſſe in all his affaires. Whereas Alexander did neuer take away the title and name of king, from any other kings: neither did euer call him ſelfe king of kings, although he had giuen vnto diuerſe of them the name and power of a king: and in contrary manner alſo, Demetrius laughed them to ſcorne which called any other Princes, kings but his father and himſelf. Moreouer he tooke great pleaſure to hear his flatterers, who being at banquets called for wine to drinke to king Demetrius, and then to Seleucus maiſter of the elephants, to Ptolomy Admirall, to Lyſimachus, keeper of the treaſure, & to Agathocles SILICIAN, gouernor of the Iles. All the kings, but Lyſimachus, laughed at theſe toyes when they were reported to thẽ: but Lyſimachus was very angrie, & thought great ſcorn that Demetrius ſhould reckon him a gelding, for that it was an old cuſtom cõmonly to giue an Eunuch the charge of keeping the treaſure. So Lyſimachus of all other Princes did beare him moſt malice, and becauſe he would finely taunt him for that he euer kept Lamia his Curtiſan with him: vntill this preſent time, ſayd he, I neuer ſaw harlot play in a tragedie before. Demetrius anſwered him againe, that his harlot was chaſter then Penelope his wife. So Demetrius departing for that time out of PELOPONNESVS, tooke his iorney towards ATHENS, & wrote before to the ATHENIANS, that when he came thither he would be receiued into the fraternitie of the holy miſteries, and that he ment they ſhould ſhew him at one ſelfe time, all that was to be ſeene, euen from the leaſt to the higheſt ſecrets of their ceremonies, called Epoptices, becauſe they made the brethren of the fraternitie ſee them long time after that they had bene firſt receiued into the leſſer ceremonies: the which was not lawfull then, neither was euer heard of before. For theſe ſmaller miſteries, in old time were celebrated in the moneth of Nouember, and the greater in the month of Auguſt: and beſide it was not lawfull to celebrate or vſe theſe ceremonies within the ſpace of a yeare one of the other. When theſe letters were openly read, no man durſt ſpeake againſt them, but Pythodorus the Prieſt, who caried the torche lighted when they ſhewed theſe miſteries. Howbeit his words preuailed not, for by the deuiſe of Stratocles it was enacted at an aſſembly of the citie, that the moneth of March in the which they were at that time, ſhould be called and reputed Nouember. And ſo as they could beſt helpe it, by their ordinances of the citie they did receiue Demetrius into the fraternitie of the miſteries: and afterwardes againe, this ſelfe moneth of March which they had tranſlated into Nouember, became ſodainely Auguſt: and in the ſelfeſame yeare was celebrated the other ceremonie of theſe great miſteries, whereby Demetrius was admitted to ſee the moſt ſtraight and ſecret ceremonies. Therfore Philippides the Poet inueighing againſt the ſacriledge, and impietie of religion prophaned by Stratocles, made theſe verſes of him:

Philippides verſes againſt Stratocles the boaſter.

Into one moneth his comming hither
Hath thruſt vp all the yeare togither.

And afterwards becauſe Stratocles was the procurer that Demetrius was lodged in the temple of Mineruа within the caſtle:

Of chaſt Mineruaes holy church he makes a filthy ſtewes,
And in that virgins very ſight his harlots doth abuſe.

But yet of all the inſolent partes done at that time in ATHENS, (although many were committed) none of all the reſt grieued the ATHENIANS more, then this did: that Demetrius commanded them they ſhould preſently furniſh him with two hundreth & fifty talents. The taxation of this payment was very hard vnto them, both for the ſhortneſſe of the time appointed them, as alſo for the impoſſibilitie of abating any part of it. When he had ſeene all this maſſe of money layed on a heape before him, he commanded it ſhould be giuen to Lamia, & among his other Curtiſans, to buy them ſope. The ſhame the ATHENIANS receiued by this gift, grieued them more, than the loſſe of their money: & the words he ſpake to the great contempt of them and their citie, did more trouble them, then the payment they made. Some ſay notwithſtanding, that Demetrius did not alone vſe the ATHENIANS thus ſhamfully, but the THESSALIANS alſo in the ſame manner. But paſſing this ouer: Lamia of her ſelfe & through her owne countenance did get a great ſumme of money together of diuerſe perſons for one ſupper ſhe made vnto Demetrius, the preparation whereof was of ſuch exceeding charge, that Lycæus borne in the Ile of SAMOS, did ſet downe the order thereof in writing. And therfore a certen

Poet no leſſe pleaſantly, then truly, called this Lamia, Elepolis: to witte, an engine to take cities. And Demochares alſo borne in the citie of SOLI, called Demetrius a fable, becauſe he had Lamia euer with him: as in the fables which olde women tell litle children, there is euer lightly a Lamia, as much to ſay, as a witch, or ſorcereſſe. So that the great credit and authoritie this Lamia had and the loue which Demetrius bare her: did not onely cauſe his wiues ſuſpect and enuy him, but made him hated alſo of all his friends & familiars. And therfore certen gentlemē, whom Demetrius ſent in ambaſſade vnto king Lyſimachus, he talking familiarly with thē, & paſſing the time away, ſhewed them great wounds of the clawes of a lyon vpon his armes and legges, telling them alſo how he was forced to fight with a lyon, when through king Alexanders fury he was ſhut vp in his denne with him: they ſmiling to heare him, told him that the king their maiſter had alſo certen markes and bitings on his necke, of a wilde beaſt called Lamia. And to ſay truly, it was a wonderfull thing, that marying (as he did) his wife Phila ſo much againſt his will, becauſe ſhe was too old for him: howe he was ſo rauiſhed with Lamia, and did ſo conſtantly loue her ſo long together, conſidering alſo that ſhe was very old, & paſt the beſt. Therefore Demo, ſurnamed Mania, (as much to ſaye the mad woman) pleaſantly anſwered Demetrius, asking her one night when Lamia had played on the flute all ſupper time, what ſhe thought of Lamia? an old woman, ô king ꝗ ſhe. Another time when frute was ſerued in, after the bourd was taken vp: do you ſee ſaid Demetrius, how many prety fine knacks Lamia ſendeth me? My mother, anſwered Demo againe, will ſend you more then theſe, if you pleaſe to lye with her. It is reported of this Lamia, that ſhe ouerthrew Bocchoris iudgment in a matter. In EGYPT there was a young man that had a maruellous fancie vnto a famous Curtiſan called Thonis: who did aske him ſuch a great ſumme of money to lye with her, that it was vnpoſsible for him to giue it her. At length, this amarous youth being ſo deepe in loue with her, dreamed one night he laye with her, and enioyed her: ſo that for the pleaſure he tooke by his conceit and imagination, when he awaked, his earneſt loue was ſatisfied. This Curtiſan whom he had caſt fancie to, hearing of this his dreame, did put him in ſute before the iudges, to be payed her hyer for the pleaſure the young man had taken of her by imagination. Bocchoris hearing the ſumme of her complaint, commaunded the young man to bring before him in ſome veſſell, at a certen day appointed, as much money as ſhe did ask him to lye with her. Then he bad him to toſſe it to and fro in his hand before the Curtiſan, that ſhe ſhould not only haue the ſhadow and ſight of it: for ꝗ he, imagination and opinion is but a ſhadow of truth. Lamia ſaid this was no equall iudgment: for ſaith ſhe, the ſhadow only or the ſight of money, did not ſatisfie the couetouſnes of the Curtiſan, as the young mans luſt was quenched by his dreame. Thus enough ſpoken of Lamia. But now the miſfortunes and ieaſts of him we preſently write of: they doe tranſport our hiſtorie, as from a comicall into a tragicall theater, that is to ſaye, from pleaſant and light matter, into lamentable and bitter teares. For all the Princes and Kings conſpired generally againſt Antigonus, and ioyned all their force and armies together. Therefore Demetrius departed forthwith out of GRECE, and came to ioyne with his father, whoſe courage he found more liuely and better giuen to this warre then his yeares required: beſides that Demetrius comming made him the bolder, and did lifte vp his heart the more. And yet ſeemeth to me, that if Antigonus would but haue yeelded vp a fewe trifling things, or that he either could or would haue bridled his ouer immoderate couetous deſire to raigne: he had both kept for himſelfe all the time of his life, and alſo lefte after his death vnto his ſonne, the ſupreameſt dignitie and power, aboue all the other Kings and ſucceſſors of Alexander. But he was ſo cruell, and ſo raſh of nature, and as inſolent and braue in his doings, as in his words: that thereby he ſtirred vp and brought vpon him as his enemies, many great and mightie Princes. For euen at that preſent time he ſaid, that he would as eaſily diſperſe and ſcatter aſunder that conſpiracie againſt him, as chowghes or other litle birdes comming to pecke vp the corne newely ſowen, are eaſily ſcared away with a ſtone or making any litle noyſe. So he caried to the field with him, aboue threeſcore and tenne thouſand footemen, tenne thouſand horſemen, and threeſcore and fifteene Elephantes. His enemies had threeſcore and foure thouſande footemen, and fiue hundreth horſemen more then he, with foure hundreth Elephants, and ſix ſcore carts of warre. When the two armies were one neare vnto the other, me thinkes he had ſome imagination in his head that changed his hope, but not his courage. For in al other battels and conflicts, hauing cōmonly vſed to looke big on the matter, to haue a loud high voice, and to vſe braue words, and ſometime alſo euen in the chiefeſt of all the battell to giue ſome pleaſant mocke or other, ſhewing a certaine truſt he had in himſelfe, and contempt of his enemie: then they ſawe him oftentimes alone and verie penſiue, without euer a word to any man. One day he called all his armie together, and preſented his ſonne vnto the ſouldiers, recommending him vnto them, as his heire and ſucceſſor, and talked with him alone in his tent. Whereat men maruelled the more, becauſe that he neuer vſed before to impart to any man the ſecrets of his counſell & determination, no not to his owne ſonne, but did all things of himſelfe: and then commanded that thing openly to to be done which he had ſecretly purpoſed. For proofe hereof it is ſaid, Demetrius being but a young man, asked him on a time when the campe ſhould remoue: and that Antigonus in anger anſwered him, art thou affraid thou ſhalt not heare the ſound of the trūpet?

Furthermore, there fell out many ill ſignes and tokens that killed their harts. For Demetrius dreamed that Alexander the great appeared armed vnto him at all peeces, and that he asked him what word or ſignall of battell they were determined to giue, at the day of battell, he anſwered that they were determined to giue, Iupiter and Victorie. Then ſaied Alexander, I will goe to thine enemies that ſhall receiue me: & afterwards at the very day of the ouerthrow, when all their army were ſet in battell ray: Antigonus comming out of his tent: had ſuch a great fall, that he fell flat on his face to the ground, and hurt himſelfe verie ſorely. So when he was taken vp, then liſting vp his hands to heauen, he made his prayer vnto the gods, that it would pleaſe them to grant him victorie, or ſodaine death without great paine, before he ſhould ſee himſelfe vanquiſhed and his armie ouerthrowen. When both battels came to ioyne, and that they fought hand to hand: Demetrius that had the moſt part of the horſmen with him, went & gaue charge vpon Antiochus the ſonne of Seleucus, and fought it out ſo valiantly on his ſide, that he ouerthrew his enemies, and put them to flight. But too fondly following the chaſe of them that fled, and out of time: he marred all, and was the occaſion of the loſſe of his victorie.

Demetrius vpon the firſt onſet, made Antiochus the ſonne of Seleucus flie. Ouerraſhly chaſing the enemies, he loſt his victorie and was ouercome.

For when he returned from the chaſe, he could not ioyne againe with their footemen, becauſe the Elephants were betwene both. Then Seleucus perceiuing Antigonus battell was naked of horſemen, he did not preſently ſet vpon them, but turned at one ſide as though he would enuirone them behind, and made them affraid: yet making head as he would charge them, only to giue them leaſure to come on their ſide as they did. For the moſt part of Antigonus hoaſt did forſake him and yeelded vnto his enemies: the reſt of them fled euery man. And when a great troupe of men together went with great furie to giue charge on that ſide where Antigonus was: one of them that were about him ſaide vnto him: your grace had neede take heede, for theſe men come to charge vs. He aunſwered againe: but how ſhould they knowe me? and if they did my ſonne Demetrius wil come & help me. This was his laſt hope, and ſtill he looked euery way, if he could ſee his ſonne comming towards him: till at length he was ſlaine with arrowes, darts and pikes. For of all his friends & ſouldiers, there taried not one man by his body, but Thorax of the city of LARISSA in THESSALIE.

The death of king Antigonus.

Now the battell hauing ſuch ſucceſſe as you haue heard. The Kings and Princes that had won ſo noble a victorie, as if they had cut a great body into ſundry peeces: they deuided Antigonus kingdom among them, and euery man had his part of all the prouinces and coūtries which Antigonus kept adding that vnto their other dominions which they poſſeſſed before.

Now Demetrius flying with all poſſible ſpeede that might be, with fiue thouſand footmen & foure thouſand horſemen, he got to the citie of EPHESVS: where euery man miſtruſted, that being needie of money as he was, he would not ſpare the temple of Diana in EPHESVS, but would rifle all the gold and ſiluer in it. And in contrarie manner alſo Demetrius being affraied of his ſouldiers, leaſt they would ſpoyle it againſt his will: he ſodainly departed thence, and ſayled towards GRECE, putting his greateſt confidence & affiance in the ATHENIANS, becauſe he had left his wife Deidamia at ATHENS, with ſhippes and ſome money, ſuppoſing he could goe no whither with better ſafetie in his aduerſitie, then to ATHENS, of whoſe good willes he thought himſelfe aſſured. Wherefore when Ambaſſadors of the ATHENIANS came vnto him. and found him not far from the Iles of Cy-

CLADES, as he ſayled with great ſpeede towardes ATTICA, and that they had declared vnto him, he ſhould forbeare to come vnto their citie, becauſe the people had made an ordinaunce to ſuffer no mo kings to come into ATHENS, and that they had ſent Deidamia his wiſe honorably accompanied vnto the citie of MEGARA: then was Demetrius for very anger & paſsion of minde, cleane out of countenaunce, although vntill that time he had patiently borne his aduerſitie, and his hart had neuer failed him. But this nipped him to the hart, when he ſaw (that contrary to expectation) the ATHENIANS had deceiued and ſayled him in his greateſt neede, and that in his aduerſitie he found their former friendſhip counterfeit, and altogether diſſembled. Whereby moſt plainly appeareth, that the moſt vncertaine and deceiueable proofe of peoples good wils and cities towardes Kings and Princes, are the immeaſurable and extreme honors they do vnto them. For ſith it is ſo, that the truth and certaintie of honour proceedeth from the good will of thoſe that giue it: the feare which the common people commonly ſtand in of the power of kings, is ſufficient cauſe for them to miſtruſt that the people do it not with good will and from their harts, conſidering that for feare they do the ſelfe ſame things, which they will alſo do for loue. Therefore graue and wiſe Princes ſhould not paſſe ſo much for the images and ſtatues they ſet vp for them, or the tables or diuine honours they do decree vnto them: as to regard their owne workes and deedes, and weying them truly, ſo to beleeue and receiue their honours for true, or otherwiſe to reiect and miſtruſt them, as things done by compulſion. For commonly it is that which maketh the people to hate kings the more, when they do accept theſe immeaſurable and extreme honours done vnto them, but thoſe ſortes chiefly hate them moſt, that againſt their wils are forced to do them thoſe honors. Demetrius ſeeing thẽ how iniuriouſly the ATHENIANS had vſed him, & at that time not knowing how to be reuenged of them: he modeſtly ſent vnto them only to make his complaints, and to demaund his ſhippes, among the which was that galley of ſixteen banckes of owers. The which when he had receiued, he hoyſed ſaile immediatly towards the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, and there found all things to go againſt him. For in euery place where he had left any garriſon, the Captaines that had the charge of them, either yeelded them vp, or elſe reuolted, & kept them againſt him. Therefore leauing Pyrrhus his Lieutenant in GRECE, he tooke ſea againe, & ſailed towards CHERRONESVS, & there with the miſchieues he did, & with the ſpoyles he got in king Lyſimachus land, he payed his men, and enriched his army, the which began againe to increaſe, & to be dreadfull to his enemies. But now for Lyſimachus, the other kings made no great account of him, neither did they ſturre to giue him aide, becauſe he was nothing inferiour vnto Demetrius: and for that he was of greater power and poſſeſsiõs then themſelues, they therefore were the more affrayed of him. Shortly after, Seleucus ſent vnto Demetrius, to require his daughter Stratonice in mariage, notwithſtanding that he had a ſonne already called Antiochus, by his wife Apama a PERSIAN. Howbeit he thought that his affaires and greatneſſe of his eſtate and kingdome, was able enough to maintaine many ſucceſſours after him. And furthermore, he conſidered with himſelfe that he ſhould haue neede of Demetrius allyance, becauſe he ſaw Lyſimachus himſelfe matche with one of Ptolomyes daughters, & his ſonne Agathocles with his other daughter. Demetrius ſeeing this good fortune offered him beyond all hope, preſently tooke his daughter with him, & ſayled with all his ſhippes directly towardes SYRIA. In the which voyage he was conſtrained of neceſsitie to land ſometimes, and ſpecially in CILICIA, the which Pliſtarchus the brother of Caſſander kept at that time, being giuen him by the other kings for his part and portion of the ſpoyle of Antigonus, after he was ouerthrowen. This Pliſtarchus thinking that Demetrius landed not to refreſh himſelfe, but to forrage and ſpoyle becauſe he would complaine of Seleucus for the allyance he made with their common enemie, without the conſent and priuitie of all the other Kings and Princes confederates, he went purpoſly vnto his brother Caſſander. Demetrius hauing intelligence thereof, ſodainly inuaded the land, and ſpoyled as farre as the citie of CYNDES, and caried away (which he had leauied) twelue hundred talentes, which he found yet left of his fathers treaſure: and then with all the ſpeede he could poſsible he returned to his ſhips, and hoyſed ſayle. Shortly after, his wife Phila alſo came vnto him. So Seleucus receiued them all neare vnto the citie of OROSSVS, and there their meeting was Princely, without ſorow or ſuſpition

one of the other. Firſt of all Seleucus did feaſt Demetrius in his tent, in the middeſt of his campe: and afterwardes Demetrius feaſted him againe in his galley, with thirteen bankes of owers. Thus they paſſed many dayes together, feaſting and reioycing ech with other, being vnarmed, and hauing no ſouldiers to wait vpon them: vntill at length Seleucus with his wife Stratonice departed, and tooke his way with great pompe towards the citie of ANTIOCH.

Now for Demetrius, he kept the prouince of CILICIA, and ſent his wife Phila vnto her brother Caſſander, to aunſwere the complaints and accuſations of Pliſtarchus againſt him. In the meane time Deidamia his wife departed out of GRECE to come vnto him: who after ſhe had remained with him a few dayes, dyed of a ſickeneſſe.

The death of Deidamia Demetrius wife. Demetrius marieth Ptolemæide, Ptolomies daughter.

Afterwardes Demetrius comming againe in fauour with Ptolomie, by Seleucus his ſonne in lawes meanes: he maried his daughter Ptolemæide. Hitherunto Seleucus vſed Demetrius very curteouſly: but afterwardes he prayed him to deliuer him CILICIA again, for a ſumme of money that he offered him: but Demetrius plainly denied him.

Diſſention betwixt Demetrius and Seleucus. Platoes ſaying of riches.

Then did Seleucus ſhew a cruell and tyrannicall couetouſnes: for in anger, and with fierce threats and countenaunce he asked him the cities of TYR, and SIDON. But therein me thinks he lacked honeſtie and ciuilitie: as though he that had vnder his obedience and ſubiection all that which lay betwixt the INDIANS, and the ſea of SYRIA, was in ſuch neede and pouertie: that for two cities only, he ſhould driue his father in law from him, who had ſuſtained ſo hard and bitter chaunge. But thereby he rightly confirmed Platoes ſaying: that he that will be rich in deede, muſt endeuour himſelfe not to increaſe his riches, but rather to diminiſh his couetouſneſſe. For he ſhall neuer be but a begger, and needy, whoſe couetous deſire hath no end. This notwithſtanding, Demetrius yeelded not for feare, but prouided to repleniſh the cities with good garriſons to keepe them againſt him: ſaying, that though he had bene ouercome ten thouſand times more in battell, yet it ſhould neuer ſincke into his head that he ſhould be contented, and thinke himſelfe happy to buy Seleucus allyance ſo deare. On the other ſide, being aduertiſed that one Lachares hauing ſpied oportunitie when the ATHENIANS were in ciuill warres one againſt the other, and that he had ouercome them, and did tyrannically vſurpe the gouernement: he then perſwaded himſelfe that he might eaſely winne it againe, if he came thither vpon the ſodaine.

Thereupon he croſſed the ſeas with a great fleete of ſhippes, without any daunger: but he had ſuch a great ſtorme and tempeſt vpon the coaſt of ATTICA, that he loſt the moſt part of his ſhippes, and a great number of men beſides. But for himſelfe he ſcaped, and began to make a litle warre with the ATHENIANS. Yet perceiuing that he did no good there, but loſt his time: he ſent ſome of his men to gather a number of his ſhips againe together, & he himſelfe in the meane time went into PELOPONNESVS, to lay ſiege to the citie of MESSENA, where his perſon was in great daunger. For fighting hard by the wall, he had ſuch a blow with a dart, that it hit him full in the mouth, and ranne through his cheeke. Notwithſtãding this, after he was healed of that wound, he brought into his ſubiection againe, certaine townes that had rebelled againſt him. After that, he returned again into ATTICA, & tooke the cities of ELEVSIN, and of RHAMNVS: & then ſpoyled all the country, & tooke a ſhip fraught with corne, & hong vp the marchaunt that ought it, & the maiſter of the ſhip that brought it. Thereby to terrifie all other marchaunts, that they ſhould be affrayed to bring any more corne thither, & ſo to famiſh the citie, by keeping them from all things neceſſarie for their ſuſtenance: and ſo it happened. For a buſhell of ſalt was ſold at ATHENS for fortie ſiluer Drachmas, and the buſhell of wheate for three hundred Drachmas. In this extreme neceſſitie, the ATHENIANS had but a ſhort ioy for the hundred and fiftie galleies they ſaw neare vnto ÆGINA, the which Ptolomie ſent to aide them. For when the ſouldiers that were in them ſaw that they brought vnto Demetrius a great number of ſhips out of PELOPONNESVS, out of CYPRVS, & diuers other parts, which amounted in the whole to the number of three hundred ſayle: they weyed their anckers, and fled preſently. Then Lachares forſooke the city, and ſecretly ſaued himſelfe.

The Atheniãs do yeeld vnto Demetrius.

Now the ATHENIANS, who before had commaunded vpon paine of death, that no man ſhould make any motion to the councell, to treate of any peace with Demetrius: they did then vpon Lachares flying, preſently open the gates next vnto Demetrius campe, and ſent Ambaſſadours vnto him, not looking for any grace or peace, but becauſe neceſſitie draue them to it. During this ſo hard and ſtraight ſiege, there fell out many wonderfull and ſtraunge things: but among others,this one is of ſpeciall note. It is reported that the father and the ſonne ſitting in their houſe, voyde of all hope of life: there fell a dead rat before them from the toppe of the houſe, and that the father and ſonne ſought who ſhould haue it to eate, Moreouer,that at the ſelfe ſame ſiege the Philoſopher Epicurus maintained himſelfe and his ſchollers, by giuing them a proportion of beanes euery day, by the which they liued. Thus the citie of ATHENS being brought vnto this extremitie, Demetrius made his entrie into it,and gaue commaundement to all the citizens, that they ſhould aſſemble euery man within the Theater: where he made them to be compaſſed in with armed ſouldiers, and then placed all his gard armed about the ſtage. Afterwardes he came downe himſelfe into the Theater,through high galleries and entries by the which the common players vſed to come to play their partes in tragedies, in ſomuch as the ATHENIANS were then worſe affrayed then before: howbeit Demetrius preſently pacified their feare, as ſoone as he began to ſpeake vnto them. For he did not faſhion his oration with a haſtie angry voyce, neither did he vſe any ſharpe or bitter wordes: but onely after he had curteouſly told them their faultes and diſcurteſie towardes him, he ſayd he forgaue them,and that he would be their friend againe: and furthermore, he cauſed ten millions of buſhels of wheate to be giuen vnto them, and ſtabliſhed ſuch Gouernours there, as the people miſliked not of. Then Democles the Orator, ſeeing that the people gaue out great ſhoutes of ioy in the prayſe of Demetrius,& that the Orators dayly contended in the pulpit for orations,who ſhould exceede other in preferring new honors for Demetrius: he cauſed an order to be made,that the hauẽs of PIRÆVS & MVNYCHIA ſhould be put into Demetrius hãds, to vſe at his pleaſure. This being ſtabliſhed by voyces of the people, Demetrius of his owne priuate authoritie did place a great garriſon within the forte called MVSÆVM, becauſe the people ſhould rebell no more againſt him, nor diuert him from his other enterpriſes. Thus when he had taken ATHENS,he went to ſet vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS. But Archidamus king of LACEDÆMON, came againſt him with a puiſſant army, whom he diſcomfited in battell,and put to flight, by the citie of MANTINEA. After that he inuaded LACONIA with all his army,& made an inrode to the citie of SPARTA, where he once againe ouerthrew the LACEDÆMONIANS in ſet battell, tooke fiue hundred of them priſoners, and ſlue two hundred: in ſomuch that euery man thought he might euen then go to SPARTA without any daunger to take it, the which had neuer yet bene taken afore by any. But there was neuer king that had ſo often and ſodaine chaunges of fortune as Demetrius, nor that in other affaires was euer ſo often litle,and then great: ſo ſodainly downe, and vp againe: ſo weake,and ſtraight ſo ſtrong. And therefore it is reported,that in his great aduerſities whẽ fortune turned ſo cõtrary againſt him, he was wont to cry out vpon fortune,that which AEſchylus ſpeaketh in a place:

Now againe when his affaires proſpered ſo well, and that he was likely to recouer a great force and kingdome: newes were brought him, firſt that Lyſimachus had taken all his townes from him,which he held in ASIA: and on the other ſide, that Ptolomie had won from him all the realme of CYPRVS, the citie of SALAMINA onely excepted, in the which he kept his mother and children very ſtraightly beſieged. This notwithſtanding,fortune played with him,as the wicked woman Archilochus ſpeaketh of, who,

For taking him away, and (as it were) the citie of SPARTA alſo out of his handes by theſe dreadfull newes, euen when he was certaine to haue won it: ſhe preſently offered him hopes of other great and new things, by this occaſion following. After the death of Caſſander, Philip who was the eldeſt of all his other ſonnes,and left his heire and ſucceſſour in the kingdome of MACEDON: he reigned no long time ouer the MACEDONIANS, but deceaſed ſoone after his father was dead. The two other brethren alſo fell at great variance, and warres together: ſo that the one called Antipater, ſlue his owne mother Theſſalonica: and the other being Alexander, called in to aide him Demetrius, and Pyrrhus, the one out of the realme of EPIRVS, and the other out of PELOPONNESVS. Pyrrhus came firſt before Demetrius, and kept a great part of MACEDON for recompence of his paynes, comming to aide him at his deſire: ſo that he became a dreadfull neighbour vnto Alexander himſelf, that had ſent for him into his country. Furthermore, when he was aduertiſed that Demetrius did preſently vpon the receite of his letters, ſet forward with all his armie to come to ayde him: the young Prince Alexander, was twiſe as much more amazed and affrayed, for the great eſtate and eſtimation of Demetrius. So he went to him notwithſtanding, and receiued him at a place called Deion, and there imbraced and welcomed him. But immediatly after, he told him that his affaires were now in ſo good ſtate, that prayſed be the goddes he ſhould not now neede his preſence to aide him. After theſe wordes the one began to miſtruſt the other. So it chaunced one day, that as Demetrius went to Alexanders lodging where the feaſt was prepared: there came one to him to tell him of an ambuſh that was layed for him, and how they had determined to kill him when he ſhould thinke to be merie at the banket. But Demetrius was nothing abaſhed at the newes, and onely went a litle ſoftlier, not making ſuch haſt as he did before, and in the meane time ſent to commaunde his Captaines to arme their men, and to haue them in readineſſe: and willed his gentlemen and all the reſt of his officers that were about him, (which were a greater number by many then thoſe of Alexanders ſide) euery man of them to go in with him into the hall, and to tarie there till he roſe from the table. By this meanes the men whom Alexander had appointed to aſſault him, they durſt not, being affrayed of the great traine he had brought with him. Furthermore, Demetrius faining that he was not well at eaſe at that time to make merie, he went immediatly out of the hall, and the next morning determined to depart, making him beleeue that he had certaine newes brought him of great importance: and prayed Alexander to pardon him, that he could no longer keepe him companie, for that he was driuen of neceſſitie to depart from him, and that an other time they would meete together, with better leaſure and libertie. Alexander was very glad to ſee that Demetrius went his way out of MACEDON not offended, but of his owne good will: whereupon he brought him into THESSALY, and when they were come to the citie of LARISSA, they began againe to feaſt one an other, to intrappe eche other: the which offered Demetrius occaſion to haue Alexander in his hand, as he would wiſh himſelfe. For Alexander of purpoſe would not haue his gard about him fearing leaſt thereby he ſhould teach Demetrius alſo to ſtand vpon his gard. Thus Alexander turned his practiſe for an other, vpon himſelfe: for he was determined not to ſuffer Demetrius to ſcape his handes, if he once againe came within daunger. So Alexander being bidden to ſupper to Demetrius, he came accordingly. Demetrius riſing from the bord in the middeſt of ſupper, Alexander roſe alſo, being affrayed of that ſtraunge manner, and followed him foote by foote to the very doore. Then Demetrius ſayd but to his warders at the gate, kill him that followeth me. With thoſe wordes he went out of the doores, and Alexander that followed him was ſlaine in the place, and certaine of his gentlemen with him which came to reſcue him: of the which, one of them as they killed him ſayd, that Demetrius had preuented them but one day. All that night, (as it is no other likely) was full of vprore and tumult. Howbeit, the next morning the MACEDONIANS being maruellouſly troubled and affrayed of Demetrius great power, whẽ they ſaw that no man came to aſſaile them, but that Demetrius in contrary maner ſent vnto them to tell them that he would ſpeake with them, and deliuer them reaſon for that he had done: then they all began to be bold againe, and willingly gaue him audience. Now Demetrius needed not to vſe many wordes, nor to make any long Orations, to win them vnto him: for, becauſe they hated Antipater as a horrible mãqueller and murtherer of his mother, and becauſe they had no better man to preferre, they eaſily choſe Demetrius king of MACEDON, and thereupon brought him backe into MACEDON, to take poſſeſsion of the kingdome. This chaunge was not miſliked of the other MACEDONIANS that remained at home in their country, for that they yet remembred the traiterours and wicked fact of Caſſander, againſt Alexander the great: for which cauſe they vtterly hated & deteſted all his iſſue and poſteritie. And furthermore, if there were any ſparke of remembrance in their harts, of the bounty and goodneſſe of their grandfather Antipater: Demetrius receiued the fruite and benefit, for his wife Philaes ſake, by whom he had a ſonne that ſhould ſucceede him in the kingdom, and was a proper youth, in campe with his father. Demetrius hauing this great good happe and fortune come vnto him, he receiued newes alſo that P*tolomy* had not onely raiſed his ſiege from the citie of SALAMINA, where he kept his mother and children ſtraightly beſieged: but further, that he had done them great honour, and beſtowed great giftes vpon them. On the other ſide alſo he was aduertiſed, that his daughter Stratonice, who had before bene maried vnto Seleucus, was now maried againe vnto Antiochus, the ſonne of the ſayd Seleucus, and how that ſhe was crowned Queene of all the barbarous nations inhabiting in the high prouinces of ASIA: and that came to paſſe in this maner. It chaunced that this young Prince Antiochus (as loue ouercommeth all men) became in loue with his mother in law Stratonice, who already had a ſonne by Seleucus his father. She being young, & paſsing fayre, he was ſo rauiſhed with her, that though he proued all the wayes poſsible to maiſter his furie and paſsion that way: yet he was ſtill the weaker. So that in the end, condemning himſelfe to death becauſe he found his deſire abhominable, his paſsion incurable, and his reaſon vtterly ouercome: he reſolued to kill himſelfe by litle and litle, with abſtinence from meate and drinke, and made no other reckoning to remedy his griefe, faining to haue ſome ſecret inward diſeaſe in his body. Yet could he not ſo finely cloke it, but that Eraſiſtratus the Phiſitian eaſily found his griefe, that loue, not ſickneſſe, was his infirmitie: howbeit it was hard for him to imagine with whom he was in loue. Eraſiſtratus being earneſtly bent to finde out the partie he loued, he ſat by this young Prince all day long in his chamber, and when any fayre young boy or wife came to ſee him, he earneſtly looked Antiochus in the face, and carefully obſerued all the partes of the body, and outward mouings, which do commonly bewray the ſecret paſsions & affections of the minde. So hauing marked him diuers times, that when others came to ſee him, whatſoeuer they were, he ſtill remained in one ſelfe ſtate, and that when Stratonice his mother in law came alone or in company of her husband Seleucus to viſite him, he commonly perceiued thoſe ſignes in him, which Sappho writeth to be in louers (to wit, that his wordes & ſpeach did faile him, his colour became red, his eyes ſtill rowled to & fro, and then a ſodaine ſweat would take him, his pulſe would beate faſt and riſe high, and in the end, that after the force and power of his hart had failed him, and ſhewed all theſe ſignes, he became like a man in an extaſie and traunſe, & white as a kearcher) he then gathering a true coniecture by theſe ſo manifeſt ſignes and declarations, that it was onely Stratonice whom this young Prince fanſied, and the which he forced himſelfe to keepe ſecret to the death: thought that to bewray it to the king it would offend him much, but yet truſting to his great affection & fatherly loue he bare to his ſonne, he ventured one day to tell him, that his ſonnes ſickneſſe was no other but loue, and withall, that his loue was impoſsible to be enioyed, and therefore that he muſt of neceſsitie dye, for it was incurable. Seleucus was cold at the hart to heare theſe newes: ſo he asked him, what, is he incurable? Yea, Sir, aunſwered the Phiſitian, becauſe he is in loue with my wife. Then replied Seleucus againe, alas Eraſiſtratus, I haue alwayes loued thee as one of my deareſt friends, and wouldeſt thou not now do me this pleaſure, to let my ſonne marry thy wife, ſith thou knoweſt it well that I haue no mo ſonnes but he, and that I ſee he is but caſt away, if thou helpe me not? But your grace would not do it your ſelfe, ſayd Eraſiſtratus: if he were in loue with Stratonice. O, ſayd Seleucus to him againe, that it were the will of the gods, ſome god or man could turne his loue that way: for mine owne part, I would not onely leaue him the thing he loued, but I would giue my kingdome alſo to ſaue his life. Thē Eraſiſtratus ſeeing that the king ſpake theſe wordes frō his hart, and with abundance of teares: he tooke him by the right hand, and told him plainly, your grace needeth not Eraſiſtratus helpe in this. For being father, husband, and king, your ſelfe alſo may onely be the Phiſitian, to cure your ſonnes diſeaſe. When Seleucus heard that, he called an aſſemblie of the people, and declared before them all that he was determined to crown his ſonne Antiochus king of the high prouinces of ASIA, & Stratonice Queene, to marry them together: and that he was perſwaded that his ſonne, (who had alwayes ſhewed him ſelfe obedient to his fathers will) would not diſobey him in this mariage. And as for Stratonice, if ſhe miſliked this mariage, and would not conſent vnto it becauſe it was no common matter: then he prayed that his friends would perſwade her ſhe ſhould thinke all good & comely that ſhould pleaſe the king; and withall that concerned the generall benefit of the realme and common wealth. Hereupon Antiochus and Stratonice were married together. But now to returne again to the hiſtory of Demetrius. Demetrius came by the kingdome of MACEDON & THESSALIE, by this meanes as you haue heard, and did moreouer poſſeſſe the beſt part of PELOPONNESVS, and on this ſide the ſtraight, the cities of MEGARA, & ATHENS. Furthermore he led his army againſt the BOEOTIANS, who were at the firſt willing to make peace with him. But after that Cleonymus king of SPARTA was come into the citie of THEBES with his army, the BOEOTIANS encouraged by the faire words & allurement of one Piſis, borne in the city of THESPIS, who at that time bare all the ſway & chiefe authoritie amongſt them: they gaue vp their treaty of peace they had begun with Demetrius & determined to make warre. Therupon Demetrius wēt to beſiege the city of THEBES, & layd his engines of battery vnto it: in ſomuch as Cleonymus for feare, ſtale ſecretly out of the citie. Thereupon the THEBANS being alſo affrayed, yeelded themſelues vnto Demetrius mercy: who putting great garriſons into the cities, & hauing leauied a great ſumme of money of the prouince, left them Hieronymus the hiſtoriographer, his Lieutenant & Gouernour there. So it appeared that he vſed them very curteouſly, & did them many pleaſures, and ſpecially vnto Piſis. For when he had taken him priſoner, he did him no hurt, but receiued him very curteouſly, and vſed him well: and furthermore, he made him Polemarchus, (to wit, campe maiſter) in the city of THESPIS. Shortly after theſe things were thus brought to paſſe, king Lyſimachus by chaunce was taken by an other barbarous Prince called Dromichetes. Thereupon, Demetrius, to take ſuch a noble occaſion offred him, went with a great army to inuade the coũtry of THRACIA, ſuppoſing he ſhould find no man to withſtand him, but that he might conquer it at his pleaſure. Howbeit, ſo ſoone as Demetrius backe was turned, the BOEOTIANS reuolted again from him, & therwithall newes was brought him, that Lyſimachus was deliuered out of priſon. Then he returned backe with all ſpeede, maruellouſly offended with the BOEOTIANS, whom he found already diſcomfited in battell, by his ſonne Antigonus, & went againe to lay ſiege to the citie of THEBES, being the chiefe city of all that prouince of BOEOTIA. But at that preſent time, Pyrrhus came & forraged all THESSALIE, and entred euen to the ſtraight of THERMOPILES. Therfore Demetrius was conſtrained to leaue his ſonne to continue the ſiege at THEBES, whileſt he himſelfe went againſt Pyrrhus, who ſodainly returned againe into his realme. So Demetrius left ten thouſand footemen, & a thouſand horſemen in THESSALY to defend the country, & returned with the reſt of his army to win THEBES. Thereupon he brought his great engine of batterie called Elepolis, againſt the wall, as you haue heard before, the which was thruſt forward by litle and litle, with great labour, by reaſon of the waight & heauines of it: ſo that it could ſcant be driuē forward two furlongs in two months. But the BOEOTIANS & the THEBANS did valiãtly defend themſelues: and Demetrius of a malitious minde and deſire of reuenge, (more oftner then needefull, or to any purpoſe) compelled his men to go to the aſſault, and to hazard themſelues: ſo that there were daily a great number of them ſlaine. Antigonus his ſonne perceiuing it: alas, ſayd he, why do we thus ſuffer our men to be ſlaine and caſt away to no purpoſe? Wherefore Demetrius angrily aunſwered him againe: what needeſt thou to care? Is there any* corne to be diſtributed to thoſe that are dead? But notwithſtanding, becauſe men ſhould not thinke he ſtill meant to put others in daunger, and durſt not venture himſelfe: he fought with them, till at length he was ſhot through the necke with a ſharpe arrow head, that was ſhot at him from the wall. Wherewithall he fell very ſicke, but yet raiſed not his ſiege, nor remoued his campe, but tooke the citie of THEBES againe by aſſault: the which being not long before againe repleniſhed with people, was in ten yeares ſpace twiſe won and taken. Now he put the THEBANS in a maruellous feare, by his cruell threats he gaue them at his cõming into THEBES: ſo that they looked to haue receiued the extremeſt puniſhment the vanquiſhed could haue, through the iuſt wrath and anger of the conquerour. Howbeit after Demetrius had put thirteen of them to death, and baniſhed ſome: he pardoned all the reſt. About that time fell out the celebration of the feaſt called Pythia, in the honour of Apollo: and becauſe the ÆTOLIANS kept all the high wayes to bring them vnto the city of DELPHES in the which of old time they did vſe to celebrate thoſe ſports aforeſaid: he cauſed them to be kept and ſolemniſed at ATHENS as in a place where this god in reaſon ſhould be beſt honored & reuerenced, becauſe he was patrone of the citie, and for that the ATHENIANS maintained that he was their progenitor. From thence he returned into Macedon,& knowing that it was againſt his nature to liue idlely, & in peace, & ſeing on the other ſide alſo that the Macedonians did him more ſeruice,& were more obediēt to him in warres,& that in time of peace they grew ſeditious,full of vanity & quarell:he went to make warre with the Ætolians,& after he had ſpoiled & deſtroyed their country, he left Pantauchus his Lieutenant there,with a great part of his army. Demetrius himſelfe went in the meane time with the reſt of his army againſt Pyrrhus: and Pyrrhus alſo againſt him, but they miſſed of meeting ech with other. Whereupon Demetrius paſſed further vnto the realme of Epirus,the which he ſpoiled & forraged. Pyrrhus on the other ſide went on ſo farre that he met with Pantauchus,Demetrius Lieutenant with whom he fought a battell, & came to the ſword with him:ſo that he did both hurt him,and was alſo hurt by him. But in the end Pyrrhus had the vpper hand,he put Pantauchus to flight,& ſlue a great number of his men,& tooke fiue thouſand priſoners:the which was the chiefe ouerthrow of Demetrius. For Pyrrhus wan not the Macedonians ill will ſo much for the miſchieues & hurts he had done vnto thē, as he got himſelfe great fame & renowne with thē, becauſe himſelfe alone had with his own hands done all the noble exploits of warre in that iourney: for the which, he was afterwardes had in great eſtimation among the Macedonians. Now many of them began to ſay, that he was the only king of all others, in whom the liuely image of the hardines & valiantnes of Alexander the great was to be ſeene: and that all the reſt,( but ſpecially Demetrius) did but counterfeit his grauitie and Princely countenaunce, like players vpon a ſtage that would counterfeit his countenance & geſture. And to ſay truly, there was much fineneſſe and curioſity about Demetrius,to make him a playing ſtocke in cōmon playes. For ſome ſay, that he did not only weare a great hat with his diademe vpon his head, & was apparelled in purple gownes imbrodered with gold: but alſo that he did vſe to weare certaine wollen ſhooes on his feete died in purple colour,not wouen,but faſhioned together like a felt, & gild vpon it. And furthermore,he had long before cauſed a cloke to be made of a maruellous rich & ſumptuous peece of worke. For vpon it was drawen the figure of the world,with ſtarres and circles of heauen,the which was not throughly finiſhed by the chaunge of his fortune. So,there was neuer king of Macedon after him that durſt weare it: albeit there were many proud and arrogant kings that ſucceeded him. Now the Macedonians were not onely ſory,and offended to ſee ſuch things, as they were not wont to be acquainted withall: but they much more miſliked this curious maner of life,& ſpecially becauſe he was ill to come to,and worſe to be ſpoken with. For he gaue no audiēce,or if he did,he was very rough,& would ſharply take them vp that had to do with him. As,he kept the Ambaſſadors of the Athenians two yeares,& would geue thē no anſwere: & yet made as though he loued them better,then any other people of Grece. An other time alſo he was offended, becauſe the Lacedæmonians had ſent but one mā only Ambaſſador vnto him,taking it that they had done it in deſpight of him. And ſo did the Ambaſſador of the Lacedæmonians anſwer him very gallātly,after the Laconian maner. For whē Demetrius asked him,how chaūceth it that the Lacædemonians do ſend but one man vnto me? No more but one,ſaid he,O king,vnto one. On a time he came abroad more plainly & popular like,then he was wont to do:whereby he put the people in good hope that they might the eaſilier ſpeake with him,and that he would more curteouſly heare their complaints. Thereupon many came,and put vp their humble ſupplications and bils of petition vnto him. He receiued them,& put them vp in the lappe of his cloke. The poore ſuters were glad of that,and waited vpon him at his heeles, hoping they ſhould quickely be diſpatched: but when he was vpon the bridge of the riuer of Axius,he opened his cloke,& caſt them all into the riuer. This went to the harts of the Macedonians,who then thought they were no more gouerned by a king,but oppreſſed by a tyrant & it grieued them ſo much more,becauſe they did yet remember (either for that they had ſeene themſelues, or otherwiſe heard their forefathers ſay) how curteous king Philip was in all ſuch matters, and how that one day as he paſſed through the ſtreete,a poore old woman pluckt him by the gowne, and eftſoones humbly beſought him to heare her, but he aunſwered her he was not then at leaſure. Whereupon the poore woman plainly cried out to him,leaue then to be king. This word ſo nettled him, and he tooke ſuch a cōceit of it, that he returned preſently to his pallace,and ſetting all other matters a part,did nothing elſe many dayes but gaue himſelfe to heare all ſutes, and began with this poore old woman. For truly nothing becommeth a Prince better, thẽ to miniſter iuſtice: for Mars (as Timotheus ſaith) ſignifieth force, & is a tyrant: but iuſtice & law, according to Pindarus, is Queene of all the world. Moreouer, the wiſe Poet Homer ſaith not that Princes and Kings haue receiued the cuſtody of engines, & of munitiõ, neither alſo ſtrõg & mighty ſhips of Iupiter, to keepe thẽ to deſtroy townes withall: but with them to maintaine law & iuſtice. And therefore he calleth not the cruell & bloudy king, but the iuſt and mercifull Prince, Iupiters friend & ſcholler. And Demetrius boaſted that he had a name & title contrary vnto Iupiter, whom they called Polieus, or Poliouchos, ſignifying protector and preſeruer of cities: and that he was called Poliorcetes, a Fortgainer. Thus the ill was taken for the good, & vice preferred for vertue: becauſe he could not diſcerne the truth frõ falſehood, which turned his iniuſtice to glory, & iniquity to honour. But now to returne where we left: Demetrius fell into a great & daungerous ſickeneſſe in the citie of PELLA, during which time he almoſt loſt all MACEDON, by a ſodaine inuaſion Pyrrhus made, who in maner rode it all ouer, & came as farre as the city of EDESSA. Howbeit ſo ſoone as he recouered health again, he eaſily draue him out, & afterwardes made peace with him, becauſe he would not fighting with him (whõ he ſhould haue daily at his doores ſtil ſkirmiſhing ſometime here, ſometime there) loſe the oportunity, and weaken himſelf to bring that to paſſe which he had determined. For he had no ſmall matters in his head, but thought to recouer all the realmes his father had: and beſides, the preparation he made was no leſſe ſufficiẽt, then the purpoſe of ſuch an imagination required. For he had leauied & aſſembled an army of a hũdred thouſand footemen, lacking but two thouſand: and vnto them he had alſo well neare twelue thouſand horſemen, and had beſides gotten aboue fiue hundred ſhippes together, which were built part in the hauen of PIRÆVS, part at CORINTH, part in the city of CHALCIS, and part about PELLA. He himſelfe in perſon went through their workehouſes, & ſhewed the artificers how they ſhould make them, & did helpe to deuiſe them: ſo that euery man wondred not only at his infinite preparation, but at the greatnes & ſumptuouſnes of his workes. For at that time there was no man liuing that euer ſaw a gally of fifteen or ſixteen bankes of owers. But this is true, that afterwardes Ptolomie, ſurnamed Philopator, built a gally of forty bankes of owers, the which was two hundred foure ſcore cubits long, & from the keele in height to the top of the poope, eight & forty cubits: & to looke to the tackle & guide her, required foure hundred mariners, & foure thouſand water men to row her, & beſides all that ſhe could yet cary aboue the hatches, well neare three thouſand fighting mẽ. Howbeit this gally neuer ſerued to other purpoſe but for ſhew, & was like to a houſe that neuer ſturred: & it was neuer remoued out of the place where it was built but with maruellous a do, & great dãger, more to make men wõder at it, then for any ſeruice or commodity it could be imployed vnto. But now, the beauty of Demetrius ſhips did nothing hinder their ſwiftneſſe & goodnes for fight, neither did the hugenes of their building take away the vſe of them, but their ſwiftneſſe and nimblenes deſerued more commendation, then their ſumptuouſnes & ſtatelineſſe. Thus as this great power & preparation was in hand, being ſuch as neuer king before (ſince the time of Alexander the great) had aſſembled a greater to inuade ASIA: theſe three kings, Ptolomy, Seleucus, and Lyſimachus, did all ioyne together againſt him. And afterwardes alſo, they ſent Ambaſſadours vnto Pyrrhus in the name of thẽ all, to draw him to their ſide, alluring him to come into MACEDON, perſwading him not to repoſe any truſt in the peace Demetrius had made with him, to make account of at as a good & ſure place: for, they ſaid that Demetrius did not giue him pledge that he would neuer make warre with him, but rather firſt tooke oportunity himſelf to make warre with whõ he thought good. Pyrrhus conſidering ſo much, & finding their words true, there roſe a ſharpe & cruell warre on euery ſide againſt Demetrius, who tracted time, & ſtayed yet to begin. For at one ſelfe time, Ptolomie with a great fleete of ſhippes came downe into GRECE, and made all GRECE reuoult frõ him: & Lyſimachus alſo on THRACIAES ſide, & Pyrrhus vpon the borders of EPIRVS, cõfining with the realme of MACEDON, they entred with a great army, & ſpoyled and ſacked all as they went. Thereupon Demetrius leauing his ſonne Antigonus in GRECE, he returned with all poſſible ſpeed into MACEDON, to go firſt againſt Lyſimachus. But as he was preparing to go againſt him, newes were brought him that Pyrrhus had already taken the city of BERRHOEA. This newes being blowen abroad amõgſt the MACEDONIANS, all Demetrius doings were turned topſie turuey. For all his campe was ſtraight full of teares & complaints, & his men begã openly to ſhew their anger againſt him, ſpeaking all the ill they could of him, ſo that they would tary no lõger, but euery one prayed leaue to depart, pretending to looke to their buſineſſe at home, but in truth to go & yeeld themſelues vnto Lyſimachus. Wherfore Demetrius thought it beſt for him to get him as farre from Lyſimachus as he could, and to bend all his army againſt Pyrrhus: becauſe the other was their coũtry man, & familiarly knowen amõg the moſt of them, for that they had ſerued together vnder Alexander the great, and that as he thought, the MACEDONIANS would not preferre Pyrrhus a ſtrãger, before him. But there his iudgement failed him. For as ſoone as Pyrrhus had pitched his campe hard by him, the MACEDONIANS that had euer loued valiantneſſe, and had of ancient time eſteemed him worthier to be king, that was the beſt ſouldier and valianteſt in the field, and furthermore had heard the report of his great clemency & curteſie he had ſhewed to the priſoners he had taken: they hauing had good will of long time ſought but good occaſion to forſake Demetrius, and to yeeld them ſelues vnto Pyrrhus, or to any other Prince whatſoeuer he were. Then they ſecretly began to ſteale away one after an other, by ſmall companies at the firſt: but afterwardes there roſe ſuch a generall tumult againſt him throughout all the campe, that ſome of thẽ were ſo deſperat to go into his tent to bid him flie, and ſaue himſelfe, becauſe the MACEDONIANS were too weary with fighting for his curioſitie. And yet Demetrius found theſe words more gentle, & modeſt, in reſpect of the vile & cruell words which others gaue him. So he went into his tent, & caſt a blacke cloke about his face, in ſtead of his rich and ſtately cloke he was wont to weare: not like vnto a king, but like a cõmon player when the play is done, & then ſecretly ſtale away. When this was knowen in the campe, many of his ſouldiers ran to his tent to rifle it, and euery man tooke ſuch hold of it to haue his part, that they tare it in peeces, and drew their ſwords to fight for it. But Pyrrhus cõming in the middeſt of the tumult, pacified this ſturre, & preſently without blow giuẽ, wan all Demetrius campe: & afterwardes he deuided the realme of MACEDON with Lyſimachus, in the which Demetrius had quietly raigned the ſpace of ſeuen yeares. Now Demetrius being thus miſerably ouerthrowẽ, & turned out of his realme: he fled vnto the citie of CASSANDRIA. There he found his wife Phila, who tooke it maruellous heauily, and could not abide to ſee him againe a priuate man, driuen out of his kingdome, and the moſt miſerable king that euer was of all other. Wherefore intending no more to follow vaine hope, and deteſting the fortune of her husband: ſhe being more conſtant in calamitie then in proſperitie, killed her ſelfe with poyſon ſhe tooke. Demetrius went from thence into GRECE, purpoſing to gather together the reſt of his ſhipwrackes: and there aſſembled all his Captaines and friendes that he had. So it ſeemeth to me, the compariſon Menelaus maketh of his fortune, in one of the tragedies of Sophocles, in theſe verſes:

Demetrius armie forſaketh him, and goeth to Pyrrhus.

Phila, Demetrius wife poyſoneth her ſelf.

My ſtate doth turne continually about on fortunes wheele,
VVhoſe double dealing diuers times inforſt I am to feele:
Reſembling right the moone whoſe face abideth at no ſtay

At firſt ſhe riſeth ſmall with hornes. And as in age ſhe growes, VVith fuller cheekes and brighter light a greater face ſhe ſhewes.
And when ſhe commeth to the full, and ſhineth fayre and bright,

She fades and falles away againe, and runnes a counterpace,

This compariſon might I ſay much better be applied vnto Demetrius fortune, to his riſing and falling, and to his ouerthrow and reliefe againe. For when euery man thought his force and power vtterly ouerthrowen, then began he to riſe againe by repayre of ſouldiers, which by litle and litle came vnto him, and ſtraight reuiued him with good hope. This was the firſt time that he was euer ſeene meanely apparelled, like a priuate man vp and downe the country, without ſome ſhew or tokens of a king. And there was one that ſeeing him in this eſtate at THEBES, pleaſauntly applied theſe verſes of Euripides vnto him:

Of god immortall, now become a mortall wight:
Iſmenus bankes and Dirces ſtreames he haunteth in our ſight.

Crates the Philoſopher deliuereth Athens from Demetrius ſiege.

Now when he began to haue ſome hope againe, and was(as it were)entred into the great high way of kings, and had gotten ſouldiers about him, which made a body and ſhew of royall power: he reſtored the THEBANS their libertie and gouernement againe. But the ATHENIANS once more reuolted from him, and did reuoke the dignitie and Prieſthood of Diphilus, who had bene that yeare created Prieſt of the ſauiours, in ſtead of the Gouernour, which they called in old time Eponymos, as we haue told you before: and made a law, that from thenceforth the auncient and common Gouernours of their citie ſhould be reſtored againe to their auncient manner: and they ſent alſo into MACEDON vnto king Pyrrhus, rather to terrifie Demetrius (whom they ſaw begin to riſe againe) then for any hope they had he would come and helpe them. Howbeit Demetrius came againſt them with great furie, and did ſtraightly beſiege the citie of ATHENS. Then the ATHENIANS ſent Crates the Philoſopher to him, a man of great eſtimation and authoritie, who ſo handled him, partly by intreatie, and partly alſo through his wiſe perſwaſions and counſels he gaue him for his profit:that Demetrius preſently raiſed his ſiege. Wherefore, after he had gathered together ſo many ſhippes as were left him, and had imbarked twelue thouſand footemen, and a ſmall number of horſemen: he preſently tooke ſea,and ſailed towardes ASIA, meaning to take the prouinces of CARIA & LYDIA from Lyſimachus,and to make them to rebell againſt him. There Eurydice,ſiſter to his wife Phila, receiued him by the citie of MILETVM, hauing with her one of Ptolomyes daughters and hers,called Ptolemaide, the which had bene afore affianced to him by Seleucus meanes. So he maried Ptolemaide there,with the good will and conſent of her mother Eurydice. After his mariage he preſently went into the field againe, and did ſet forwardes to winne ſome cities,whereof many willingly receiued him, and others he tooke by force. Amongſt them he tooke the city of SARDIS, whither came diuers Captaines vnto him of king Lyſimachus,who yeelded themſelues,and brought him a great number of men,and much money beſides. But Demetrius receiuing aduertiſement that Agathocles,Lyſimachus ſonne, followed him with a great army: he went thence into PHRYGIA,making account, and alſo hoping,that if he could winne ARMENIA,he might eaſily make MEDIA rebell, and then that he would ſee if he could conquer the high prouinces of ASIA,where he might haue many places of refuge, if fortune turned againſt him. Agathocles followed him very neare, and yet ſkirmiſhing diuers times with him, Demetrius alway had the better: howbeit Agathocles did cut off his victuals from him euery way and kept him at ſuch a ſtraight, that his mẽ durſt no more ſtray from the campe to forrage: wherefore, they ſuſteined great want of victuals, and then began his men to be affrayed, and to miſtruſt that he would make them follow him into ARMENIA and MEDIA. The famine dayly increaſed more and more in his army,and it chaunced beſides, that miſsing his way, and failing to gage the forde well as he paſſed ouer the riuer of Lycus, the furie and force of the riuer caried his men downe the ſtreame,and drowned a great number of them: and yet notwithſtanding theſe great troubles, they mocked him beſides. For one wrote at the entry and comming into his tent,the firſt verſe of the tragedie of Oedipus COLONIAN, written by Sophocles, chaunging onely,ſome word.

Thou impe of old and blind Antigonus.
To what a point haſt thou now caried vs?

But in the end, the plague began alſo in the middeſt of this famine, (a common thing, and almoſt a matter of neceſsitie, it ſhould ſo be) becauſe that men being driuen to neede and neceſsitie, do frame themſelues to eate all that comes to hand: whereupon he was driuen to bring backe thoſe few men that remained, hauing loſt of all ſortes (good and bad) not ſo few as eight thouſand fully told. When he came into the prouince of TARSVS, he commaunded his men in no caſe to meddle with any thing, becauſe the country was ſubiect vnto king Seleucus, whom he would in no wiſe diſpleaſe. But when he ſaw it was impoſsible to ſtay his men being now brought to ſuch extremitie and neede, & that Agathocles had bard vp the ſtraights and paſſages of mount Taurus againſt him: he wrote a letter vnto Seleucus, firſt declaring his miſerable ſtate and hard fortune, and then preſenting his humble petition and requeſt vnto him, praying him to take pitie vpō his friend, whom ſpightfull fortune had throwen into ſuch miſerie & calamitie, that could not but moue his greateſt enemies to haue compaſsion of him. Theſe letters ſomewhat ſoftened Seleucus hart, in ſomuch that he wrote to his Gouernours & Lieutenants of thoſe parts, to furniſh Demetrius perſon with all things needefull for a Princes houſe, & victuals ſufficient to maintaine his men. But one Patrocles, a graue wiſe man accounted, and Seleucus faithfull friend alſo, came to tell him, that the charge to entertaine Demetrius ſouldiers, was not the greateſt fault he made therin, & moſt to be accounted of: but that he did not wiſely looke into his affaires, to ſuffer Demetrius to remaine in his country, conſidering that he had alway bene a more fierce and venturous Prince then any other, to enterpriſe any matters of great importāce, & now he was brought to ſuch deſpaire & extremitie, that he had framed his men which were but ranke cowardes (contrary to their nature) to be moſt deſperat and hardy in greateſt daungers. Seleucus being moued with theſe perſwaſions, preſently tooke his iourney into CILICIA with a great army. Demetrius being aſtonied with this ſodaine chaunge, and dreading ſo great an army, got him to the ſtrongeſt places of mount Taurus. Then he ſent vnto Seleucus, firſt of all to pray him to ſuffer him to conquer certain barbarous people there abouts, who liued according to their owne lawes, and neuer had king: to the end that he might yet there with ſafetie end the reſt of his life and exile, ſtaying at length in ſome place where he might be ſafe. Secondly if that liked him not, then that it would yet pleaſe him to victuall his men for the winter time onely, in the ſame place where they were, and not to be ſo hard harted vnto him as to driue him thence, lacking all needefull things, and ſo to put him into the mouth of his moſt cruell and mortall enemies. But Seleucus miſtruſting his demands, ſent vnto him that he ſhould winter if he thought good, two monethes, but no more, in the country of CATAONIA, ſo he gaue him the chiefeſt of his friends for hoſtages: howbeit in the meane time he ſtopped vp all the wayes and paſſages going from thence into SYRIA. Demetrius now ſeeing himſelf kept in of all ſides, like a beaſt to be taken in the toyle: he was driuē to truſt to his own ſtrength. Therupō he ouerranne the countrey there abouts, & as oftē as it was his chaunce to haue any skirmiſh or conflict with Seleucus, he had euer the better of him: and ſometime alſo when they draue the armed cartes with ſithes againſt him, he ouercame them, & put the reſt to flight. Then he draue them away that kept the toppe of the mountaines, and had barred the paſſages to keepe him that he ſhould not go into SYRIA, and ſo kept them himſelfe. In fine, finding his mens harts lift vp againe, & pretily encouraged: his hart alſo grew ſo bigge, that he determined to fight a battel with Seleucus, and to ſet all at ſix and ſeuen. So that Seleucus was at a ſtraight with himſelfe, and wiſt not what to do. For he had returned backe the ayde which Lyſimachus ſent vnto him, becauſe he was affrayed of him, and miſtruſted him. On the other ſide alſo he durſt not fight with Demetrius alone, being affrayed to venture himſelf with a deſperate man: and alſo miſtruſting much his vnconſtant fortune, the which hauing brought him to great extremitie, raiſed him vp againe to great proſperitie. But in the meane ſpace Demetrius fell into a great ſickeneſſe, the which brought his body very weake & low, and had almoſt vtterly ouerthrowen his affaires. For his ſouldiers, ſome of them yeelded themſelues to his enemies, and others ſtale away without leaue, and went where they liſted. Afterwardes when he had hardly recouered his health, and within forty dayes ſpace was pretily growen to ſtrength againe: with thoſe few ſouldiers that remained with him, he ſeemed to his enemies, that he would go and inuade CILICIA. But then ſodainly in the night without ſounding any trumpet, he remoued his campe, and went an other way: and hauing paſſed ouer mount Amanus, he ſpoyled all the countrey vnder it, as farre as the region of CYRRESTICA. But Seleucus followed him, and camped hard by him. Therupon Demetrius ſodainly armed his men, and went out by night to aſſault Seleucus, & to take him ſleeping when he miſtruſted nothing. So that Seleucus knew nothing of his ſtealing on him but late enough, vntill that certaine traitours of Demetrius campe that fled before, went quickly to aduertiſe him finding him a ſleepe, and brought him newes of the daunger he was in. Then Seleucus in a maze and feare withall, got vp, and ſounded the alarme: and as he was putting on his hoſe and making him ready he cryed out, (ſpeaking to his friendes and familiars about him) we haue now a cruell and daungerous beaſt to deale with. Demetrius on the other ſide perceiuing by the great ſturre & noyſe

he heard in the enemies campe, that his enterpriſe was diſcouered: he retired againe with ſpeed, and the next morning by breake of day, Seleucus went and offred him battell. Demetrius prepared himſelfe to ioyne with him, and hauing giuen one of his faithfull friendes the leading of one of the wings of his army, himſelfe led the other, and ouerthew ſome of his enemies on his ſide. But Seleucus in the middeſt of the battell lighted from his horſe, and taking his helmet from his head, he tooke a target on his arme, and went to the firſt ranckes of his armie, to make himſelfe knowen vnto Demetrius men: perſwading them to yeeld themſelues vnto him, and to acknowledge in the end, that he had ſo long time deferred to giue them battell, rather to ſaue them, then to ſpare Demetrius. Demetrius ſouldiers hearing him ſay ſo, they did him humble reuerence, and acknowledging him for their king, they all yeelded vnto him. Demetrius hauing ſundry times before proued ſo many chaunges & ouerthrowes of fortune, thinking yet to eſcape this laſt alſo, & to paſſe it ouer: he fled vnto the gates Amanides, which are certaine ſtraightes of the mount Amanus. There he founde certaine litle thicke groues, where he determined to ſtay all night with certaine gentlemen of his houſe, and a few other of his houſhold ſeruants & officers which had followed him: meaning, if he could poſsible, to take his way towardes the citie of CAVNVS, to go to that ſea coaſt, hoping to heare of his ſhippes there. But when it was told him he had no victuals nor prouiſion left onely to ſerue him that day: he began then to deuiſe ſome other way. At length, one of his familiar friendes Soſigenes came vnto him, that had foure hundred peeces of gold about him in his girdle. So hoping that with the ſame money he might flie to the ſea, they tooke their way by night directly, to the toppe of the mountaine. But when they perceiued that the enemies kept watch there, and that there were great ſtore of fires hard by them: they then diſpayred to paſſe any farther, leaſt they ſhould be ſeene. So they returned to the ſelfe ſame place from whence they came, not all of them, for ſome of them fled: neither had they that remained alſo any life in them as before. So, one among the reſt tooke vpon him, to ſay, that there was no other way to ſcape, but to put Demetrius into Seleucus hands. Demetrius therewithall drew out his ſword, and would haue ſlaine himſelfe: but his friendes about him would not ſuffer him, but perſwaded him to yeeld himſelfe vnto Seleucus. Thereupon he ſent vnto Seleucus, to tell him that he yeelded himſelfe vnto him. Seleucus was ſo ioyfull of the newes, that he ſayd it was not Demetrius good fortune that ſaued him, but his owne: who beſides many other happy good turnes ſhe had done him, gaue him yet ſo honorable occaſion and good happe, as to make the world to know his clemencie & curteſie. Thereupon immediatly he called for his officers of houſhold, and commaunded them to ſet vp his richeſt pauilion, and to prepare all things meete to receiue him honorably. There was one Appolonides a gentleman in Seleucus Court, who ſometime had bene very familiar with Demetrius: Him Seleucus ſent immediatly vnto Demetrius, to will him to be of good cheare, and not to be affrayed to come to the king his Maiſter, for he ſhould find him his very good friend. So ſoone as the kings pleaſure was knowen, a few of his Courtiers went at the firſt to meete him: but afterwardes, euery man ſtriued who ſhould go meete him firſt, becauſe they were all in hope that he ſhould preſently be much made of, and grow in credit with Seleucus. But hereby they turned Seleucus pitie into enuie, and gaue occaſion alſo to Demetrius enemies and ſpightfull men, to turne the kings bountifull good nature from him. For they put into his head many doubts and daungers, ſaying, that certainly ſo ſoone as the ſouldiers ſaw him, there would grow great ſturre and chaunge in their campe. And therefore, ſhortly after that Appollonides was come vnto Demetrius, being glad to bring him theſe good newes, and as others alſo followed him one after an other, bringing him ſome good newes from Seleucus, and that Demetrius himſelfe after ſo great an ouerthrow (although that before he thought it a ſhamefull part of him to haue yeelded his body into his enemies hands) chaunged his minde at that time, and began then to grow bold, and to haue good hope to recouer his ſtate againe: behold, there came one of Seleucus Captaines called Pauſanias, accompanied with a thouſand footemen & horſemen in all, who compaſſed in Demetrius with them, and made the reſt depart that were come vnto him before, hauing charge giuen him not to bring him to the Court, but to cõuey him into CHERRONESVS of SYRIA, whither he was brought, and euer after had a ſtrong garriſon about him to keepe him. But otherwiſe, Seleucus leucus ſent him officers,money, and all things elſe meete for a Princes houſe: and his ordinarie fare was ſo delicate, that he could wiſh for no more then he had. And furthermore, he had places of libertie & pleaſure appointed him,both to ride his horſe in, and alſo pleaſant walkes, and goodly arbors to walke or ſit in,and fine parkes full of beaſts where he might hunt: moreouer,the king ſuffered his owne houſhold ſeruants that followed him when he fled,to remain with him if they would. And furthermore,there daily came ſome one or other vnto him from Seleucus,to comfort him,and to put him in hope,that ſo ſoone as Antiochus & Stratonice were come,they would make ſome good agreement & peace betwene them. Demetrius remaining in this eſtate, wrote vnto his ſonne Antigonus, and to his friendes and Lieutenants which he had at CORINTH and ATHENS, that they ſhould giue no credite to any letters written in his name, though his ſeale were to thē: but that they ſhould keepe the townes they had in charge for his ſonne Antigonus,and all the reſt of his forces,as if he himſelfe were dead. When Antigonus heard the pitifull captiuitie of his father, he maruellous grieuouſly tooke his hard fortune,wearing blackes for ſorrow,and wrote vnto all the other kings,but vnto Seleucus ſpecially, beſeeching him to take him as a pledge for his father, and that he was readie to yeeld vp all that he kept, to haue his fathers libertie. The like requeſt did many cities make vnto him, and in manner all Princes, but Lyſimachus: who promiſed Seleucus a great ſumme of money to put Demetrius to death. But Seleucus,who of long time had no great fancie to Lyſimachus, but rather vtterly deſpiſed him: did then thinke him the more cruell and barbarous,for this vile and wicked requeſt he made vnto him. Wherefore he ſtill delayed time, becauſe he would haue Demetrius deliuered by his ſonne Antiochus & Stratonices meanes, for that Demetrius ſhould be bound to them for his deliuerie, and for euer ſhould acknowledge it to them. Now for Demetrius, as he from the beginning patiently tooke his hard fortune, ſo did he daily more and more forget the miſerie he was in. For firſt of all,he gaue himſelfe to riding & hunting,as farre as the place gaue him libertie. Then by litle and litle he grew to be very groſſe,and to giue ouer ſuch paſtimes, and therewithall he fell into drunkennes and dicing: ſo that in that ſort he paſſed away the moſt part of his time,as it ſhould ſeeme,either to auoid the grieuous thoughts of his hard fortune,which came into his mind when he was ſober: or els vnder culler of drunkennes and eating,to ſhadowe the thoughts he had: or elſe finding in himſelfe that it was that maner of life he had long deſired, and that through his vaine ambition and folly till that time he could neuer attaine vnto,greatly turmoyling and troubling himſelfe and others, ſuppoſing to find in warres,by ſea & land, the felicitie and delight which he had found in eaſe & idlenes, when he neither thought of it, nor looked for it. For what better end can euill and vnaduiſed kings and princes looke for, of all their troubles, dangers, and warres? who in deede deceiue themſelues greatly, not onely for that they follow their pleaſure and delights as their chiefeſt felicitie, in ſteede of vertue and honeſt life: but alſo,becauſe that in truth they can not be mery & take their pleaſure as they would. So, Demetrius after he had bene ſhut vp in CHERRONESVS three yeares together,by eaſe, groſſenes,and drunkennes, fell ſicke of a diſeaſe whereof he died, when he was foure & fifty yeare old. Therefore was Seleucus greatly blamed,and he him ſelfe alſo did much repent him that he ſo ſuſpected him as he did, & that he followed not Dromichetes curteſie, a barbarous man borne in THRACIA, who had ſo royally and courteouſly intreated Lyſimachus, whom he had taken priſoner in the warres. But yet there was ſome tragicall pompe in the order of his funerall. For his ſonne Antigonus vnderſtanding that they brought him the aſhes of his bodie, he tooke ſea with all his ſhips,and went to meete them,to receiue them in the Iles: and when he had receiued them, he ſet vp the funerall pot of gold(in the which were his embers) vpon the poope of his Admirall galley. So,all the cities & towns whereby they paſſed or harboured, ſome of them did put garlands of flowers about the pot, others alſo ſent a number of men thither in mourning apparell, to accompany and honor the conuoy, to the very ſolemnitie of his funerals. In this ſort ſailed all the whole fleete towards the citie of CORINTHE, the pot being plainely ſeene farre off, ſtanding on the toppe of the Admirall galley: all the place about it being hanged about with purple,& ouer it,the diademe or royall band, and about it, alſo were goodly young men armed, which were as Penſioners to Demetrius. Furthermore, Xenophantus the famouſeſt Muſition in that time, being ſet hard by it, played a ſweete and lamentable ſong on the flute, where withall the ores keeping ſtroke and meaſure, the ſound did meete with a gallant grace, as in a conuoy where the mourners doe knocke their breaſts, at the foote of euery verſe. But that which moſt made the people of CORINTH to weepe and lament, which ranne to the peere, and all alongſt the ſhore ſide to ſee it: was Antigonus, whom they ſaw all beblubbered with teares, apparelled as a mourner in blackes. Now, after they had brought a wonderfull number of garlands and noſegayes, and caſt them vpon the funerall pot, and had ſolemnized all the honors poſſible for the funerals at CORINTH: Antigonus caried away the pot to burie it in the citie of DEMETRIADE, the which bare the name of Demetrius that was dead, and was a newe citie, that had beene repleniſhed with people, and built of litle townes which are about IOLCOS. Demetrius left two children by his firſt wife Phila, to wit, Antigonus and Stratonice: and two other ſonnes, both of them named Demetrius, the one ſurnamed the leane, of a woman of ILLYRIA, & the other king of the CYRENIANS, of his wife Ptolemæide: and another by Deidamia called Alexander, who liued in ÆGYPT. And it is reported alſo, that he had another ſon called Corrhæbus, by his wife Eurydice, and that his poſteritie raigned by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne, vntill the time of Perſeus: who was the laſt king of MACEDON, whom the ROMAINS ouercame by Paulus Æmylius, and wan all the Realme of MACEDON vnto the Empire of ROME. Now that the MACEDONIAN hath plaied his part, giue the ROMAIN alſo leaue to come vpon the ſtage.

ANTONIVS grandfather was that famous Orator whom Marius ſlew, becauſe he tooke Syllaes part. His father was an other Antonius ſurnamed* Cretan, who was not ſo famous, nor bare any great ſway in the common wealth: howbeit otherwiſe he was an honeſt man, and of a very good nature, and ſpecially very liberall in giuing, as appeareth by an act he did. He was not very wealthy, and therefore his wife would not let him vſe his liberalitie and franke nature. One day a friend of his comming to him to pray him to helpe him to ſome money, hauing great neede: Antonius by chance had no money to giue him, but he commaunded one of his men to bring him ſome water in a ſiluer baſen, and after he had brought it him, he waſhed his beard as though he ment to haue ſhauen it, and then found an arrant for his man to ſend him out, and gaue his friend the ſiluer baſen, and bad him get him money with that. Shortly after, there was a great ſturre in the houſe among the ſeruants, ſeeking out this ſiluer baſen. Inſomuch as Antonius ſeeing his wife maruellouſly offended for it, & that ſhe would examine all her ſeruants, one after another about it, to know what was become of it: at length he confeſſed he had giuen it away, & prayed her to be contented. His wife was Iulia, of the noble houſe and family of Iulius Cæſar: who for her vertue & chaſtitie, was to be compared with the nobleſt Ladie of her time. M. Antonius was brought vp vnder her, being married after her firſt husbands death, vnto Cornelius Lentulus, whom Cicero put to death with Cethegus, and others, for that he was of Catilines conſpiracie againſt the common wealth. And this ſeemeth to be the originall cauſe and beginning of the cruell and mortall hate Antonius bare vnto Cicero. For Antonius ſelfe ſaith, that he would neuer giue him the body of his father in law to bury him, before his mother went firſt to intreat Ciceroes wife: the which vndoubtedly was a flat lie. For Cicero denied buriall to none of them, whom he executed by law. Now Antonius being a faire young man, and in the prime of his youth: he fell acquainted with Curio, whoſe friendſhip and acquaintance (as it is reported) was a plague vnto him. For he was a diſſolute man, giuen ouer to all luſt and inſolencie, who to haue Antonius the better at his commandement, trained him on into great follies, and vaine expences vpon women, in rioting and banqueting. So that in ſhort time, he brought Antonius into a maruellous great debt, and too great for one of his yeares, to wit: of two hundred and fiftie talents, for all which ſumme Curio was his ſuertie. His father hearing of it, did put his ſonne from him, and forbad him his houſe. Then he fell in with Clodius, one of the deſperateſt and moſt wicked Tribunes at that time in ROME. Him he followed for a time in his deſperate attempts, who bred great ſturre and miſchiefe in ROME: but at length he forſooke him, being weary of his raſhnes and folly, or els for that he was affraid of thẽ that were bent againſt Clodius. Thereupon he left ITALY, & went into GRECE, & there beſtowed the moſt part of his time, ſometime in warres, and otherwhile in the ſtudie of eloquence. He vſed a manner of phraſe in his ſpeech, called Aſiatike, which caried the beſt grace and eſtimation at that time, and was much like to his manners and life: for it was full of oſtentation, fooliſh brauerie, and vaine ambition. After he had remained there ſome time, Gabinius Proconſull going into SYRIA, perſwaded him to goe with him, Antonius told him he would not goe as a priuate man: Wherefore Gabinius gaue him charge of his horſemen, and ſo tooke him with him. So, firſt of all he ſent him againſt Ariſtobulus, who had made the IEVVES to rebell, & was the firſt man himſelfe that got vp to the wall of a caſtle of his, and ſo draue Ariſtobulus out of all his holds: & with thoſe few men he had with him, he ouercame all the IEVVES in ſet battle, which were many againſt one, and put all of them almoſt to the ſword, and furthermore, tooke Ariſtobulus himſelfe priſoner with his ſonne. Afterwards Ptolomy king of ÆGYPT, that had bene driuen out of his country, went vnto Gabinius to intreat him to go with his armie with him into ÆGYPT, to put him againe into his kingdome: and promiſed him if he would goe with him, tenne thouſand talents. The moſt part of the Captaines thought it not beſt to goe thither, and Gabinius himſelfe made it daintie to enter into this warre: although the couetouſneſſe of theſe tenne thouſand talents ſtucke ſorely with him. But Antonius that ſought but for oportunitie and good occaſion to attempt great enterpriſes, and that deſired alſo to gratifie Ptolomyes requeſt: he went about to perſwade Gabinius to goe this voyage. Now they were more affraid of the way they ſhould goe, to come to the citie of PELVSIVM, then they feared any daunger of the warre beſides: becauſe they were to paſſe through deepe ſandes and deſert places, where was no freſh water to be had all the mariſſes thorough, which are called the mariſſes Serbonides, which the ÆGYPTIANS call the exhalations or fume, by the which the Gyant Typhon breathed. But in truth it appeareth to be the ouerflowing of the red ſea, which breaketh out vnder the ground in that place, where it is deuided in the narroweſt place from the ſea on this ſide. So Antonius was ſent before into ÆGYPT with his horſemen, who did not only winne that paſſage, but alſo tooke the citie of PELVSIVM (which is a great citie) with all the ſouldiers in it: and thereby he cleared the way, and made it ſafe for all the reſt of the armie, and the hope of the victorie alſo certaine for his Captaine. Nowe did the enemies themſelues feele the frutes of Antonius curteſie, and the deſire he had to winne honor. For when Ptolomy (after he had entred into the citie of PELVSIVM) for the malice he bare vnto the citie, woud haue put all the ÆGYPTIANS in it to the ſword: Antonius withſtood him, & by no meanes would ſuffer him to doe it. And in all other great battels and skirmiſhes which they fought, and were many in number, Antonius did many noble actes of a valiant and wiſe Captaine: but ſpecially in one battell, where he compaſſed in the enemies behinde, giuing them the victory that fought againſt them, whereby he afterwards had ſuch honorable reward, as his valiantnes deſerued. So was his great curteſie alſo much commended of all, the which he ſhewed vnto Archelaus. For hauing bene his very friend, he made warre with him againſt his will while he liued: but after his death he ſought for his bodie, and gaue it honorable buriall. For theſe reſpects he wanne himſelfe great fame of them of ALEXANDRIA, and he was alſo thought a worthy man of all the ſouldiers in the ROMAINES campe. But beſides all this, he had a noble preſence, and ſhewed a countenance of one of a noble houſe: he had a goodly thicke beard, a broad forehead, crooke noſed, and there appeared ſuch a manly looke in his countenance, as is commonly ſeene in Hercules pictures, ſtamped or grauen in mettall. Now it had bene a ſpeech of old time, that the familie of the Antonij were diſcended from one Anton, the ſonne of Hercules, whereof the family tooke name. This opinion did Antonius ſeeke to confirme in all his doings: not onely reſembling him in the likeneſſe of his bodie, as we haue ſaide before, but alſo in the wearing of his garments. For when he would openly ſhewe himſelfe abroad before many people, he would alwaies weare his caſſocke girt downe low vppon his hippes, with a great ſword hanging by his ſide, and vpon that, ſome ill fauoured cloke. Furthermore, things that ſeeme intollerable in other men, as to boaſt commonly, to ieaſt with one or other, to drinke like a good fellow with euery bodie, to ſit with the ſouldiers when they dine, and to eate and drinke with them ſouldierlike: it is incredible what wonderfull loue it wanne him amongſt them. And furthermore, being giuen to loue: that made him the more deſired, and by that meanes he brought many to loue him. For he would further euery mans loue, and alſo would not be angry that men ſhould merily tell him of thoſe he loued. But beſides all this, that which moſt procured his riſing and aduancement, was his liberalitie, who gaue all to the ſouldiers, and kept nothing for himſelfe: and when he was growen to great credite, then was his authoritie and power alſo very great, the which notwithſtanding himſelfe did ouerthrowe, by a thouſand other faults he had. In this place I will ſhewe you one example onely of his wonderfull liberalitie. He commanded one day his coferer that kept his money, to giue a friend of his fiue and twentie Myriades: which the ROMAINES call in their tongue, Decies. His coferer maruelling at it, and being angry withall in his minde, brought him all this money, in a heape together, to ſhewe him what a maruellous maſſe of money it was. Antonius ſeeing it as he went by, asked what it was: his coferer anſwered him, it was the money he willed him to giue vnto his friend. Then Antonius perceiuing the ſpight of his man, I thought, ſaid he, that Decies had bene a greater ſumme of money then it is, for this is but a trifle: and therfore he gaue his friend as much more another time, but that was afterwards. Now the ROMAINS maintaining two factions at ROME at that time, one againſt the other, of the which, they that tooke part with the Senate, did ioyne with Pompey being then in ROME: and the contrarie ſide taking part with the people, ſent for Cæſar to aide them, who made warres in GAVLE. Then Curio Antonius friend, that had chaunged his garmentes, and at that time tooke part with Cæſar, whoſe enemie he had bene before: he wanne Antonius, and ſo handled the matter, partly through the great credite and ſway he bare amongſt the people, by reaſon of his eloquent tongue: and partly alſo by his exceeding expence of money hee made which Cæſar gaue him: that Antonius was choſen Tribune, and afterwards made Augure. But this was a great helpe and furtherance to Cæſars practiſes. For ſo ſoone as Antonius became Tribune he did oppoſe himſelfe againſt thoſe things which the Conſull Marcellus preferred: (who ordeined that certaine legions which had beene alreadie leauied and billed, ſhould be giuen vnto Cneus Pompey, with further commiſſion and authoritie to leauie others vnto them) and ſet downe an order, that the ſouldiers which were alreadie leauied and aſſembled, ſhould be ſent into Syria, for a newe ſupply vnto Marcus Bibulus, who made warre at that time againſt the Parthians. And furthermore, prohibition that Pompey ſhould leauie no more men, and alſo that the ſouldiers ſhould not obey him. Secondly, where Pompeys friends and followers would not ſuffer Cæſars letters to be receiued, and openly read in the Senate: Antonius hauing power and warrant by his perſon, through the holines of his tribuneſhip, did read them openly, and made diuers men chaunge their mindes: for it appeared to them that Cæſar by his letters required no vnreaſonable matters. At length, when they preferred two matters of conſideration vnto the Senate, whether they thought good that Pompey or Cæſar, ſhould leaue their armie: there were fewe of the Senators that thought it meete Pompey ſhould leaue his armie, but they all in manner commanded Cæſar to doe it. Then Antonius riſing vp, asked whether they thought it good that Pompey and Cæſar both, ſhould leaue their armies. Thereunto all the Senators iointly together gaue their whole conſent, and with a great crie commending Antonius, they prayed him to referre it to the iudgement of the Senate. But the Conſuls would not allow of that. Therefore Cæſars friendes preferred other reaſonable demaundes and requeſts againe, but Cato ſpake againſt them: and Lentulus, one of the Conſuls draue Antonius by force out of the Senate, who at his going out made grieuous curſes againſt him. After that, he tooke a ſlaues gowne, and ſpeedily fled to Cæſar, with Quintus Caſſius, in a hyred coch. When they came to Cæſar, they cryed out with open mouth, that all went hand ouer head at Rome: for the Tribunes of the people might not ſpeake their mindes, and were driuen away in great daunger of their liues, as many as ſtoode with law and iuſtice. Hereupon Cæſar incontinently went into Italy with his army, which made Cicero ſay in his Philippides: that as Hellen was cauſe of the warre of Troy, ſo was Antonius the author of the ciuill warres, which indeede was a ſtarke lie. For Cæſar was not ſo fickle headed, nor ſo eaſily caried away with anger, that he would ſo ſodainly haue gone & made warre with his country, vpon the ſight onely of Antonius and Caſſius, being fled vnto him in miſerable apparell, and in a hyred coch: had he not long before determined it with himſelfe. But ſith in deede Cæſar looked of long time but for ſome colour, this came as he wiſhed, & gaue him iuſt occaſion of warre. But to ſay truely, nothing elſe moued him to make warre with all the world as he did, but one ſelfe cauſe, which firſt procured Alexander and Cyrus alſo before him: to wit, an inſatiable deſire to raigne, with a ſenſeles couetouſnes to be the beſt man in the world, the which he could not come vnto, before he had firſt put downe Pompey, and vtterly ouerthrowen him. Now, after that Cæſar had gotten Rome at his commandement, & had driuen Pompey out of Italy, he purpoſed firſt to goe into Spayne, againſt the legions Pompey had there: and in the meane time to make prouiſion for ſhippes and marine preparation, to follow Pompey. In his abſence, he left Lepidus that was Prætor, gouernor of Rome: and Antonius that was Tribune, he gaue him charge of all the ſouldiers, and of Italy. Then was Antonius ſtraight maruellouſly commended and beloued of the ſouldiers, becauſe he commonly exerciſed himſelfe among them, and would oftentimes eate and drinke with them, and alſo be liberall vnto them, according to his abilitie. But then in contrary manner, he purchaſed diuers other mens euill willes, becauſe that through negligence he would not doe them iuſtice that were iniuried, & delt very churliſhly with them that had any ſute vnto him: and beſides all this, he had an ill name to intiſe mens wiues. To conclude, Cæſars friends that gouerned vnder him, were cauſe why they hated Cæſars gouernment (which in deede in reſpect of himſelfe was no leſſe than a tyrannie) by reaſon of the great inſolencies & outragious parts that were committed: amongſt whom Antonius, that was of greateſt power, and that alſo committed greateſt faultes, deſerued moſt blame. But Cæſar notwithſtanding, when he returned from the warres of Spayne, made no reckoning of the complaints that were put vp againſt him: but contrarily, becauſe he found him a hardy man, & a valiant Captaine, he employed him in his chiefeſt affayres, and was no whit deceiued in his opinion of him. So he paſſed ouer the Ionian ſea vnto Brvndvsivm, being but ſlenderly accompanied: & ſent vnto Antonius & Gabinius, that they ſhould imbarke their men as ſoone as they could, and paſſe them ouer into Macedon. Gabinius was affraide to take the ſea, becauſe it was very rough, and in the winter time: & therefore fetched a great compaſſe about by land. But Antonius fearing ſome daunger might come vnto Cæſar, becauſe

he was compaſſed in with a great number of enemies: firſt of all he draue away Libo, who rode at ancker with a great armie, before the hauen of BRVNDVSIVM. For he manned out ſuch a number of pynnaſies, barkes, and other ſmall boates about euery one of his gallyes, that he draue him thence. After that, he imbarked into ſhippes twentie thouſande footemen, and eight hundred horſemen, and with this armie he hoyſed ſaile. When the enemies ſawe him, they made out to followe him: but the ſea roſe ſo high, that the billowes put backe their gallies that they could not come neere him, and ſo he ſcaped that daunger. But withall he fell vpon the rockes with his whole fleete, where the ſea wrought verie high: ſo that he was out of all hope to ſaue himſelfe. Yet by good fortune, ſodainely the winde turned Southweſt, and blew from the gulfe, driuing the waues of the riuer into the maine ſea. Thus Antonius looſing from the lande, and ſayling with ſafetie at his pleaſure, ſoone after he ſawe all the coaſtes full of ſhipwrackes. For the force and boyſterouſneſſe of the winde, did caſt away the gallies that followed him: of the which, many of them were broken and ſplitted, and diuers alſo caſt away, & Antonius tooke a great number of them priſoners, with a great ſumme of money alſo. Beſides all theſe, he tooke the citie of LYSSVS, and brought Cæſar a great ſupply of men, and made him couragious, comming at a pinch with ſo great a power to him. Nowe there were diuers hotte ſkirmiſhes and encounters, in the which Antonius fought ſo valiantly, that he caried the praiſe from them all: but ſpecially at two ſeuerall times, when Cæſars men turned their backes, and fled for life. For he ſtepped before them, and compelled them to returne againe to fight: ſo that the victorie fell on Cæſars ſide. For this cauſe he had the ſecond place in the campe among the ſouldiers, and they ſpake of no other man vnto Cæſar, but of him: who ſhewed plainely what opinion he had of him, when at the laſt battell of PHARSALIA (which in deede was the laſt triall of all, to giue the Conquerour the whole Empire of the worlde) he himſelfe did leade the right wing of his armie, and gaue Antonius the leading of the left wing, as the valianteſt man and ſkilfulleſt ſouldier of all thoſe he had about him. After Cæſar had wonne the victorie, and that he was created Dictator, he followed Pompey ſteppe by ſteppe: howbeit before he named Antonius generall of the horſemen, and ſent him to ROME. The generall of the horſemen is the ſecond office of dignitie, when the Dictator is in the citie: but when he is abroad, he is the chiefeſt man, and almoſt the onely man that remaineth, and all the other officers and Magiſtrates are put downe, after there is a Dictator choſen. Notwithſtanding, Dolabella being at that time Tribune, and a young man deſirous of chaunge and innouation: he preferred a law which the ROMAINES call Nouas tabulas (as much to ſay, as a cutting off and cancelling of all obligations and ſpecialties, and were called the new tables, becauſe they were driuen then to make bookes of daily receit and expence) and perſwaded Antonius his friend (who alſo gaped for a good occaſion to pleaſe and gratifie the common people) to aide him to paſſe this lawe. But Trebellius and Aſinius diſſwaded from it all they could poſſible. So by good hap it chanced that Antonius miſtruſted Dolabella for keeping of his wife, and tooke ſuch a conceite of it, that he thruſt his wife out of his houſe being his coſin Germane, and the daughter of C. Antonius, who was Conſull with Cicero: and ioyning with Aſinius, he reſiſted Dolabella, & fought with him. Dolabella had gotten the market place where the people doe aſſemble in councell, and had filled it full of armed men, intending to haue this law of the new tables to paſſe by force. Antonius by cōmandement of the Senate, who had giuen him authoritie to leauie men, to vſe force againſt Dolabella: he went againſt him, and fought ſo valiantly, that men were ſlaine on both ſides. But by this meanes, he got the ill will of the common people, & on the other ſide, the noble men (as Cicero ſaith) did not only miſlike him, but alſo hate him for his naughtie life: for they did abhor his banquets and drunken feaſts he made at vnſeaſonable times, & his extreame waſtfull expences vpon vaine light huſwiues, & then in the day time he would ſleepe or walke out his drunkenneſſe, thinking to weare away the fume of the aboundance of wine which he had taken ouer night. In his houſe they did nothing but feaſt, dance, and maske: and himſelfe paſſed away the time in hearing of fooliſh playes, or in marrying theſe plaiers, tumblers, ieaſters, & ſuch ſort of people. As for proofe hereof it is reported, that at Hippias mariage, one of his ieaſters, he drank wine ſo luſtily all night, that the next morning when he came to pleade before the people aſſembled in councell, who had ſent for him: he being queſie ſtomached with his ſurfet he had taken, was compelled to lay all before them, and one of his friends held him his gown in ſtead of a baſen. He had an other pleaſant player called Sergius, that was one of the chiefeſt men about him, and a woman alſo called Cytheride, of the ſame profeſſion, whom he loued dearly: he caried her vp and downe in a litter vnto all the townes he went, and had as many men waiting vpon her litter, ſhe being but a plaier, as were attending vpon his own mother. It grieued honeſt men alſo very much, to ſee that when he went into the countrey, he caried with him a great number of cubbords full of ſiluer and gold plate, openly in the face of the world, as it had bene the pompe or ſhew of ſome triumph: and that eftſoones in the middeſt of his iourney hee would ſet vp his hals & tents hard by ſome greene groue or pleaſant riuer, & there his Cookes ſhould prepare him a ſumptuous dinner. And furthermore, Lions were harneſſed in traſes to draw his carts: and beſides alſo, in honeſt mens houſes in the cities where he came, he would haue common harlots, curtiſans, and theſe tumbling gillots lodged. Now it greued men much, to ſee that Cæſar ſhould be out of ITALY following of his enemies, to end this great war, with ſuch great perill and danger: and that others in the meane time abuſing his name and authority, ſhould commit ſuch inſolent and outragious parts vnto their Citizens. This me thinks was the cauſe that made the conſpiracy againſt Cæſar increaſe more and more, and layed the reynes of the bridle vppon the ſouldiers neckes, whereby they durſt boldlier commit many extortions, cruelties and robberies. And therefore Cæſar after his returne pardoned Dolabella, and being created Conſull the third time, he tooke not Antonius, but choſe Lepidus, his colleague and fellow Conſull. Afterwardes when Pompeys houſe was put to open ſale, Antonius bought it: but when they asked him money for it, he made it very ſtrange, and was offended with them, and writeth him ſelfe that he would not goe with Cæſar into the warres of AFRICKE, becauſe he was not well recompenced for the ſeruice hee had done him before. Yet Cæſar did ſomewhat bridle his madneſſe and inſolency, not ſuffering him to paſſe his fault ſo lightly away, making as though he ſaw them not. And therefore he left his diſſolute maner of life, and maried Fuluia that was Clodius widdow, a woman not ſo baſely minded to ſpend her time in ſpinning and houſewiuery, and was not contented to maſter her husband at home, but would alſo rule him in his office abroade, and commaund him, that commaunded legions and great armies: ſo that Cleopatra was to giue Fuluia thankes for that ſhee had taught Antonius this obedience to women, that learned ſo well to be at their commandement. Now, becauſe Fuluia was ſomewhat ſower and crooked of condition, Antonius deuiſed to make her pleaſaunter, and ſomewhat better diſpoſed: and therefore he would play her many prety youthfull partes to make her merry. As he did once, when Cæſar returned the laſt time of all Conquerour out of SPAINE, euery man went out to meete him: and ſo did Antonius with the reſt. But on the ſodaine there ranne a rumor through ITALY, that Cæſar was dead, and that his enemies came againe with a great army. Thereuppon he returned with ſpeede to ROME, and tooke one of his mens gownes, and ſo apparelled came home to his houſe in a darke night, ſaying that he had brought Fuluia letters from Antonius. So he was let in, and brought to her muffled as he was, for being knowen: but ſhe taking the matter heauily, asked him if Antonius were well. Antonius gaue her the letters, and ſayd neuer a word. So when ſhee had opened the letters, and beganne to read them: Antonius ramped of her necke, and kiſſed her. We haue told you this tale for examples ſake onely, and ſo could we alſo tell you of many ſuch like as theſe. Now when Cæſar was returned from his laſt warre in SPAINE, all the chiefeſt nobility of the city, road many daies iorney from ROME to meete him, where Cæſar made maruellous much of Antonius, aboue al the mē that came vnto him. For he alwaies tooke him into his coche with him, through out all ITALY: and behind him, Brutus Albinus and Octauius, the ſon of his Neece, who afterwards was called Cæſar, and became Emperor of ROME long time after. So Cæſar being afterwards choſen Conſull the fift time, he immediately choſe Antonius his colleague and companion: and deſired by depoſing him ſelf of his Conſulſhip, to make Dolabella Conſull in his roome, and had already moued it to the Senat. But Antonius did ſtoutly withſtand it, and openly reuiled Dolabella in the Senate: and Dolabella alſo ſpared him as litle. Thereuppon Cæſar being aſhamed of the matter, he let it alone. An other time alſo when

Cæſar attempted againe to ſubſtitute Dolabella Conſull in his place, Antonius cried out, that the ſignes of the birds were againſt it: ſo that at length Cæſar was compelled to giue him place, and to let Dolabella alone, who was maruellouſly offended with him. Now in truth, Cæſar made no great reckoning of either of them both. For it is reported that Cæſar anſwered one that did accuſe Antonius and Dolabella vnto him for ſome matter of conſpiracy: tuſh ſaied he, they be not thoſe fat fellowes and fine comed men that I feare, but I miſtruſt rather theſe pale and leane men, meaning by Brutus and Caſſius, who afterwardes conſpired his death, and ſlue him. Antonius vnwares afterwards, gaue Cæſars enemies iuſt occaſion and colour to doe as they did: as you ſhall heare. The ROMAINS, by chance celebrated the feaſt called Lupercalia, and Cæſar being apparelled in his triumphing robe, was ſet in the Tribune where they vſe to make their orations to the people, and from thence did behold the ſport of the runners. The manner of this running was this. On that day there are many young men of noble houſe, and thoſe ſpecially that be chiefe officers for that yeare: who running naked vp and downe the city annointed with the oile of oliue, for pleaſure do ſtrike them they meete in their way, with white leather thongs they haue in their hands. Antonius being one among the reſt that was to runne, leauing the ancient ceremonies and old cuſtomes of that ſolemnity: he ranne to the Tribune where Cæſar was ſet, and caried a laurell crowne in his hand, hauing a royall band or diademe wreathed about it, which in old time was the auncient marke and token of a king. When he was come to Cæſar, he made his fellow runners with him lift him vp, and ſo he did put this laurell crowne vpon his head, ſignifying thereby that he had deſerued to be king. But Cæſar making as though he refuſed it, turned away his head. The people were ſo reioyced at it, that they all clapped their handes for ioy. Antonius againe did put it on his heade: Cæſar againe refuſed it, and thus they were ſtriuing off and on a great while together. As oft as Antonius did put this laurell crowne vnto him, a few of his followers reioyced at it: and as oft alſo as Cæſar refuſed it, all the people together clapped their hands. And this was a wonderfull thing, that they ſuffered all things ſubiects ſhould doe by commaundement of their kings: and yet they could not abide the name of a king, deteſting it as the vtter deſtruction of their liberty. Cæſar in a rage roſe out of his ſeate, and plucking downe the choller of his gowne from his necke, he ſhewed it naked, bidding any mā ſtrike off his head that would. This laurell crown was afterwards put vpon the head of one of Cæſars ſtatues or images, the which one of the Tribunes pluckt of. The people liked his doing therein ſo well, that they waited on him home to his houſe, with great clapping of hands. Howbeit Cæſar did turne thē out of their offices for it. This was a good incoragement for Brutus & Caſſius to conſpire his death, who fel into a conſort with their truſtieſt frends, to execute their enterpriſe: but yet ſtood doubtfull whether they ſhould make Antonius priuy to it or not. All the reſt liked of it, ſauing Trebonius only. He told them, that when they rode to meet Cæſar at his returne out of SPAIN, Antonius and he alwaies keeping company, and lying together by the way, he felt his mind a far off: but Antonius finding his meaning, would hearken no more vnto it, and yet notwithſtanding neuer made Cæſar acquainted with this talk, but had faithfully kept it to himſelf. After that they conſulted whether they ſhould kil Antonius with Cæſar. But Brutus would in no wiſe conſent to it, ſaying: that ventring on ſuch an enterpriſe as that, for the maintenance of law and iuſtice, it ought to be cleare from all villany. Yet they fearing Antonius power, and the authority of his office, appointed certain of the conſpiracy, that when Cæſar were gone into the Senate, and while others ſhould execute their enterpriſe, they ſhould keepe Antonius in a talke out of the Senat houſe. Euen as they had deuiſed theſe matters, ſo were they executed: and Cæſar was ſlaine in the middeſt of the Senat. Antonius being put in a feare withall, caſt a ſlaues gowne vpon him, and hid himſelfe. But afterwardes when it was told him that the murtherers ſlue no man elſe, and that they went onely into the Capitoll: he ſent his ſon vnto them for a pledge, and bad them boldly come downe vppon his word. The ſelfe ſame day he did bid Caſſius to ſupper, and Lepidus alſo bad Brutus. The next morning the Senat was aſſēbled, & Antonius himſelf preferred a law that all things paſt ſhould be forgotten, and that they ſhould appoint prouinces, vnto Caſſius & Brutus: the which the Senat confirmed, and further ordained, that they ſhould cancel none of Cæſars lawes. Thus went Antonius out of the Senate more praiſed, and better eſteemed, then euer man was: becauſe it ſeemed to euery man that he had cut off all occaſion of ciuill warres, and that he had ſhewed him ſelfe a maruellous wiſe gouernour of the common wealth, for the appeaſing of theſe matters of ſo great waight and importance. But now, the opinion he conceiued of him ſelfe after he had a litle felt the good will of the people towards him, hoping thereby to make him ſelfe the chiefeſt man if he might ouercome Brutus: did eaſily make him alter his firſt minde. And therefore when Cæſars body was brought to the place where it ſhould be buried, he made a funerall oration in commendation of Cæſar, according to the ancient cuſtome of praiſing noble men at their funerals. When he ſaw that the people were very glad and deſirous alſo to heare Cæſar ſpoken of, and his praiſes vttered: he mingled his oration with lamentable words, and by amplifying of matters did greatly moue their hearts and affections vnto pity and compaſſion. In fine to conclude his oration, he vnfolded before the whole aſſembly the blouddy garments of the dead, thruſt through in many places with their ſwords, and called the malefactors, cruell and curſed murtherers. With theſe words he put the people into ſuch a fury, that they preſently tooke Cæſars body, and burnt it in the market place, with ſuch tables & fourmes as they could get together. Then when the fire was kindled, they tooke firebrands, and ran to the murtherers houſes to ſet them a fire, and to make them come out to fight. Brutus therefore and his accomplices, for ſafety of their perſons were driuen to flie the city. Then came all Cæſars frends vnto Antonius, and ſpecially his wife Calpurnia putting her truſt in him, ſhe brought the moſt part of her money into his houſe, which amounted to the ſumme of foure thouſand talents, and furthermore brought him all Cæſars bookes and writings, in the which were his memorials of all that he had done and ordained. Antonius did daily mingle with them ſuch as he thought good, and by that means he created new officers, made new Senators, called home ſome that were baniſhed, and deliuered thoſe that were priſoners: and then hee ſayed that all thoſe things were ſo appointed and ordayned by Cæſar. Therefore the ROMAINES mocking them that were ſo moued, they called them CHARONITES: becauſe that when they were ouercome, they had no other helpe but to ſay, that thus they were found in Cæſars memorials, who had ſailed in Charons boate, and was departed. Thus Antonius ruled abſolutely alſo in all other matters, becauſe he was Conſull, and Caius one of his brethren Prætor, and Lucius the other, Tribune. Now things remayning in this ſtate at ROME, Octauius Cæſar the yonger came to ROME, who was the ſonne of Iulius Cæſars Neece, as you haue heard before, and was left his lawfull heire by will, remayning at the time of the death of his great Vncle that was ſlaine, in the city of APOLLONIA. This yong man at his firſt arriuall went to ſalute Antonius, as one of his late dead father Cæſars frends, who by his laſt will & teſtament had made him his heire: and withall, he was preſently in hand with him for money and other things which were left of truſt in his hands, becauſe Cæſar had by will bequeathed vnto the people of ROME, three ſcore and fifteene ſiluer Drachmas to be giuen to euery man, the which he as heire ſtoode charged withall. Antonius at the firſt made no reckonning of him, becauſe he was very young: and ſayed he lacked witte, and good friends to aduiſe him, if he looked to take ſuch a charge in hand, as to vndertake to be Cæſars heire. But when Antonius ſaw that he could not ſhake him off with thoſe wordes, and that he was ſtill in hand with him for his fathers goods, but ſpecially for the ready money: then he ſpake and did what he could againſt him. And firſt of all, it was he that did keepe him from being Tribune of the people: and alſo when Octauius Cæſar beganne to meddle with the dedicating of the chaire of gold, which was prepared by the Senate to honor Cæſar with: he threatned to ſend him to priſon, and moreouer deſiſted not to put the people in an vprore. This yong Cæſar ſeeing his doings, went vnto Cicero, and others, which were Antonius enemies, and by them crept into fauor with the Senate: and he himſelfe ſought the peoples good will euery manner of way, gathering together the olde ſouldiers of the late deceaſed Cæſar, which were diſperſed in diuers cities and colonies. Antonius being affrayd of it, talked with Octauius in the Capitoll, and became his frend. But the very ſame night Antonius had a ſtrange dreame, who thought that lightning fell vpon him, and burnt his right hād. Shortly after word was brought him, that Cæſar lay in wait to kil him. Cæſar cleared him ſelfe vnto him, and told him there was no ſuch matter: but he could not make Antonius beleue the contrary. Whereuppon they became further enemies then euer they were: inſomuch that both of them made friends of either ſide to gather together all the old ſouldiers through ITALY, that were diſperſed in diuers townes: and made them large promiſes, & ſought alſo to win the legions on their ſide, which were already in armes. Cicero on the other ſide being at that time the chiefeſt man of authority and eſtimation in the city, he ſtirred vp all men againſt Antonius: ſo that in the end he made the Senate pronounce him an enemy to his country, and appointed yong Cæſar Sergeants to cary axes before him, and ſuch other ſignes as were incident to the dignity of a Conſull or Prætor: and moreouer ſent Hircius and Panſa, then Conſuls, to driue Antonius out of ITALY. Theſe two Conſuls together with Cæſar, who alſo had an army, went againſt Antonius that beſieged the city of MODENA, and there ouerthrew him in battel: but both the Conſuls were ſlaine there. Antonius flying vpon this ouerthrow, fell into great miſery all at once: but the chiefeſt want of all other, and that pinched him moſt, was famine. Howbeit he was of ſuch a ſtrong nature, that by patience he would ouercome any aduerſitie, and the heauier fortune lay vpon him, the more conſtant ſhewed he himſelſe. Euery man that feeleth want or aduerſity, knoweth by vertue and diſcretion what he ſhould doe: but when in deede they are ouerlayed with extremity, and be ſore oppreſſed, few haue the hearts to follow that which they praiſe and commend, and much leſſe to auoide that they reproue and miſlike. But rather to the contrary, they yeeld to their accuſtomed eaſie life: and through faint heart, & lacke of corage, doe chaunge their firſt mind and purpoſe. And therefore it was a wonderfull example to the ſouldiers, to ſee Antonius that was brought vp in all fineneſſe and ſuperfluity, ſo eaſily to drinke puddle water, and to eate wild frutes and rootes: and moreouer it is reported, that euen as they paſſed the Alpes, they did eate the barkes of trees, and ſuch beaſts, as neuer man taſted of their fleſh before. Now their intent was to ioyne with the legions that was on the other ſide of the Mountains, vnder Lepidus charge: whom Antonius tooke to be his friend, becauſe he had holpen him to many things at Cæſars hand, through his meanes. When he was come to the place where Lepidus was, he camped hard by him: and when he ſaw that no man came to him to put him in any hope, he determined to venter him ſelfe, and to goe vnto Lepidus. Since the ouerthrow he had at MODENA, he ſuffred his beard to grow at length and neuer clipt it, that it was maruellous long, and the haire of his head alſo without koming: and beſides all this, he went in a mourning gowne, and after this ſort came hard to the trenches of Lepidus campe. Then he beganne to ſpeake vnto the ſouldiers, and many of them their hearts yerned for pity to ſee him ſo poorely arrayed, and ſome alſo through his wordes beganne to pity him: inſomuch that Lepidus beganne to be affrayed, and therefore commaunded all the trumpets to ſound together to ſtoppe the ſouldiers eares, that they ſhoulde not hearken to Antonius. This notwithſtanding, the ſouldiers tooke the more pity of him, and ſpake ſecretly with him by Clodius and Lælius meanes, whom they ſent vnto him diſguiſed in womens apparel, and gaue him counſell that he ſhould not be afraid to enter into their campe, for there were a great number of ſouldiers that would receiue him, and kil Lepidus, if he would ſay the word. Antonius would not ſuffer thẽ to hurt him, but the next morning he went with his army to wade a ford, at a litle riuer that ran betweene them: and him ſelfe was the foremoſt man that tooke the riuer to get ouer, ſeeing a number of Lepidus campe that gaue him their handes, plucked vp the ſtakes, and layed flat the bancke of their trenche to let him in to their campe. When he was come into their campe, and that he had all the army at his commandement: he vſed Lepidus very curteouſly, imbraced him, and called him father: and though in deede Antonius did all, and ruled the whole army, yet he alway gaue Lepidus the name and honor of the Captaine. Munatius Plancus, lying alſo in campe hard by with an army: vnderſtanding the report of Antonius curteſie, he alſo came and ioined with him. Thus Antonius being a foote againe, and growen of great power, repaſſed ouer the Alpes, leading into ITALY with him ſeuenteene legions, and tenne thouſand horſemen, beſides ſixe legions he left in gariſon among the GAVLES, vnder the charge of one Varius, a companion of his that woulde drinke luſtely with him, and therefore in mockery was ſurnamed Cotylon: to wit, a bibber. So Octauius Cæſar would not leane to Cicero, when he ſaw that his whole trauell & endeuor was onely to reſtore the common wealth to her former liberty. Therefore he ſent certaine of his friends to Antonius, to make them friends againe: and thereupon all three met together, (to wit, Cæſar, Antonius, and Lepidus) in an Iland enuironned round about with a litle riuer, and there remained three daies together. Now as touching all other matters, they were eaſily agreed, and did deuide all the Empire of ROME betweene them, as if it had bene their own inheritance. But yet they could hardly agree whom they would put to death: for euery one of them would kill their enemies, and ſaue their kinſmen and friends. Yet at length, giuing place to their greedy deſire to be reuenged of their enemies, they ſpurned all reuerence of bloud, and holines of frendſhip at their feete. For Cæſar left Cicero to Antonius wil, Antonius alſo forſooke Lucius Cæſar, who was his Vncle by his mother: and both of them together ſuffered Lepidus to kill his owne brother Paulus. Yet ſome writers affirme, that Cæſar and Antonius requeſted Paulus might be ſlaine, and that Lepidus was contented with it. In my opinion there was neuer a more horrible, vnnaturall, and crueller change then this was. For thus chaunging murther for murther, they did aſwell kil thoſe whō they did forſake and leaue vnto others, as thoſe alſo which others left vnto them to kill: but ſo much more was their wickedneſſe and cruelty great vnto their friends, for that they put them to death being innocents, and hauing no cauſe to hate them. After this plot was agreed vpon betweene them: the ſouldiers that were thereabouts, would haue this friendſhip & league betwixt them confirmed by mariage, and that Cæſar ſhould mary Claudia, the daughter of Fuluia, and Antonius wife. This mariage alſo being agreed vpon, they condemned three hūdred of the chiefeſt citizens of ROME, to be put to death by proſcription. And Antonius alſo commanded them to whom he had giuen commiſſion to kill Cicero, that they ſhould ſtrike off his head and right hand, with the which he had written the inuectiue Orations (called Philippides) againſt Antonius. So when the murtherers brought him Ciceroes head and hand cut off, he beheld them a long time with great ioy, and laughed heartely, and that oftentimes for the great ioy he felt. Then when he had taken his pleaſure of the ſight of them, he cauſed thē to be ſet vp in an open place, ouer the pulpit for orations (where when he was aliue, he had often ſpoken to the people) as if he had done the dead man hurt, and not bleamiſhed his owne fortune, ſhewing him ſelfe (to his great ſhame and infamy) a cruell man, and vnworthy the office & authority he bare. His vncle Lucius Cæſar alſo, as they ſought for him to kill him, and followed him hard, fled vnto his ſiſter. The murtherers comming thither, forcing to break into her chamber, ſhe ſtood at her chamber dore with her armes abroad, crying out ſtill: you ſhall not kil Lucius Cæſar, before you firſt kill me, that bare your Captaine in my wombe. By this meanes ſhe ſaued her brothers life. Now the gouernment of theſe Triumuiri grew odious and hatefull to the ROMAINS, for diuers reſpects: but they moſt blamed Antonius, becauſe he being elder then Cæſar, and of more power and force then Lepidus, gaue him ſelfe againe to his former riot and exceſſe, when he left to deale in the affairs of the cōmonwealth. But ſetting aſide the ill name he had for his inſolency, he was yet much more hated in reſpect of the houſe he dwelt in, the which was the houſe of Pompey the great: a man as famous for his temperance, modeſty, and ciuil life, as for his three triumphes. For it grieued them to ſee the gates commonly ſhut againſt the Captaines, Magiſtrates of the city, and alſo Ambaſſadors of ſtraunge nations, which were ſometimes thruſt from the gate with violence: and that the houſe within was full of tumblers, anticke dauncers, iuglers, players, ieaſters, and drunkards, quaffing and guzling, and that on them he ſpent and beſtowed the moſt part of his money he got by all kind of poſſible extortions, bribery and policy. For they did not only ſel by the crier the goods of thoſe whom they had outlawed, and appointed to murther, ſlanderouſly deceiued the poore widowes and yong orphanes, and alſo raiſed al kind of impoſts, ſubſidies, and taxes: but vnderſtanding alſo that the holy veſtall Nuns had certaine goods and money put in their cuſtody to keepe, both of mens in the city, and thoſe alſo that were abroade: they went thither, and tooke them away by force. Octauius Cæſar perceiuing that no money would ſerue Antonius turne, he prayed that they might deuide the money betweene them, and ſo did they alſo deuide the army, for them both to goe into MACEDON to make warre againſt Brutus and Caſsius: and in the meane time they left the gouernment of the city of ROME vnto Lepidus. When they had paſſed ouer the ſeas, and that they beganne to make warre, they being both camped by their enemies, to wit, Antonius againſt Caſsius, and Cæſar againſt Brutus: Cæſar did no great matter, but Antonius had alway the vpper hand, and did all. For at the firſt battell

Cæſar was ouerthrowen by Brutus, and loſt his campe, and very hardly ſaued him ſelfe by flying from them that followed him. Howbeit he writeth himſelfe in his Commentaries, that he fled before the charge was giuen, becauſe of a dreame one of his friends had. Antonius on the other ſide ouerthrew Caſſius in battell, though ſome write that he was not there himſelfe at the battel, but that he came after the ouerthrow, whileſt his men had the enemies in chaſe. So Caſſius at his earneſt requeſt was ſlaine by a faithfull ſeruant of his own called Pindarus, whom he had infranchiſed: becauſe he knew not in time that Brutus had ouercome Cæſar. Shortly after they fought an other battell againe, in the which Brutus was ouerthrowen, who afterwardes alſo ſlue himſelf. Thus Antonius had the chiefeſt glory of all this victory, ſpecially becauſe Cæſar was ſicke at that time. Antonius hauing found Brutus body after this battell, blaming him much for the murther of his brother Caius, whom he had put to death in MACEDON for reuenge of Ciceroes cruel death, and yet laying the fault more in Hortenſius then in him: he made Hortenſius to be ſlaine on his brothers tombe. Furthermore, he caſt his coate armour (which was wonderful rich and ſumptuous) vpon Brutus body, and gaue commandement to one of his ſlaues infranchiſed, to defray the charge of his buriall. But afterwards, Antonius hearing that his infranchiſed bondman had not burnt his coate armour with his body, becauſe it was very rich, and worth a great ſumme of money, and that he had alſo kept backe much of the ready money appointed for his funerall and tombe: he alſo put him to death. After that Cæſar was conuayed to ROME, and it was thought he would not liue long, nor eſcape the ſicknes he had. Antonius on the other ſide went towards the Eaſt prouinces and regions, to leauy money: and firſt of all he went into GREECE, and caried an infinite number of ſouldiers with him. Now, becauſe euery ſouldier was promiſed fiue thouſand ſiluer Drachmas, he was driuen of neceſſity to impoſe extreame tallages and taxations. At his firſt comming into GREECE, hee was not hard nor bitter vnto the GRECIANS, but gaue himſelfe onely to heare wiſe men diſpute, to ſee playes, and alſo to note the ceremonies and ſacrifices of GREECE, miniſtring iuſtice to euerie man, and it pleaſed him maruellouſly to heare them call him Philellen, (as much to ſay, a louer of the GRECIANS) and ſpecially the ATHENIANS, to whom he did many great pleaſures. Wherfore the MEGARIANS, to exceed the ATHENIANS, thinking to ſhew Antonius a goodly ſight: they praid him to come and ſee their Senat houſe, and councel hall. Antonius went thither to ſee it: ſo when he had ſeene it at his pleaſure, they asked him, my Lord, how like you our hall? Me thinks (q he) it is litle, old, and ready to fall downe. Furthermore he tooke meaſure of the temple of Apollo Pythias, and promiſed the Senat to finiſh it. But when he was once come into ASIA, hauing left Lucius Cenſorinus Gouernor in GREECE, and that he had felt the riches and pleaſures of the Eaſt parts, and that Princes, great Lords, and Kings, came to wait at his gate for his comming out, and that Queenes and Princeſſes to excell one an other, gaue him verie rich preſents, and came to ſee him, curiouſly ſetting forth them ſelues, & vſing all art that might be to ſhew their beauty, to win his fauour the more: (Cæſar in the meane ſpace turmoyling his wits and body in ciuill wars at home, Antonius liuing merrily and quietly abroad) he eaſily fell again to his old licentious life. For ſtraight one Anaxenor a plaier of the cithern, Xoutus a plaier of the flutes, Metrodorus a tumbler, and ſuch a rabble of minſtrels and fit miniſters for the pleaſures of ASIA, (who in finenes and flattery paſſed all the other plagues he brought with him out of ITALY) all theſe flocked in his court, and bare the whole ſway: and after that, all went awry. For euery one gaue them ſelues to riot and exceſſe, when they ſaw he delighted in it: and all ASIA was like to the city Sophocles ſpeaketh of in one of his tragedies:

VVas full of ſweete perfumes, and pleaſaunt ſongs,

For in the city of EPHESVS, women attired as they goe in the feaſtes and ſacrifice, of Bacchus, came out to meete him with ſuch ſolemnities and ceremonies, as are then vſed: with men and children diſguiſed like Fawnes and Satyres. Moreouer, the city was full of Iuey, and darts wreathed about with Iuey, pſalterions, flutes and howboyes; and in their ſongs they called him Bacchus, father of mirth, curteous, and gentle: and ſo was he vnto ſome, but to the moſt part of men, cruell, and extreame. For he robbed noble men and gentle men of their goods, to giue it vnto vile flatterers: who oftentimes begged mens goods liuing, as though they had bene dead, and would enter their houſes by force. As he gaue a citizens houſe of MAGNESIA vnto a cooke, becauſe ( as it is reported ) he dreſſed him a fine ſupper. In the end he doubled the taxation, and impoſed a ſecond vpon ASIA. But then Hybraas the Orator ſent from the eſtates of ASIA, to tell him the ſtate of their countrie, boldly ſaid vnto him: if thou wilt haue power to lay two tributes in one yere vpon vs, thou ſhouldeſt alſo haue power to giue vs two ſommers, two autumnes, and two harueſts. This was gallantly and pleaſantly ſpoken vnto Antonius by the Orator, and it pleaſed him well to heare it: but afterwardes amplifying his ſpeech, hee ſpake more boldly, and to better purpoſe. ASIA hath payed the two hundred thouſand talents. If all this money be not come to thy cofers, then aske account of them that leauied it: but if thou haue receiued it, and nothing be left of it, then are we vterly vndone. Hybraas words netled Antonius roundly. For he vnderſtoode not many of the thefts and robberies his officers committed by his authoritie, in his treaſure and affaires: not ſo much becauſe he was careleſſe, as for that he ouerſimply truſted his men in all things. For he was a plaine man, without ſubtiltie, and therefore ouerlate founde out the foule faultes they committed againſt him: but when he heard of them, he was much offended, and would plainely confeſſe it vnto them whom his officers had done iniurie vnto, by countenance of his authoritie. He had a noble minde, as well to puniſh offenders, as to reward well doers: and yet he did exceede more in giuing, then in puniſhing. Now for his outragious manner of railing he commonly vſed, mocking and flouting of euery man: that was remedied by it ſelfe. For a man might as boldly exchange a mocke with him, & he was as well contented to be mocked, as to mock others. But yet it oftentimes marred all. For he thought that thoſe which told him ſo plainly, & truly in mirth: would neuer flatter him in good earneſt, in any matter of weight. But thus he was eaſily abuſed by the praiſes they gaue him, not finding how theſe flatterers mingled their flatterie, vnder this familiar and plaine manner of ſpeech vnto him, as a fine deuiſe to make difference of meates with ſharpe and tart ſauce, & alſo to keepe him by this frank ieaſting & bourding with him at the table, that their common flatterie ſhould not be troubleſome vnto him, as men doe eaſily miſlike to haue too much of one thing: and that they handled him finely thereby, when they would giue him place in any matter of waight, and follow his counſell, that it might not appeare to him they did it ſo much to pleaſe him, but becauſe they were ignorant, and vnderſtoode not ſo much as he did. Antonius being thus inclined, the laſt and extreameſt miſchiefe of all other (to wit, the loue of Cleopatra) lighted on him, who did waken and ſtirre vp many vices yet hidden in him, and were neuer ſeene to any: and if any ſparke of goodneſſe or hope of riſing were left him, Cleopatra quenched it ſtraight, and made it worſe then before. The manner how he fell in loue with her was this. Antonius going to make warre with the PARTHIANS, ſent to command Cleopatra to appeare perſonally before him, when he came into CILICIA, to aunſwere vnto ſuch accuſations as were laide againſt her, being this: that ſhe had aided Caſsius and Brutus in their warre againſt him. The meſſenger ſent vnto Cleopatra to make this ſummons vnto her, was called Dellius: who when he had throughly conſidered her beautie, the excellent grace and ſweeteneſſe of her tongue, he nothing miſtruſted that Antonius would doe any hurt to ſo noble a Ladie, but rather aſſured himſelfe, that within few dayes ſhe ſhould be in great fauor with him. Thereupon he did her great honour, and perſwaded her to come into CILICIA, as honourably furniſhed as ſhe could poſſible, and bad her not to be affraide at all of Antonius, for he was a more courteous Lord, then any that ſhe had euer ſeene. Cleopatra on the other ſide beleeuing Dellius words, & geſſing by the former acceſſe and credit ſhe had with Iulius Cæſar, and Cneus Pompey (the ſonne of Pompey the great) onely for her beautie: ſhe began to haue good hope that ſhe might more eaſily win Antonius. For Cæſar and Pompey knew her when ſhe was but a young thing, & knew not then what the worlde ment: but now ſhe went to Antonius at the age when a womans beautie is at the prime, and ſhe alſo of beſt iudgement. So, ſhe furniſhed her ſelfe with a world of gifts, ſtore of gold and ſiluer, and of riches and other ſumptuous ornaments, as is credible enough ſhe might bring from ſo great a houſe, and from ſo wealthie and rich a realme as ÆGYPT was. But yet ſhe caried nothing with her wherein ſhe truſted more then in her ſelfe, and in the charmes and inchauntment of her paſſing beautie and grace. Therefore when ſhe was ſent vnto by diuers letters, both from Antonius himſelfe, and alſo from his friendes, ſhe made ſo light of it and mocked Antonius ſo much, that ſhe diſdained to ſet forward otherwiſe, but to take her barge in the riuer of Cydnus, the poope whereof was of gold, the ſailes of purple, and the owers of ſiluer, which kept ſtroke in rowing after the ſound of the muſicke of flutes, howboyes, cytherns,, vyolls, and ſuch other inſtruments as they played vpon in the barge. And now for the perſon of her ſelfe: ſhe was laide vnder a pauillion of cloth of golde of tiſſue, apparelled and attired like the goddeſſe Venus, commonly drawen in picture: and hard by her, on either hand of her, pretie faire boyes apparelled as painters doe ſet foorth god Cupide, with litle fans in their hands, with the which they fanned winde vpon her. Her Ladies and gentlewomen alſo, the faireſt of them were apparelled like the nymphes Nereides (which are the myrmaides of the waters) and like the Graces, ſome ſtearing the helme, others tending the tackle and ropes of the barge, out of the which there came a wonderfull paſſing ſweete ſauor of perfumes, that perfumed the wharfes ſide, peſtered with innumerable multitudes of people. Some of them followed the barge all alongſt the riuers ſide: others alſo ranne out of the citie to ſee her comming in. So that in the end, there ranne ſuch multitudes of people one after an other to ſee her, that Antonius was left poſt alone in the market place, in his Imperiall ſeate to giue audience: and there went a rumour in the peoples mouthes, that the goddeſſe Venus was come to play with the god Bacchus, for the generall good of all ASIA. When Cleopatra landed, Antonius ſent to inuite her to ſupper to him. But ſhe ſent him worde againe, he ſhould doe better rather to come and ſuppe with her. Antonius therefore to ſhew himſelfe curteous vnto her at her arriuall, was contented to obey her, and went to ſupper to her: where he found ſuch paſſing ſumptuous fare, that no tongue can expreſſe it. But amongſt all other things, he moſt wondered at the infinite number of lightes and torches hanged on the toppe of the houſe, giuing light in euery place, ſo artificially ſet and ordered by deuiſes, ſome round, ſome ſquare: that it was the rareſt thing to behold that eye could diſcerne, or that euer bookes could mention. The next night, Antonius feaſting her, contended to paſſe her in magnificence and finenes: but ſhe ouercame him in both. So that he himſelfe began to ſcorne the groſſe ſeruice of his houſe, in reſpect of Cleopatraes ſumptuouſnes and fineneſſe. And when Cleopatra found Antonius ieaſts and ſlents to be but groſſe, and ſouldier like, in plaine manner: ſhe gaue it him finely, and without feare taunted him throughly. Now her beautie (as it is reported) was not ſo paſſing, as vnmatchable of other women, nor yet ſuch, as vpon preſent viewe did enamor men with her: but ſo ſweete was her companie and conuerſation, that a man could not poſſiblie but be taken. And beſides her beautie, the good grace ſhe had to talke and diſcourſe, her curteous nature that tempered her words & deedes, was a ſpurre that pricked to the quick. Furthermore, beſides all theſe, her voice and words were maruellous pleaſant: for her tongue was an inſtrument of muſicke to diuers ſportes and paſtimes, the which ſhe eaſily turned to any language that pleaſed her. She ſpake vnto few barbarous people by interpreter, but made them anſwere her ſelfe, or at the leaſt the moſt part of them: as the ÆTHIOPIANS, the ARABIANS, the TROGLODYTES, the HEBRVES, the SYRIANS, the MEDES, and the PARTHIANS, and to many others alſo, whoſe languages ſhe had learned. Whereas diuers of her progenitors, the kings of ÆGYPT, could ſcarce learne the ÆGYPTIAN tongue only, & many of them forgot to ſpeake the MACEDONIAN. Now, Antonius was ſo rauiſhed with the loue of Cleopatra, that though his wife Fuluia had great warres, and much a doe with Cæſar for his affaires, and that the armie of the PARTHIANS (the which the kings Lieutenantes had giuen to the only leading of Labienus) was now aſſembled in MESOPOTAMIA readie to inuade SYRIA: yet, as though all this had nothing touched him, he yeelded himſelfe to goe with Cleopatra into ALEXANDRIA, where he ſpent and loſt in childiſh ſports (as a man might ſay) and idle paſtimes, the moſt pretious thing a man can ſpend, as Antiphon ſaith: and that is, time. For they made an order betwene them, which they called Amimetobion (as much to ſay, no life comparable and matchable with it) one feaſting each other by turnes, and in coſt, exceeding all meaſure and reaſon. And for proofe hereof, I haue heard my grandfather Lampryas report, that one Philotas a Phiſitian, borne in the city of AMPHISSA, told him that he was at that preſent time in ALEXANDRIA, and ſtudied Phiſicke: and that hauing acquaintance with one of Antonius cookes, he tooke him with him to Antonius houſe, ( being a young man deſirous to ſee things) to ſhew him the wonderfull ſumptuous charge and preparation of one only ſupper. When he was in the kitchin, and ſaw a world of diuerſities of meates, and amongſt others, eight wild boares roſted whole: he began to wonder at it, and ſaide, ſure you haue a great number of gueſtes to ſupper. The cooke fell a laughing, and anſwered him, no (ꝙ he) not many gueſtes, nor aboue twelue in all: but yet all that is boyled or roaſted muſt be ſerued in whole, or elſe it would be marred ſtraight. For Antonius peraduenture will ſuppe preſently, or it may be a pretie while hence, or likely enough he will deferre it longer, for that he hath drunke well to day, or elſe hath had ſome other great matters in hand: and therefore we doe not dreſſe one ſupper onely, but many ſuppers, becauſe we are vncertaine of the houre he will ſuppe in. Philotas the Phiſitian tolde my grandfather this tale, and ſaide moreouer, that it was his chaunce ſhortly after to ſerue the eldeſt ſonne of the ſaide Antonius, whom he had by his wife Fuluia: and that he ſate commonly at his table with his other friendes, when he did not dine nor ſuppe with his father. It chaunced one day there came a Phiſitian that was ſo full of words, that he made euery man wearie of him at the bord: but Philotas to ſtoppe his mouth, put out a ſubtle propoſition to him. It is good in ſome ſort to let a man drinke colde water that hath an agew: euery man that hath an agew hath it in ſome ſort, ergo it is good for a man that hath an agew to drinke cold water. The Phiſitian was ſo grauelled & amated withall, that he had not a word more to ſay. Young Antonius burſt out in ſuch a laughing at him, and was ſo glad of it, that he ſaid vnto him: Philotas, take all that, I giue it thee: ſhewing him his cubbord full of plate, with great pots of gold and ſiluer. Philotas thanked him, and told him he thought himſelf greatly bound to him for this liberality, but he would neuer haue thought that he had had power to haue giuen ſo many things, and of ſo great value. But much more he maruelled, when ſhortly after one of young Antonius men brought him home all the pots in a basket, bidding him ſet his marke and ſtampe vpon them, and to locke them vp. Philotas returned the bringer of them, fearing to be reproued if he tooke thẽ. Then the young gentleman Antonius ſaid vnto him: alas poore man, why doeſt thou make it niſe to take them? Knoweſt thou not that it is the ſonne of Antonius that giues them thee, and is able to do it? If thou wilt not beleeue me, take rather the readie money they come to: becauſe my father peraduenture may aske for ſome of the plate, for the antike & excellent workmanſhip of them. This I haue heard my grandfather tell oftentimes. But now againe to Cleopatra. Plato writeth that there are foure kinds of flatterie: but Cleopatra deuided it into many kinds. For ſhe, were it in ſport, or in matters of earneſt, ſtill deuiſed ſundrie newe delights to haue Antonius at commaundement, neuer leauing him night nor day, nor once letting him go out of her ſight. For ſhe would play at dice with him, drinke with him, & hunt commonly with him, and alſo be with him when he went to any exerciſe or actiuitie of body. And ſometime alſo, when he would goe vp and downe the citie diſguiſed like a ſlaue in the night, & would peere into poore mens windowes & their ſhops, and ſcold and braule with them within the houſe: Cleopatra would be alſo in a chamber maides array, and amble vp & downe the ſtreetes with him, ſo that oftentimes Antonius bare away both mockes & blowes. Now, though moſt men miſliked this maner, yet the ALEXANDRIANS were commonly glad of this iolity, and liked it well, ſaying very gallantly, and wiſely: that Antonius ſhewed them a comicall face, to wit, a merie countenance: and the ROMAINES a tragicall face, to ſay, a grimme looke. But to reckon vp all the fooliſh ſportes they made, reuelling in this ſort: it were too fonde a part of me, and therefore I will only tell you one among the reſt. On a time he went to angle for fiſh, and when he could take none, he was an angrie as could be, becauſe Cleopatra ſtood by. Wherefore he ſecretly commaunded the fiſher men, that when he caſt in his line, they ſhould ſtraight diue vnder the water, and put a fiſh on his hooke which they had taken before: and ſo ſnatched vp his angling rodde, and brought vp fiſh twiſe or thriſe. Cleopatra found it ſtraight, yet ſhe ſeemed not to ſee it, but wondred at his excellent fiſhing: but when ſhe was alone by her ſelfe among her owne people, ſhe tolde them how it was, and bad them the next morning to be on the water to ſee the fiſhing. A number of people came to the hauen, and got into the fiſher boates to ſee this fiſhing. Antonius then threw in his line and Cleopatra ſtraight commanded one of her men to diue vnder water before Antonius men, and to put ſome old ſalt fiſh vpon his baite, like vnto thoſe that are brought out of the country of PONT. When he had hong the fiſh on his hook, Antonius thinking he had taken a fiſh in deede, ſnatched vp his line preſently. Then they all fell a laughing. Cleopatra laughing alſo, ſaid vnto him: leaue vs (my Lord) ÆGYPTIANS (which dwell in the country of PHARVS & CANOBVS) your angling rod: this is not thy profeſſion: thou muſt hunt after conquering of realmes and countries. Now Antonius delighting in theſe fond and childiſh paſtimes, very ill newes were brought him from two places. The firſt from ROME, that his brother Lucius and Fuluia his wife, fell out firſt betwene themſelues, and afterwards fell to open warre with Cæſar, & had brought all to nought, that they were both driuen to flie out of ITALY. The ſecond newes, as bad as the firſt: that Labienus conquered all ASIA with the armie of the PARTHIANS, from the riuer of Euphrates, and from SYRIA, vnto the countries of LYDIA and IONIA. Then beganne Antonius with much a do, a litle to rouſe him ſelfe as if he had bene wakened out of a deepe ſleepe, and as a man may ſay, comming out of a great drunkenneſſe. So, firſt of all he bent himſelfe againſt the PARTHIANS, and went as farre as the country of PHOENICIA: but there he receiued lamentable letters from his wife Fuluia. Whereupon he ſtraight returned towardes ITALY, with two hundred ſaile: and as he went, tooke vp his friends by the way that fled out of ITALIE, to come to him. By them he was informed, that his wife Fuluia was the only cauſe of this warre: who being of a peeuiſh, crooked, and troubleſome nature, had purpoſely raiſed this vprore in ITALY, in hope thereby to withdraw him from Cleopatra. But by good fortune, his wife Fuluia going to meete with Antonius ſickned by the way, and died in the citie of SICYONE: and therefore Octauius Cæſar, and he were the eaſilier made friends together. For when Antonius landed in ITALIE, and that men ſaw Cæſar asked nothing of him, and that Antonius on the other ſide laide all the fault & burden on his wife Fuluia: the friendes of both parties would not ſuffer them to vnrippe any old matters, and to proue or defend who had the wrong or right, and who was the firſt procurer of this warre, fearing to make matters worſe betwene them: but they made them friendes together, and deuided the Empire of ROME betwene them, making the ſea Ionium the bounds of their diuiſion. For they gaue all the prouinces Eaſtward vnto Antonius: and the countries Weſtward, vnto Cæſar: and left AFRICKE vnto Lepidus: and made a law, that they three one after an other ſhould make their friends Conſuls, when they would not be themſelues. This ſeemed to be a ſound councell, but yet it was to be confirmed with a ſtraighter bond, which fortune offered thus. There was Octauia the eldeſt ſiſter of Cæſar, not by one mother, for ſhe came of Ancharia, & Cæſar himſelfe afterwards of Accia. It is reported, that he dearly loued his ſiſter Octauia, for in deede ſhe was a noble Ladie, and left the widow of her firſt husband Caius Marcellus, who died not long before: and it ſeemed alſo that Antonius had bene widower euer ſince the death of his wife Fuluia. For he denied not that he kept Cleopatra, but ſo did he not confeſſe that he had her as his wife: & ſo with reaſon he did defend the loue he bare vnto this ÆGYPTIAN Cleopatra Thereupon euery man did ſet forward this mariage, hoping thereby that this Ladie Octauia, hauing an excellent grace, wiſedom, & honeſtie, ioyned vnto ſo rare a beautie, that when ſhe were with Antonius (he louing her as ſo worthy a Ladie deſerueth) ſhe ſhould be a good meane to keepe good loue & amitie betwixt her brother and him. So when Cæſar & he had made the match betwene them, they both went to ROME about this mariage, although it was againſt the law, that a widow ſhould be maried within tenne monethes after her husbandes death. Howbeit the Senate diſpenſed with the law, and ſo the mariage proceeded accordingly. Sextus Pompeius at that time kept in SICILIA, and ſo made many an inrode into ITALIE with a great number of pynnaſies and other pirates ſhippes, of the which were Captaines two notable pirats, Menas and Menecrates, who ſo ſcoured all the ſea thereabouts, that none durſt peepe out with a ſaile. Furthermore, Sextus Pompeius had dealt very friendly with Antonius, for he had courteouſly receiued his mother, when ſhe fled out of ITALIE with Fuluia: and therefore they thought good to make peace with him. So they met all three together by the mount of Miſena, vpon a hill that runneth farre into the ſea: Pompey hauing his ſhippes ryding hard by at anker, and Antonius and Cæſar their armies vpon the ſhore ſide, directly ouer againſt him. Now, after they had agreed that Sextus Pompeius ſhould haue SICILE and Sardinia, with this condition, that he ſhould ridde the ſea of all theeues and pirats, and make it ſafe for paſſengers, and withall that he ſhould ſend a certaine of wheate to Rome: one of them did feaſt an other, and drew cuts who ſhould beginne. It was Pompeius chaunce to inuite them firſt. Whereupon Antonius asked him: and where ſhall we ſup? There, ſaid Pompey, and ſhewed him his admirall galley which had ſixe banks of owers: that (ſaid he) is my fathers houſe they haue left me. He ſpake it to taunt Antonius, becauſe he had his fathers houſe, that was Pompey the great. So he caſt anckers enow into the ſea, to make his galley faſt, and then built a bridge of wood to conuey them to his galley, from the head of mount Miſena: and there he welcomed them, and made them great cheere. Now in the middeſt of the feaſt, when they fell to be merie with Antonius loue vnto Cleopatra: Menas the pirate came to Pompey, & whiſpering in his eare, ſaid vnto him: ſhall I cut the gables of the ankers, and make thee Lord not only of Sicile and Sardinia, but of the whole Empire of Rome beſides? Pompey hauing pauſed a while vpon it, at length anſwered him: thou ſhouldeſt haue done it, and neuer haue told it me, but now we muſt content vs with that we haue. As for my ſelfe, I was neuer taught to breake my faith, nor to be counted a traitor. The other two alſo did likewiſe feaſt him in their campe, and then he returned into Sicile. Antonius after this agreement made, ſent Ventidius before into Asia to ſtay the Parthians, and to keepe them they ſhould come no further: and he himſelfe in the meane time, to gratifie Cæſar, was contented to be choſen Iulius Cæſars prieſt and ſacrificer, & ſo they ioyntly together diſpatched all great matters, concerning the ſtate of the Empire. But in all other maner of ſports and exerciſes, wherein they paſſed the time away the one with the other: Antonius was euer inferior vnto Cæſar, & alway loſt, which grieued him much. With Antonius there was a ſoothſayer or aſtronomer of Ægypt, that could caſt a figure, and iudge of mens natiuities, to tell them what ſhould happen to them. He, either to pleaſe Cleopatra, or elſe for that he found it ſo by his art, tolde Antonius plainely, that his fortune (which of it ſelfe was excellent good, and very great) was altogether bleamiſhed and obſcured by Cæſars fortune: and therefore he counſelled him vtterly to leaue his company, and to get him as farre from him as he could. For thy Demon ſaid he, (that is to ſay, the good angell and ſpirit that keepeth thee) is affraide of his: and being coragious & high when he is alone, becometh fearefull and timerous when he commeth neere vnto the other. Howſoeuer it was, the euents enſuing proued the Ægyptians words true. For, it is ſaid, that as often as they two drew cuts for paſtime, who ſhould haue any thing, or whether they plaied at dice, Antonius alway loſt. Oftentimes when they were diſpoſed to ſee cockfight, or quailes that were taught to fight one with an other: Cæſars cockes or quailes did euer ouercome. The which ſpighted Antonius in his mind, although he made no outward ſhew of it: and therfore he beleeued the Ægyptian the better. In fine, he recommended the affaires of his houſe vnto Cæſar, & went out of Italy with Octauia his wife, whom he caried into Grece, after he had had a daughter by her. So Antonius lying al the winter at Athens, news came vnto him of the victories of Ventidius, who had ouercome the Parthians in battell, in the which alſo were ſlaine, Labienus and Pharnabates, the chiefeſt Captaine king Orodes had. For theſe good newes he feaſted all Athens, and kept open houſe for all the Grecians, and many games of price were plaid at Athens, of the which he himſelfe would be iudge. Wherfore leauing his gard, his axes, and tokens of his Empire at his houſe, he came into the ſhew place (or liſtes) where theſe games were plaide in a long gowne and ſlippers after the Grecian faſhion, and they caried tippeſtaues before him, as martials men do carie before the Iudges to make place: and he himſelfe in perſon was a ſtickler to part the young men, when they had fought enough. After that, preparing to go to the warres, he made him a garland of the holy Oliue, and caried a veſſell with him of the water of the fountaine Clepſydra, becauſe of an Oracle he had receiued that ſo commaunded him. In the meane time, Ventidius once againe ouercame Pacorus, (Orodes ſonne king of Parthia) in a battel fought in the country of Cyrrestica, he being come againe with a great armie to inuade Syria: at which battell was ſlaine a great number of the Parthians, & among them Pacorus, the kings owne ſonne ſlaine. This noble exploit as famous as euer any was, was a full reuenge to the Romaines, of the ſhame and loſſe they had receiued before by the death of Marcus Craſſus: and he made the Parthians flie, and

glad to keepe themſelues within the confines and territories of MESOPOTAMIA, & MEDIA, after they had thriſe together bene ouercome in ſeuerall battels. Howbeit Ventidius durſt not vndertake to follow them any farther, fearing leaſt he ſhould haue gotten Antonius diſpleaſure by it. Notwithſtanding, he led his armie againſt them that had rebelled, and conquered them againe: amongſt whom he beſieged Antiochus, king of COMMAGENA, who offered him to giue a thouſand talents to be pardoned his rebellion, and promiſed euer after to be at Antonius commaundement. But Ventidius made him anſwere, that he ſhould ſend vnto Antonius, who was not farre off, & would not ſuffer Ventidius to make any peace with Antiochus, to the end that yet this litle exploit ſhould paſſe in his name, and that they ſhould not thinke he did any thing but by his Lieutenant Ventidius. The ſiege grew very long, becauſe they that were in the towne, ſeeing they could not be receiued vppon no reaſonable compoſition: determined valiantly to defende themſelues to the laſt man. Thus Antonius did nothing, and yet receiued great ſhame, repenting him much that he tooke not their firſt offer. And yet at laſt he was glad to make truce with Antiochus, and to take three hundred talents for compoſition. Thus after he had ſet order for the ſtate & affaires of SYRIA, he returned againe to ATHENS: and hauing giuen Ventidius ſuch honours as he deſerued, he ſent him to ROME, to triumph for the PARTHIANS. Ventidius was the onely man that euer triumphed of the PARTHIAN's vntill this preſent day, a meane man borne, and of no noble houſe nor family: who only came to that he attained vnto, through Antonius friendſhippe, the which deliuered him happie occaſion to atchieue to great matters. And yet to ſay truely, he did ſo well quit himſelfe in all his enterpriſes, that he confirmed that which was ſpoken of Antonius and Cæſar: to wit, that they were alway more fortunate when they made warre by their Lieutenants, then by themſelues. For Soſsius, one of Antonius Lieutenants in SYRIA, did notable good ſeruice: and Canidius whom he had alſo left his Lieutenant in the borders of ARMENIA, did conquer it all. So did he alſo ouercome the kings of the IBERIANS and ALBANIANS, and went on with his conqueſts vnto mount Caucaſus. By theſe conqueſts, the fame of Antonius power increaſed more and more, and grew dreadfull vnto all the barbarous nations. But Antonius notwithſtanding, grew to be maruellouſly offended with Cæſar, vpon certaine reportes that had beene brought vnto him: and ſo tooke ſea to go towards ITALY with three hundred ſaile. And becauſe thoſe of BRVNDVSIVM would not receiue his armie into their hauen, he went farther vnto TARENTVM. There his wife Octauia that came out of GRECE with him, beſought him to ſend her vnto her brother: the which he did. Octauia at that time was great with child, and moreouer had a ſecond daughter by him, and yet ſhe put her ſelfe in iorney, and met with her brother Octauius Cæſar by the way, who brought his two chiefe friends, Mæcenas and Agrippa with him. She tooke them aſide, and with all the inſtance ſhe could poſsible, intreated them they would not ſuffer her that was the happieſt woman of the worlde, to become now the moſt wretched and vnfortunateſt creature of all other. For now, ſaid ſhe, euery mans eyes doe gaze on me, that am the ſiſter of one of the Emperors and wife of the other. And if the worſt counſell take place, (which the goddes forbid) and that they growe to warres: for your ſelues, it is vncertaine to which of them two the goddes haue aſsigned the victorie, or ouerthrowe. But for me, on which ſide ſoeuer victorie fall, my ſtate can be but moſt miſerable ſtill. Theſe wordes of Octauia ſo ſoftned Cæſars heart, that he went quickly vnto TARENTVM. But it was a noble ſight for them that were preſent, to ſee ſo great an armie by land not to ſturre, and ſo many ſhippes a flote in the roade, quietly and ſafe: and furthermore, the meeting and kindneſſe of friendes, louingly imbracing one an other. Firſt, Antonius feaſted Cæſar, which he graunted vnto for his ſiſters ſake. Afterwardes they agreed together, that Cæſar ſhould giue Antonius two legions to goe againſt the PARTHIANS: and that Antonius ſhould let Cæſar haue a hundred gallies armed with braſen ſpurres at the prooes. Beſides all this, Octauia obteyned of her huſband, twentie brigantines for her brother: and of her brother for her huſbande, a thouſande armed men. After they had taken leaue of each other, Cæſar went immediatly to make warre with Sextus Pompeius, to get SICILIA into his handes. Antonius alſo leauing his wife Octauia and litle children begotten of her with Cæſar, and his other children which he had by Fuluia: he went directly into ASIA. Then beganne this peſtilent plague and miſchiefe

chiefe of Cleopatraes loue (which had ſlept a long time, and ſeemed to haue beene vtterly forgotten, and that Antonius had giuen place to better counſell) againe to kindle, and to be in force, ſo ſoone as Antonius came neare vnto Syria. And in the end, the horſe of the minde as Plato termeth it, that is ſo hard of raine (I meane the vnreyned luſt of concupiſcence) did put out of Antonius head, all honeſt and commendable thoughtes: for he ſent Fonteius Capito to bring Cleopatra into Syria. Vnto whom, to welcome her, he gaue no trifling things: but vnto that ſhee had already, he added the prouinces of Phoenicia, thoſe of the nethermoſt Syria, the Ile of Cyprus, and a great part of Cilicia, and that countrey of Iury, where the true balme is, and that part of Arabia where the Nabatheians doe dwell, which ſtretcheth out towardes the Ocean. Theſe great giftes much miſliked the Romaines. But now, though Antonius did eaſily giue away great ſeigniories, realmes, and mighty nations vnto ſome priuate men, and that alſo he tooke from other kings their lawfull realms: (as from Antigonus king of the Ievves, whom he openly beheaded, where neuer king before had ſuffered like death) yet all this did not ſo much offend the Romaines, as the vnmeaſurable honors which he did vnto Cleopatra. But yet he did much more aggrauat their malice and ill will towards him, becauſe that Cleopatra hauing brought him two twins, a ſonne and a daughter, he named his ſon Alexander, and his daughter Cleopatra, and gaue them to their ſurnames, the Sun to the one, and the moone to the other. This notwithſtanding, hee that could finely cloke his ſhamefull deeds with fine words, ſaid that the greatnes and magnificence of the Empire of Rome appeared moſt, not where the Romains tooke, but where they gaue much: & nobility was multiplied amongſt men, by the poſterity of kings, when they left off their ſeede in diuers places: and that by this meanes his firſt aunceſter was begotten of Hercules, who had not left the hope and continuance of his line and poſterity, in the wombe of one only woman, fearing Solons lawes, or regarding the ordinaunces of men touching the procreation of children: but that he gaue it vnto nature, and eſtabliſhed the foundation of many noble races and families in diuers places. Now when Phraortes had ſlaine his father Orodes, and poſſeſſed the kingdome: many gentlemen of Parthia forſooke him, & fled from him. Amongſt them was Monaſes, a noble man, and of great authority among his country men, who came vnto Antonius, that receiued him, & compared his fortune vnto Themiſtocles, and his own riches and magnificence, vnto the kings of Perſia. For he gaue Monaſes 3. cities, Lariſſa, Arethuſa, & Hierapolis, which was called before Bombyce. Howbeit the king of Parthia ſhortly after called him home againe, vpon his faith & word. Antonius was glad to let him go, hoping thereby to ſteale vpon Phraortes vnprouided. For he ſent vnto him, and told him that they would remaine good frends, & haue peace together, ſo he would but only redeliuer the ſtanderds & enſignes of the Romains, which the Parthians had won in the battel where Marcus Craſſus was ſlaine, & the men alſo that remained yet priſoners of this ouerthrow. In the meane time he ſent Cleopatra backe into Ægypt, & tooke his way towards Arabia & Armenia, & there tooke a general muſter of al his army he had together, & of the kings his confederats that were come by his commandement to aide him, being a maruellous number: of the which the chiefeſt was Artauaſdes, king of Armenia, who did furniſh him with ſix thouſand horſmen, and ſeuen thouſand footmen. There were alſo of the Romains about three ſcore thouſand footemen, & of horſmen (Spaniards & Gauls reckoned for Romains) to the number of ten thouſand, & of other nations thirty thouſand men, reckoning together the horſmen and light armed footmen. This ſo great & puiſant army which made the Indians quake for fear, dwelling about the country of the Bactrians, & all Aſia alſo to tremble: ſerued him to no purpoſe, & all for the loue he bare to Cleopatra. For the earneſt great deſire he had to lie all winter with her, made him begin his warre out of due time, and for haſt, to put all in hazard, being ſo rauiſhed and enchaunted with the ſweete poiſon of her loue, that he had no other thought but of her, and how he might quickly returne againe: more then how he might ouercome his enemies. For firſt of all, where he ſhould haue wintered in Armenia to refreſh his men, wearied with the long iorney they had made, hauing come eight thouſand furlongs, and then at the beginning of the ſpring to go and inuade Media, before the Parthians ſhould ſtir out of their houſes and garriſons: he could tary no longer, but led them forthwith vnto the prouince of ATROPATENE, leauing ARMENIA on the left hand, and forraged all the countrey. Furthermore, making all the haſt he could, he left behind him engines of battery which were caried with him in three hundred carts, (among the which alſo there was a ramme foure ſcore foot long) being things moſt neceſſary for him, and the which he could not get again for money, if they were once loſt or marred. For the high prouinces of ASIA haue no trees growing of ſuch height & length, neither ſtrong nor ſtraight enough to make ſuch like engines of battery. This notwithſtanding, he left them all behind him, as a hinderance to bring his matters & intent ſpeedily to paſſe: and left a certaine number of men to keepe them, and gaue them in charge vnto one Tatianus. Then he went to beſiege the city of PHRAATA, being the chiefeſt and greateſt city the king of MEDIA had, where his wife and children were. Then he ſtraight found his owne fault, and the want of his artillery he left behind him, by the worke he had in hand: for he was faine for lacke of a breache (where his men might come to the ſword with their enemies that defended the walle) to force a mount of earth hard to the walles of the city, the which by litle and litle with great labour, roſe to ſome height. In the meane time king Phraortes came downe with a great army: who vnderſtanding that Antonius had left his engines of battery behind him, he ſent a great number of horſemen before, which enuironned Tatianus with all his cariage, and ſlue him, and tenne thouſand men he had with him. After this, the barbarous people tooke theſe engines of battery and burnt them, and got many priſoners, amongſt whom they tooke alſo king Polemon. This diſcomfiture maruellouſly troubled al Antonius army, to receiue ſo great an ouerthrow (beyond their expectation) at the beginning of their iorney: inſomuch that Artabazus, king of the ARMENIANS, deſpairing of the good ſucceſſe of the ROMAINS: departed with his men, notwithſtanding that he was him ſelfe the firſt procurer of this warre and iorney. On the other ſide, the PARTHIANS came coragiouſly vnto Antonius campe, who lay at the ſiege of their chiefeſt city, and cruelly reuiled and threatned him. Antonius therefore fearing that if he lay ſtill and did nothing, his mens hearts would faile them: he tooke ten legions, with three cohorts or enſignes of the Prætors, (which are companies appointed for the guard of the Generall) and all his horſemen, and carried them out to forrage, hoping thereby he ſhould eaſily allure the PARTHIANS to fight a battell. But when he had marched about a dayes iorney from his campe, he ſaw the PARTHIANS wheeling round about him to giue him the onſet, & to skirmiſh with him, when he would think to march his way. Therefore he ſet out his ſignall of battell, and yet cauſed his tents and fardels to be truſſed vp, as though he ment not to fight, but only to lead his men back againe. Then he marched before the army of the barbarous people, the which was martiald like a creſſant or halfe moone: and commaunded his horſemen, that as ſoone as they thought the legions were near enough vnto their enemies to ſet vpon the voward, that then they ſhould ſet ſpurs to their horſes, and begin the charge. The PARTHIANS ſtanding in battell ray, beholding the countenance of the ROMAINS as they marched: they appeared to be ſouldiers in deede, to ſee them march in ſo good array as was poſſible. For in their march, they kept the rancks a litle ſpace one from another, not ſtragling out of order, and ſhaking their pikes, ſpeaking neuer a word. But ſo ſoone as the allarme was giuen, the horſmen ſodainly turned head vpon the PARTHIANS, and with great cries gaue charge on them: who at the firſt receiued their charge coragiouſly, for they were ioined nearer thē within an arrows ſhoote. But when the legions alſo came to ioine with them, ſhouting out aloud, and ratling of their armors: the PARTHIANS horſes and them ſelues were ſo affraied and amazed withall, that they all turned taile and fled, before the ROMAINES could come to the ſword with them, Then Antonius followed thē hard in chaſe, being in great good hope by this conflict to haue brought to end all, or the moſt part of this warre. But after that his footemen had chaſed them fifty ſurlongs off, and the horſemen alſo thriſe as farre: they found in all but thirty priſoners taken, and about foure ſcore men only ſlaine But this did much diſcorage them, when they cōſidered with them ſelues, that obtaining the victory, they had ſlaine ſo few of their enemies: and where they were ouercome, they loſt as many of their men, as they had done at the ouerthrow when the cariage was taken. The next morning, Antonius army truſſed vp their cariage, and marched backe towards their campe: and by the way in their returne they met at the firſt a few of the PARTHIANS: then going further, they met a few few moe. So at length when they all came together, they reuiled them, and troubled them on euery ſide, as freſhly and couragiouſly, as if they had not bene ouerthrowen: ſo that the ROMAINES very hardly got to their campe with ſafety. The MEDES on the other ſide, that were beſieged in their chiefe city of PHRAATA, made a ſaly out vpon thẽ that kept the mount, which they had forced and caſt againſt the wall of the city, and draue them for feare, from the mount they kept. Antonius was ſo offended withall, that he executed the Decimation. For he deuided his men by ten legions, and then of them he put the tenth legion to death, on whom the lotte fell: and to the other nine, he cauſed them to haue barley giuen them in ſtead of wheate. Thus this war fell out troubleſome vnto both parties, and the end thereof much more fearefull. For Antonius could looke for no other of his ſide, but famine: becauſe he could forrage no more, nor fetch in any victuals, without great loſſe of his men. Phraortes on the other ſide, he knew well enough that he could bring the PARTHIANS to any thing els, but to lie in campe abroad in the winter. Therefore he was affrayed, that if the ROMAINS continued their ſiege all winter long, and made warre with him ſtill: that his men would forſake him, and ſpecially becauſe the time of the yeare went away a pace, and the aire waxed cloudy, and cold, in the equinoctiall autumne. Thereupon he called to minde this deuiſe. He gaue the chiefeſt of his gentlemen of the PARTHIANS charge, that when they met the ROMAINES out of their campe, going to forrage, or to water their horſe, or for ſome other prouiſion. that they ſhould not diſtreſſe them too much, but ſhould ſuffer them to cary ſomewhat away, and greatly commend their valiantnes and hardines, for the which their king did eſteeme them the more, and not without cauſe. After theſe firſt baites and allurements, they began by litle and litle to come nearer vnto them, and to talke with them a horſebacke, greatly blaming Antonius ſelfewil that did not giue their king Phraortes occaſiõ to make a good peace, who deſired nothing more, then to ſaue the liues of ſo goodly a company of valiant men: but that he was too fondly bent to abide two of the greateſt and moſt dreadfull enemies he could haue, to wit: winter, and famine, the which they ſhould hardly away withall, though the PARTHIANS did the beſt they could to aide and accompany them. Theſe wordes being oftentimes brought to Antonius, they made him a litle pliant, for the good hope he had of his returne: but yet he would not ſend vnto the king of PARTHIA, before they had firſt asked theſe barbarous people that ſpake ſo curteouſly vnto his men, whether they ſpake it of them ſelues, or that they were their maiſters words. When they told them the king him ſelfe ſaid ſo, and did perſwade them further not to feare or miſtruſt them: then Antonius ſent ſome of his frends vnto the king, to make demand for the deliuery of the enſignes and priſoners he had of the ROMAINS, ſince the ouerthrow of Craſſus: to the end it ſhould not appeare, that if he asked nothing, they ſhould thinke he were glad that he might only ſcape with ſafety out of the danger he was in. The king of PARTHIA aunſwered him: that for the enſignes and priſoners he demanded, he ſhould not breake his head about it: notwithſtanding, that if he would preſently depart without delay, he might depart in peaceable maner, and without danger. Wherfore Antonius after he had giuen his men ſome time to truſſe vp their cariage, he raiſed his campe, and tooke his way to depart. But though he had an excellent tongue at will, and very gallant to entertaine his ſouldiers and men of war, and that he could paſſingly well do it, as wel, or better then any Captaine in his time: yet being aſhamed for reſpects, he would not ſpeake vnto them at his remouing, but willed Domitius Ænobarbus to do it. Many of them tooke this in very ill part, and thought that he did it in diſdaine of them: but the moſt part of them preſently vnderſtood the truth of it, & were alſo aſhamed. Therefore they thought it their dueties to cary the like reſpect vnto their Captaine, that their Captaine did vnto them: and ſo they became the more obedient vnto him. So Antonius was minded to returne the ſame way he came, being a plaine barren countrey without wod. But there came a ſouldier to him, born in the country of the MARDIANS, who by oft frequẽting the PARTHIANS of long time, knew their faſhions very wel, and had alſo ſhewed himſelf very true & faithfull to the ROMAINS, in the battell where Antonius engines of battery and cariage were taken away. This man came vnto Antonius, to counſell him to beware how he went that way, & to make his army a prey, being heauily armed, vnto ſo great a number of horſemen, all archers in the open field, where they ſhould haue nothing to let them to compaſſe him roundabout: and that this was Phraortes fetch to offer him ſo friendly conditions and curteous words to make him raiſe his ſiege, that he might afterwards meete him as he would, in the plaines: howbeit, that he would guide him, if he thought good, an other way on the right hand, through wods and mountaines, a far nearer way, and where he ſhould find great plenty of all things needefull for his army. Antonius hearing what he ſaid, called his counſell together, to conſult vppon it. For after he had made peace with the PARTHIANS, he was loth to giue them cauſe to thinke he miſtruſted them: and on the other ſide alſo he would gladly ſhorten his way, and paſſe by places well inhabited, where he might be prouided of all things neceſſary: therefore he asked the MARDIAN what pledge he would put in, to performe that he promiſed. The MARDIAN gaue himſelfe to be bound hand and foot, til he had brought his army into the country of ARMENIA. So he guided the army thus bound, two dayes together, without any trouble or ſight of enemy. But the third day, Antonius thinking the PARTHIANS would no more follow him, and truſting therein, ſuffred the ſouldiers to march in diſorder as euery man liſted. The MARDIAN perceiuing that the dammes of a riuer were newly broken vp, which they ſhould haue paſſed ouer, and that the riuer had ouerflowen the bancks & drowned all the way they ſhould haue gone: he geſſed ſtraight that the PARTHIANS had done it, and had thus broken it open, to ſtay the ROMAINES for getting too far before them. Thereupon he bad Antonius looke to him ſelfe, and told him that his enemies were not far from thence. Antonius hauing ſet his men in order, as he was placing of his archers and ſling men to reſiſt the enemies, and to driue them backe: they diſcried the PARTHIANS that wheeled round about the army to compaſſe them in on euery ſide, and to breake their rancks, & their light armed men gaue charge vpon them. So after they had hurt many of the ROMAINS with their arrowes, and that they themſelues were alſo hurt by them with their darts and plummets of lead: they retired a litle, and then came againe and gaue charge. Vntill that the horſmen of the GAVLS turned their horſes, and fiercelie gallopped towards them, that they diſperſed them ſo, as all that day they gathered no more together. Thereby Antonius knew what to do, and did not onely ſtrengthen the rereward of his army, but both the flancks alſo, with darts and ſling men, and made his army march in a ſquare battell: commanding the horſemen, that when the enemies ſhould come to aſſaile them, they ſhould driue them backe, but not follow them too far. Thus the PARTHIANS foure daies after, ſeeing they did no more hurt to the ROMAINS, then they alſo receiued of them: they were not ſo hot vpon them, as they were commanded, but excuſing them ſelues by the winter that troubled them, they determined to returne backe againe. The fift day, Flauius Gallus, a valiant man of his handes, that had charge in the army: came vnto Antonius to pray him to let him haue ſome moe of his light armed men then were already in the rereward, and ſome of the horſemen that were in the voward, hoping thereby to doe ſome notable exploite. Antonius graunting them vnto him, when the enemies came according to their manner to ſet vpon the taile of the army, and to skirmiſh with them: Flauius coragiouſly made them retire, but not as they were wont to do before, to retire and ioyne preſently with their army, for he ouerraſhly thruſt in among them to fight it out at the ſword. The Captaines that had the leading of the rereward, ſeeing Flauius ſtray too farre from the army: they ſent vnto him to wil him to retire, but he would not hearken to it. And it is reported alſo, that Titius him ſelf the Treaſurer, tooke the enſignes, & did what he could to make the enſigne bearers returne backe, reuiling Flauius Gallus, becauſe that through his folly and deſperatneſſe he cauſed many honeſt and valiant men to be both hurt & ſlaine to no purpoſe. Gallus alſo fell out with him, and commanded his men to ſtay. Wherefore Titius returned again into the army, and Gallus ſtil ouerthrowing and driuing the enemies backe whom he met in the voward, he was not ware that he was compaſſed in. Then ſeeing him ſelfe enuironned of all ſides, he ſent vnto the army, that they ſhould come and aide him: but there the Captaines that led the legions (among the which Canidius, a man of great eſtimation about Antonius made one) committed many faults. For where they ſhould haue made head with the whole army vpon the PARTHIANS, they ſent him aide by ſmall cōpanies: and when they were ſlaine, they ſent him others alſo. So that by their beaſtlineſſe and lacke of conſideration, they had like to haue made all the army flie, if Antonius him ſelfe had not come from the front of the battell with the third legion, the which came through the middeſt of them that fled, vntill they came to front of the enemies, and that they ſtayed them frō chaſing any farther. Howbeit at this laſt conflict there were ſlaine no leſſe then three thouſand men, and fiue thouſand beſides brought ſore hurt into the campe, and amongſt them alſo Flauius Gallus, whoſe body was ſhot through in foure places, whereof he died. Antonius went to the tents to viſit & comfort the ſicke and wounded, and for pities ſake he could not refraine from weeping: and they alſo ſhewing him the beſt countenaunce they could, tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to go and be dreſſed, and not to trouble him ſelfe for them, moſt reuerently calling him their Emperour and Captaine: and that for them ſelues, they were whole and ſafe, ſo that he had his health. For in deede to ſay truly, there was not at that time any Emperor or Captaine that had ſo great and puiſant an army as his together, both for luſty youths and corage of the ſouldiers, as alſo for their patience to away with ſo great pains and trouble. Furthermore, the obedience and reuerence they ſhewed vnto their Captaine, with a maruellous earneſt loue and good will, was ſo great: and all were indifferently (as well great as ſmall, the noble men, as meane men, the Captaines and ſouldiers) ſo earneſtly bent to eſteeme Antonius good will and fauour, aboue their owne life and ſafety: that in this point of martiall diſcipline, the anciēt Romains could not haue done any more. But diuers things were cauſe thereof, as we haue told you before: Antonius nobility and auncient houſe, his eloquence, his plaine nature, his liberality and magnificence, and his familiarity to ſport and to be merry in company: but ſpecially the care he tooke at that time to helpe, viſite, and lament thoſe that were ſicke and wounded, ſeeing euery man to haue that which was meete for him: that was of ſuch force and effect, as it made them that were ſicke and wounded to loue him better, and were more deſirous to do him ſeruice, then thoſe that were whole and ſound. This victory ſo incoraged the enemies, (who otherwiſe were weary to follow Antonius any farther) that all night long they kept the fields, and houored about the Romaines campe, thinking that they would preſently flie, and then that they ſhould take the ſpoile of their campe. So the next morning by breake of day, there were gathered together a far greater number of the Parthians, then they were before. For the rumor was, that there were not much fewer then forty thouſand horſe, becauſe their king ſent thither euen the very gard about his perſon, as vnto a moſt certaine and aſſured victory, that they might be partners of the ſpoile and booty they hoped to haue had: for as touching the king himſelf, he was neuer in any conflict or battel. Then Antonius deſirous to ſpeake to his ſouldiers, called for a blacke gowne, to appeare the more pittifull to them: but his friends did diſſwade him from it. Therefore he put on his coate armor, and being ſo apparelled, made an oration to his army: in the which he highly commended them that had ouercome and driuen backe their enemies, and greatly rebuked them that had cowardly turned their backes. So that thoſe which had ouercome, praied him to be of good chere: the other alſo to cleare them ſelues, willingly offered to take the lots of Decimation if he thought good, or otherwiſe, to receiue what kind of puniſhment it ſhould pleaſe him to lay vpon them, ſo that he would forget any more to miſlike, or to be offended with them. Antonius ſeeing that, did lift vp his hands to heauen, & made his prayer to the gods, that if in exchange of his former victories, they would now ſend him ſome bitter aduerſity: then that all might light on him ſelfe alone, and that they would giue the victory to the reſt of his army. The next morning, they gaue better order on euery ſide of the army, and ſo marched forward: ſo that when the Parthians thought to returne againe to aſſaile them, they came farre ſhort of the reckonning. For where they thought to come not to fight, but to ſpoile and make hauocke of all: when they came neare them, they were ſore hurt with their ſlings and darts, and ſuch other iauelings as the Romains darted at them, and the Parthians found them as rough and deſperat in fight, as if they had bene freſh men they had dealt withall. Whereuppon their hearts beganne againe to faile them. But yet when the Romains came to goe downe any ſteepe hils or mountaines, then they would ſet on them with their arrowes, becauſe the Romains could go downe but faire and ſoftly. But then againe, the ſouldiers of the legion that caried great ſhields, returned backe, and incloſed them that were naked or light armed, in the middeſt amongeſt them, and did kneele of one knee on the ground, and ſo ſet downe their ſhields before them: and they of the ſecond rancke alſo couered them of the firſt rancke, and the third alſo couered the ſecond, and ſo from rancke

to rancke all were couered. Inſomuch that this manner of couering and ſhading them ſelues with ſhields, was deuiſed after the faſhion of laying tiles vpon houſes, and to ſight, was like the degrees of a Theater, and is a moſt ſtrong defence and bulwarke againſt all arrowes and ſhot that falleth vpon it. When the PARTHIANS ſaw this countenance of the ROMAINE ſouldiers of the legion, which kneeled on the ground in that ſort vpon one knee, ſuppoſing that they had bene wearied with trauell: they layed downe their bowes, and tooke their ſpears and launces, and came to fight with them man for man. Then the ROMAINES ſodainly roſe vpon their feete, and with the darts that they threw from them, they ſlue the formoſt, and put the reſt to flight, and ſo did they the next dayes that followed. But by means of theſe dangers and lets, Antonius army could winne no way in a day, by reaſon whereof they ſuffered great famine: for they could haue but litle corne, and yet were they driuen daily to fight for it, and beſides that, they had no inſtruments to grinde it, to make bread of it. For the moſt part of them had bene left behind, becauſe the beaſts that caried them were either dead, or els imployed to cary them that were ſore and wounded. For the famine was ſo extreame great, that the eight part of a buſhell of wheate was ſold for fifty Drachmas, and they ſold barely bread by the waight of ſiluer. In the end, they were compelled to liue of hearbs and rootes, but they found few of them that men doe commonly eate of, and were inforced to taſt of them that were neuer eaten before: among the which there was one that killed them, and made them out of their wits. For he that had once eaten of it, his memory was gone from him, and hee knew no manner of thing, but onely buſied him ſelfe in digging and hurling of ſtones from one place to another, as though it had bene a matter of great waight, and to be done with all poſſible ſpede. All the campe ouer, men were buſily ſtouping to the ground, digging and carying of ſtones from one place to an other: but at the laſt, they caſt vp a great deale of choller, and died ſodainely, becauſe they lacked wine, which was the onely ſoueraine remedy to cure that diſeaſe. It is reported that Antonius ſeeing ſuch a number of his men die daily, and that the PARTHIANS left them not, neither would ſuffer them to be at reſt: he oftentimes cried out ſighing, and ſayed: O, tenne thouſand. He had the valiantnes of tenne thouſand GRECIANS, in ſuch admiration, whom Xenophon brought away after the ouerthrow of CYPRVS: becauſe they had come a farther iorney from BABYLON, and had alſo fought againſt much moe enemies many times told, then them ſelues, and yet came home with ſafety. The PARTHIANS therefore ſeeing that they could not breake the good order of the army of the ROMAINS, and contrarily that they them ſelues were oftentimes put to flight, and welfauoredly beaten: they fell againe to their old crafty ſubtilties. For when they found any of the ROMAINES ſcattered from the army to goe forrage, to ſeeke ſome corne, or other victuals: they would come to them as if they had bene their friends, and ſhewed them their bowes vnbent, ſaying, that them ſelues alſo did returne home to their countrey as they did, and that they would follow them no farther, howbeit that they ſhould yet haue certaine MEDES that would follow them a daies iorney or two, to keepe them that they ſhould doe no hurt to the villages from the high waies, and ſo holding them with this talke, they gently tooke their leaue of them, and bad them farewell, ſo that the ROMAINS began againe to think them ſelues ſafe. Antonius alſo vnderſtanding this, being very glad of it, determined to take his way through the plaine countrey, becauſe alſo they ſhould find no water in the mountaines, as it was reported vnto him. So as he was determined to take this courſe, there came into his hoaſt one Mithridates, a gentleman from the enemies campe, who was Coſen vnto Monazes that fled vnto Antonius, and vnto whom he had giuen three cities. When he came to Antonius campe, he praid them to bring him one that could ſpeake the PARTHIAN, or SYRIAN tongue. So one Alexander ANTIOCHIAN, a familiar of Antonius, was brought vnto him. Then the gentleman told him what he was, and ſayed, that Monazes had ſent him to Antonius, to requite the honor and curteſie he had ſhewed vnto him. After he had vſed this ceremonious ſpeach, he asked Alexander if he ſaw thoſe high Mountaines a farre off, which he pointed vnto him with his finger. Alexander aunſwered he did. The PARTHIANS (ſayd he) doe lie in ambuſhe at the foote of thoſe Mountaines, vnder the which lieth a goodly plaine champion countrey: and they thinke that you being deceiued with their crafty ſubtill wordes, will leaue the way of the Mountaines, and turne into the plaine. other way, it is very hard and painfull, and you ſhall abide great thirſt, the which you are well acquainted withall: but if Antonius take the lower way, let him aſſure himſelfe to runne the ſame fortune that Marcus Craſſus did. So Mithridates hauing ſaid, he departed. Antonius was maruellouſly troubled in his mind when he heard thus much, & therfore called for his frends, to heare what they would ſay to it. The Mardian alſo that was their guide, being asked his opinion, anſwered: that he thought as much as the gentleman Mithridates had ſayed. For, ſayd he, admit that there were no ambuſhe of enemies in the valley, yet is it a long crooked way, and ill to hit: where taking the Mountaine waye, though it be ſtonie and painefull, yet there is no other danger, but a whole dayes trauelling without any water. So Antonius changing his firſt minde and determination, remoued that night, and tooke the Mountaine waye, commaunding euery man to prouide himſelfe of water. But the moſt parte of them lacking veſſells to carie water in, ſome were driuen to fill their ſaletts and murrians with water, and others alſo filled goates ſkinnes to carie water in. Nowe they marching forwarde, word was brought vnto the Parthians that they were remoued: whereupon, contrary to their manner, they preſently followed them the ſelfeſame night, ſo that by breake of day they ouertooke the rereward of the Romains, who were ſo lame and wearied with going, and lacke of ſleep, that they were euen done. For beyond expectation, they had gone that night, two hundreth and fortie furlong, and further, to ſee their enemies ſo ſodamly at their backes, that made them vtterly diſpaire: but moſt of all, the fighting with them increaſed their thirſt, becauſe they were forced to fight as they marched, to driue their enemies backe, yet creeping on ſtill. The voward of the armie by chaunce met with a riuer that was very cleere and cold water, but it was ſalt and venemous to drinke: for ſtraight it did gnaw the guts of thoſe that had drunke it, and made them maruellous drie, and put them into a terrible ache and pricking. And notwithſtanding that the Mardian had told them of it before, yet they would not be ruled, but violently thruſt them backe that would haue kept them from drinking, and ſo dranke. But Antonius going vp and downe amongſt them, prayed them to take a litle patience for a while, for hard by there was another riuer that the water was excellent good to drinke, & that from thenceforth the way was ſo ſtonie and ill for horſemen, that the enemies could followe them no further. So he cauſed the retreate to be ſounded to call them backe that fought, and commaunded the tents to be ſet vppe, that the ſouldiers might yet haue ſhadowe to refreſh them with. So when the tents were ſet vp, and the Parthians alſo retyred according to their maner: the gentleman Mithridates before named, returned againe as before, and Alexander in like maner againe brought vnto him for Interpreter. Then Mithridates aduiſed him, that after the army had repoſed a litle, the Romains ſhould remoue forthwith, and with all poſſible ſpeede get to the riuer: becauſe the Parthians would goe no further, but yet were cruelly bent to follow them thither. Alexander caried the report therof vnto Antonius, who gaue him a great deale of gold plate to beſtow vpon Mithridates. Mithridates tooke as much of him as he could well cary away in his gowne, and ſo departed with ſpeede. So Antonius rayſed his campe being yet day light, and cauſed all his army to march, and the Parthians neuer troubled any of them by the way: but amongeſt them ſelues it was as ill and dreadfull a night as euer they had. For there were Villains of their owne company, who cut their fellowes throats for the money they had, and beſides that, robbed the ſumpters and cariage of ſuch money as they caried: and at length, they ſet vpon Antonius ſlaues that draue his owne ſumpters and cariage, they brake goodly tables and riche plate in peeces, and deuided it among them ſelues. Thereuppon all the campe was ſtraight in tumult and vprore: For the reſidue of them were afraid it had bene the Parthians that had giuen them this alarme, and had put all the army out of order. Inſomuch that Antonius called for one Rhamnus, one of his ſlaues infranchiſed that was of his gard, and made him giue him his faith that he would thruſt his ſword through him when he would bid him, and cut off his head: becauſe he might not be taken aliue of his enemies, nor knowen when he were dead. This grieued his friends to the hart, that they burſt out a weping for ſorrow. The Mardian alſo did comfort him, and aſſured him that the riuer he ſought for was hard by, and that he did geſſe it by a ſweete moyſt wind that breathed vpon them, and by the aire which they found freſher then they were wont, and alſo, for that they fetched their wind more at libertie: and moreouer, becauſe that ſince they did ſet forward he thought they were neare their iornies end, not lacking much of day. On the other ſide alſo, Antonius was enformed, that this great tumult and trouble came not through the enemies, but through the vile couetouſneſſe and villanie of certen of his ſouldiers. Therefore Antonius to ſet his armie againe in order, and to pacifie this vprore, ſounded the trumpet that euerie man ſhould lodge. Now day beagn to breake, and the army to fall againe into good order, and all the hurly burly to ceaſe, when the Parthians drew nere, and that their arrowes lighted among them of the rereward of his armie. Thereupon the ſignall of battell was giuen to the light armed men, and the legioners did couer themſelues as they had done before with their ſhields, with the which they receiued & defended the force of the Parthians arrowes, who neuer durſt any more come to handy ſtrokes with them: and thus they that were in the voward, went downe by litle and litle, till at length they ſpyed the riuer. There Antonius placed his armed men vpon the ſandes to receiue and driue backe the enemies, and firſt of all, got ouer his men that were ſicke and hurt, and afterwards all the reſt. And thoſe alſo that were left to reſiſt the enemies, had leyſure enough to drinke ſafely, and at their pleaſure. For when the Parthians ſaw the riuer, they vnbent their bowes, and bad the Romains paſſe ouer without any feare, and greatly commended their valiantneſſe. When they had all paſſed ouer the riuer at their eaſe, they tooke a litle breath, and ſo marched forward againe not greatly truſting the Parthians. The ſixth day after this laſt battell, they came to the riuer of Araxes, which deuideth the coũtry of Armenia from Media: the which appeared vnto them very daungerous to paſſe, for the depth and ſwiftnes of the ſtreame. And furthermore, there ranne a rumour through the campe, that the Parthians lay in ambuſh thereabouts, and that they would come & ſet vpon them whileſt they were troubled in paſſing ouer the riuer. But now, after they were all come ſafely ouer without any daunger, and that they had gotten to the other ſide, into the prouince of Armenia: then they worſhipped that land, as if it had bene the firſt land they had ſeene after a long and daungerous voyage by ſea, being now arriued in a ſafe and happie hauen: and the teares ranne downe their cheekes, and euery man imbraced each other for the great ioy they had. But now, keeping the fieldes in this frutefull countrie ſo plentifull of all things, after ſo great a famine and want of all things: they ſo crammed them ſelues with ſuch plenty of victuals, that many of them were caſt into flyxes and dropſies. There Antonius muſtring his whole armie, found that he had loſt twentie thouſand footemen, and foure thouſand horſemen, which had not all bene ſlaine by their enemies: for the moſt part of them died of ſickneſſe, making ſeuen and twentie dayes iorney, comming from the citie of Phraata into Armenia, and hauing ouercome the Parthians in eighteen ſeuerall battels. But theſe victories were not throughly performed nor accompliſhed, becauſe they followed no long chaſe: and thereby it eaſily appeared, that Artabazus king of Armenia, had reſerued Antonius to end this warre. For if the ſixteene thouſand horſemen which he brought with him out of Media, had bene at theſe battels, conſidering that they were armed and apparelled much after the Parthians manner, and acquainted alſo with their fight: When the Romains had put them to flight that fought a battel with them, & that theſe Armenians had followed the chaſe of them that fled, they had not gathered them ſelues againe in force, neither durſt they alſo haue returned to fight with them ſo often, after they had bene ſo many times ouerthrowen. Therefore, all thoſe that were of any credite and countenaunce in the army, did perſwade and egge Antonius to be reuenged of this Armenian king. But Antonius wiſely diſſembling his anger, he told him not of his trechery, nor gaue him the worſt countenaunce, nor did him leſſe honor then he did before: becauſe he knew his army was weake, and lacked things neceſſary. Howbeit afterwards he returned againe into Armenia with a great army, and ſo with faire wordes, and ſweete promiſes of Meſſengers, hee allured Artabazus to come vnto him: whom he then kept priſoner, and led in triumphe in the city of Alexandria. This greatly offended the Romaines, and made them much to miſlike it: when they ſaw that for Cleopatraes ſake he depriued his country of her due honor and glory, only to gratifie the Ægyptians. But this was a prety while after. Howbeit then, the great haſt he made to returne vnto Cleopatra, cauſed him to put his men to ſo great paines, forcing them to lie in the field all winter long when it ſnew vnreaſonably, that by the way he loſt eight thouſand of his men, and ſo came downe to the ſea ſide with a ſmall companie, vnto a certen place called Blancbovrg, which ſtandeth betwixt the cities of Berytvs and Sidon, and there taried for Cleopatra. And becauſe ſhe taried longer then he would haue had her, he pined away for loue and ſorrow. So that he was at ſuch a ſtraight, that he wiſt not what to doe, and therfore to weare it out, he gaue himſelfe to quaffing and feaſting. But he was ſo drowned with the loue of her, that he could not abide to ſit at the table till the feaſt were ended: but many times while others banquetted, he ranne to the ſea ſide to ſee if ſhe were comming. At length ſhe came and brought with her a world of apparell and money to giue vnto the ſouldiers. But ſome ſaye notwithſtanding, that ſhe brought apparell but no money, and that ſhe tooke of Antonius money, and cauſed it to be giuen amongſt the ſouldiers in her owne name, as if ſhe had giuen it them. In the meane time it chanced, that the king of the Medes, and Phraortes king of the Parthians, fell at great warres together, the which began (as it is reported) for the ſpoiles of the Romains: and grew to be ſo hot betwene them, that the king of Medes was no leſſe affraied, then alſo in danger to loſe his whole realme. Thereuppon he ſent vnto Antonius to pray him to come and make war with the Parthians, promiſing him that he would aide him to his vttermoſt power. This put Antonius againe in good comfort, conſidering that vnlooked for, the onely thing he lacked, (which made him he could not ouercome the Parthians, meaning that he had not brought horſemen, and men with darts and ſlings enough) was offred him in that ſort: that he did him more pleaſure to accept it, than it was pleaſure to the other to offer it. Hereuppon, after he had ſpoken with the king of Medes at the riuer of Araxes, he prepared him ſelfe once more to goe through Armenia, and to make more cruell war with the Parthians, then he had done before. Now whileſt Antonius was buſie in this preparation, Octauia his wife, whom he had left at Rome, would needes take ſea to come vnto him. Her brother Octauius Cæſar was willing vnto it, not for his reſpect at all (as moſt authors doe report) as for that he might haue an honeſt colour to make warre with Antonius if he did miſuſe her, and not eſteeme of her as ſhe ought to be. But when ſhe was come to Athens, ſhe receiued letters from Antonius, willing her to ſtay there vntill his comming, & did aduertiſe her of his iorney and determination. The which though it grieued her much, and that ſhe knew it was but an excuſe: yet by her letters to him of aunſwere, ſhe asked him whether he would haue thoſe things ſent vnto him which ſhe had brought him, being great ſtore of apparell for ſouldiers, a great number of horſe, ſumme of money and gifts, to beſtow on his friends and Captaines he had about him: and beſides all thoſe, ſhe had two thouſande ſouldiers choſen men, all well armed like vnto the Prætors bands. When Niger, one of Antonius friendes whom he had ſent vnto Athens, had brought theſe newes from his wife Octauia, and withall did greatly praiſe her, as ſhe was worthy, and well deſerued: Cleopatra knowing that Octauia would haue Antonius from her, and fearing alſo that if with her vertue and honeſt behauior, (beſides the great power of her brother Cæſar) ſhe did adde thereunto her modeſt kind loue to pleaſe her husband, that ſhe would then be too ſtrong for her, and in the end winne him away: ſhe ſubtilly ſeemed to languiſh for the loue of Antonius, pining her body for lacke of meate. Furthermore, ſhe euery way ſo framed her countenaunce, that when Antonius came to ſee her, ſhe caſt her eyes vpon him, like a woman rauiſhed for ioy. Straight againe when he went from her, ſhe fell a weeping and blubbering, looked rufully of the matter, and ſtill found the meanes that Antonius ſhould oftentimes finde her weeping: and then when he came ſodainely vppon her, ſhe made as though ſhee dried her eyes, and turned her face away, as if ſhe were vnwilling that he ſhould ſee her weepe. All theſe trickes ſhe vſed, Antonius being in readines to go into Syria, to ſpeake with the king of Medes. Then the flatterers that furthered Cleopatraes mind, blamed Antonius, and told him that he was a hard natured man, and that he had ſmall loue in him, that would ſee a poore Lady in ſuch torment for his ſake, whoſe life depended only vpon him alone. For, Octauia, ſayd they, that was maried vnto him as it were of neceſſity, becauſe her brother Cæſars affaires ſo required it: hath the honor to be called Antonius lawfull ſpouſe and wife: and Cleopatra, being borne a Queene of ſo many thouſands of men, is onely named Antonius Leman, and yet that ſhee diſdained not ſo to be called, if it might pleaſe him ſhe might enioy his companie, and liue with him: but if he once leaue her, that then it is vnpoſſible ſhe ſhould liue. To be ſhort, by theſe their flatteries and inticements, they ſo wrought Antonius effeminate mind, that fearing leaſt ſhe would make her ſelfe away: he returned againe vnto ALEXANDRIA, & referred the king of MEDES to the next yeare following, although he receiued newes that the PARTHIANS at that time were at ciuill warres among themſelues. This notwithſtanding, he went afterwardes and made peace with him. For he maried his Daughter which was verie young, vnto one of the ſonnes that Cleopatra had by him: and then returned being fully bent to make warre with Cæſar. When Octauia was returned to ROME from ATHENS, Cæſar commanded her to goe out of Antonius houſe, and to dwell by herſelfe, becauſe he had abuſed her. Octauia anſwered him againe, that ſhe would not forſake her husbands houſe, and that if he had no other occaſion to make warre with him, ſhe prayed him then to take no thought for her: for ſayed ſhe, it were too ſhamefull a thing, that two ſo famous Captaines ſhould bring in ciuill warres among the ROMAINS, the one for the loue of a woman, and the other for the iealouſie betwixt one another. Now as ſhe ſpake the word, ſo did ſhe alſo performe the deede. For ſhe kept ſtill in Antonius houſe, as if he had bene there, and very honeſtly, and honorably kept his children, not thoſe onely ſhe had by him, but the other which her husband had by Fuluia. Furthermore, when Antonius ſent any of his men to ROME, to ſue for any office in the common wealth: ſhe receiued him very curteouſly, and ſo vſed her ſelfe vnto her brother, that ſhe obtained the thing ſhe requeſted. Howbeit thereby, thinking no hurt, ſhe did Antonius great hurt. For her honeſt loue and regard to her husband, made euery man hate him, when they ſawe he did ſo vnkindly vſe ſo noble a Ladie: but yet the greateſt cauſe of their malice vnto him, was for the diuiſion of lands he made amongſt his children in the citie of ALEXANDRIA. And to confeſſe a troth, it was too arrogant and inſolent a part, and done (as a man would ſay) in deriſion and contempt of the ROMAINS. For he aſſembled all the people in the ſhew place, where young men doe exerciſe themſelues, and there vppon a high tribunall ſiluered, he ſet two chaires of gold, the one for himſelfe, and the other for Cleopatra, and lower chaires for his children: then he openly publiſhed before the aſſembly, that firſt of all he did eſtabliſh Cleopatra Queene of ÆGYPT, of CYPRVS, of LYDIA, and of the lower SYRIA, and at that time alſo, Cæſarion king of the ſame realmes. This Cæſarion was ſuppoſed to be the ſonne of Iulius Cæſar, who had left Cleopatra great with child. Secondly he called the ſonnes he had by her, the kings of kings, & gaue Alexander for his portion, ARMENIA, MEDIA, and PARTHIA, when he had conquered the countrie: and vnto Ptolemy for his portion, PHENICIA, SYRIA, and CILICIA. And therwithall he brought out Alexander in a long gowne after the faſhion of the MEDES with a high copped tanke hat on his head, narrow in the toppe, as the kings of the MEDES and ARMENIANS doe vſe to weare them: and Ptolomy apparelled in a cloke after the MACEDONIAN maner, with ſlippers on his feete, and a broad hat, with a royal band or diademe. Such was the apparell and old attire of the auncient kings and ſucceſſours of Alexander the great. So after his ſonnes had done their humble duties, and kiſſed their father and mother: preſently a company of ARMENIAN ſouldiers ſet there of purpoſe, compaſſed the one about, and a like company of the MACEDONIANS the other. Now for Cleopatra, ſhe did not only weare at that time, (but at all other times els when ſhe came abroad) the apparell of the goddeſſe Iſis, and ſo gaue audience vnto all her ſubiects, as a new Iſis. Octauius Cæſar reporting all theſe things vnto the Senate, and oftentimes accuſing him to the whole people and aſſembly in ROME: he thereby ſtirred vp all the ROMAINS againſt him. Antonius on the other ſide ſent to ROME likewiſe to accuſe him, and the chiefeſt pointes of his accuſations he charged him with, were theſe. Firſt, that hauing ſpoiled Sextus Pompeius in SICILE, he did not giue him his part of the Ile. Secondly, that he did detayne in his hands the ſhippes he lent him to make that warre. Thirdly, that hauing put Lepidus their companion and triumuirate out of his part of the Empire, and hauing depriued him of all honors: he retayned for him ſelfe the lands and reuenues thereof, which had bene aſſigned vnto him for his part. And laſt of all, that he had in manner deuided all ITALY amongeſt his owne ſouldiers, and had left no part of it for his ſouldiers. Octauius Cæſar aunſwered him againe: that for Lepidus, he had in deede depoſed him, and taken his part of the Empire from him, becauſe he did ouercruelly vſe his authoritie. And ſecondly, for the conqueſts he had made by force of armes, he was contented Antonius ſhould haue his part of them, ſo that he would likewiſe let him haue his part of ARMENIA. And thirdly, that for his ſouldiers, they ſhould ſeeke for nothing in ITALY, becauſe they poſſeſſed MEDIA and PARTHIA, the which prouinces they had added to the Empire of ROME, valiantly fighting with their Emperor and Captaine. Antonius hearing theſe newes, being yet in ARMENIA, commaunded Canidius to goe preſently to the ſea ſide with his ſixteene legions he had: and he himſelfe with Cleopatra, went vnto the citie of EPHESVS, and there gathered together his gallies and ſhippes out of all partes, which came to the number of eight hundreth, reckoning the great ſhippes of burden: and of thoſe Cleopatra furniſhed him with two hundreth, and twenty thouſand talents beſides, & prouiſion of victuals alſo to mainteine all the whole armie in this warre. So Antonius, through the perſwaſions of Domitius, commaunded Cleopatra, to returne againe into EGYPT, and there to vnderſtand the ſucceſſe of this warre. But Cleopatra, fearing leaſt Antonius ſhould againe be made friends with Octauius Cæſar, by the meanes of his wife Octauia: ſhe ſo plyed Canidius with money, and filled his purſe, that he became her ſpokeſman vnto Antonius, and told him there was no reaſon to ſend her from this war, who defraied ſo great a charge: neither that it was for his profit, becauſe that thereby the ÆGYPTIANS would then be vtterly diſcoraged, which were the chiefeſt ſtrength of the armie by ſea: conſidering that he could ſee no king of all the kings their confederates, that Cleopatra was inferior vnto, either for wiſedom or iudgement, ſeeing that long before ſhe had wiſely gouerned ſo great a realme as ÆGYPT, & beſides that ſhe had bene ſo long acquainted with him, by whom ſhe had learned to manedge great affaires. Theſe faire perſwaſions wanne him: for it was predeſtined that the gouernment of all the world ſhould fall into Octauius Cæſars handes. Thus, all their forces being ioyned together, they hoiſed ſaile towards the Ile of SAMOS, and there gaue themſelues to feaſtes and ſolace. For as all the kings, princes, and communalties, peoples and cities from SYRIA, vnto the mariſhes Mæotides, and from the ARMENIANS to the ILLYRIANS, were ſent vnto, to ſend and bring all munition and warlike preparation they could: euen ſo all plaiers, minſtrels, tumblers, fooles, and ieaſters, were commaunded to aſſemble in the Ile of SAMOS. So that, where in manner all the world in euery place was full of lamentations, ſighes and teares: onely in this Ile of SAMOS there was nothing for many daies ſpace, but ſinging and pyping, and all the Theater full of theſe common players, minſtrels, and ſinging men. Beſides all this, euery citie ſent an oxe thither to ſacrifice, and kings did ſtriue one with an other who ſhould make the nobleſt feaſts, & giue the richeſt gifts. So that euery man ſaid, what can they doe more for ioy of victorie, if they winne the battell? When they make alreadie ſuch ſumptuous feaſts at the beginning of the warre? When this was done, he gaue the whole rabble of theſe minſtrels, & ſuch kind of people, the citie of PRIENE to keepe them withall, during this warre. Then he went vnto the citie of ATHENS, and there gaue himſelfe againe to ſee playes and paſtimes, and to keepe the Theaters. Cleopatra on the other ſide, being iealous of the honors which Octauia had receiued in this city, where in deed ſhe was maruelouſly honored and beloued of the ATHENIANS: to winne the peoples good will alſo at ATHENS, ſhe gaue them great gifts: and they likewiſe gaue her many great honors, and appointed certain Ambaſſadors to cary the decree to her houſe, among the which Antonius was one, who as a Citizen of ATHENS reported the matter vnto her, & made an oration in the behalfe of the city. Afterwards he ſent to ROME to put his wife Octauia out of his houſe, who (as it is reported) went out of his houſe with al Antonius children, ſauing the eldeſt of them he had by Fuluia, who was with his father, bewailing and lamenting her curſed hap that had brought her to this, that ſhe was accompted one of the chiefeſt cauſes of this ciuill warre. The ROMAINES did pity her, but much more Antonius, & thoſe ſpecially that had ſeene Cleopatra: who neither excelled Octauia in beautie, nor yet in young yeares. Octauius Cæſar vnderſtanding the ſodaine & wonderfull great preparation of Antonius, he was not a litle aſtonied at it, (fearing he ſhould be driuen to fight that ſommer) becauſe he wanted many things, & the great and grieuous exactions of money did ſorely oppreſſe the people. For all manner of men elſe, were driuen to pay the fourth part of their goods and reuenue: but the Libertines, (to witte, thoſe whoſe fathers or other predeceſſors had ſometime bene bond men) they were ceſſed to paye the eight part of all their goods at one payment. Hereuppon, there roſe a wonderfull exclamation and great vprore all ITALY ouer: ſo that among the greateſt faults that euer Antonius committed, they blamed him moſt, for that he delayed to giue Cæſar battell. For he gaue Cæſar leyſure to make his preparations, and alſo to appeaſe the complaints of the people. When ſuch a great ſumme of money was demanded of them, they grudged at it, and grewe to mutinie vpon it: but when they had once payed it, they remembred it no more. Furthermore, Titius and Plancus (two of Antonius chiefeſt friendes and that had bene both of them Conſuls) for the great iniuries Cleopatra did them, becauſe they hindred all they could, that ſhe ſhould not come to this warre: they went and yeelded themſelues vnto Cæſar, and tolde him where the teſtament was that Antonius had made, knowing perfitly what was in it. The will was in the cuſtody of the Veſtall Nunnes: of whom Cæſar demanded for it. They anſwered him, that they would not giue it him: but if he would goe and take it, they would not hinder him. Thereupon Cæſar went thither, & hauing read it firſt to himſelfe, he noted certen places worthy of reproch: ſo aſſembling all the Senate, he read it before them all. Whereupon diuers were maruellouſly offended, and thought it a ſtrange matter that he being aliue, ſhould be puniſhed for that he had appointed by his will to be done after his death. Cæſar chiefly tooke hold of this that he ordained touching his buriall: for he willed that his bodie, though he died at ROME, ſhould be brought in funerall pompe through the middeſt of the market place, and that it ſhould be ſent into ALEXANDRIA vnto Cleopatra. Furthermore, among diuers other faults wherewith Antonius was to be charged, for Cleopatraes ſake: Caluiſius, one of Cæſars friends reproued him becauſe he had franckly giuen Cleopatra all the libraries of the royall citie of PERGAMVM, in the which ſhe had aboue two hundred thouſand ſeuerall bookes. Againe alſo, that being on a time ſet at the table, he ſodainely roſe from the bord and trode vpon Cleopatraes foote, which was a ſigne giuen betwene them, that they were agreed of. That he had alſo ſuffred the EPHESIANS in his preſence to call Cleopatra, their ſoueraigne Ladie. That diuers times ſitting in his tribunall and chaire of ſtate, giuing audience to all kings and Princes: he had receiued loue letters from Cleopatra, written in tables of onyx or chriſtall, and that he had read them, ſitting in his imperiall ſeate. That one day when Furnius, a man of great account, and the eloquenteſt man of all the ROMAIN's, pleaded a matter before him: Cleopatra by chance cōming through the market place in her litter where Furnius was a pleading: Antonius ſtraight roſe out of his ſeate, and left his audience to follow her litter. This notwithſtanding, it was thought Caluiſius deuiſed the moſt part of all theſe accuſations of his owne head. Neuertheleſſe they that loued Antonius, were interceſſors to the people for him, and amongſt them they ſent one Geminius vnto Antonius, to pray him he would take heede, that through his negligence his Empire were not taken from him, and that he ſhould be counted an enemie to the people of ROME. This Geminius being arriued in GREECE, made Cleopatra iealous ſtraight of his comming: becauſe ſhe ſurmiſed that he came not but to ſpeake for Octauia. Therfore ſhe ſpared not to taunt him al ſupper time, and moreouer to ſpite him the more, ſhe made him to be ſet loweſt of all at the boorde, the which he tooke patiently, expecting occaſion to ſpeake with Antonius. Now Antonius commanding him at the table to tell him what wind brought him thither: he anſwered him, that it was no table talke, and that he would tell him to morrow morning faſting: but drunke or faſting, howſoeuer it were, he was ſure of one thing, that all would not go well on his ſide, vnles Cleopatra were ſent backe into ÆGYPT. Antonius tooke theſe words in very ill part. Cleopatra on the other ſide anſwered him, thou doeſt well Geminius, ſayed ſhe, to tell the truth before thou be compelled by torments: but within few dayes after, Geminius ſtale away, and fled to ROME. The flatterers alſo to pleaſe Cleopatra, did make her driue many other of Antonius faithfull ſeruants and friends from him, who could not abide the iniuries done vnto them: among the which theſe two were chiefe, Marcus Syllanus, and Dellius the Hiſtoriographer: who wrote that he fled, becauſe her Phiſitian Glaucus told him, that Cleopatra had ſet ſome ſecretly to kill him. Furthermore he had Cleopatraes diſpleaſure, becauſe he ſayed one night at ſupper, that they made them drinke ſower wine, where Sarmentus at ROME dranke good wine of FALERNA. This Sarmentus was a pleaſaunt young boy, ſuch

as the Lordes of ROME are wont to haue about them to make them paſtime, which they call their ioyes, and he was Octauius Cæſars boye. Now after that Cæſar had made ſufficient preparation, he proclaimed open warre againſt Cleopatra, and made the people to aboliſh the power and Empire of Antonius, becauſe he had before giuen it vp vnto a woman. And Cæſar ſayed furthermore, that Antonius was not Maiſter of himſelfe, but that Cleopatra had brought him beſide himſelfe, by her charmes and amarous poyſons: and that they that ſhoulde make warre with them, ſhould be Mardian the Eunuch, Photinus, and Iras, a woman of Cleopatraes bedchamber, that frizeled her haire, and dreſſed her head, and Charmion, the which were thoſe that ruled all the affaires of Antonius Empire. Before this warre as it is reported, many ſignes and wonders fell out. Firſt of all, the citie of PISAVRVM which was made a colonie to ROME, and repleniſhed with people by Antonius, ſtanding vpon the ſhore ſide, of the ſea Adriaticke, was by a terrible earthquake ſuncke into the ground. One of the images of ſtone which was ſet vp in the honor of Antonius, in the citie of ALBA, did ſweate many daies together: and though ſome wyped it away, yet it lefte not ſweating ſtill. In the citie of PATRAS whileſt Antonius was there, the temple of Hercules was burnt with lightning And at the citie of ATHENS alſo, in a place where the warre of the gyants againſt the goddes is ſet out in imagerie: the ſtatue of Bacchus with a terrible wind was throwen downe in the Theater. It was ſaid that Antonius came of the race of Hercules, as you haue heard before, and in the manner of his life he followed Bacchus: and therfore he was called the new Bacchus. Furthermore, the ſame bluſtering ſtorm of wind, ouerthrew the great monſtrous images at ATHENS, that were made in the honor of Eumenes and Attalus, the which men had named and intituled, the Antonians, and yet they did hurt none of the other images which were many beſides. The Admiral galley of Cleopatra, was called Antoniade, in the which there chanced a maruellous ill ſigne. Swallowes had bred vnder the poop of her ſhip, and there came others after them that draue away the firſt, and plucked down their neaſts. Now when all things were readie, & that they drew neare to fight: it was found that Antonius had no leſſe then fiue hundreth good ſhips of war, among which there were many gallies that had eight & ten bancks of owers, the which were ſumptuouſly furniſhed, not ſo meete for fight, as for triumph: a hundred thouſand footmen, and twelue thouſand horſemen, and had with him to aide him theſe kings and ſubiectes following. Bocchus king of LIBYA, Tarcōdemus king of high SILICIA, Archelaus king of CAPPADOCIA, Philadelphus king of PAPHLAGONIA, Mithridates king of COMAGENA, and Adallas king of THRACIA. All which were there euery man in perſon. The reſidue that were abſent ſent their armies, as Polemon king of PONT, Manchus king of ARABIA, Herodes king of IVRY: and furthermore, Amyntas king of LYCAONIA, & of the GALATIANS: and beſides all theſe, he had all the aide the king of MEDES ſent vnto him. Now for Cæſar, he had two hundreth and fiftie ſhips of warre, foureſcore thouſand footmen, and well neare as many horſmen as his enemie Antonius. Antonius for his part, had all vnder his dominion from ARMENIA, & the riuer of Euphrates, vnto the ſea IONIVM & ILLYRICVM. Octauius Cæſar had alſo for his part, all that which was in our HEMISPHERE, or halfe part of the world, from ILLYRIA, vnto the Ocean ſea vpon the weſt: then all from the Ocean, vnto mare Siculum: & from AFRICK, all that which is againſt ITALY, as GAVLE, & SPAIN. Furthermore, all from the prouince of CYRENIA, to ÆTHIOPIA, was ſubiect vnto Antonius. Now Antonius was made ſo ſubiect to a womans will, that though he was a great deale the ſtronger by land, yet for Cleopatraes ſake he would needes haue this battell tryed by ſea: though he ſawe before his eyes, that for lacke of water-menne, his Captaines did preſt by force all ſortes of men out of GRECE that they could take vp in the field, as trauellers, muletters, reapers, harueſt men, and young boyes, and yet could they not ſufficiently furniſh his gallies: ſo that the moſt parte of them were emptie, and could ſcant row, becauſe they lacked water-men enowe. But on the contrarie ſide Cæſars ſhippes were not built for pompe, high and great, onely for a ſight and brauery, but they were light of yarage: armed and furniſhed with water-men as many as they needed, and had them al in readines, in the hauens of TARENTVM, & BRVNDVSIVM. So Octauius Cæſar ſent vnto Antonius, to will him to delay no more time, but to come on with his army into ITALY: and that for his owne part he would giue him ſafe harbor, to land without any trouble, and that he would withdraw his armie from the ſea, as farre as one horſe could runne, vntil he had put his army a ſhore, & had lodged his men. Antonius on the other ſide brauely ſent him word againe, and chalenged the combat of him man to man, though he were the elder: and that if he refuſed him ſo, he would then fight a battell with him in the fields of PHARSALIA, as Iulius Cæſar, & Pompey had done before. Now whilſt Antonius rode at anker, lying idlely in harbor at the head of ACTIVM, in the place where the citie of NICOPOLIS ſtandeth at this preſent: Cæſar had quickly paſſed the ſea Ionium, and taken a place called TORYNE, before Antonius vnderſtoode that he had taken ſhip. Then beganne his men to be affraid, becauſe his armie by land was left behind. But Cleopatra making light of it: and what danger, I pray you, ſaid ſhe, if Cæſar keepe at* TORYNE? The next morning by breake of day, his enemies comming with full force of owers in battell againſt him, Antonius was afraid that if they came to ioyne, they would take and carie away his ſhippes that had no men of warre in them. So he armed all his watermen, and ſet them in order of battell vpon the forecaſtle of their ſhippes, and then liſte vp all his rancks of owers towards the element, as wel on the one ſide as on the other, with the prooes againſt the enemies, at the entrie and mouth of the gulfe, which beginneth at the point of ACTIVM, and ſo kept them in order of battell, as if they had bene armed and furniſhed with water-men and ſouldiers. Thus Octauius Cæſar being finely deceiued by this ſtratageme, retyred preſently, and therewithall Antonius very wiſely and ſodainly did cut him off from freſh water. For vnderſtanding that the places where Octauius Cæſar landed, had very litle ſtore of water, and yet very bad: he ſhutte them in with ſtrong ditches and trenches he caſt, to keepe them from ſalying out at their pleaſure, and ſo to goe ſeeke water farther off. Furthermore, he delt very friendly and courteouſly with Domitius, and againſt Cleopatraes minde. For, he being ſicke of an agew when he went and tooke a litle boate to go vnto Cæſars campe, Antonius was very ſorie for it, but yet he ſent after him all his cariage, traine, and men: and the ſame Domitius, as though he gaue him to vnderſtand that he repented his open treaſon, he died immediatly after. There were certen kings alſo that forſooke him, and turned on Cæſars ſide: as Amyntas and Deiotarus. Furthermore his fleete and nauy that was vnfortunate in all things, and vnreadie for ſeruice, compelled him to change his minde, and to hazard battell by land. And Canidius alſo, who had charge of his armie by land, when time came to follow Antonius determination: he turned him cleane contrarie, and counſelled him to ſend Cleopatra backe againe, and himſelfe to retire into MACEDON, to fight there on the maine land. And furthermore told him, that Dicomes king of the GETES, promiſed him to aid him with a great power: and that it ſhould be no ſhame nor diſhonor to him to let Cæſar haue the ſea, (becauſe himſelfe and his men both had bene well practiſed and exerciſed in battels by ſea, in the warre of SICILIA againſt Sextus Pompeius) but rather that he ſhould doe againſt all reaſon, he hauing ſo great skill and experience of battelles by land as he had, if he ſhould not imploy the force and valiantnes of ſo many luſty armed footemen as he had readie, but would weaken his armie by deuiding them into ſhippes. But now notwithſtanding all theſe good perſwaſions, Cleopatra forced him to put all to the hazard of battell by ſea: conſidering with her ſelfe how ſhe might flie and prouide for her ſafetie, not to helpe him to win the victorie, but to flie more eaſily after the battell loſt. Betwixt Antonius campe and his fleet of ſhips, there was a great high point of firme lande that rannea good waye into the ſea, the which Antonius vſed often for a walke, without miſtruſt of feare or danger. One of Cæſars men perceiued it, and told his maiſter that he would laugh if they could take vp Antonius in the middeſt of his walke. Thereupon Cæſar ſent ſome of his men to lye in ambuſh for him, and they miſſed not much of taking of him: for they tooke him that came before him, becauſe they diſcouered too ſoon, & ſo Antonius ſcaped verie hardly. So when Antonius had determined to fight by ſea, he ſet all the other ſhippes on fire, but threeſcore ſhips of EGYPT, and reſerued onely but the beſt and greateſt gallies, from three bancks, vnto tenne bancks of owers. Into them he put two & twenty thouſand fighting men, with two thouſand darters & ſlingers. Now as he was ſetting his men in order of battel, there was a Captaine, and a valiant man, that had ſerued Antonius in many battels & conflicts, & had all his body hacked and cut: who as Antonius paſſed by him, cryed out vnto him & ſaid: O noble Emperor, how commeth it to paſſe that you truſt to theſe vile brittle ſhippes? what, doe

doe you miſtruſt theſe wounds of mine and this ſword? let the Egyptians and Phenicians fight by ſea, and ſet vs on the maine land, where we vſe to conquer, or to be ſlaine on our feete. Antonius paſſed by him and ſaid neuer a word, but onely beckned to him with his hand & head, as though he willed him to be of good courage, although indeed he had no great courage himſelfe. For when the maiſters of the gallies and pilots would haue let their ſailes alone, he made them clap them on, ſaying to colour the matter withall, that not one of his enemies ſhould ſcape. All that day and the three dayes following, the ſea roſe ſo high & was ſo boiſterous, that the battell was put off. The fift day the ſtorme ceaſed, and the ſea calmed againe and then they rowed with force of owers in battell one againſt the other: Antonius leading the right wing with Publicola, & Cælius the left, & Marcus Octauius, & Marcus Iuſteius the midſt. Octauius Cæſar on the other ſide, had placed Agrippa in the left wing of his army, and had kept the right wing for himſelfe. For the armies by land, Canidius was generall of Antonius ſide, & Taurus of Cæſars ſide: who kept their men in battell raye the one before the other, vppon the ſea ſide, without ſtirring one againſt the other. Further, touching both the Chieftaines: Antonius being in a ſwift pinnaſe, was caried vp and downe by force of owers through his army, and ſpake to his people to encourage them to fight valiantly, as if they were on maine land, becauſe of the ſteadines and heauines of their ſhips: and commaunded the pilots and maſters of the gallies, that they ſhould not ſturre, none otherwiſe then if they were at anker, and ſo to receiue the firſt charge of their enemies, and that they ſhould not goe out of the ſtraight of the gulfe. Cæſar betimes in the morning going out of his tent, to ſee his ſhippes through out: met a man by chance that draue an aſſe before him. Cæſar asked the man what his name was. The poore man told him that his name was Eutychus, to ſaye fortunate: and his aſſes name Nicon, to ſay Conqueror. Therfore Cæſar after he had wonne the battell, ſetting out the market place with the ſpurres of the gallies he had taken, for a ſigne of his victorie: he cauſed alſo the man and his aſſe to be ſet vp in braſſe. When he had viſited the order of his army through out, he tooke a litle pinnaſe, and went to the right wing, and wondred when he ſawe his enemies lye ſtill in the ſtraight, & ſturred not. For decerning them a farre off, men would haue thought they had bene ſhippes riding at anker, and a good while he was ſo perſwaded. So he kept his gallies eight furlong from his enemies: about noon there roſe a litle gale of wind from the ſea, and then Antonius men waxing angrie with tarying ſo long, and truſting to the greatnes and height of their ſhips, as if they had bene inuincible: they beganne to march forward with their left wing. Cæſar ſeeing that, was a glad man and began a litle to giue backe from the right wing, to alure them to come farther out of the ſtraight & gulfe, to the end that he might with his light ſhippes well manned with water-men, turne and enuirone the gallies of the enemies, the which were heauie of yarage, both for their bignes, as alſo for lacke of watermen to row them. When the skirmiſh began, and that they came to ioine, there was no great hurt at the firſt meeting, neither did the ſhips vehemently hit one againſt the other, as they do commonly in fight by ſea. For on the one ſide, Antonius ſhips for their heauines, could not haue the ſtrength and ſwiftnes to make their blowes of any force: and Cæſars ſhippes on the other ſide tooke great heede, not to ruſh and ſhocke with the forecaſtelles of Antonius ſhips, whoſe prooes were armed with great braſen ſpurres. Furthermore they durſt not flancke them, becauſe their pointes were eaſily broken, which way ſo euer they came to ſet vpon his ſhippes, that were made of great maine ſquare pieces of timber, bounde together with great ironne pinnes: ſo that the battell was much like to a battell by land, or to ſpeake more properly to the aſſault of a citie. For there were alwaies three or foure of Cæſars ſhippes about one of Antonius ſhippes, and the ſouldiers fought with their pikes, halberds and darts, and threwe pottes and darts with fire. Antonius ſhips on the other ſide beſtowed among them, with their crosbowes and engines of batterie, great ſtore of ſhot from their high towers of wood, that were vpon their ſhips. Now Publicola ſeing Agrippa put forth his left wing of Cæſars armie, to compaſſe in Antonius ſhippes that fought: he was driuen alſo to looſe off to haue more roome, & going a litle at one ſide, to put thoſe farther off that were affraid, and in the middeſt of the battell. For they were ſore diſtreſſed by Aruntius. Howbeit the battell was yet of euen hand, and the victorie doubtfull, being indifferent to both: when ſodainely they ſawe the threeſcore ſhippes of

Cleopatra buſie about their yard maſts, and hoyſing ſaile to flie. So they fled through the middeſt of them that were in fight, for they had bene placed behind the great ſhippes, & did maruellouſly diſorder the other ſhippes. For the enemies them ſelues wondred much to ſee them ſaile in that ſort, with ful ſaile towards PELOPONNESVS. There Antonius ſhewed plainly, that he had not onely loſt the courage and hart of an Emperor, but alſo of a valiant man, & that he was not his owne man: (prouing that true which an old man ſpake in myrth, that the ſoule of a louer liued in another body, and not in his owne) he was ſo caried away with the vaine loue of this woman, as if he had bene glued vnto her, & that ſhe could not haue remoued without mouing of him alſo. For when he ſaw Cleopatraes ſhippe vnder ſaile, he forgot, forſook, & betrayed them that fought for him, & imbarked vpon a galley with fiue bankes of owers, to follow her that was already begun to ouerthrow him, & would in the end be his vtter deſtruction. When ſhe knew his galley a farre off, ſhe lift vp a ſigne in the poope of her ſhippe, and ſo Antonius cōming to it, was pluckt vp where Cleopatra was, howbeit he ſaw her not at his firſt comming, nor ſhe him, but went and ſate downe alone in the prow of his ſhippe, and ſaied neuer a word, clapping his head betweene both his hands. In the meane time came certaine light brigantynes of Cæſars that followed him hard. So Antonius ſtraight turned the prow of his ſhip, and preſently put the reſt to flight, ſauing one Eurycles LACEDÆMONIAN, that followed him neare, and preſſed vpon him with great courage, ſhaking a dart in his hand ouer the prow as though he would haue throwen it vnto Antonius. Antonius ſeing him, came to the fore caſtell of his ſhip and asked him what he was that durſt follow Antonius ſo neare? I am anſwered he, Eurycles the ſon of Lachares, who through Cæſars good fortune ſeeketh to reuenge the death of my father. This Lachares was condemned of fellonie, and beheaded by Antonius. But yet Eurycles durſt not venture vpon Antonius ſhip, but ſet vpon the other Admirall galley (for there were two) and fell with him with ſuch a blowe of his braſen ſpurre, that was ſo heauie and bigge, that he turned her round, and tooke her, with another that was loden with verie rich ſtuffe and cariage. After Eurycles had left Antonius, he returned againe to his place, and ſate downe, ſpeaking neuer a word as he did before: and ſo liued three dayes alone, without ſpeaking to any man. But when he arriued at the head of Tænarus, there Cleopatraes women firſt brought Antonius and Cleopatra to ſpeake together, and afterwards, to ſuppe and lye together. Then beganne there againe a great number of Marchaunts ſhippes to gather about them, and ſome of their friends that had eſcaped from this ouerthrow: who brought newes, that his army by ſea was ouerthrown, but that they thought the army by land was yet whole. Then Antonius ſent vnto Canidius, to return with his army into ASIA, by MACEDON. Now for himſelf, he determined to croſſe ouer into AFRICK, & took one of his carects or hulks loden with gold & ſiluer, and other rich cariage, & gaue it vnto his friends: commanding them to depart, and to ſeeke to ſaue themſelues. They anſwered him weeping, that they would neither doe it, nor yet forſake him. Then Antonius verie courteouſly and louingly did comfort them, and prayed them to depart: and wrote vnto Theophilus gouernor of CORINTHE, that he would ſee them ſafe, and helpe to hide them in ſome ſecret place, vntill they had made their way & peace with Cæſar. This Theophilus was the father of Hypparchus, who was had in great eſtimation about Antonius. He was the firſt of all his infranchiſed bondmen that reuolted from him, and yeelded vnto Cæſar, and afterwards went and dwelt at CORINTH. And thus it ſtood with Antonius. Now for his armie by ſea, that fought before the head or foreland of ACTIVM: they helde out a long time, and nothing troubled them more then a great boyſterous winde that roſe full in the prooes of their ſhippes and yet with much a doe, his nauie was at length ouerthrowen, fiue houres within night. There were not ſlaine aboue fiue thouſand men: but yet there were three hundreth ſhippes taken as Octauius Cæſar writeth himſelfe in his commentaries. Many plainely ſawe Antonius flie, and yet could very hardly beleeue it, that he that had nineteene legions whole by land and twelue thouſand horſemen vpon the ſea ſide, would ſo haue forſaken them, and haue fled ſo cowardly: as if he had not oftentimes proued both the one and the other fortune, and that he had not bene throughly acquainted with the diuerſe changes and fortunes of battelles. And yet his ſouldiers ſtill wiſhed for him, and euer hoped that he would come by ſome meanes or other vnto them. Furthermore, they

they ſhewed themſelues ſo valiant and faithfull vnto him, that after they certainely knewe he was fled, they kept themſelues whole together ſeuen dayes. In the ende Canidius, Antonius Lieutenant, flying by night, and forſaking his campe: when they ſaw themſelues thus deſtitute of their heads and leaders, they yeelded themſelues vnto the ſtronger. This done, Cæſar ſayled towards ATHENS, and there made peace with the GRECIANS, and deuided the reſt of the corne that was taken vp for Antonius army, vnto the townes and cities of GRECE, the which had bene brought to extreame miſery & pouerty, cleane without money, ſlaues, horſe, & other beaſtes of cariage. So that my grandfather Nicarchus told, that all the Citizens of our citie of CHÆRONEA, (not one excepted) were driuen themſelues to carrie a certen meaſure of corne on their ſhoulders to the ſea ſide, that lyeth directly ouer againſt the Ile of ANTICYRA, and yet were they driuen thither with whips. They caried it thus but once: for the ſecond time that they were charged againe to make the like cariage, all the corne being ready to be caried, newes came that Antonius had loſt the battel, & ſo ſcaped our poore city. For Antonius ſouldiers & deputies fled immediatly, & the citizens deuided the corne amongſt them. Antonius being arriued in LIBYA, he ſent Cleopatra before into EGYPT from the citie of PARÆTONIVM: & he himſelf remained very ſolitary, hauing only two of his frends with him, with whom he wandred vp and downe, both of them Orators, the one Ariſtocrates a GRECIAN, & the other Lucilius a ROMAIN: of whõ we haue written in another place, that at the battell where Brutus was ouerthrowen, by the citie of PHILIPPES, he came and willingly put himſelfe into the hands of thoſe that followed Brutus, ſaying that it was he: becauſe Brutus in the meane time might haue liberty to ſaue himſelfe. And afterwards becauſe Antonius ſaued his life, he ſtill remained with him: and was very faithfull and friendly vnto him till his death. But when Antonius heard, that he whom he had truſted with the gouernment of LIBYA, and vnto whom he had giuen the charge of his army there, had yeelded vnto Cæſar: he was ſo mad withall, that he would haue ſlaine himſelfe for anger, had not his friends about him withſtood him, & kept him from it. So he went vnto ALEXANDRIA, and there found Cleopatra about a wonderfull enterpriſe, and of great attempt. Betwixt the red ſea, and the ſea betwene the lands that poynt vpon the coaſt of EGYPT there is a litle peece of land that deuideth both the ſeaes, and ſeparateth AFRICK from ASIA: the which ſtraight is ſo narrow at the end where the two ſeas are narroweſt, that it is not aboue three hundreth furlongs ouer. Cleopatra went about to lift her ſhippes out of the one ſea, and to hale them ouer the ſtraight into the other ſea: that when her ſhippes were come into the goulfe of ARABIA, ſhe might then carie all her gold and ſiluer away, and ſo with a great companie of men goe and dwell in ſome place about the Ocean ſea farre from the ſea Mediterraneum, to ſcape the danger and bondage of this warre. But now, becauſe the ARABIANS dwelling about the citie of PETRA, did burne the firſt ſhippes that were brought to land, and that Antonius thought that his armie by land, which he left at ACTIVM was yet whole: ſhe left off her enterpriſe, and determined to keepe all the portes and paſſages of her realme. Antonius, he forſooke the citie and company of his friends, and built him a houſe in the ſea, by the Ile of PHAROS, vpon certen forced mountes which he cauſed to be caſt into the ſea, and dwelt there, as a man that baniſhed himſelfe from all mens companie: ſaying that he would leade Timons life, becauſe he had the like wrong offred him, that was before offred vnto Timon: and that for the vnthankfulnes of thoſe he had done good vnto, and whom he tooke to be his friends, he was angrie with all men, and would truſt no man. This Timon was a citizen of ATHENS, that liued about the warre of PELOPONNESVS, as appeareth by Plato and Ariſtophanes comedies: in the which they mocked him, calling him a viper and malicious man vnto mankind, to ſhunne all other mens companies, but the companie of young Alcibiades, a bold and inſolent youth, whom he would greatly feaſt, and make much of, and kiſſed him verie gladly. Apemantus wondering at it, asked him the cauſe what he ment to make ſo much of that young man alone, and to hate all others: Timon aunſwered him, I doe it ſaid he, becauſe I know that one day he ſhall doe great miſchief vnto the ATHENIANS. This Timon ſomtimes would haue Apemantus in his companie, becauſe he was much like of his nature & conditions, and alſo followed him in manner of life. On a time when they ſolemnly celebrated the feaſts called Choæ at ATHENS, (to wit, the feaſts of the dead, where they make ſprinklings and ſacrifices for the dead) and that they two then feaſted together by themſelues, Apemantus ſayed vnto the other: O heere is a trim banquet Timon. Timon anſwered againe, yea ſayd he, ſo thou wert not heer. It is reported of him alſo, that this Timon on a time (the people being aſſembled in the market place about diſpatch of ſome affaires) got vp into the pulpit for orations, where the Orators commonly vſe to ſpeake vnto the people: and ſilence being made, euery man liſtning to heare what he would ſay, becauſe it was a wonder to ſee him in that place: at length he began to ſpeake in this manner. My Lords of ATHENS, I haue a litle yard in my houſe where there groweth a figge tree, on the which many citizens haue hangd thẽſelues: & becauſe I meane to make ſome building on the place, I thought good to let you all vnderſtand it, that before the fig tree be cut downe, if any of you be deſperate, you may there in time goe hang your ſelues. He died in the city of HALES, and was buried vpon the ſea ſide. Now it chanced ſo, that the ſea getting in, it compaſſed his tombe round about, that no man could come to it: and vpon the ſame was written this Epitaphe.

Heere lyes a wretched corſe, of wretched ſoule bereft,

The Epitaph of Timon Miſanthropus.

It is reported that Timon himſelf when he liued made this Epitaph: for that which is commonly rehearſed was not his, but made by the Poet Callimachus.

Heere lye I Timon who aliue all liuing men did hate,
Paſſe by, and curſe thy fill: but paſſe, and ſtay not heere thy gate.

Many other things could we tell you of this Timon, but this litle ſhall ſuffice at this preſent. But now to returne to Antonius againe. Canidius himſelfe came to bring him newes, that he had loſt all his armie by land at ACTIVM: on the other ſide he was aduertiſed alſo, that Herodes king of IVRIE, who had alſo certen legions and bandes with him, was reuolted vnto Cæſar, and all the other kings in like manner: ſo that, ſauing thoſe that were about him, he had none left him. All this notwithſtanding did nothing trouble him, and it ſeemed that he was contented to forgoe all his hope, and ſo to be ridde of all his care and troubles. Thereupon he left his ſolitarie houſe he had built by the ſea which he called Timoneon, and Cleopatra receiued him into her royall pallace. He was no ſooner com thither, but he ſtraight ſet all the citie on rioting and banquetting againe, and himſelfe to liberalitie and giftes. He cauſed the ſonne of Iulius Cæſar & Cleopatra, to be enrolled (according to the manner of the ROMAINS) amongſt the number of young men: and gaue Antyllus, his eldeſt ſon he had by Fuluia, the mans gown, the which was a plaine gowne, without gard or embroderie of purple. For theſe things, there was kept great feaſting, banquetting and dancing in ALEXANDRIA many dayes together. In deede they did breake their firſt order they had ſet downe, which they called Amimetobion, (as much to ſay, no life comparable) & did ſet vp another, which they called Synapothanumenon (ſignifying the order and agreement of thoſe that will dye together) the which in exceeding ſumptuouſnes, and coſt was not inferior to the firſt. For their friendes made themſelues to be inrolled in this order of thoſe that would die together, and ſo made great feaſtes one to another: for euerie man when it came to his turne, feaſted their whole companie and fraternitie. Cleopatra in the meane time was verie carefull in gathering all ſorts of poyſons together, to deſtroy men. Now to make proofe of thoſe poyſons which made men die with leaſt paine, ſhe tryed it vpon condemned men in priſon. For when ſhe ſaw the poyſons that were ſodaine and vehement, and brought ſpeedy death with grieuous torments: & in contrary manner, that ſuch as were more milde and gentle, had not that quicke ſpeede and force to make one dye ſodainely: ſhe afterwardes went about to proue the ſtinging of ſnakes and adders, and made ſome to be applyed vnto men in her ſight, ſome in one ſorte and ſome in another. So when ſhe had daily made diuers and ſundrie proofes, ſhe found none of them all ſhe had proued ſo fit, as the biting of an Aſpick, the which cauſeth onely a heauines of the head, without ſwounding or complaining, and bringeth a great deſire alſo to ſleepe, with a litle ſwet in the face, and ſo by litle and litle taketh away the ſenſes & vitall powers, no liuing creature perceiuing that the patients feele any paine. For they are ſo ſorie, when any bodie awaketh them, and taketh them vp: as thoſe that being taken out of a ſound ſleep, are very heauie and deſirous to ſleepe. This notwithſtanding, they ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Octauius Cæſar in ASIA, Cleopatra requeſting ſting the realme of ÆGYPT for their children, and Antonins praying that he might be ſuffered to liue at ATHENS like a priuate mã, if Cæſar would not let him remaine in ÆGYPT. And becauſe they had no other men of eſtimation about them, for that ſome were fled, and thoſe that remained, they did not greatly truſt them: they were inforced to ſend Euphronius the ſchoolemaiſter of their children. For Alexas LAODICIAN, who was brought into Antonius houſe & fauour by meanes of Timagenes, and afterwards was in greater credit with him, then any other GRECIAN: (for that he had alway bene one of Cleopatraes miniſters to win Antonius, & to ouerthrow all his good determinations to vſe his wife Octauia well) him Antonius had ſent vnto Herodes king of IVRIE, hoping ſtill to keepe him his friend, that he ſhould not reuolt from him. But he remained there, and betrayed Antonius. For where he ſhould haue kept Herodes frõ reuolting from him, he perſwaded him to turne to Cæſar: & truſting king Herodes, he preſumed to come in Cæſars preſence. Howbeit Herodes did him no pleaſure: for he was preſently taken priſoner, and ſent in chaines to his own country, & there by Cæſars commaundement put to death. Thus was Alexas in Antonius life time put to death, for betraying of him. Furthermore, Cæſar would not graunt vnto Antonius requeſtes: but for Cleopatra, he made her aunſwere, that he would deny her nothing reaſonable, ſo that ſhe would either put Antonius to death, or driue him out of her country. There withall he ſent Thyreus one of his men vnto her, a very wiſe and diſcreet man, who bringing letters of credit from a young Lord vnto a noble Lady, and that beſides greatly liked her beautie, might eaſily by his eloquence haue perſwaded her. He was longer in talke with her then any man elſe was, and the Queene her ſelfe alſo did him great honour: in ſomuch as he made Antonius ielous of him. Whereupon Antonius cauſed him to be taken and well fauoredly whipped, and ſo ſent him vnto Cæſar: and bad him tell him that he made him angry with him, becauſe he ſhewed himſelfe proude and diſdainfull towardes him, and now ſpecially when he was eaſie to be angred, by reaſon of his preſent miſerie. To be ſhort, if this miſlike thee ſayd he, thou haſt Hipparchus one of my infranchiſed bondmen with thee: hang him if thou wilt, or whippe him at thy pleaſure, that we may crie quittaunce. From thenceforth, Cleopatra to cleare her ſelfe of the ſuſpition he had of her, ſhe made more of him then euer ſhe did. For firſt of all, where ſhe did ſolemniſe the day of her birth very meanely and ſparingly, fit for her preſent misfortune: ſhe now in contrary maner did keepe it with ſuch ſolemnitie, that ſhe exceeded all meaſure of ſumptuouſneſſe and magnificence: ſo that the gueſtes that were bidden to the feaſts, and came poore, went away rich. Now things paſsing thus, Agrippa by diuers letters ſent one after an other vnto Cæſar, prayed him to returne to ROME, becauſe the affaires there did of neceſsitie require his perſon and preſence. Thereupon he did deferre the warre till the next yeare following: but when winter was done, he returned againe through SYRIA by the coaſt of AFRICKE, to make warres againſt Antonius, and his other Captaines. When the citie of PELVSIVM was taken, there ran a rumor in the citie, that Seleucus, by Cleopatraes conſent, had ſurrendered the ſame. But to cleare her ſelfe that ſhe did not, Cleopatra brought Seleucus wife and children vnto Antonius, to be reuenged of them at his pleaſure. Furthermore, Cleopatra had long before made many ſumptuous tombes and monuments, as well for excellencie of workemanſhip, as for hight and greatneſſe of building, ioyning hard to the temple of Iſis. Thither ſhe cauſed to be brought all the treaſure and pretious things ſhe had of the auncient kings her predeceſſours: as gold, ſiluer, emerods, pearles, ebbonie, iuorie, and ſinamon, and beſides all that, a maruellous number of torches, faggots, and flaxe. So Octauius Cæſar being affrayed to looſe ſuch a treaſure and maſſe of richeſſe, and that this woman for ſpight would ſet it a fire, and burne it euery whit: he alwayes ſent ſome one or other vnto her from him, to put her in good comfort, whileſt he in the meane time drew neare the citie with his armie. So Cæſar came, and pitched his campe hard by the citie, in the place where they runne and manage their horſes. Antonius made a ſaly vpon him, and fought very valiantly, ſo that he draue Cæſars horſemen backe, fighting with his men euen into their campe. Then he came againe to the pallace, greatly boaſting of this victorie, and ſweetely kiſſed Cleopatra, armed as he was, when he came from the fight, recommending one of his men of armes vnto her, that had valiantly fought in this skirmiſh. Cleopatra to reward his manlineſſe, gaue him an armour & head peece of cleane gold: howbeit the man at armes when he had receiued this rich gift, ſtale away by night, and went to Cæſar? Antonius ſent againe to chalenge Cæſar, to fight with him hand to hand. Cæſar aunſwered him, that he had many other wayes to dye then ſo. Then Antonius ſeeing there was no way more honourable for him to dye, then fighting valiantly: he determined to ſet vp his reſt, both by ſea and land. So being at ſupper, (as it is reported) he commaunded his officers and houſehold ſeruaunts that waited on him at his bord, that they ſhould fill his cuppes full, and make as much of him as they could: for ſayd he, you know not whether you ſhall do ſo much for me to morrow or not, or whether you ſhall ſerue an other maiſter: and it may be you ſhall ſee me no more, but a dead body. This notwithſtanding, perceiuing that his friends and men fell a weeping to heare him ſay ſo: to ſalue that he had ſpoken, he added this more vnto it, that he would not lead them to battell, where he thought not rather ſafely to returne with victorie, then valiantly to dye with honour. Furthermore, the ſelfe ſame night within litle of midnight, when all the citie was quiet, full of feare, and ſorrow, thinking what would be the iſſue and end of this warre: it is ſayd that ſodainly they heard a marueillous ſweete harmonie of ſundry ſortes of inſtrumentes of muſicke, with the crie of a multitude of people, as they had bene dauncing, and had ſong as they vſe in Bacchus feaſts, with mouings and turnings after the manner of the Satyres: and it ſeemed that this daunce went through the city vnto the gate that opened to the enemies, and that all the troupe that made this noyſe they heard, went out of the citie at that gate. Now, ſuch as in reaſon ſought the depth of the interpretation of this wonder, thought that it was the god vnto whom Antonius bare ſingular deuotion to counterfeit and reſemble him, that did forſake them. The next morning by breake of day, he went to ſet thoſe few footemen he had in order vpon the hils adioyning vnto the citie: and there he ſtood to behold his gallies which departed from the hauen, and rowed againſt the gallies of his enemies, and ſo ſtood ſtill, looking what exploit his ſouldiers in them would do. But when by force of rowing they were come neare vnto them, they firſt ſaluted Cæſars men: and then Cæſars men reſaluted them alſo, and of two armies made but one, and then did all together row toward the citie. When Antonius ſaw that his men did forſake him, and yeelded vnto Cæſar, and that his footemen were broken and ouerthrowen: he then fled into the citie, crying out that Cleopatra had betrayed him vnto them, with whom he had made warre for her ſake. Thē ſhe being affrayed of his fury, fled into the tombe which ſhe had cauſed to be made, and there locked the doores vnto her, and ſhut all the ſprings of the lockes with great boltes, and in the meane time ſent vnto Antonius to tell him that ſhe was dead. Antonius beleeuing it, ſayd vnto himſelfe: what doeſt thou looke for further, Antonius, ſith ſpightfull fortune hath taken from thee the onely ioy thou haddeſt, for whom thou yet reſeruedſt thy life? when he had ſayd theſe words, he went into a chamber & vnarmed himſelfe, and being naked ſaid thus: O Cleopatra, it grieueth me not that I haue loſt thy companie, for I will not be long from thee: but I am ſory, that hauing bene ſo great a Captaine and Emperour, I am indeede condemned to be iudged of leſſe courage & noble minde, then a woman. Now he had a man of his called Eros, whom he loued and truſted much, and whom he had long before cauſed to ſweare vnto him, that he ſhould kill him when he did commaunde him: and then he willed him to keepe his promiſe. His man drawing his ſword, lift it vp as though he had meant to haue ſtriken his maiſter: but turning his head at one ſide, he thruſt his ſword into himſelfe, and fell downe dead at his maiſters foote. Then ſayd Antonius, O noble Eros, I thanke thee for this, and it is valiantly done of thee, to ſhew me what I ſhould do to my ſelfe, which thou couldeſt not do for me. Therewithall he tooke his ſword, and thruſt it into his bellie, and ſo fell downe vpon a litle bed. The wounde he had killed him not preſently, for the bloud ſtinted a litle when he was layed: and when he came ſomewhat to himſelfe againe, he prayed them that were about him to diſpatch him. But they all fled out of the chamber, and left him crying out & tormenting himſelfe: vntill at laſt there came a Secretarie vnto him called Diomedes, who was commaunded to bring him into the tombe or monument where Cleopatra was. Whē he heard that ſhe was aliue, he very earneſtly prayed his men to carie his body thither, and ſo he was caried in his mens armes into the entry of the monument. Notwithſtanding, Cleopatra would not open the gates, but came to the high windowes, and caſt out certaine chaines and ropes, in the which Antonius nius was truſſed:and Cleopatra her owne ſelfe,with two women onely, which ſhe had ſuffered to come with her into theſe monuments, triſed Antonius vp. They that were preſent to behold it, ſayd they neuer ſaw ſo pitifull a ſight. For,they plucked vp poore Antonius all bloudy as he was, and drawing on with pangs of death,who holding vp his hands to Cleopatra,raiſed vp himſelfe as well as he could. It was a hard thing for theſe women to do,to lift him vp: but Cleopatra ſtouping downe with her head, putting to all her ſtrength to her vttermoſt power, did lift him vp with much a do, and neuer let go her hold, with the helpe of the women beneath that bad her be of good courage,and were as ſory to ſee her labour ſo,as ſhe her ſelfe. So when ſhe had gotten him in after that ſort, and layed him on a bed: ſhe rent her garments vpon him,clapping her breſt, and ſcratching her face and ſtomacke. Then ſhe dried vp his bloud that had berayed his face, and called him her Lord, her husband, and Emperour, forgetting her owne miſerie and calamity,for the pitie and compaſsion ſhe tooke of him. Antonius made her ceaſſe her lamenting, and called for wine, either becauſe he was a thirſt, or elſe for that he thought thereby to haſten his death. When he had dronke, he earneſtly prayed her, and perſwaded her, that ſhe would ſeeke to ſaue her life, if ſhe could poſsible, without reproche and diſhonour:and that chiefly ſhe ſhould truſt Proculeius aboue any man elſe about Cæſar. And as for himſelfe, that ſhe ſhould not lament nor ſorow for the miſerable chaunge of his fortune at the end of his dayes: but rather that ſhe ſhould thinke him the more fortunate, for the former triumphes & honours he had receiued,conſidering that while he liued he was the nobleſt and greateſt Prince of the world,& that now he was ouercome,not cowardly,but valiantly, a ROMAINE by an other ROMAINE. As Antonius gaue the laſt gaſpe,Proculeius came that was ſent frō Cæſar. For after Antonius had thruſt his ſword in himſelfe, as they caried him into the tombes and monuments of Cleopatra, one of his gard called Dercetæus, tooke his ſword with the which he had ſtriken himſelfe, and hid it: then he ſecretly ſtale away, and brought Octauius Cæſar the firſt newes of his death,& ſhewed him his ſword that was bloudied. Cæſar hearing theſe newes, ſtraight withdrew himſelfe into a ſecret place of his tent, and there burſt out with teares, lamenting his hard and miſerable fortune, that had bene his friend and brother in law, his equall in the Empire, and companion with him in ſundry great exploits and battels. Then he called for all his friendes, and ſhewed them the letters Antonius had written to him,and his aunſweres alſo ſent him againe,during their quarrell and ſtrife:and how fiercely and proudly the other aunſwered him,to all iuſt and reaſonable matters he wrote vnto him. After this,he ſent Proculeius,and commaunded him to do what he could poſsible to get Cleopatra aliue, fearing leaſt otherwiſe all the treaſure would be loſt: & furthermore, he thought that if he could take Cleopatra,and bring her aliue to ROME,ſhe would maruelloully beautifie and ſet out his triumphe. But Cleopatra would neuer put her ſelfe into Proculeius handes, although they ſpake together. For Proculeius came to the gates that were very thicke & ſtrong, and ſurely barred, but yet there were ſome cranewes through the which her voyce might be heard, and ſo they without vnderſtood, that Cleopatra demaunded the kingdome of ÆGYPT for her ſonnes: and that Proculeius aunſwered her, that ſhe ſhould be of good cheare, and not be affrayed to referre all vnto Cæſar. After he had viewed the place very well,he came and reported her anſwere vnto Cæſar. Who immediatly ſent Gallus to ſpeake once againe with her, and bad him purpoſely hold her with talke, whileſt Proculeius did ſet vp a ladder againſt that high window, by the which Antonius was triſed vp, and came downe into the monument with two of his men hard by the gate, where Cleopatra ſtood to heare what Gallus ſayd vnto her. One of her women which was ſhut in her monumēts with her, ſaw Proculeius by chance as he came downe, and ſhreeked out: O poore Cleopatra, thou art taken. Then when ſhe ſaw Proculeius behind her as ſhe came from the gate, ſhe thought to haue ſtabbed her ſelfe in with a ſhort dagger ſhe wore of purpoſe by her ſide. But Proculeius came ſodainly vpon her, and taking her by both the hands,ſayd vnto her. Cleopatra, firſt thou ſhalt do thy ſelfe great wrong, and ſecondly vnto Cæſar: to depriue him of the occaſion and oportunitie, openly to ſhew his bountie and mercie, and to giue his enemies cauſe to accuſe the moſt curteous and noble Prince that euer was, and to appeache him, as though he were a cruell and mercileſſe man, that were not to be truſted. So euen as he ſpake the word, he tooke her dagger from her, and ſhooke her clothes for feare of any poyſon hidden about her. Afterwardes Cæſar ſent one of his infranchiſed men called Epaphroditus, whom he ſtraightly charged to looke well vnto her, and to beware in any caſe that ſhe made not her ſelfeaway: and for the reſt, to vſe her with all the curteſie poſsible. And for himſelfe, he in the meane time entred the citie of ALEXANDRIA, and as he went, talked with the Philoſopher Arrius, and held him by the hand, to the end that his country men ſhould reuerence him the more, becauſe they ſaw Cæſar ſo highly eſteeme and honour him. Then he went into the ſhew place of exerciſes, and ſo vp to his chaire of ſtate which was prepared for him of a great height: and there according to his commaundement, all the people of ALEXANDRIA were aſſembled, who quaking for feare, fell downe on their knees before him, and craued mercy. Cæſar bad them all ſtand vp, and told them openly that he forgaue the people, and pardoned the felonies and offences they had committed againſt him in this warre. Firſt, for the founders ſake of the ſame citie, which was Alexander the great: ſecondly, for the beautie of the citie, which he much eſteemed and wondred at: thirdly, for the loue he bare vnto his very friend Arrius. Thus did Cæſar honour Arrius, who craued pardon for himſelfe and many others, and ſpecially for Philoſtratus, the eloquenteſt man of all the ſophiſters and Orators of his time, for preſent and ſodaine ſpeach: howbeit he falſly named himſelſe an Academicke Philoſopher. Therfore, Cæſar that hated his nature and conditions, would not heare his ſute. Thereupon he let his gray beard grow long, & followed Arrius ſtep by ſtep in a long mourning gowne, ſtill buzzing in his eares this Greeke verſe:

A wiſe man if that he be wiſe in deede,
May by a wiſe man haue the better ſpeede.

Antyllus, Antonius eldeſt ſonne by Fuluia, ſlaine.

Cæſar vnderſtanding this, not for the deſire he had to deliuer Philoſtratus of his feare, as to rid Arrius of malice and enuy that might haue fallen out againſt him: he pardoned him. Now touching Antonius ſonnes, Antyllus, his eldeſt ſonne by Fuluia was ſlaine, becauſe his ſchoolemaiſter Theodorus did betray him vnto the ſouldiers, who ſtrake off his head. And the villaine tooke a pretious ſtone of great value from his necke, the which he did ſow in his girdle, and afterwards denied that he had it: but it was found about him, & ſo Cæſar truſſed him vp for it. For Cleopatraes children, they were very honorably kept, with their gouernours & traine that waited on thē. But for Cæſarion, who was ſayd to be Iulius Cæſars ſonne: his mother Cleopatra had ſent him vnto the INDIANS through ÆTHIOPIA, with a great ſumme of money. But one of his gouernours alſo called Rhedon, euē ſuch an other as Theodorus, perſwaded him to returne into his country, & told him that Cæſar ſent for him to giue him his mothers kingdome. So, as Cæſar was determining with himſelfe what he ſhould do, Arrius ſayd vnto him.

The ſaying of Arrius the Philoſopher.

Too Many Cæſars is not good.

Alluding vnto a certaine verſe of Homer that ſayth:

Cæſarion Cleopatraes ſonne, put to death.

Cæſar came to ſee Cleopatra.

Cleopatra, a martyred creature, through her owne paſſiō and furie.

Therefore Cæſar did put Cæſarion to death, after the death of his mother Cleopatra. Many Princes, great kings & Captaines did craue Antonius body of Octauius Cæſar, to giue him honourable buriall: but Cæſar would neuer take it from Cleopatra, who did ſumptuouſly & royally bury him with her own hands, whom Cæſar ſuffred to take as much as ſhe would to beſtow vpon his funerals. Now was ſhe altogether ouercome with ſorow & paſsion of minde, for ſhe had knocked her breſt ſo pitifully, that ſhe had martyred it, and in diuers places had rayſed vlcers & inflammations, ſo that ſhe fell into a feuer withall: whereof ſhe was very glad, hoping thereby to haue good colour to abſteine from meate, and that ſo ſhe might haue dyed eaſily without any trouble. She had a Phiſition called Olympus, whom ſhe made priuie of her intent, to the end he ſhould helpe her to rid her out of her life: as Olympus writeth himſelfe, who wrote a booke of all theſe things. But Cæſar miſtruſted the matter, by many coniectures he had, and therefore did put her in feare, and threatned her to put her children to ſhamefull death. With theſe threates, Cleopatra for feare yeelded ſtraight, as ſhe would haue yeelded vnto ſtrokes: & afterwards ſuffred her ſelfe to be cured and dieted as they liſted. Shortly after, Cæſar came himſelf in perſon to ſee her, & to cōfort her. Cleopatra being layed vpon a litle low bed in poore eſtate, when ſhe ſaw Cæſar come into her chamber, ſhe ſodainly roſe vp, naked in her ſmocke, and fell downe at his feete maruellouſly diſfigured: both for that ſhe had plucked her haire from her head, as alſo for that ſhe had martired all her face with her nayles, and beſides, her voyce was ſmall and trembling, her eyes ſunke into her head with continuall blubbering and moreouer, they might ſee the moſt part of her ſtomake torne in ſunder. To be ſhort, her body was not much better then her minde: yet her good grace and comelyneſſe, and the force of her beautie was not altogether defaced. But notwithſtanding this ougly and pitifull ſtate of hers, yet ſhe ſhewed herſelfe within, by her outward lookes and countenance. When Cæſar had made her lye downe againe, and ſate by her beds ſide: Cleopatra began to cleare and excuſe her ſelfe for that ſhe had done, laying all to the feare ſhe had of Antonius: Cæſar, in contrary manner, reproued her in euery point. Then ſhe ſodainly altered her ſpeach, and prayed him to pardon her, as though ſhe were affrayed to dye, and deſirous to liue. At length, ſhe gaue him a briefe and memoriall of all the ready money and treaſure ſhe had. But by chaunce there ſtood Seleucus by, one of her Treaſurers, who to ſeeme a good ſeruant, came ſtraight to Cæſar to diſproue Cleopatra, that ſhe had not ſet in all, but kept many things backe of purpoſe. Cleopatra was in ſuch a rage with him, that ſhe flew vpon him, & tooke him by the haire of the head, and boxed him welfauouredly. Cæſar fell a laughing, and parted the fray. Alas, ſayd ſhe, O Cæſar: is not this a great ſhame and reproche, that thou hauing vouchſaued to take the paines to come vnto me, and haſt done me this honour, poore wretch, and caitife creature, brought into this pitifull and miſerable eſtate: and that mine owne ſeruants ſhould come now to accuſe me, though it may be I haue reſerued ſome iewels and trifles meete for women, but not for me (poore ſoule) to ſet out my ſelfe withall, but meaning to giue ſome pretie preſents and giftes vnto Octauia and Liuia, that they making meanes & interceſsion for me to thee, thou mighteſt yet extend thy fauour and mercy vpon me? Cæſar was glad to heare her ſay ſo, perſwading him ſelfe thereby that ſhe had yet a deſire to ſaue her life. So he made her aunſwere, that he did not onely giue her that to diſpoſe of at her pleaſure, which ſhe had kept backe, but further promiſed to vſe her more honorably and bountifully then ſhe would thinke for: and ſo he tooke his leaue of her, ſuppoſing he had deceiued her, but indeede he was deceiued himſelfe. There was a young gentleman Cornelius Dolabella, that was one of Cæſars very great familiars, & beſides did beare no euill wil vnto Cleopatra He ſent her word ſecretly as ſhe had requeſted him, that Cæſar determined to take his iorney through SYRIA, & that within three daies he would ſend her away before with her children. When this was told Cleopatra, ſhe requeſted Cæſar that it would pleaſe him to ſuffer her to offer the laſt oblations of the dead, vnto the ſoule of Antonius. This being graunted her, ſhe was caried to the place where his tombe was, and there falling downe on her knees, imbracing the tombe with her women, the teares running down her cheekes, ſhe began to ſpeake in this ſort: O my deare Lord Antonius, not long ſithence I buried thee here, being a free woman: and now I offer vnto thee the funerall ſprinklings and oblations, being a captiue and priſoner, and yet I am forbidden and kept from tearing & murthering this captiue body of mine with blowes, which they carefully gard and keepe, only to triumphe of thee: looke therefore henceforth for no other honours, offerings, nor ſacrifices from me, for theſe are the laſt which Cleopatra can giue thee, ſith now they carie her away. Whileſt we liued together, nothing could ſeuer our companies: but now at our death, I feare me they will make vs chaunge our countryes. For as thou being a ROMAINE, haſt bene buried in ÆGYPT: euen ſo wretched creature I, an ÆGYPTIAN, ſhall be buried in ITALIE, which ſhall be all the good that I haue receiued by thy country. If therefore the gods where thou art now haue any power & authoritie, ſith our gods here haue forſakē vs: ſuffer not thy true friend and louer to be caried away aliue, that in me, they triumphe of thee: but receiue me with thee, and let me be buried in one ſelfe tombe with thee. For though my griefes and miſeries be infinite, yet none hath grieued me more, nor that I could leſſe beare withall: then this ſmall time, which I haue bene driuē to liue alone without thee. Then hauing ended theſe dolefull plaints, and crowned the tombe with garlands and ſundry noſegayes, and maruellous louingly imbraced the ſame: ſhe commaunded they ſhould prepare her bath, and when ſhe had bathed and waſhed her ſelfe, ſhe fell to her meate, and was ſumptuouſly ſerued. Now whileſt ſhe was at dinner, there came a countryman, and brought her a basket. The ſouldiers that warded at the gates, asked him ſtraight what he had in his basket. He opened the basket, and tooke out the leaues that couered the figges, and ſhewed them that they were figges he brought. They all of them maruelled to ſee ſo goodly figges. The countryman laughed to heare them, and bad them take ſome if they would. They beleeued he told them truely, and ſo bad him carie them in. After Cleopatra had dined, ſhe ſent a certaine table written and ſealed vnto Cæſar, and commaunded them all to go out of the tombes where ſhe was, but the two women, then ſhe ſhut the doores to her. Cæſar when he receiued this table, and began to read her lamẽtation and petition, requeſting him that he would let her be buried with Antonius, found ſtraight what ſhe meant, and thought to haue gone thither himſelfe: howbeit he ſent one before in all haſt that might be, to ſee what it was.

The death of Cleopatra

Her death was very ſodaine. For thoſe whom Cæſar ſent vnto her ran thither in all haſt poſsible, & found the ſouldiers ſtanding at the gate, miſtruſting nothing, nor vnderſtanding of her death. But when they had opened the doores, they found Cleopatra ſtarke dead, layed vpon a bed of gold, attired & arayed in her royall robes, and one of her two women, which was called Iras, dead at her feete: and her other woman called Charmion halfe dead, and trembling, trimming the Diademe which Cleopatra ware vpon her head.

Cleopatraes two waiting women dead with her.

One of the ſouldiers ſeeing her, angrily ſayd vnto her: is that well done Charmion? Very well ſayd ſhe againe, and meete for a Princeſſe diſcended from the race of ſo many noble kings. She ſayd no more, but fell downe dead hard by the bed. Some report that this Aſpicke was brought vnto her in the basket with figs, & that ſhe had commaunded them to hide it vnder the figge leaues, that when ſhe ſhould thinke to take out the figges, the Aſpicke ſhould bite her before ſhe ſhould ſee her: howbeit, that when ſhe would haue taken away the leaues for the figges, ſhe perceiued it, and ſayd, art thou here then?

And ſo, her arme being naked, ſhe put it to the Aſpicke to be bitten. Other ſay againe, ſhe kept it in a boxe, and that ſhe did pricke and thruſt it with a ſpindle of gold, ſo that the Aſpicke being angerd withall, lept out with great furie, and bit her in the arme. Howbeit few can tell the troth. For they report alſo, that ſhe had hidden poyſon in a hollow raſer which ſhe caried in the haire of her head: and yet was there no marke ſeene of her body, or any ſigne diſcerned that ſhe was poyſoned, neither alſo did they finde this ſerpent in her tombe. But it was reported onely, that there were ſeene certaine freſh ſteppes or trackes where it had gone, on the tombe ſide toward the ſea, and ſpecially by the doore ſide. Some ſay alſo, that they found two litle pretie bytings in her arme, ſcant to be diſcerned: the which it ſeemeth Cæſar himſelfe gaue credit vnto, becauſe in his triumphe he caried Cleopatraes image, with an Aſpicke byting of her arme.

The age of Cleopatra and Antonius.

And thus goeth the report of her death. Now Cæſar, though he was maruellous ſory for the death of Cleopatra, yet he wondred at her noble minde and courage, and therfore commaunded ſhe ſhould be nobly buried, and layed by Antonius: and willed alſo that her two women ſhould haue honorable buriall. Cleopatra dyed being eight and thirtie yeare old, after ſhe had raigned two and twenty yeares, and gouerned aboue foureteen of them with Antonius. And for Antonius, ſome ſay that he liued three and fiftie yeares: and others ſay, ſix and fiftie. All his ſtatues, images, and mettals, were plucked downe and ouerthrowen, ſauing thoſe of Cleopatra which ſtood ſtill in their places, by meanes of Archibius one of her friendes, who gaue Cæſar a thouſand talentes that they ſhould not be handled, as thoſe of Antonius were. Antonius left ſeuen children by three wiues, of the which, Cæſar did put Antyllus, the eldeſt ſonne he had by Fuluia, to death.

Of Antonius iſſue came Emperours.

Octauia his wife tooke all the reſt, and brought them vp with hers, and maried Cleopatra, Antonius daughter, vnto king Iuba, a maruellous curteous & goodly Prince. And Antonius, the ſonne of Fuluia came to be ſo great, that next vnto Agrippa, who was in greateſt eſtimation about Cæſar, and next vnto the children of Liuia, which were the ſecond in eſtimation: he had the third place. Furthermore, Octauia hauing had two daughters by her firſt husband Marcellus, and a ſonne alſo called Marcellus: Cæſar maried his daughter vnto that Marcellus, and ſo did adopt him for his ſonne. And Octauia alſo maried one of her daughters vnto Agrippa. But when Marcellus was dead, after he had bene maried a while, Octauia perceiuing that her brother Cæſar was very buſie to chooſe ſome one amõg his friends, whom he truſted beſt to make his ſonne in law: ſhe perſwaded him, that Agrippa ſhould mary his daughter, (Marcelius widow) and leaue her owne daughter. Cæſar firſt was contented withall, and then Agrippa: and ſo ſhe afterwardes tooke away her daughter and maried her vnto Antonius, & Agrippa maried Iulia, Cæſars daughter. Now there remained two daughters more of Octauia & Antonius. Domitius Ænobarbus maried the one: and the other, which was Antonia, ſo faire and vertuous a young Lady, was maried vnto Druſus the ſonne of Liuia, and ſonne in law of Cæſar. Of this mariage, came Germanicus and Clodius: of the which, Clodius afterwardes came to be Emperour. And of the ſonnes of Germanicus, the one whoſe name was Caius, came alſo to be Emperour: who, after he had licētiouſly raigned a time, was ſlaine, with his wife and daughter. Agrippina alſo, hauing a ſonne by her firſt husband Ænobarbus called Lucius Domitius: was afterwardes maried vnto Clodius, who adopted her ſonne, and called him Nerò Germanicus. This Nerò was Emperour in our time, & ſlue his own mother, had almoſt deſtroyed the Empire of ROME, through his madneſſe and wicked life, being the fift Emperour of ROME after Antonius.

THE COMPARISON OF Demetrius with Antonius.

The power of Demetrius, & Antonius.

NOw, ſithence it falleth out, that Demetrius and Antonius were one of them much like to the other, hauing fortune a like diuers & variable vnto them: let vs therefore come to conſider their power and authoritie, and how they came to be ſo great. Firſt of all, it is certaine that Demetrius power and greatnes fell vnto him by inheritance from his father Antigonus: who became the greateſt & mightieſt Prince of all the ſucceſſours of Alexander, and had won the moſt part of ASIA, before Demetrius came of full age. Antonius in contrary manner, borne of an honeſt man, who otherwiſe was no mā of warre, & had not left him any meane to ariſe to ſuch greatnes: durſt take vpon him to contend for the Empire with Cæſar, that had no right vnto it by inheritance, but yet made himſelfe ſucceſſour of the power, the which the other by great paine and trauell had obteined, and by his owne induſtrie became ſo great, without the helpe of any other: that the Empire of the whole world being deuided into two partes, he had the one halfe, and tooke that of the greateſt countenaunce and power. Antonius being abſent, oftentimes ouercame the PARTHIANS in battell by his Lieutenaunts, and chaſed away the barbarous people dwelling about mount Caucaſus, vnto the ſea Hyrcanium, in ſomuch as the thing they moſt reproue him for, did moſt witneſſe his greatnes. For, Demetrius father made him gladly marrie Phila, Antipaters daughter, although ſhe was too old for him: becauſe ſhe was of a nobler houſe then himſelfe. Antonius on the other ſide was blamed for marying of Cleopatra, a Queene that for power and nobilitie of bloud, excelled all other kings in her time, but Arſaces: and moreouer made himſelfe ſo great, that others thought him worthy of greater things, then he himſelfe required. Now for the deſire

that moued the one & the other to conquer realmes: the deſire of Demetrius was vnblameable and iuſt, deſiring to raigne ouer people, which had bene gouerned at all times, and deſired to be gouerned by kings. But Antonius deſire was altogether wicked & tyrannicall: who ſought to keepe the people of ROME in bondage and ſubiection, but lately before rid of Caeſars raigne & gouernement. For the greateſt & moſt famous exploit Antonius euer did in warres (to wit, the warre in the which he ouerthrew Caſsius and Brutus) was begun to no other end, but to depriue his countrymen of their libertie and freedome. Demetrius in contrary maner, before fortune had ouerthrowen him, neuer left to ſet GRECE at libertie, & to driue the garriſons away, which kept the cities in bõdage: & not like Antonius, that boaſted he had ſlaine them that had ſet ROME at libertie. The chiefeſt thing they commended in Antonius, was his liberalitie and bountie: in the which Demetrius excelled him ſo farre, that he gaue more to his enemies, then Antonius did to his friends: although he was maruellouſly well thought of, for the honorable & ſumptuous funerall he gaue vnto Brutus body. Howbeit Demetrius cauſed all his enemies be buried that were ſlaine in battell, & returned vnto Ptolomy all the priſoners he had taken, with great gifts & preſents he gaue them. They were both in their proſperitie, very riotouſly & licentiouſly giuen: but yet no man can euer ſay, that Demetrius did at any time let ſlip any oportunity or occaſion to follow great matters, but onely gaue himſelſe indeed to pleaſure, when he had nothing elſe to do. And further, to ſay truly, he tooke pleaſure of Lamia, as a mã would haue a delight to heare one tell tales, when he hath nothing elſe to do, or is deſirous to ſleepe: but in deede whẽ he was to make any preparation for warre, he had not then Iuy at his darts end, nor had his helmet perfumed, nor came not out of the Ladies cloſets, picked & princt to go to battell: but he let all dauncing and ſporting alone, and became as the Poet Euripides ſaith.

But to conclude, he neuer had ouerthrow or misfortune through negligence, nor by delaying time to follow his owne pleaſure: as we ſee in painted tables, where Omphale ſecretly ſtealeth away Hercules clubbe, and tooke his Lyons skinne from him. Euen ſo Cleopatra oftentimes vnarmed Antonius, and intiſed him to her, making him loſe matters of great importaunce, and very needefull iourneys, to come and be dandled with her, about the riuers of Canobus, and Taphoſitis. In the end, as Paris fled from the battell, and went to hide himſelfe in Helens armes: euen ſo did he in Cleopatraes armes, or to ſpeake more properly, Paris hid himſelfe in Helens cloſet, but Antonius to follow Cleopatra, fled and loſt the victory. Furthermore, Demetrius had many wiues that he had maried, and all at one time: the which was not diſſalowable or not forbidden by the kings of MACEDON, but had bene vſed from Philip and Alexanders time, as alſo king Lyſimachus and Ptolomie had, and did honour all them that he maried. But Antonius firſt of all maried two wiues together, the which neuer ROMAINE durſt do before, but himſelſe. Secondly, he put away his firſt ROMAINE wife, which he had lawfully maried, for the loue of a ſtraunge woman, he fondly fell in fancie withall, and contrary to the lawes and ordinaunces of ROME. And therefore Demetrius mariages neuer hurt him, for any wrong he had done to his wiues: but Antonius contrarily was vndone by his wiues. Of all the laſciuious parts Antonius played, none were ſo abhominable, as this onely fact of Demetrius. For the hiſtoriographers write, that they would not ſuffer dogs to come into the caſtle of ATHENS, becauſe of all beaſts he is too buſie with bitcherie: and Demetrius, in Mineruaes temple it ſelſe lay with Curtiſans, and there defiled many citizens wiues. And beſides all this, the horrible vice of crueltie, which a man would thinke were leaſt mingled with theſe wanton delightes, is ioyned with Demetrius cõcupiſcence: who ſuffered, (or more properly cõpelled) the goodlieſt young boy of ATHENS, to dye a moſt pitifull death, to ſaue himſelfe from violence, being taken. And to conclude, Antonius by his incontinencie, did no hurt but to himſelfe: and Demetrius did hurt vnto all others. Demetrius neuer hurt any of his friends: and Antonius ſuffered his Vncle by his mothers ſide to be ſlaine, that he might haue his will of Cicero to kill him: a thing ſo damnable, wicked, and cruell of it ſelfe, that he hardly deſerued to haue bene pardoned, though he had killed Cicero, tõ haue ſaued his Vncles life. Now where they falſified & brake their othes, the one making Artabazus priſoner, & the other killing of Alexander: Antonius out of doubt had beſt cauſe, & iuſteſt colour. For Artabazus had betrayed him, and forſaken him in MEDIA. But Demetrius (as diuers do report) deuiſed a falſe matter to accuſe Alexander, to cloke the murther he had committed: and ſome thinke he did accuſe him, to whom he himſelfe had done iniurie vnto: and was not reuenged of him, that would do him iniurie. Furthermore, Demetrius himſelfe did noble feates of warre, as we haue recited of him before: and contrarily Antonius, when he was not there in perſon, wanne many famous and great victories by his Lieutenaunts: and were both ouerthrowen being perſonally in battell, but yet not both after one ſort. For the one was forſaken of his men being MACEDONIANS, and the other contrarily forſooke his that were ROMAINES: for he fled, and left them that ventured their liues for his honour. So that the fault the one did was, that he made them his enemies that fought for him: & the fault in the other, that he ſo beaſtly left them that loued him beſt, and were moſt faithfull to him. And for their deathes, a man can not prayſe the one nor the other, but yet Demetrius death the more reprochfull. For he ſuffered himſelfe to be taken priſoner, and when he was ſent away to be kept in a ſtraunge place, he had the hart to liue yet three yeare longer, to ſerue his mouth and belly, as brute beaſtes do. Antonius on the other ſide ſlue himſelfe, (to confeſſe a troth) cowardly, and miſerably, to his great payne and griefe: and yet was it before his body came into his enemies hands.

ARTHAXERCES LONGIM. PERS. R.

ARtaxerxes, the firſt of this name of all the kings of PERSIA, a noble and curteous Prince as any of all his houſe: was ſurnamed long hand, becauſe his right hand was longer then his left, and he was the ſonne of king Xerxes. But the ſecond, whoſe life we preſently intend to write, was ſurnamed Mnemon, as much to ſay, great memorie: and he was the ſonne of the daughter of the firſt Artaxerxes. For king Darius, and his wife Paryſatis, had foure ſonnes of the which, the eldeſt was this Artaxerxes, the ſecond Cyrus, and two other younger, Oſtanes and Oxathres. Cyrus from the beginning bare the name of the former auncient Cyrus, which in the PERSIAN tongue ſignifieth the ſunne. But Artaxerxes was called before Arſicas, although Dinon writeth, that he was called Oarſes. Howbeit it is vnlikely that Cteſias (although his bookes otherwiſe be full of fables, and as vntrue as they are founde) ſhould forget the name of the Prince with whom he dwelt, whom he ſerued, and continually followed, both him, his wife, and children. Cyrus from his cradle was of a hot ſturring minde, and Artaxerxes in contrary manner, more milde and gentle in all his actions and doings. He was maried to a very fayre Lady, by his father and mothers commaundement: & afterwardes kept her againſt their wils, being forbidden by them. For king Darius his father, hauing put his ſonnes wiues brother to death, he would alſo haue put her to death: but her husband with teares made ſuch humble ſute to his mother for her, that with much a do, he did not onely get pardon for her life, but graunt alſo that ſhe ſhould not be put from him. This notwithſtanding, his mother alwayes loued Cyrus better then him, and prayed that he might be king after his fathers death. Wherfore Cyrus being in his prouinces of ASIA by the ſea ſide, when he was ſent for to come to the Court, at what time his father lay ſicke of the diſeaſe he dyed: he went thither in good hope his mother had preuailed with his father, that in his will he would make him his heire of the realme of PERSIA. For his mother Paryſatis alledged a matter very probable, and the which in old time did helpe king Xerxes in the like caſe, through Demaratus coũſell. She ſaid that Arſicas was borne before her husbãd Darius was king, & Cyrus after he was crowned king. All this could not preuaile. For her eldeſt ſonne Arſicas, ſurnamed Artaxerxes, was aſsigned king of PERSIA, & Cyrus gouernour of LYDIA, & the kings Lieutenant generall of all the low countryes of ASIA toward the ſea ſide. Shortly after king Darius death, the new king Artaxerxes went vnto Paſargades, there to be conſecrated & annoynted king, by the Prieſts of the country of PERSIA. The place of this Paſargades, is a temple dedicated vnto Minerua the goddeſſe of battels, as I take it: where the new king muſt be conſecrated, and when he commeth into the temple, he putteth off his gowne, and putteth on that which the old auncient Cyrus ware before he was king. Furthermore, he muſt eate of a certaine tart or fricacie made of figges with turpentine: and then he muſt drinke a drinke made with vineger and milke. There are alſo certaine other ſecret ceremonies which they muſt keepe, and none do know, but the very Prieſts themſelues. Now Artaxerxes being ready to enter into all theſe ceremonies, Tiſaphernes came vnto him, & brought him one of the Prieſts that had bene Cyrus ſchoolemaiſter in his youth, and had taught him magicke, who by reaſon ſhould haue bene more offended then any man elſe, for that he was not appointed king. And this was the cauſe why they beleeued him the better, when he accuſed Cyrus. For he ſayd that Cyrus had conſpired treaſon againſt the king his brothers owne perſon, & that he meant traiterouſly to kill him in the temple, when he ſhould put off his gown. Some do report, that Cyrus was apprehended vpon this ſimple accuſation by word of mouth. Others write alſo, that Cyrus came into the temple, and hiding himſelfe, he was taken with the maner, and bewrayed by the Prieſt. So as he was going to ſuffer death, his mother tooke Cyrus in her armes, and wounde the haire of her head about his necke, and tyed him ſtraightly to her: and withall ſhe wept ſo bitterly, and made ſuch pitifull mone vnto the king her ſonne, that through her interceſsion, the king graunted him his life, & ſent him againe into his country and gouernement. But this ſatisfied not Cyrus, neither did he ſo much remember the king his brothers fauour vnto him, in granting him his life, as he did the deſpight he had offred him, to be made priſoner. In ſomuch that for this grudge and euill will, he euer after had a greater deſire then before to be king. Some writers alledge, that he entred into actuall rebellion againſt his brother by force of armes, becauſe he had not ſufficient reuenue to defray the ordinary expence of his houſe: howbeit it is a meere folly to ſay ſo. For though he had had no other helpe but his mother, he might haue had of her what he would haue taken, and deſired. Againe, to ſhew that of himſelfe he had abilitie enough: we neede but alledge the ſouldiers and ſtraungers he gaue pay vnto, in diuers places, as Xenophon writeth. For he brought them not all together into one army, becauſe he deſired to keepe his enterpriſe as ſecret as he could: but he had friends and ſeruaunts that leauied them in diuers places, and vnder diuers colours. And furthermore, he had his mother alway about the king, that cleared all ſuſpitions conceiued againſt him. He himſelfe alſo on the other ſide, whileſt he made theſe preparations, wrote very humbly vnto his brother,ſomtime asking ſomwhat of him, and another time accuſing Tiſaphernes: all to blind the king, to make him thinke that he bent all his malice and ſpight againſt him: beſides that, the king of his own nature was ſomwhat dull, & ſlow, which the common people thought to proceede of his curteſie and good nature. At his firſt comming to the crowne, he followed the firſt Artaxerxes goodneſſe and curteſie, by whom he had his name. For he gaue more eaſie audience vnto ſuters, he did alſo more honorably reward & recompence thoſe that had deſerued well: and he vſed ſuch moderation in puniſhing of offendours, that it appeared he did it not of any malitious minde and deſire of reuenge, nor yet of will to hurt any man. When he had any thing giuen him, he tooke it as thankefully, as they offered it him, and did as willingly and frankely alſo giue againe. For, how litle a thing ſoeuer was offered him, he tooke it well. And it is reported that one Romiſes on a time preſented him a maruellous fayre pomegarnet. By the ſunne ſayd he, this man in a ſhort time of a litle towne would make a great citie, he that would make him gouernour of it. Another time there was a poore labourer ſeeing euery man giue the king a preſent, ſome one thing, ſome an other as he paſſed by them: he hauing nothing at hand to giue him, ranne to the riuers ſide, & tooke both his hands full of water, and came and offred it him. King Artaxerxes was ſo glad of it, that he ſent him in a cup of maſſy gold, a thouſand Dareckes, which were peeces of gold ſo named, becauſe the image of Darius was ſtamped vpon them. And vnto one Euclidas a LACEDÆMONIAN, that preſumed to giue him bold wordes, it pleaſed him to aunſwer him by one of his Captaines: thou mayſt ſay what thou lyſt, and I as king, may ſay and do what I lyſt. An other time as he was a hunting, Tiribazus ſhewed the king his gowne that was all to tattered: well, ſayd the king, and what wouldeſt thou haue me to do? Tiribazus aunſwered him, I pray your grace take an other, and giue me that you haue on. The king did ſo, and told him: Tiribazus, I giue thee my gowne, but I commaund thee not to weare it. Tiribazus tooke it, and cared not for the kings commaundement that he ſhould not weare it, not that he was any euill diſpoſed man, but becauſe he was a fond light headed fellow that cared for nothing: thereupon he ſtraight put the kings gowne on his backe, and not contented therewith, he did beſides ſet on many iewels of gold which kings onely are wont to weare, and womens trinckets and ornaments. Therewithall euery man in the Court murmured at him, becauſe it was a preſumptiõ, directly againſt the lawes & ordinances of PERSIA. Howbeit the king but laughed at it, and told him: I giue thee leaue Tiribazus to weare thoſe womens gawdes as a woman, and the kings robe as a foole. Furthermore, where the manner was in PERSIA that no perſon ſate at the kings bord, but his mother and wife, of the which, his mother ſate vppermoſt, and his wife lowermoſt: Artaxerxes made his two brethren Oſtanes and Oxathres ſit at his owne bord. But yet he pleaſed the PERSIANS beſt of all, becauſe he was content his wife Statyra ſhould ſit openly in her charret, and that ſhe might be ſeene and reuerenced by the other Ladyes of the country. And this made him ſingularly beloued of the people. Now, ſuch as deſired innouation and chaunge, and that could not away with quiet life: they gaue out that the Realme of PERSIA required ſuch a Prince as Cyrus, that was liberall of nature, giuen to armes, & greatly rewarded his ſeruaunts, and that the greatneſſe of the Empire of PERSIA ſtood in neede of a king, whoſe minde was bent to high attemptes and noble enterpriſes. So Cyrus thereupon began to make warre vpon his brother, not onely truſting vnto them that were of the low countreys about him, but hoping of thoſe alſo in the high prouinces neare vnto the king. Furthermore he wrote alſo vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, to pray them to ſend him men of warre, promiſing to giue the footemen they ſent, horſes: & the horſemen, coches: landed men, whole villages: and to thoſe that had villages, to giue them cities. Beſides all this, that for the ordinary wages of them that ſhould ſerue him in this warre, he would not pay them by account, but by full meaſure: and boaſting largely of himſelfe, he ſayd he had a greater minde then his brother, that he could better away with hardneſſe then he, that he vnderſtood magicke better then he, and that he could drinke more wine then he, and carie it better. And that the king his brother in contrary manner was ſo womaniſh and fearefull, that when he went a hunting, he durſt ſcarce get vp vpon his horſe backe: and when he went to the warres, he would hardly take his charriot. When the LACEDÆMONIANS had read his letters, they ſent a litle ſcrowle vnto Clearchus, commaunding him to obey Cyrus in any thing he would commaund him. So Cyrus did ſet forward to make warre againſt his brother, hauing leauied a great number of fighting men of barbarous nations, and of GRECIANS, litle leſſe then thirteen thouſand men: ſometime aduertiſing one cauſe, ſometime an other, why he leauied ſuch a multitude of men. But his purpoſe could not be long diſſembled: for Tiſaphernes went himſelfe vnto the Court, to bring newes of his attempt. Then all the Court was ſtraight in an vprore withall. Many men alſo did accuſe the Queene mother, for the practiſe of this warre, & all her friends & ſeruants were vehemently ſuſpected to be conſpiratours with Cyrus: but the greateſt thing that troubled Paryſatis moſt, was Queene Statyra her daughter in law, who ſtormed maruellouſly to ſee this warre begun againſt king Artaxerxes her husband, and inceſſantly cryed out on her: O, where is the faith thou vowedſt by othe? whereto are thy interceſsions come thou madeſt, for the pardon of his life: who now conſpireth his brothers death? By ſauing of his life, art not thou now the cauſe of this warre and troubles we ſee at hand? After this reproch and ſhame receiued by Statira, Paryſatis, being a cruell and malitious woman of nature, ſo hated her, that from thenceforth ſhe ſought all the wayes ſhe could to put her to death. And Dinon the Hiſtoriographer ſayth, that during this warre, ſhe did execute her wicked purpoſe vpon her: but Cteſias writeth, that it was after the warre. And therfore it is liker, that he being daily in the king of PERSIAES Court, ſhould certainly know the time when ſhe did execute her treaſon againſt her, and alſo there is no cauſe why he ſhould rather write it in any other time, then in that in the which the fact was done: although in many other places he commonly vſeth to fitten, and to write deuiſes of his owne head. Therefore let vs leaue the report of this fact to the ſelfe ſame time and place as he hath written it. Now when Cyrus drew neare vnto his brothers country, he had newes, and a rumor ranne through his campe, that the king was not determined to come and fight with him ſo ſoone: and that he meant firſt to go further into PERSIA, and to tary there till he had gathered his army together out of all parts. And for proofe hereof, the king hauing caſt a great trench of ten yardes broad, and as many high, the ſpace of foure hundred furlong in length: he left it without gard, and let Cyrus winne it, who came on further without any reſiſtance, euen to the very citie ſelfe of BABYLON. Howbeit in the end, Tiribazus (as it is reported) was the firſt man that durſt tell the king, that he ſhould not flie fight in that ſort, nor hide himſelfe in the fartheſt part of PERSIA, leauing his enemy the Realmes of MEDIA, BABYLON, and SVSA: conſidering alſo that he had many mo ſouldiers in readineſſe then his enemy, and an infinite number of Captaines more skilfull, and abler to giue counſell, and to fight, then he was. Theſe words of Tiribazus made the king alter his minde, and to determine to giue battell as ſoone as he could. Thereupon he marched forward againſt his enemy, with nine hundred thouſand fighting men, excellently well armed, and marching in very good order. That maruellouſly aſtonied Cyrus men, and made them afrayed at the firſt, when they ſaw them in ſo excellent good order before them: for that they were diſperſed ſtraggling here and there without any order, and men vnarmed, truſting too much in themſelues, in deſpiſing of their enemy: ſo that Cyrus had much a do to ſet his men it battell ray, and yet was it with great noyſe and tumult. But the GRECIANS wondred moſt of all other, when they ſaw the kings army march in ſo good order of battell without any noyſe. For they thought to haue ſeene a wonderfull great diſorder and confuſion, in ſuch an infinite multitude of people: and ſuppoſed they would haue made ſuch a noyſe, that one of them ſhould not haue heard an other. Where in deede to the contrary, all was ſo well marſhalled, ſpecially becauſe he had placed before his battell the beſt carts he had armed with ſiethes, and drawen with the ſtrongeſt and biggeſt great horſe he had in all his armie: hoping by the fierceneſſe and furie of their careere, to breake into theranckes of the enemies, before they could come to ioyne with theirs. But ſith this battell is deſcribed by diuers Hiſtoriographers, but ſpecially by Xenophon, who hath (as a man would ſay) liuely ſet it out to the eye, and ſetteth it forth to the Reader, not as a battell already fought, but preſently a fighting, ſtirring vp their mindes as if themſelues were in the action and inſtant daunger, he hath ſo paſsingly ſet it downe: it were but a follie therfore of me to take vpon me to make any further deſcription of it, ſauing to touch ſome ſpeciall points worthy of note, which he peraduenture hath left out. As,the place where the battell was fought,is called COUNAXA,fiue hundred furlongs from BABYLON: and how that before the battell, Clearchus gaue Cyrus counſell to keepe behind the ſquadron of the GRECIANS, and not to hazard his perſon among the firſt: and that Cyrus aunſwered him, what ſayeſt thou Clearchus? wouldeſt thou haue me that ſtriues to be king, to ſhew my ſelfe vnworthy to be a king? But Cyrus hauing made this fault, not ſtanding vpon his ſafetie and guard, but ouer raſhly thruſting himſelfe into great daunger: Clearchus ſelfe alſo committed as great a fault (if it were not worſe) when he would not ſet his men in order directly againſt the battell of the enemies, where the kings perſon ſtoode, but went and pent them vp by the riuers ſide, being affraide leaſt they ſhould haue beene compaſſed in behind. For if he would haue looked ſo ſtraightly to himſelfe, and haue prouided euery way for his ſafetie, that no man might come to hurt him: he ſhould haue kept himſelfe at home, and not haue ſturred one foote out of the dores. But ſith he had come ſo farre, as from the lowe countries of ASIA, vnto the place where the field was fought, and vncompelled, onely to put Cyrus in his fathers ſeate & imperiall crowne, to goe chooſe a place in the battell, not where he might doe his Lorde beſt ſeruice that had hyred him, but rather where he might fight more at his eaſe, and at leſſe daunger: it was euen as much, as if through cowardlineſſe his wits had bene taken from him when he ſhould haue fought, or that through treaſon he had forſaken his enterpriſe. For, to proue that the troupes which were about the kings perſon, had neuer beene able to haue receiued the charge of the GRECIANS, and that thoſe being ouerthrowen, the king had bene ſlaine in the fielde, or elſe forced to flie, and that Cyrus had wonne the field, and by this victorie had bene king: the ſucceſſe of this battell doth plainely ſhewe it. And therefore Clearchus ouer curious reſpect, deſerued more blame for the loſſe of this battell: then Cyrus ouerhardines. For if king Artaxerxes would haue choſen or wiſhed a place where the GRECIANS might haue done him leſſe hurt: he could not haue deuiſed a fitter place that was ſo farre from him, and from whence the GRECIANS could neither ſee nor heare what was done where he was, as it fell out in ſequell. For Cyrus was ſlaine before he could preuaile by Clearchus victorie, he was ſo farre from him: and furthermore, Cyrus therein knew before what was meeteſt to be done. For he commaunded Clearchus to place himſelfe with his company in the middeſt of the battell: who aunſwered him, he ſhould take no thought for nothing, for he would ſee all things well ordered. And when he had ſaide ſo, he marred all afterwards: For where the GRECIANS were, they ouerthrew the barbarous people that made head againſt them, and had them in chace while they were wearie of following of them. Cyrus being mounted vpon a hotte ſtirring horſe, that had a hard head, and was verie fierce and dogged, called Paſacas, as Cteſias writeth: Artagerſes, the gouernor of the prouince of the CADUSIANS, ſpyed him a farre off, and when he had found him, clapped ſpurres to his horſe, and came with full cariere vnto him, and cryed out: O traytor, and moſt vnfaithfull and deſperate man, thou now diſhonoreſt the name of Cyrus (which is the goodlieſt and moſt honorableſt name of all the PERSIANS) for that thou haſt brought ſo valiant GRECIANS hither to ſo wicked an enterpriſe, to ſpoyle the PERSIANS goods, in hope to deſtroy thy ſoueraigne Lorde and onely brother, who hath an infinite number of ſlaues and ſeruants farre honeſter men then thou wilt be while thou liueſt, and that thou ſhalt preſently knowe by proofe, for thou ſhalt die before thou ſee the king thy brothers face: and therewithall he threw his dart at him with all the force he had. But Cyrus armor was ſo good, that it pearſed him not: yet the blow came with ſuch good will, that it made him ſtagger on his horſe backe. When Artagerſes had giuen him that blow, he preſently turned his horſe. But Cyrus therewithall threw a dart at him ſo happily, that he ſlew him right in the place aboue the bone that ioyneth the two ſhoulders together: ſo that the head of his dart, ranne quite through his necke. Now, that Cyrus ſlew Artagerſes with his owne hands in the field, all the Hiſtoriographers doe agree vpon it: but for the death of Cyrus, becauſe Xenophon toucheth it but a litle by the way, for that he was not preſent in the very place where he was ſlaine: it ſhall not be hurtfull particularly to ſet downe the manner thereof, both according to the report of Dinon, and alſo of C*teſias*. Firſt, Dinon writeth, that after Cyrus had ſlaine Artagerſes, he went with great furie, and flue in amongſt the troupe of them which were neareſt vnto the kings perſon, and that he came ſo neare the king, that he ſlew his horſe ſtarke dead vnder him, and the king fell to the ground withall. But Tiribazus that was hard by him, ſtraight mounted the king againe vpon an other horſe, and ſaid vnto him: your grace will remember this battell an other day, for it is not to be forgotten. And Cyrus clapping ſpurres againe to his horſe, threwe an other dart at Artaxerxes, and hit him. But at the third charge, the king tolde them that were about him, he could not abide this, and that he had rather die then ſuffer it: ſo therewithall he ſpurring his horſe to charge Cyrus (who came fiercely and deſperately, hauing an infinite number of blowes with darts throwen at him on euery ſide) threw his dart at him alſo. So did all thoſe that were about his perſon: and ſo was Cyrus ſlaine in this conflict. Some ſay, that he was ſlaine with the wound the king his brother gaue him. Others ſay, that it was a man at armes of the countrie of CARIA, vnto whom the king for reward of his good ſeruice, gaue him the honor in all battels to carie before the firſt ranke, a cocke of gold on the toppe of a ſpeare: for the PERSIANS doe call the CARIANS cockes, becauſe in the warres they vſe to weare creaſts in the toppe of their headpeeces. And this is Dinons report. But Cteſias, to couch in fewe wordes that which Dinon reporteth at large, ſaith: that Cyrus after he had ſlaine Artagerſes, he gallopped on the ſpurre againſt the king himſelfe, and the king againſt him, and not a worde betwene them both. Ariaus one of Cyrus flatterers, threwe the firſt dart at the king, but killed him not: and the king with all his force againe threwe his dart, thinking to haue hit Cyrus, but he miſſed him, and ſlew Tiſaphernes, one of the valianteſt and ſtouteſt men Cyrus had about him, and ſo fell downe dead. Then Cyrus hit Artaxerxes ſo ſore a blow on his breaſt, that he pearced his armor, and entred into his fleſh two fingers deepe. The king with this blowe fell downe to the ground: wherewithall the moſt part of his men about him were ſo affraid, that they forſooke him and fled. Howbeit he got vp againe, with the helpe of others that were about him, amongſt whom Cteſias ſaide he was one: and ſo recouered a litle hill not farre off, to take a litle breath. In the meane time, Cyrus horſe that was hotte in the mouth, and hard headed as we haue tolde you: caried his maſter ſpight of his heart farre from his men, among his enemies, and no man knew him, becauſe it was night, and his men were very buſie in ſeeking for him. But Cyrus hoping he had wonne the victorie, being of a hotte ſtirring nature, and valiant: he went vppe and downe in the thickeſt of his enemies, crying out in the PERSIAN tongue, ſaue your ſelues poore men, ſaue your ſelues. When they heard him ſay ſo, ſome made a lane for him to paſſe by them, and did him reuerence: But by euill fortune his Tiara (which is the high royall hat after the PERSIAN maner) fell off from his head. Then a young PERSIAN called Mithridates, paſſing by him, hit him a blow with his dart vpon one of his temples, hard by his eye, not knowing what he was. His wound ſtraight fell on a maruellous bleeding. Whereupon, Cyrus ſtaggering at it, fell to the ground in a ſownd, and his horſe ranne away from him: but the capparison he had vppon him fell to the ground all bloudied, and his page that had hurt him, tooke it vp. Shortly after Cyrus being come to himſelfe againe, ſome of his Eunuches (which were men gelt, and groomes of his chamber) that were about him, did lift him vp, thinking to ſet him vpon an other horſe, and to get him out of the preaſe: but he was not able to ſit on his horſe. Thereupon he proued if he could better goe a foote, & the Eunuchs held him vp by the armes, & led him amaſed as he was, not able to ſtand on his feete, although he thought he had won the battell: becauſe he heard his enemies flying about him cry, the gods ſaue king Cyrus, and they prayed him to pardon them, and to receiue them to mercy. But in the meane time, there came certaine poore men of the citie of CAVNVS, who followed the kings campe, getting their liuing as drudges and ſlaues, to doe moſt vile ſeruice. They ioyned with the troupe where Cyrus was, ſuppoſing they had bene the kings men: but when they perceiued in the end by the red coates they ware vppon their armours, that they were enemies, for that the kings men ware white coates: there was one among the reſt that valiantly ſtrake at Cyrus behind with his pertiſan, not knowing in deede that it was Cyrus. The blow lighted full on the hamme of his legge and cut his ſinewes ſo, that Cyrus fell withall, and falling, by misfortune fell vpon a great ſtone with his browe, where he had bene hurt before, that he died forthwith. Thus doth Cteſias report it, where me thinketh he cutteth his throate with a dull edged knife, he hath ſuch a doe to bring Cyrus to his ende. Now after

Cteſias report of Cyrus death.

Cyrus hurt.

Cyrus miſerable deſtinie.

Cyrus was dead, Artaſyras, one of king Artaxerxes Eunuches, whom they called the kings eye in the Court: paſſing by a horſebacke, knew Cyrus Eunuches that mourned very pitifully, lamenting the death of their maſter. So he asked the Eunuch whom Cyrus loued beſt: who is that that is dead, O Pariſcas, that thou weepeſt ſo bitterly? Pariſcas anſwered him againe, ſeeſt thou not Artaſyras, that it is Cyrus but newly dead? Artaſyras wondred much when he ſaw him. So he comforted the Eunuch, and willed him in no caſe to goe from the bodie: and in the meane time he gallopped a pace to the king, who thought he had loſt all, and was very ill beſides, both for the great thirſt he ſuffred, as alſo for his wound he had on his breaſt. Now when the Eunuch came vnto the king, and told him with a ſmiling countenance the newes, how he had ſeene Cyrus dead: The king was ſo ioyfull at the newes, that he was deſirous him ſelfe forthwith to goe vnto the place where he lay to ſee him, and commaunded Artaſyras to bring him thither. But after he had conſidered better of it, he was counſelled not to goe thither himſelfe for feare of the GRECIANS, who they ſaid wonne all, and were yet chaſing and killing them in the field, that fled: But rather that he ſhould ſend a good company of men thither, to bring him iuſt report, whether the newes were true of his death or not. Vpon this aduiſe he ſtaied, and ſent thither thirtie men, euery man with torches in their handes. In the meane time, one of his Eunuches called Satibarzanes, ranne vp and downe to ſee if he could get any water for the king, that was almoſt dead for thirſt: for there was no water neare vnto him where he was, and beſides, his campe was farre from him. His Eunuch hauing runne vp and downe a great way to ſeeke it, met by chaunce with theſe poore ſlaues and porters the CAVNIANS, among the which one of them caried in an olde ragged goates ſkinne, about eight glaſſefuls of naughtie ſtincking water. So he preſently caried the ſame to the king, who dranke it vp euery whit. When the king had drunke it, the Eunuch asked him, if that naughtie water did him no hurt. The king ſware by the goddes vnto him, that he neuer dranke better wine, nor ſweeter water then that was, nor that pleaſed him better then that did: and therefore, ſaide he, I beſeech the goddes if it be not my happe to finde him that gaue thee this water to reward him, yet that it will pleaſe them to ſend him good fortune. As the king was talking thus with his Eunuch, the thirty men with their torches returned vnto him, who altogether with ioyfull countenance, confirmed the good newes he looked not for: and then there were come together againe a great number of ſouldiers about him, and ſtill came moe one after another, that he beganne againe to be couragious. Then he came downe into the plaine, with a world of lights and torches about him, and went ſtraight to the place where his brother Cyrus body lay. There, following the ancient manner of the PERSIANS againſt traytors to the king: he cauſed his head and right hand to be ſtriken off, and then made his head be brought vnto him, the which he tooke by the haires of his head (for Cyrus ware them long and thicke) and did himſelfe ſhew it vnto them that fled ſtill, and were affraide, to encourage them againe. They wondering to ſee it, did him humble reuerence, and ſo gathered by companies about the king, that in a ſmall time there were gathered together about him, three ſcore and tenne thouſand fighting men, with the which he tooke his way againe towards the campe. In deede Cteſias ſaith, that he had but foure hundred thouſand fighting men in all: but Dinon and Xenophon ſay more. And for the number of them that were ſlaine, Cteſias ſaith, that word was brought to the king, that there were not aboue nyne thouſand ſlaine, howbeit that to ſight they ſeemed to be no leſſe then twentie thouſand. But for that point, he might be talked withall, in either of both. But furthermore, where he ſaith that the king did ſend him with Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN vnto the GRECIANS, and others with him: that is a flat lie. For Xenophon knew right well, that this Cteſias waited vpon the king, becauſe he ſpeaketh of him in diuers places of his hiſtorie: and if he had bene appointed by the king to carie report vnto the GRECIANS of ſo waightie a matter, it is like enough Xenophon would not haue concealed it, when he nameth Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN. But Cteſias (as it appeareth by his writings) was a very ambitious man, and partial vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, but ſpecially vnto Clearchus: & is glad when he can get any occaſion to ſpeake of himſelfe for his glorie, of LACEDÆMON, and of Clearchus. Now after this battell, king Artaxerxes ſent goodly rich giftes vnto Artagerſes ſonne, whoſe father Cyrus had ſlaine with his owne hands, and as it is reported, did alſo

How Artaxerxes rewarded the good, and alſo puniſhed the euill greatly honor Cteſias and many others: and did not forget alſo to cauſe the poore CAVNIAN ſlaue to be ſought out, that had giuen him the water to be caried to him which ſaued his life: & when he had found him out, of a poore wretch vnknowen before, he made him a rich noble man. He ſeuerely puniſhed thoſe alſo that had offended the martiall law, as amongſt others, Arbaces, one of the MEDES: who when the battell was ioyned, he fled firſt on Cyrus ſide, and then when he vnderſtoode he was ſlaine, he returned againe to the kings ſide. For, ſuppoſing that it was rather timerouſnes and cowardly nature, then for treaſon or euill wil he bare him: he compelled him to carie a whore on his backe ſtarke naked, all day long about the market place. And to an other, who beſides he had yeelded himſelfe to his enemies, falſely boaſted that he had ſlaine two: he made his tongue to be boared thorough in three ſeuerall places with a cordiners alle. Now the king being of opinion that it was himſelfe that had ſlaine his brother Cyrus with his owne hand, and being deſirous that euery man ſhould ſo thinke & ſay: he ſent preſents vnto Mithridates, that had hurt him firſt in the forehead, and commaunded him that caried the gifts vnto him, to tell him from the king: the king doth ſend thee theſe preſents, becauſe thou finding firſt the cappariſon of Cyrus horſe, diddeſt bring it vnto the king. The CARIAN alſo that had cut the hamme of his legge wherwith Cyrus fell downe, asked his gift likewiſe: the which the king gaue him, and bad the meſſenger tell him, the king doth giue thee this, becauſe thou waſt the ſecond perſon that broughteſt him the good newes. For Artaſyras was the firſt, and thou the ſecond, that brought him newes of the death of Cyrus. Now Mithridates, albeit he was not well pleaſed in his mind with thoſe wordes, he went his way, and ſaid nothing then, nor made any thing a doe: but the vnfortunate CARIAN fondly fell into a fooliſh vaine, common vnto men. For, the ſodaine ioy he felt (as it ſeemeth) to ſee ſuch a goodly rich preſent before him, as the king ſent him: made him ſo forget himſelfe, that he began to aſpire, and to pretend greater things, then became his ſtate and calling. And therefore he would not take the kings gift, as in reſpect that he had brought him worde of Cyrus death: but began to ſtorme, and to rage, calling the gods to witneſſe, that it was he onely, and none other, that ſlew Cyrus, and that they did him great wrong, to take this honor from him. The king being told of it, tooke it ſo angrily: that he preſently commaunded them to ſtrike off his head. But Paryſatis (the Queene mother) being preſent with the king gaue this commaundement, ſhe prayed him not to put him to death in that ſort: for the villaine, ſaid ſhe, let me alone, I will chaſtiſe him well enough for his preſumption and raſh ſpeech. The king was contented ſhe ſhould haue him. Thereuppon ſhe ſent the Sergeants to take this curſed CARIAN, and made him be hanged vpon a gybbet ten daies together, and at the tenne dayes end, cauſed his eyes to be pulled out of his head, and laſt of all, poured molten mettall into his eares, and ſo killed the villaine with this kind of torment. Mithridates alſo ſhortly after, died miſerably by a like follie. He was bidden to ſupper at a feaſt, whither came alſo the king and Queene mothers Eunuches: and when they came, Mithridates ſate downe at the bord in the kings golden gowne he gaue him. When they had ſupped, and that they beganne to drinke one to another, one of Paryſatis Eunuches ſaid vnto Mithridates: the king hath in deede giuen thee a goodly gowne Mithridates, and goodly chaines and carcanets of gold, and ſo is the ſworde very rich and good he gaue thee, ſo that when thou haſt that by thy ſide, there is no man I warrant thee but will thinke thee a happy man. Mithridates then, the wine fuming into his braine, anſwered ſtraight: what meaneſt thou by that, Sparamixes? I deſerued a better than this, when the battell was fought. Then Sparamixes laughing on him, anſwered, I do not ſpeake it for any hurt or euill will I beare thee, Mithridates: but to ſpeake frankly among our ſelues, becauſe the GRECIANS haue a cõmon prouerbe, that wine telleth true, I pray thee tell me, what valiant act was it to take vp a cappariſon of a horſe that fell on the ground, and to carie it to the king? which the Eunuch ſpitefully put forth vnto him, not that he was ignorant who did it, but to prouoke him to ſpeake, and to put him in a rage, knowing that he was a haſtie man of nature, & could not kepe his tongue, & leaſt of all when he had drunke ſo well as he had done, and ſo it fell out in deede. For Mithridates could not bite it in, but replyed ſtraight: you may take as long as you liſt of the cappariſon of a horſe, & ſuch traſh, but I tell you plainly, that Cyrus was ſlaine with mine owne hands, and with no mans els. For I hit him not in vaine as Artagerſes did, but full in the forehead hard by his eye, and ſtrake him through and through his head againe, and ſo ouerthrew him, of which blow he died. He had no ſooner ſpoken thoſe words, but the reſt that were at the bord, caſt downe their eies, foreſeeing the death of this poore & vnfortunate Mithridates. But then the maſter of the feaſt began to ſpeak, and ſaid vnto him: friend Mithridates, I pray thee let vs drinke and be merie, and reuerence and thanke the good fortune of our king, and for the reſt, let this talke goe, it is too high for vs. When the Eunuch went from thence, he tolde Paryſatis the Queene mother what Mithridates had ſaide before them all: and ſhe went and told the king of it. Who was maruellouſly offended withall to be ſo belyed, and to loſe the thing that was moſt honorable, and beſt pleaſed him in his victorie. For it was his mind, that all the world (both GRECIANS and barbarous people) ſhould certainely beleue, that in the battell betwixt him and his brother he was hurt, but yet that he ſlew Cyrus with his owne hand. So the king cōmanded that Mithridates ſhould ſuffer the paines of death in botes, the which is after this manner. They take two botes made of purpoſe ſo euen, that the one is neither broader nor longer then the other, & then lay the offender in one of them vpon his backe, and ſo couer him with the other, & do ſow both botes together: So that the parties feete, hands, and head do come out at holes made of purpoſe for him, the reſt of his bodie is all hidden within. Nowe they giue him meate as much as he will eate, and if he will not eate, they force him to it, by thruſting alles in his eyes: then when he hath eaten, they giue him honey to drinke mingled with milke, and they do not only poure it into his mouth, but alſo all his face ouer, turning him full into the ſunne, ſo that his face is all couered ouer with flies: and furthermore, being driuen to do his needes in that trough, of his excrements there ingender wormes that eate his bodie euen to the very priuities. Then, when they ſee the man is dead, they take off the vppermoſt bote, and find all his fleſh deuoured with vermine ingendring of him, euen to his very intrals. So, when Mithridates had miſerably languiſhed in this manner, ſeuenteene daies together: at length he died in extreame torments. Now Paryſatis (the Queene mother) lacked no more to accompliſh her wicked deſire, but Meſabates, one of the kings Eunuchs that had cut off Cyrus head and hand: and ſeeing that he was very warie & circumſpect in his behauior, that ſhe could not take him at any aduantage: in the ende ſhe deuiſed a fine way to intrap him. She had a maruellous wit, and among other things could play paſſingly well at all games at dice, & did many times play with the king her ſonne before the wars: and after the warres alſo, when he had made peace, ſhe did play at dice with him as ſhe had done before, in ſo much as ſhe knew all his ſecret loue, and furthered him to enioy it. To be ſhort, ſhe would neuer be out of his ſight but as litle as ſhe could, and would let his wife Statira haue as litle time with him as might be, that ſhe might gouerne and rule him as ſhe would: both becauſe ſhe hated her of all creatures liuing, and alſo for that ſhee would beare the greateſt ſway and credite about him. When ſhe ſaw the king one day at leaſure, not knowing how to paſſe the time away: ſhe inticed him to play a thouſand Dareckes at dice, and was contented to loſe them willingly, and paied the thouſand Darecks downe, ſeeming notwithſtanding to be angry with her loſſe. So ſhe prayed him alſo to play one of his Eunuches with her: & the king was well contented with it. But before they would play, they agreed betweene them that they ſhould both name and except fiue of the truſtieſt and chiefeſt Eunuches they had: & then, which of them loſt, ſhould preſently deliuer vnto the winner his choice of all the other Eunuches he would demaund. Thus they fell to play, and ſhe imploying all the cunning ſhe had, and playing as warily as ſhe could poſſible, beſides that the dice ranne on her ſide, her lucke ſerued her ſo, that ſhe wanne: and then ſhe required Meſabates for her winnings, being none of thoſe the king had excepted. When ſhe had him deliuered her, ſhe gaue him to the hangmen, and willed them to flea him aliue, & then that they ſhould crucifie him, & naile him to a croſſe, & hang his skin vpon an other peece of timber by him: the which was done accordingly. The king was maruellous angry withall when he knew it, and greeuouſly offended with his mother. Howbeit ſhe ſported it out, and laughing told him: indeede it becomes thee wel to be angry for loſing an old gelded villaine, where I loſt a 1000 Darecks quietly, & ſaid neuer a word. So there came no other thing of it, ſauing that the king was a litle angry, & repented him that he had plaied ſo fondly and was ſo finely mocked. But Queene

Statira on the other ſide, beſides that ſhe was againſt her in all other things: ſhe ſpared not to tel Queene mother plainly, that it was wickedly done of her, to put the kings good & faithful ſeruants ſo cruelly to death, for Cyrus ſake. But now, after that Tiſaphernes (king Artaxerxes Lieutenant) had deceiued Clearchus, & other captaines of GRECE, deteſtably falſifying his word he had giuen them, & that he had ſent thē bound vnto the king: Cteſias ſaith, that Clearchus praied him to helpe him to a combe, & that hauing had one by his meanes, & alſo comed his head, it pleaſed him ſo well, that to requite his good will, he gaue him his ſeale of armes from his finger wherewith he ſealed his letters, for a witnes of the great friendſhip that was betwene them two. He ſaith alſo that in the ſtone of this ring there was grauen the dance of the CARYATIDES. And furthermore, that the other ſouldiers which were priſoners with Clearchus, did take away the moſt part of the victuals that were ſent to him, & left him litle or nothing: and that he did remedie all this, procuring a greater quantitie to be ſent vnto them, & that they ſhould put Clearchus portion a part, and all the other ſouldiers part alſo by themſelues. This he did, as he ſaith, by Paryſatis conſent and commaundement, who knowing that amongſt other victuals they daily ſent Clearchus a gammon of bacon: ſhe tolde him one day he ſhould doe well to hide a litle knife in this gammon of bacon, and to ſend it him, to the end that the life of ſo noble and valiant a man as he was, ſhould not fall to the crueltie of the king. Howbeit, that he was affraid to meddle withall, and durſt not doe it: and that the king ſware, and promiſed his mother (who was an earneſt ſuter to him for Clearchus) that he would not put him to death. This notwithſtanding, the king being afterwards procured, and perſwaded to the contrarie, by Queene Statira his wife: he put them all to death, but Menon. Therefore Paryſatis, Queene mother, after that time (ſaith Cteſias) deuiſed all the waies ſhe could to poyſon Queene Statira, and to make her out of the way. But me thinketh this ſmelleth like a lie, that Paryſatis ſhould entend ſo wicked and daungerous an act, as to put the kings lawfull wife to death, by whom he had ſonnes that were to inherite the crowne, only for the loue and reſpect of Clearchus: and it is too plaine that he coyned that, to honour and magnifie Clearchus memorie the more. But to proue it, a man may eaſily find it by the lies he addeth afterwardes vnto it: ſaying, that after the Captaines were ſlaine, all the bodies of the reſt were torne a peeces by dogs and fowles: and alſo that there came a boyſterous winde, and couered all Clearchus bodie with a great hill of duſt, and that out of this hill of duſt ſhortly after there ſprung vppe many palme trees, which made a pretie thicke groue, that it ſhadowed all that place. Inſomuch that the king himſelfe did afterwardes marueilouſly repent him for putting of him to death, for that he was an honeſt man, and beloued of the gods. This was not for Clearchus ſake, but for an olde canckered malice Paryſatis had long time borne in her heart againſt Queene Statira: becauſe ſhe ſaw well enough, that the credite and authoritie her ſelfe had with the king, was in reſpect of a ſonnes dutie and obedience to his mother, and in contrary maner, Statiraes credit and authoritie had a better ground and foundation, becauſe it came of the loue and good will the king did beare her. And this is the only cauſe that made her to practiſe the death of Queene Statira, hauing determined that her ſelfe, or daughter in law, muſt needes die. Now Queene mother had one of the women of her chamber called Gigis, that was of great credite about her, and whom ſhe onely truſted. Dinon writeth, that this Gigis did helpe Paryſatis to make the poyſon. But Cteſias writeth contrarily, and ſaith that ſhe onely knew it, but otherwiſe that it was againſt her will: and that he that made the poyſon, was one Belitaras, but Dinon calleth him Melantas. Now, though in outwarde ſemblance and ſhew Queene mother and Statira ſeemed to haue forgotten all malice betwene them, and that they began againe one of them to keepe company with the other, and did eate and drinke together: yet one of them miſtruſted the other, and tooke great heede to themſelues, both of them eating one ſelfe meate, and in one diſh together, and were both ſerued with one ſelfe officers and men. In PERSIA there is a litle bird, of the which all the partes of it is excellent good to eate, and is full of fatte within: ſo that it is thought it liueth by ayre and dewe, and in the PERSIAN tongue they call it Ryntaces. Paryſatis, as Cteſias ſaieth, tooke one of theſe birdes, and cut it in the middeſt with a litle knife, the which was poyſoned onely on one of the ſides, and gaue that halfe which was poyſoned vnto Statira. Yet Dinon writeth, that it was not Paryſatis her ſelfe that gaue it her, but her caruer Melantas that carued her meate, and ſtill gaue Queene Statyra of that meate which the ſide of his poyſoned knife had touched. So Queen Statyra preſently fell ſicke of the diſeaſe whereof ſhe died, with grieuous pangs and gripings in her bowels, and found plainely that ſhe was poyſoned by Paryſatis meanes: whereuppon ſhee told the king as much, who was of the ſame opinion, and thought it was his mother, becauſe he knew her cruell reuenging minde, that neuer pardoned any, againſt whom ſhe conceiued any grudge. The king therfore to know the troth, when his wife Statira was dead, apprehended all his mothers houſhold ſeruants and officers, and did put them to torments, to make them confeſſe the troth, ſauing Gigis, whom Queen mother kept cloſe in her chamber a long time, and would neuer ſuffer the king to haue her: who earneſtly requeſted her to deliuer her vnto him. Notwithſtanding, Gigis her ſelfe at length prayed Queene mother to giue her leaue one night to goe home to her houſe. The king vnderſtanding it, layed waite for her, and intercepted her by the way: and when ſhe was taken, he condemned her to ſuffer the paines of death ordayned for poyſoners, the which in PERSIA is executed in this maner. They make them put their head vpon a great plaine ſtone, and with an other ſtone they preſſe and ſtrike it ſo long, till they haue daſhed the brains of the malefactor out of their head. After this ſort was Gigis put to death. Now for Paryſatis his mother, the king did her no other hurt, nor ſayed no more vnto her, but confined her vnto BABYLON according to her deſire, and ſware, that whileſt ſhe liued, he would neuer ſee BABYLON. In this ſtate ſtoode the affaires of the king. But now, Artaxerxes hauing done the vtmoſt he could to haue ouercome the GRECIANS which came to make war with him in the heart of his Realme, and would haue bene as glad of that, as he was to haue ouercome Cyrus, and to keepe his crowne and Realme: he could neuer preuaile againſt them. For though they had loſt Cyrus that gaue them entertainement, and all their priuate Captaines that led them: they ſaued them ſelues notwithſtanding, being in the heart of his Realme, and ſhewed the PERSIANS by experience, that all their doings was nothing but gold and ſiluer, curioſity, and faire women, and otherwiſe, nothing but pompe and vanity. Hereuppon all the GRECIANS became couragious, and deſpiſed the barbarous people: inſomuch that the LACEDÆMONIANS thought it a great ſhame and diſhonor vnto them, if they did not deliuer the GRECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, from the ſlauery and bondage of the PERSIANS, and kept them from the open violence and cruelty of the barbarous people. For they hauing at other times attempted to doe it by their Captaine Thimbron, and afterwards alſo by Dercillidas, whom they ſent thither with an army, and hauing done nothing worthy memory: at length they determined to ſend their king Ageſilaus thither in perſon, who paſſing through ASIA with his ſhips, began preſently to make hot warre againſt the PERSIANS as ſoone as euer he had landed his army. For, at the firſt conflict he ouerthrew Tiſaphernes (the king of PERSIAES Lieutenant) in battell, and made the moſt part of the cities of GREECE that are in ASIA, to rebell againſt him. Artaxerxes looking into this warre, and wiſely conſidering what way and meanes he was to take, to make warre with the GRECIANS: he ſent into GREECE one Hermocrates a RHODIAN, (of great credit about him) with a maruellous ſumme of gold and ſiluer, bountifully to beſtow in gifts among the nobility and chiefe rulers of the cities of GREECE, to make all the other GRECIANS to riſe againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS. Hermocrates wiſely executed his cōmiſſion, for he made the chiefeſt cities of GREECE to rebell againſt LACEDÆMON: ſo that all PELOPONNESVS being vp in arms, and in great garboile, the Ephori at LACEDÆMON were inforced to ſend for Ageſilaus home againe. Ageſilaus being ſory to depart out of ASIA, ſaied vnto his friends: that the king of PERSIA had driuen him out of his Realme with thirty thouſand archers: becauſe that the PERSIAN coine is ſtamped with an archer, hauing a bow in his hand. Artaxerxes alſo draue the LACEDÆMONIANS out of al their iuriſdiction by ſea, by the meanes of Conon, generall of the ATHENIANS, whom Pharnabazus (one of his Lieutenants) had wonne to take his part. For Conon, after he was ouerthrowen in battell at a place called the goates riuer, kept euer after in the Ile of CYPRVS, not ſo much for the ſafety of his perſon, as alſo for that it was a meet place to ſtay in, vntil the wars of GREECE were appeaſed. He knowing that the deuiſe he had in his head, lacked power to put it in execution, and on the contrary ſide, that the power of the king lacked a man of deepe iudgement to be employed: he wrote

letters vnto him of his deuiſe what he thought to doe, ſtraightly charging him whom he deliuered his letters vnto, that if he could poſſibly, he ſhould cauſe the ſame to be deliuered vnto the king by Zenon the CRETAN, one of the kings dancers, or by one Polycritus his Phiſition, borne in the city of MENDE: and in both their abſences, then to giue it vnto Cteſias, to deliuer vnto the king. It chanced ſo that this letter came to the hands of Cteſias: who (as it is reported) added moreouer vnto the contents of the letter, that the king ſhould ſend him vnto Conon, becauſe he was a neceſſary mã to be employed in his ſeruice, but ſpecially by ſea. Cteſias ſaith not ſo, but writeth that the king of his owne voluntary motion gaue him this charge. Now, after Artaxerxes had through the leading of Conon and Pharnabazus, won the battel by ſea neare to the Ile of GNIDVS, and that thereby he had driuen al the LACEDÆMONIANS from their iuriſdiction by ſea, al GREECE had him in maruellous great eſtimation: ſo that he gaue vnto the GRECIANS with ſuch conditions as he would, that ſo famous peace, called Antalcidas peace. This Antalcidas was a citizen of SPARTA, the ſon of one Leon, who fauoring king Artaxerxes affairs, procured by the treaty of this peace, that the LACEDÆMONIANS left vnto Artaxerxes all the cities of GREECE in ASIA, and all the Iles contained in the ſame, to enioy quietly making them pay tribute at his pleaſure. This peace being concluded with the GRECIANS (if ſo ſhamefull a treaſon, reproch, and common infamy to all GREECE may be called a peace, as neuer warre fell out more diſhonorable and infamous for the vanquiſhed) king Artaxerxes that otherwiſe hated the LACEDÆMONIANS to the death, and that eſteemed them (as Dinon writeth) the impudenteſt men liuing: did notwithſtanding loue Antalcidas paſſingly well, and entertained him very honorably, when he came into PERSIA vnto him. It is reported that the king one day tooke a garland of flowers, and did wet it with the moſt precious and ſweeteſt oile of perfume that was prepared for the feaſt, and ſent the ſame vnto Antalcidas: inſomuch as euery man maruelled to ſee the king ſet ſo much by him. In deed he was a meet man to follow the vanity and curioſity of the PERSIANS, and had wel deſerued ſuch a garland to be ſent him: who was ſo bold to daunce a daunce before the PERSIANS, mocking and counterfeyting Leonidas and Callicratidas, two of the valianteſt men that euer were in GREECE. Therefore one ſaid at that time in the preſence of king Ageſilaus: O how vnhappy is poore GREECE at this day, when the LACEDÆMONIANS come to follow the PERSIANS? But Ageſilaus preſently aunſwered him againe, not ſo, ſaid he: but rather the PERSIANS follow the LACEDÆMONIANS. Notwithſtanding, this wiſe aunſwere Ageſilaus made, did not take away the ſhame of the fact: and ſhortly after, the LACEDÆMONIANS loſt the battell of LEVCTRES, and therwith alſo the ſigniory and principality they had kept of long time ouer all GREECE, although they had loſt their eſtimation before, for conſenting to ſo ſhameful and diſhonorable a peace. When SPARTA floriſhed moſt, and was chiefe of all the other cities of GREECE: ſo long did Artaxerxes ſtill continue to make much of Antalcidas, and called him his friend. But after that the LACEDÆMONIANS had loſt the battel of LEVCTRES, hauing receiued ſo gret an ouerthrow and wanting money: they ſent Ageſilaus into ÆGYPT, and Antalcidas into PERSIA, vnto king Artaxerxes, to pray him to aide and helpe the LACEDÆMONIANS. Howbeit the king made ſo ſmall accompt of him, and diſdained him ſo much, denying him, and his requeſts: that he returned backe to SPARTA, as a man knocked on the head, without any thing done with the king. And there alſo ſeeing that his enemies mocked him: & fearing that the Ephori would commit him to priſon: he killed himſelf with famine. About that time alſo, the THEBANS after they had won the battell of LEVCTRES, ſent Iſmenias and Pelopidas into PERSIA, vnto king Artaxerxes: where Pelopidas did nothing vnworthy of him ſelfe. Howbeit Iſmenias being commanded to kneele to the king, he let fall his ring at his feete, & ſtouped to take it vp: whereby it was thought of ſome that he did it to kneele to the king. Another time Artaxerxes liking a ſecret aduertiſment very well ſent him from Timagoras the ATHENIAN: he gaue him tenne thouſand daricks by his Secretary called Belluris. And becauſe he had a ſickly body, & was driuen to drinke cowes milke to reſtore him: the king therefore ſent foure ſcore milch kine with him to giue milke to the paile, to haue freſh milke euery day. Furthermore, he ſent him a bed throughly furniſhed with all things neceſſary, & groomes of the chamber to make his bed, ſaying, that the GRECIANS could not tell how to make it: and did alſo let him haue men to carie him vpon their armes to the ſea ſide, becauſe he was ſicke, and whileſt he was at the Court, he entertained him very honorably and bountifully. So Oſtanes, the kings brother, ſayd one daie vnto him: Timagoras, remember how honorably thou art ſerued at thy borde, for it is not for no ſmall matter thou art thus made of. This word was rather to cut him for his treaſon, then for any remembrance of the benefit receiued. So the ATHENIANS afterwards condemned the ſame Timagoras to die, becauſe he had taken bribes and money of the king of PERSIA. But Artaxerxes in recompence of ſo many other things that he had done, to deſpite the GRECIANS with, he did one thing that pleaſed them maruellouſly: when he did put Tiſaphernes to death, who was the dreadfulleſt enemy the GRECIANS had. Paryſatis the Queen mother did help to bring this to paſſe, aggrauating the accuſations brought in againſt him. For the king kept not his anger long againſt his mother, but fell in againe with her, and ſent for her, knowing that ſhe had an excellent witte and noble courage to gouerne a great kingdome: and beſides, that there was nothing now to let them to come together as much as they would, to giue any occaſion of iealouſie or malice to any perſon. So euer after, his mother Paryſatis endeuored her ſelfe to feede the king her ſonnes humor euery maner of way, ſeeming to miſlike nothing that he did: Whereby ſhe grew in great credit with him, that he denied her nothing whatſoeuer ſhee asked him. So ſhee perceiued that the king was extreamely in loue with one of his owne Daughters, that was called Atoſſa: howbeit that he diſſembled his loue the beſt he could, and kept it ſecret, chiefely for feare of her, although ſome write, that in deede he had already had her maydenhead. Now Paryſatis hauing found his loue, ſhee beganne to make more of his Daughter then ſhe did before, and talking with her father, ſometime ſhee praiſed her beauty, another time her grace and good countenaunce, ſaying that ſhee was like a Queene and noble Princeſſe. So that at length by litle and litle ſhee perſwaded him to marry her openly, not paſſing for the lawes and opinions of the GRECIANS, conſidering that God had giuen him vnto the PERSIANS, to ſtabliſhe lawes vnto them, to decyde right from wrong, and the good from the bad. Some Hiſtoriographers doe write, and amongeſt them Heraclides of CVMES: that Artaxerxes did not onely mary the eldeſt of his daughters, but the ſecond alſo called Ameſtris, of whom we will ſpeake hereafter. Now when he had maried the eldeſt, Atoſſa, he loued her ſo entirely well, that though ſhe fell ſicke of the diſeaſe commonly called Vitiligo, that ranne ouer all her body: he loued her not the worſe for it, but prayed continually for her vnto the goddeſſe Iuno, honoring no other goddeſſe but her onely, and fell downe on his knees before her image, and ſent by his friendes and Lieutenaunts ſo many offerings, that all the way from his Court gates vnto the temple of Iuno, (which was ſixteene furlong off) was full of gold, ſiluer, rich purple ſilkes, and horſe that were ſent thither. He beganne to make warre alſo with the ÆGYPTIANS, and made Pharnabazus and Iphicrates ATHENIAN, his Lieutenaunts, who did no good, becauſe they fell at variance the one with the other. But afterwards, Artaxerxes him ſelfe went in perſon to conquer the CADVSIANS with three hundred thouſand footemen, and tenne thouſand horſemen. So he inuaded their countrey, which was a very rude countrey, alway darke and cloudy. The earth bringeth forth nothing that man ſoweth, but doth onely feede the inhabitants with peares, aples, and ſuch like fruite, and yet the men be very ſtrong and valiant notwithſtanding. So when he was entred farre into the countrey before he was ware, he fell into great want of victuals, and was alſo in great danger. For his ſouldiers found nothing in all the countrey that was good to eate, and worſt of all, no victuals could come vnto them from any place, becauſe of the hardnes and naughty wayes of the countrey: So that his campe liued onely with the fleſh of their beaſtes of cariage, and yet they ſold it dearely: for, an aſſes head was ſold for three ſcore ſiluer Drachmas. To conclude, the famine was ſo great, that prouiſion failed for the kings owne mouth, and there were but few horſe left, for all the reſt were eaten. Then Tiribazus, that had oftentimes bene chiefe about the king, becauſe he was a valiant man, and that through his folly was many times alſo out of fauor, as at that preſent time, when he had no authority nor eſtimation: he deuiſed a ſtratageme, whereby he ſaued the king and all his campe. In this country of the CADVSIANS, there were two kings in the field with their armies, both of them camped a ſunder one from the other. Tiribazus, after he had ſpoken with king Artaxerxes, and had told him what he

ment to doe: he went vnto one of the kings, and at the ſelfe ſame time alſo ſecretly ſent his ſonne vnto the other king, and told either of them, that the other king had ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Artaxerxes to make peace with him, vnwitting to his companion, and therefore hee counſelled them if they were wiſe, one of them to ſeeke to preuent another with all the poſſible ſpeede he could, and promiſed them both, one after another, to helpe them the beſt he could. Both the one and the other of the kings gaue credit to his wordes, either of them both miſtruſting one another: ſo that the one ſpeedily ſent his Ambaſſadors vnto king Artaxerxes, with Tiribazus, and the other alſo his Ambaſſadors with his ſon. But Tiribazus tarying long in his iorney, king Artaxerxes beganne ſomewhat to ſuſpect him, his enemies alſo did accuſe him in his abſence, and the king grew very chollericke, and repented him that he had truſted him ſo farre, and was willing to heare euery man that ſpake againſt him. Howbeit Tiribazus at length returned, and his ſonne alſo, and either of them brought with them the Ambaſſadors of the CADVSIANS, and ſo peace was taken with them both. Then was Tiribazus aloft againe, and in greater credit then euer he was, and ſo departed with the king. The king then ſhewed plainely, that cowardlines proceedeth not of pompe and curioſity, as ſome take it, beleeuing that it doth effeminate mens hearts, but rather of a vile baſe mind, that commonly followeth euill, and the worſt counſell. For neither the iewels of gold, the kingly robe, nor other ſumptuous ornaments which the king euer ware about him, worth twelue thouſand talentes as it is reported, did not hinder him at that time to trauaile, and to take as much paine as any man in all his army. For he him ſelfe marched a foote the foremoſt man, carying his owne truſſe in a ſcarfe vppon his ſhoulders, and his target on his arme, and trauelled through high ſtony mountaines. So that his ſouldiers ſeeing the courage and paine the king him ſelfe tooke, they marched ſo nimbly, that it ſeemed they had wings: for he dayly marched aboue two hundred furlongs. Now the king at length by ſore trauell, came to one of his owne houſes, where there were goodly arbors and parkes, with goodly trees paſſingly ſette forth: but all the countrey beſides was naked and barren, ſo that there was not a tree a great way from thence, and it was maruellous cold. The king ſuffered his ſouldiers to hew downe the goodly pines and cypres trees in his parkes: and becauſe they durſt not preſume to touch them, he him ſelfe as he was tooke an axe in his hand and beganne to hew downe the goodlieſt tree there. The ſouldiers ſeeing that, fell euery man of them alſo to hewing: ſo that in a very ſhort time they had prouided them ſelues well with wodde, and made them great fires in euery place, and ſo paſt ouer the night quietly by the fires ſide. This notwithſtanding, he loſt a great number of valiant men in this voyage, and almoſt all his horſes. Therefore thinking his men would mocke him, becauſe hee did fayle of his purpoſe: he beganne to grow miſtruſtfull, and to ſuſpect the chiefeſt noble men he had about him: ſo that in a rage he put many of them to death, but much more of them remained, whom he miſtruſted. For there is nothing more cruell, nor a greater bloud ſucker, then a cowardly tyrant: as in contrary manner nothing is more curteous, and leſſe ſuſpicious, then a valiant and hardy man. And therefore brute beaſtes that be neuer made tame nor maſtered, are commonly cowardly, and timerous: and the other to the contrary, that are noble and coragious, are bold ſtraight, and doe come to know a man, becauſe they haue no feare, neither doe they flie from their clapping and making much of them as they doe. Afterwards king Artaxerxes being growen very olde, heard that there was great ſturre and contention betweene his ſonnes, which of them ſhould be heire after his death, and that this contention fell out alſo among his friendes and men of great calling. The wiſeſt of them wiſhed, that as he him ſelfe came vnto the crowne, as his fathers eldeſt ſonne: ſo that hee likewiſe ſhould after his death leaue it vnto his eldeſt ſonne, called Darius. But the younger, which was called Ochus, being a valiant man, and of a whot ſtirring nature, had ſome in the Court alſo that tooke his part, and hoped to attaine to his purpoſe, by the meanes of his ſiſter Atoſſa, whom he loued and honored, promiſing to mary her, and to make her Queene, if he might come to be king after his fathers deceaſe. And beſides, there went a report abroad, that in their fathers life time he ſecretly kept her: howbeit Artaxerxes neuer vnderſtood it. Now, becauſe he would betimes put his ſonne Ochus out of all hope to ſucceede him in the kingdome, leaſt this expectation might make him to goe about to practiſe that which Cyrus did, and that by this meanes his Realme ſhould grow into faction and ciuill warres: he proclaimed his eldeſt ſonne Darius ( being fiftie yeare olde) king after his death, and furthermore gaue him leaue from thenceforth to weare the poynt of his hat right vp. In PERSIA the cuſtome is, that when any commeth to be proclaymed ſucceſſor and heire apparaunt to the crowne, hee ſhould require a gift of him that proclaymeth him ſucceſſor. The which the other doth graunt him, whatſoeuer it be that hee asketh, ſo it be not impoſſible. Darius then asked his father a concubine called Aſpaſia, who was firſt with Cyrus, and in greateſt fauour with him aboue all the reſt, but then was for the kings owne body. Shee was borne in the countrey of IONIA, of free parents: and being vertuouſly brought vp, ſhee was brought one night vnto Cyrus as he was at ſupper with other women, who ſate them downe, without too curious bidding, hard by him, and were very glad when Cyrus offered to play and be merry with them, giuing euery one of them ſome pleaſant word, and they made it not coy. But Aſpaſia ſtoode on her feete by the table, and ſayed neuer a word: and notwithſtanding that Cyrus called her, ſhe would not come at him. Moreouer, when one of the groomes of his chamber would haue taken her to haue brought her to him: the firſt ſaith ſhe, that layeth hands on me ſhall repent it. Thereuppon all thoſe that were preſent, ſaied ſhe was a fooliſh thing, and ſimply brought vp, and could not tell what was comely for her. Howbeit Cyrus being glad of it, paſſed it ouer with laughing, and told him that had brought them vnto him: doeſt thou not ſee, that of all theſe thou haſt brought me, there is not an honeſt woman but ſhe? After that, Cyrus began to make much of her, and loued her better continually then all the reſt, and called her Aſpaſia the wiſe. This Aſpaſia was taken among the ſpoiles of Cyrus campe after he was ouerthrowen, and Darius as we haue told yee, did beg her of his father, who was very angry with it in his minde. For the barbarous people of all other things are maruellous iealous of their women, ſo that not onely he ſhould be put to death, that durſt but ſpeake to, or touch any concubine of the kings but in ſport: but alſo whoſoeuer came neare them, or neare their coches as they trauelled. The kings daughter Atoſſa, whom he had maried againſt all law, was yet liuing, and beſides her he had alſo three hundred and three ſcore paſſing faire concubines: and yet when his ſonne Darius asked Aſpaſia of him, the king aunſwered, ſhe was a free woman borne, and therefore if ſhee would, he was content he ſhould haue her: but if ſhe were vnwilling to goe to him, then he would not haue him force her by no meanes. So Aſpaſia was ſent for, and ſhe was asked with whom ſhe had rather be. She anſwered, with Darius: contrary to king Artaxerxes expectation, who both by the cuſtome, and alſo the law, was compelled to let him haue her. But ſhortly after he tooke her from him againe, ſaying that he would place her in a Nunrie of Diana, in the countrey of ECBATANE, where they call her Anitis, there to ſerue the goddeſſe, and to liue chaſt all the dayes of her life: ſuppoſing by this meanes to puniſh his ſonne, not rigorouſly, but moderatly, with griefe mixt with ſport and earneſt. Howbeit his ſonne tooke it not ſo patiently, either becauſe hee was deepely in loue with Aſpaſia, or elſe for that he ſaw his father mocked him in that point. Tiribazus finding this, and perceiuing that Darius tooke it very grieuouſly: he aggrauated his anger againſt his father, knowing the paſſion of loue in Darius, by his owne, vpon the like occaſion. King Artaxerxes had many daughters, and had promiſed Pharnabazus one of them, called Apama: vnto Orontes, Rodogoune: and to Tiribazus, Ameſtris. The king performed the other two mariages, and did put Tiribazus by his wife. For the king him ſelfe maried his own daughter Ameſtris, and for her, he promiſed Tiribazus the younger, Atoſſa: with whom alſo he him ſelfe fell in loue, and maried her. Tiribazus hereupon was in ſuch a rage with the king, that he hated him to the death: not becauſe he was any traytor or ſeditious man in nature, but a madde harebrained fellow. For ſometime he was aloft, and in as good credite and authority as the beſt: ſodainely againe hee would play ſome madde part to anger the king, and then he was in as much diſgrace, and out of countenaunce: and could not away with neither fortune. For when he was in authority, he made euery man hate him for his pride: and being in diſgrace, he could not humble him ſelfe, but looke bigger then before. Now there was fire and brimſtone met, when Tiribazus tooke part with Darius. For he dayly blew into his eares, that it was to no purpoſe for him to weare his hat right vp, if his affaires alſo went not rightly forward: and that he deceiued him ſelfe much, if he did not know that his brother (by meanes of the women he kept) ſecretly aſpired to the crowne: and that his father being ſo vnconſtant as he was, he muſt not truſt in any ſort to ſuccede his father in the kingdome, what proclamation ſoeuer he hath made in his behalfe to the contrary. For, ſayed he, he that for a GRECIAN woman hath broken and violated the holieſt lawe that was in PERSIA: thou muſt not looke that he will performe that he hath promiſed thee. And furthermore, he perſwaded him, that it was not a like repulſe vnto Ochus, to be denied that which he looked for: as it was for him to be turned out of all that euer he had gotten. For ſaied he, if it pleaſe Ochus to liue like a priuate man, he may ſafely doe it, and no man will trouble him: but for him ſelfe that was already proclaimed king, he muſt of neceſſity make him ſelfe king, or elſe he muſt not liue. So the Poet Sophocles his ſaying moſt commonly proueth true:

For the way is large and plaine for a man to beleeue as he liſt, and men commonly are giuen rather to beleeue the euil then the good, becauſe moſt men know not what goodnes meaneth. But now beſide theſe perſwaſions, the greatnes of the kingdome, and the feare Darius ſtoode in of his brother Ochus, tooke great force and effect with him: and it may be alſo, that Venus her ſelfe did ſomwhat in the matter, for the malice and ſpite that Aſpaſia was taken from him. But whatſoeuer the cauſe was, thus was it handled: that Darius flatly conſpired againſt his father Artaxerxes, together with Tiribazus. Now, they hauing gotten many conſpirators to ioyne with them, one of the kings Eunuches perceiuing it, ranne and told the king of it, and how they had ſodainely determined to aſſaile him, knowing certainely that it was agreed among them ſelues, that they ſhould kill him in his bedde in the night. Artaxerxes receiuing this aduertiſement, thought it was not good to be careleſſe of a matter of ſo great importance as his life: and alſo that it were too great lightneſſe in him ſo ſodainly to beleeue his Eunuch, without better proofe or knowledge. So he tooke this way with him ſelfe. He commaunded the Eunuch that had giuen him this information, to keepe company ſtill with the conſpirators, and to follow them whereſoeuer they went, to ſee their doings: and in the meane time he beat downe his wall behinde his bed, and made a dore through, and ſet vp a hanging of tapeſtry before it. When the time was come, as the Eunuch had aduertiſed the king, that the traitors ment to doe their feate: Artaxerxes being layed on his bed, roſe not vp till hee had ſeene euery traitor of them in the face that came to kill him. Then when he ſaw them comming towards him with their ſwords drawen, he ſodainly lift vp the hanging, and got in to his inner chamber, and ſhut the dore after him, making an outcry, murder, murder. So the traitors being plainely ſeene and knowen by the king, fled the ſame way they came, and failed of their purpoſe, and bad Tiribazus ſaue him ſelfe, becauſe he was knowen. So they diſperſed them ſelues, and ſcaped by flying. But Tiribazus was taken tardy, although he had ſlaine diuerſe of the kings gard, valiantly defending him ſelfe: yet they tooke him not, till he was ſtriken with a dart a good way off, which ſlue him. Darius was alſo taken and apprehended, and brought priſoner with his ſonnes: and the king referred him to be iudged by his peeres. For the king him ſelfe would not be preſent to giue iudgement of him, but deputed others in his place to accuſe him: howbeit he commaunded his ſecretaries to ſet downe in writing the opinion and ſentence of euery one of the Iudges and to bring it him. In fine, they all caſt him, and condemned him to die. Then the officers layed hold on him, and brought him into a chamber of the priſon, where the hangman came with a raſer in his hand with the which he vſed to cut mens throates ſo condemned to die. So the hangman comming into the chamber, when he ſaw it was Darius, he was affrayed, and came out of the chamber againe, his heart failing him, and durſt not lay handes vpon the perſon of the king. But the Iudges that ſtoode without the chamber, bad him goe and doe it, vnleſſe he would haue his owne throate cut. So the hangman then came in, and tooke Darius by the haire of the head, and made him hold downe his head, and ſo cut his necke with his raſer he had in his other hand. Others doe write, that this ſentence was giuen in the preſence of king Artaxerxes ſelfe, and that Darius ſeeing himſelfe conuicted by manifeſt proofes brought in againſt him, he fell downe at his fathers feete, and beſought him to pardon him: and then that his father being angry, roſe vp, and drew out his curtelax and wounded him in ſo many places withall, that at length he ſlew him. Then returning into the Court, he worſhipped the ſunne, and turning him to his Lords that were about him, he ſaide vnto them. My Lordes, God be with you, and be merie at home in your houſes, and tell them that were not here, how the great Oromazes hath taken reuenge of them that practiſed treaſon againſt me. This was the end of Darius treaſon. Now Darius being dead Ochus his brother ſtood in good hope to be next heire to the crowne, and the rather through the meanes and friendſhippe of his ſiſter Atoſſa: but yet of his legitimate brethren, he feared him called Ariaſpes, who was only left of all the reſt that were legitimate: and of his baſtard brethren, Arſames: not becauſe Ariaſpes was elder than he, but for that he was of a ſoft & plain nature, the Persians deſired he might be their king. On the other ſide, Arſames was wiſe, and valiant: and Ochus ſaw that his father loued him dearely. So he determined to intrappe them both. Now Ochus being a ſubtle and malicious natured man, he firſt ſhewed his cruelty vpon Arſames, and his malice vpon Ariaſpes his legitimate brother. For, becauſe he knew he was but ſimple and plaine, he ſent daily ſome of the kings Eunuches vnto him, who brought him threatning words and meſſages, as from the king: telling him that he had determined to put him to a ſhamefull and cruell death. So, forging theſe newes continually as things verie ſecret, they did ſo terrifie poore Ariaſpes, telling him that the king was fully bent to put ſome of his threates in execution out of hand: that he was put in ſuch feare and diſpaire of his life, that he prepared himſelfe a poyſon, and dranke it, to rid himſelfe of his life. King Artaxerxes vnderſtanding of his death, tooke it very heauily, and beganne to miſtruſt the cauſe that made him to make himſelfe away: howbeit he could not ſeeke the proofe of it, for his extreame age. But this chaunce made him loue Arſames better than before, ſhewing plainely that he truſted him better than Ochus, and did make him priuie to all things. Ochus could no longer abide to deferre his intent, and therefore entiſed Harpaces, Tiribazus ſonne, to kill his baſtard brother Arſames: the which he did. Now Artaxerxes was ſo extreame old, that he was as good as done with age: but after he heard his ſonne Arſames was murthered, he could beare it no longer, but tooke it ſo to his heart for ſorrow, that when he had liued foure ſcore and fourteene yeares, and raigned threeſcore and two, he died. When he was dead, they then found that he had bene a gratious and courteous Prince, and one that loued his people and ſubiects: when they ſawe the proofe of his ſucceſſor Ochus, that paſſed all men liuing, in crueltie and ſeueritie.

THE LIFE OF

LIke as Simonides, ô Soſsius Senecio, ſaith that the city of ILIVM was not offended with the CORINTHIANS, for that they came to make war with them with other GRECIANS, becauſe Glaucus (whoſe firſt anceſters came from CORINTH) had taken armes, and louingly fought for the ſame; euen ſo me thinkes, that neither the GRECIANS, nor ROMAINES haue cauſe to complaine of the Academy, ſith they be both alike praiſed of the ſame in this preſent booke, in the which are conteined the liues of Dion & Brutus. Of the which, the one of them hauing bene verie familiar with Plato himſelfe, and the other from his childhoode brought vp in Platoes doctrine: they both (as it were) came out of one ſelfe ſchoolehouſe, to attempt the greateſt enterpriſes amongſt men. And it is no maruell if they two were much like in many of their doings, prouing that true which their ſchoolemaiſter Plato wrote of vertue: that to do any noble act in the gouernment of a cōmon wealth, which ſhould be famous, and of credit, authoritie, and good fortune, muſt both meete in one ſelfe perſon, ioined with iuſtice and wiſedom. For, as a certaine fencer called Hippomachus ſaid, that he knew his ſchollers farre off, if he did but ſee them comming from the market with meate in their hands: ſo it muſt needes follow, that men hauing bene vertuouſly brought vp, muſt needes be wiſe in all their doings, and beſide that it bringeth them to ciuility and honeſty, euen ſo it frameth their conditions much like one vnto an other. Furthermore, their fortunes hauing alſo fallen out both a like, more by chaunce then by any reaſon, do make their liues very like to each other. For, they were both of them ſlaine, before they could bring their enterpriſes to paſſe which they had determined. But the greateſt wonder of all is this: that their deathes were foreſhewed vnto them both, by a wicked ſpirit that viſibly appeared vnto either of them: albeit there be ſome that can not abide thoſe opinions, and doe maintaine that theſe ſights and euill ſpirits do neuer appeare to any man that hath his right wits, but that they are fancies of litle children, or old women, or of ſome men that their wits are weakened by ſickeneſſe, and ſo haue a certaine imagination of ſuch ſtraunge ſightes, being of this ſuperſtitious minde, that they haue a wicked ſpirit, and an euill angell in them. But if Dion and Brutus, both of them graue and learned Philoſophers, and very conſtant men, not ouercome by any ſodaine paſſion or imagination of minde, haue bene moued by ſuch ſights and ſpirites, and haue alſo told it vnto their friends: I cannot tell whether we ſhall be inforced, to grant the moſt ſtrangeſt and oldeſt opinion of this, which ſaith : that there be euill ſpirits which enuying the vertue of good men, to withdraw them from their godly minds, do make them affraid with theſe fearefull ſights, intiſing them to forſake their godlines , leaſt that perſiſting therein, they ſhould be rewarded with better life in the world to come, then theirs is. But let vs referre this diſputation to ſome other booke , and now in this twelfth couple of theſe famous mens liues compared, let vs firſt begin to write the life of him that is the elder of theſe two men we ſpeake of.

Dionyſius the elder, after he had the gouernment of SICILIA in his handes, he maried the daughter of Hermocrates, a citizen of SYRACVSA. But yet not being throughly ſettled in his tyranny, the SYRACVSANS did rebell againſt him, & did ſo cruelly and abhominablie handle the bodie of his wife, that ſhe willingly poyſoned her ſelfe. So after he had eſtabliſhed him ſelfe in his gouernment with more ſuretie then before, he maried againe two other wiues together, the one a ſtraunger of the citie of LOCRES, called Doride : and the other of the country it ſelfe, called Ariſtomaché, the daughter of Hipparinus the chiefeſt man of all SYRACVSA, and that had bene companion with Dionyſius, the firſt time he was choſen Generall. It was ſaide that Dionyſius maried them both in one day, and that they could neuer tell which of them he knewe firſt : but otherwiſe, that he made as much of the one, as he did of the other. For they commonly ſate together with him at his table, and did either of them lie with him by turnes: though the SYRACVSANS would haue their owne countriwoman preferred before the ſtranger. Howbeit the ſtraunge woman had this good happe, to bring foorth Dionyſius his eldeſt ſonne, which was a good countenance to defend her, being a forreiner. Ariſtomaché in contrarie maner, continued a long time with Dionyſius without frute of her wombe, although he was very deſirous to haue children by her: ſo that he put the LOCRIAN womans mother to death, accuſing her that ſhe had with ſorceries and witchcraft, kept Ariſtomaché from being with child. Dion being the brother of Ariſtomaché, was had in great eſtimation at the firſt, for his ſiſters ſake: but afterwards the tyrant finding him to be a wiſe man, he loued him then for his owne ſake. Inſomuch, that among many ſundry things & pleaſures he did for him: he cõmaunded his Treaſurers to let him haue what money he asked of them, ſo they made him acquainted withall the ſelfe ſame day they gaue him any. Nowe though Dion had euer before a noble minde in him by nature, yet much more did that magnanimitie increaſe, when Plato by good fortune arriued in SICILE. For his comming thither ſurely was no mans deuiſe, as I take it, but the very prouidence of ſome god: who (bringing farre off the firſt beginning and foundation of the libertie of the SYRACVSANS, and to ouerthrow the tyrannicall ſtate) ſent Plato out of ITALY vnto the citie of SYRACVSA, & brought him acquainted with Dion, who was but a young man at that time, but yet had an apter wit to learne, & readier good wil to follow vertue, then any young man elſe that followed Plato: as Plato himſelfe writeth, & his own doings alſo do witneſſe. For Dion hauing from a child bene brought vp with humble conditions vnder a tyrant, and acquainted with a ſeruile timerous life, with a proud & inſolent reigne, with all vanitie and curioſitie, as placing chiefe felicitie in couetouſnes: neuertheleſſe, after he had felt the ſweete reaſons of Philoſophie, teaching the broad way to vertue, his hart was enflamed ſtraight with earneſt deſire to follow the ſame. And becauſe he found that he was ſo eaſily perſwaded to loue vertue and honeſtie, he ſimply thinking (being of an honeſt plaine nature) that the ſelfe ſame perſwaſions would moue a like affection in Dionyſius: obteined of Dionyſius, that being at leaſure, he was contented to ſee Plato, and to ſpeake with him. When Plato came to Dionyſius, all their talke in maner was of vertue, and they chiefely reaſoned what was fortitude: where Plato proued that tyrants were no valiant men. From thence paſſing farther into iuſtice, he tolde him that the life of iuſt men was happie, and contrarily the life of vniuſt men vnfortunate. Thus the tyrant Dionyſius perceiuing he was ouercome, durſt no more abide him, and was angry to ſee the ſtanders by to make ſuch eſtimation of Plato, and that they had ſuch delight to heare him ſpeake. At length he angrily asked him, what buſineſſe he had to do there? Plato aunſwered him, he came to ſeeke a good man. Dionyſius then replyed againe: what, in Gods name, by thy ſpeech then it ſeemeth thou haſt found none yet. Nowe Dion thought that Dionyſius anger would proceede no further, and therefore as Platoes earneſt re-queſt, he ſent him away in a galley with three bankes of owers, the which Pollis a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine caried backe againe into GRECE. Howbeit Dionyſius ſecretly requeſted Pollis to kill Plato by the way, as euer he would do him pleaſure: if not, yet that he would ſell him for a ſlaue, howſoeuer he did. For ſaid he, he ſhall be nothing the worſe for that: becauſe if he be a iuſt man, he ſhall be as happie to be a ſlaue, as a freeman. Thus, as it is reported, this Pollis caried Plato into the Ile of ÆGINA, and there ſold him. For the ÆGINETES hauing warre at that time with the ATHENIANS, made a decree, that all the ATHENIANS that were taken in their Ile, ſhould be ſold. This notwithſtanding, Dionyſius refuſed not to honor & truſt Dion, as much as euer he did before, and did alſo ſende him Ambaſſadour in matters of great weight. As whē he ſent him vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, where he behaued himſelf ſo well, that he wan great reputation by his iorney: and the tyrant could well away with his plaine ſpeech. For no man but he, durſt ſay their minds ſo boldly vnto him, to ſpeak what he thought good: as on a time he reproued him for Gelon. One day when they mocked Gelons gouernement before the tyrants face, and that Dionyſius himſelfe ſaid (finely deſcanting on his name, which ſignifieth laughter) that he was euen the very laughing ſtocke himſelf of SICILE: the Courtiers made as though they liked this encounter and interpretation of laughter paſſingly well. But Dion not being well pleaſed withall, ſaide vnto him: for his ſake men truſted thee, whereby thou cameſt to be tyrant: but for thine owne ſake they will neuer truſt any man. For to ſay truely, Gelon ſhewed by his gouernment, that it was as goodly a thing as could be, to ſee a citie gouerned by an abſolute Prince: but Dionyſius by his gouernmēt on the other ſide, made it appeare as deteſtable a thing. This Dionyſius had by his LOCRIAN wife three children, and by Ariſtomaché foure: of the which, two were daughters, the one called Sophroſynè, and the other Areté. Of them, Dionyſius eldeſt ſonne maried Sophroſynè, and Areté was maried vnto his brother Thearides, after whoſe death Dion maried her, being his Nece. Now when Dionyſius her father fell ſicke, not likely to eſcape: Dion would haue ſpoken with him for his children he had by his ſiſter Ariſtomaché. Howbeit the Phiſitians about him, to currie fauour with the next heire and ſucceſſor of the tyranny, would neuer let him haue any time or oportunitie to ſpeake with him. For, as Timæus writeth, they gaue Dionyſius the elder (as he had commanded them) a ſtrong opiat drinke to caſt him in a ſleepe, and ſo thereby they tooke from him all his ſenſes and ioyned death with his ſleepe. Notwithſtanding, in the firſt councell and aſſemblie holden by his friends, to couſult about the ſtate and affaires of the younger Dionyſius: Dion moued matter ſo neceſſary & profitable for that preſent time, that by his wiſedom he ſhewed they were all but children, and by his bold and franke ſpeech, made them know that they were but ſlaues of the tyrannie: becauſe they beaſtly and cowardly gaue ſuch counſell and aduiſe, as might beſt pleaſe and feede the young tyrants humor. But he made them moſt to wonder at him, when they fearing aboue all other things, the daunger Dionyſius ſtate was in, by reaſon of CARTHAGE, he did promiſe them, that if Dionyſius would haue peace, he would then goe forthwith into AFRICKE, and find the meanes honorably to quench the warres: or if otherwiſe he better liked of warre, that he would furniſh him at his owne proper coſts and charges, fiftie gallies readie to row. Dionyſius wondered greatly at the noble minde of Dion, and thanked him much for the good will he bare vnto him, touching his eſtate. But all men elſe taking Dions noble offer to be a reproach of their auarice, and his credite and authoritie, an impaire vnto theirs: they preſently vpon this liberall offer tooke occaſion to accuſe him, not ſparing any reproachfull wordes againſt him, to moue Dionyſius to be offended with him. For they complained of him, and ſaid that he cunningly practiſed to poſſeſſe the tyranny, making himſelfe ſtrong by ſea, going about by his gallies to make the tyrannie fall into the handes of the children of Ariſtomaché his ſiſter. But the chiefeſt cauſe of all why they did malice and hate him, was his ſtrange maner of life: that he neither would keepe company with them, nor liue after their maner. For they that from the beginning were crept in fauour and friendſhip with this young euill brought vp tyrant, by flattering of him, and feeding him with vaine pleaſures: ſtudied for no other thing, but to entertaine him in loue matters, and other vaine exerciſes, as to riot & banquet, to keepe light women company, and all ſuch other vile vitious paſtimes and recreations, by the which the tyrannie became like iron ſoftened by fire, and ſeemed to be very pleaſant vnto the ſubiectes, becauſe the ouergreat Maieſtie and ſeueritie thereof was ſomewhat milder,not ſo much by the bountie and goodnes, as by the follie and retchleſneſſe of the Lord. Thus,this litle care and regard increaſing more and more,ſtill winning way with the young tyrant: did at length melt and breake a ſunder thoſe ſtrong diamond chaines, with the which Dionyſius the elder made his boaſt that he left his Monarchie and tyrannie chained to his ſonne. For ſometime he would be three daies together without intermiſſion, ſtill banqueting and being drunke: and all that time his Court gates were kept ſhut vnto graue & wiſe men, and for all honeſt matters, and was then full of drunkards, of common playes,dancings, maskes, and mummeries, and full of all ſuch trumperie and diſſolute paſtimes. And therefore Dion vndoubtedly was much enuied of them, becauſe he gaue himſelfe to no ſport nor pleaſure: whereupon they accuſed him, and miſnamed his vertues, vices, being ſomewhat to be reſembled vnto them. As in calling his grauitie, pride: his plainneſſe and boldneſſe in his oration, obſtinacie: if he did perſwade them, that he accuſed them: and becauſe he would not make one in their fond paſtimes,that therefore he deſpiſed them. For to ſay truely,his maners by nature had a certaine haughtineſſe of mind and ſeueritie,and he was a ſower man to be acquainted with: whereby his company was not onely troubleſome, but alſo vnpleaſant to this yonger Dionyſius,whoſe eares were ſo fine,that they could not away to heare any other thing but flatterie. And furthermore, diuers of his very friends and familiars, that did like and commend his plaine manner of ſpeech and noble minde: they did yet reproue his ſternneſſe,and auſtere conuerſation with men. For it ſeemed vnto them, that he ſpake too roughly, and delt ouerhardly with them that had to doe with him, and more then became a ciuill or curteous man. And for proofe hereof, Plato himſelfe ſometime wrote vnto him (as if he had prophecied what ſhould happen) that he ſhould beware of obſtinacie,the companion of ſolitarineſſe, that bringeth a man in the end to be forſaken of euerie one. This notwithſtanding, they did more reuerence him at that time, then any man elſe: becauſe of the ſtate and gouernment,and for that they thought him the onely man that could beſt prouide for the ſafetie and quietneſſe of the tyrannie, the which ſtood then in tickle ſtate. Now Dion knewe well enough, that he was not ſo well taken and eſteemed through the good wil of the tyrant,as againſt his will,and for the neceſſitie of the ſtate and time. So Dion ſuppoſing that ignorance, and want of knowledge in Dionyſius was the cauſe: he deuiſed to put him into ſome honeſt trade or exerciſe,and to teach him the liberall ſciences, to frame him to a ciuill life, that thenceforth he ſhould no more be affraid of vertue,and ſhould alſo take pleaſure and delight in honeſt things. For Dionyſius of his owne nature, was none of the worſt ſort of tyrants, but his father fearing that if he came once to haue a feeling and conceite of himſelfe, or that he companied with wiſe and learned men, he would goe neere to enter into practiſe, and put him out of his ſeate: he euer kept him locked vp in a chamber,& would ſuffer no man to ſpeake with him. Then the younger Dionyſius hauing nothing elſe to doe, gaue himſelfe to make litle chariots, candleſtickes, chaires,ſtooles,and tables of wood. For his father Dionyſius was ſo fearefull and miſtruſtfull of euerie bodie, that he would ſuffer no man with a paire of barbers ſiſſers to poule the haires of his head,but cauſed an image maker of earth to come vnto him, and with a hotte burning cole to burne his goodly buſh of haire round about. No man came into his chamber where he was with a gowne on his backe, no not his owne brother nor ſonne, but he was driuen before he could come in,to put off his gowne, and the guard of his chamber to ſtrippe him naked whatſoeuer he was: and then they gaue him an other gowne to caſt vpon him, but not his owne. One day his brother Leptines, going about to deſcribe vnto him the ſituation of ſome place, he tooke a halberd from one of the guard, and with the point thereof beganne to drawe out a plot of the ſame vpon the ground. Dionyſius was terribly offended with him, and did put the ſouldier to death that gaue him his halberd. He ſaid he was affraid of his friends,yea and of the wiſeſt of them: becauſe he knew that they deſired rather to rule, then to be ruled, and to commaund, then to obey. He ſlew one of his Captaines called Marſyas, whom he had preferred and had giuen him charge of men: becauſe he dreamed that he killed him: ſaying that he dreamed of this in the night, becauſe that waking in the day he had determined to kill him. Now Dionyſius that was ſo timerous, and whoſe mind through fearefulnes was ſtill miſerably occupied he was notwithſtanding maruellouſly offended with Plato, becauſe he did not iudge him to be the nobleſt and valianteſt man aliue. Dion therfore ſeeing (as we haue ſaid) the younger Dionyſius cleane marred, and in manner caſt away for lacke of good education: perſwaded him the beſt he could to giue himſelfe vnto ſtudie, and by the greateſt intreatie he could poſſibly make, to pray the Prince of al Philoſophers to come into SICILE. And then whẽ through his intreatie he were come, that he would referre himſelfe wholly vnto him, to the ende that reforming his life by vertue and learning, and knowing God thereby: (the beſt example that can be poſſible, and by whom all the whole worlde is ruled and gouerned, which otherwiſe were out of all order and confuſed) he ſhould firſt obtaine great happines to himſelfe, and conſequently vnto all his citizens alſo, who euer after through the temperance and iuſtice of a father, would with good will doe thoſe things, which they preſently vnwillingly did for the feare of a Lord, & in doing this, from a tyrant he ſhould come to be a king. For, the chaines of a diamant to keepe a realme in ſafetie, were not force, and feare, as his father Dionyſius held opinion: neither the great multitude of young ſouldiers, nor the guard of ten thouſand barbarous people: but in contrarie maner, that they were the loue & good will of their ſubiectes, which the Prince obteineth through vertue and iuſtice: the which chaines though they be ſlacker then the other that are ſo hard and ſtiffe, yet are they ſtronger, and will laſt longer time, to keepe a realme and kingdom in ſafetie. And furthermore, the Prince (ſaid he) is not deſirous of honor, neither is a man that deſerueth greatly to be praiſed and commended, that only ſtudieth to weare ſumptuous apparell, and that glorieth to ſee his Court richly furniſhed, and himſelfe curiouſly ſerued: and in the meane time doth not frame himſelfe to ſpeake better, to be wiſer, and to carie a greater maieſtie then any other meane or common perſon, not eſteeming to adorne and beautifie the Princely pallace of his minde, as becommeth the royall maieſtie of a king. Dion oftentimes rehearſing theſe exhortations vnto Dionyſius, and other while enterlacing betwene, ſome reaſons he had learned of Plato: he graffed in him a wonderfull, and as it were a vehement deſire to haue Plato in his company, and to learne of him. So ſundry letters came from Dionyſius vnto ATHENS, diuers requeſts from Dion, & great intreatie made by certaine Pythagorian Philoſophers, that prayed & perſwaded Plato to come into SICILE, to bridle the light diſpoſition of this young man, by his graue & wiſe inſtructions: who without regard of reaſon, led a diſſolute & licentious life. Therefore Plato, as himſelfe reporteth, bluſhing to himſelfe, & fearing leaſt he ſhould giue men cauſe to thinke that it was but the opinion men had of him, and that of himſelfe he was vnwilling to do any worthy act: and further, hoping that doing good but vnto one man alone, who was the onely guide of all the reſt, he ſhould as it were recouer all SICILIA from her corruption and ſickneſſe: he performed their requeſtes that ſent vnto him. But Dions enemies fearing the chaunge & alteration of Dionyſius, they perſwaded him to call Philiſtus the Hiſtoriographer home againe from baniſhment, who was a learned man, and had bene brought vp and acquainted with the tyrants faſhions: to the end he ſhould ſerue as a counterpeace, to withſtand Plato and his Philoſophie. For this Philiſtus, from the firſt time that the tyrannie began to be eſtabliſhed, did ſhew himſelfe very willing & conformable to the ſtabliſhment thereof, and had of long time kept the caſtle: and the voice went, that he kept the mother of Dionyſius the elder, and as it was ſuppoſed, not altogether without the tyrants knowledge. But afterwardes, Leptines hauing had two daughters by one woman, whom he intiſed to folly being an other mans wife: he maried one of theſe his daughters vnto Philiſtus, and made not Dionyſius priuie to it before. The tyrant therewith was ſo offended, that he put Leptines woman in priſon faſt locked vp, and draue Philiſtus out of SICILIA. He being baniſhed thus, repayred vnto ſome of his friendes that dwelt about the Adriaticke ſea, where it ſeemeth he wrote the moſt part of all his hiſtorie, being then at good leaſure. For he was not called home againe during the life of Dionyſius the elder: but after his death, the malice the Courtiers bare vnto Dion, cauſed thẽ to procure Philiſtus calling home againe, as we haue told you, as the man they thought would ſticke ſtoutly in defence of the tyrannie. So Philiſtus no ſooner returned, but he ſtoutly began to defend the tyranny: and others in contrary maner, deuiſed accuſations to the tyrant againſt Dion, accuſing him that he had practiſed with Theodotes and Heraclides, to ouerthrow the tyrannie of Dionyſius. For Dion, in my opinion, hoped

by Platoes comming to bridle and leſſen a litle the ouer-licentious and imperious tyranny of Dionyſius, and thereby to frame Dionyſius a wiſe and righteous gouernor. But on the other ſide, if he ſaw he would not follow his counſel, and that he yeelded not to his wiſe inſtructions: he then determined to put him downe, and to bring the gouernment of the common wealth into the hãds of the SYRACVSANS: not that he allowed of Democratia (to wit, where the people gouern) but yet certainly thinking that Democratia was much better then the tyranny, when they could not come vnto Ariſtocratia, to wit, the gouernment of a few of the nobility. Now things being in this ſtate, Plato arriued in SICILE, where he was maruellouſly receiued and honored by Dionyſius. For when he landed on the ſhoare, leauing his gally that brought him: there was ready for him one of the kings rich and ſumptuous chariots to conuey him to the caſtell: & the tyrant made ſacrifice to giue the goddes thanks for his comming, as for ſome wonderfull great good hap chanced vnto his ſeigniory. Furthermore, the wonderfull modeſty and temperance that was begun to be obſerued in feaſts and bankets, the Court cleane changed, and the great goodnes and clemency of the tyrant in al things, in miniſtring iuſtice to euery man: did put the SYRACVSANS in great good hope of change, and euery man in the Court was very deſirous to giue him ſelfe to learning and Philoſophy. So that, as men reported, the tyrants pallace was full of ſand and duſt, with the numbers of ſtudents that drew plattes and figures of Geometry. Shortly after Plato was arriued, by chaunce the time was come about to doe a ſolemne ſacrifice within the caſtell, at which ſacrifice the Heraulde (as the manner was) proclaimed aloude the ſolemne prayer accuſtomed to be done, that it would pleaſe the gods long to preſerue the ſtate of the tyranny: and that Dionyſius being hard by him, ſayed vnto him, what, wilt thou not leaue to curſe me? This word grieued Philiſtus and his companions to the heart, thinking that with time, by litle and litle, Plato would winne ſuch eſtimation and great authority with Dionyſius, that afterwardes they ſhould not be able to reſiſt him: conſidering that in ſo ſhort a time as he had bene with Dionyſius, he had ſo altered his minde and courage. And therefore they now beganne, not one by one, nor in hugger mugger, but all of them with open mouth together to accuſe Dion: and ſayed, that it was eaſie to be ſeene, how he charmed and inchanted Dionyſius through Platoes eloquence, to make him willing to reſigne his gouernment becauſe he would transferre it to the handes of the children of his ſiſter Ariſtomaché. Others ſeemed to be offended, for that the ATHENIANS hauing come before into SICILIA with a great army, both by ſea and land, they were all loſt and caſt away, and could not win the city of SYRACVSA: and that now by one onely Sophiſter, they vtterly deſtroyed and ouerthrew the Empire of Dionyſius, perſwading him to diſcharge the tenne thouſand ſouldiers he had about him for his guard, to forſake the foure hundred gallies, the ten thouſand horſemen, and as many moe footemen, to goe to the Academy to ſeeke an vnknowen happines neuer heard of before, and to make him happy by Geometry, reſigning his preſent happines and felicity to be a great Lord, to haue money at will, and to liue pleaſantly, vnto Dion and his Nephewes. By ſuch like accuſations and wicked tongues, Dionyſius beganne firſt to miſtruſt Dion, and afterwards to be openly offended with him, and to frowne vppon him. In the meane time they brought letters Dion wrote ſecretly vnto the Gouernours of the city of CARTHAGE, willing them that when they would make peace with Dionyſius, they ſhould not talke with him vnles he ſtood by: aſſuring them that he would help them to ſet things in quietnes, and that al ſhould be well againe. When Dionyſius had read theſe letters with Philiſtus, and had taken his aduiſe and counſell what he ſhould doe, as Timæus ſayd: he deceiued Dion vnder pretence of reconciliation, making as though he ment him no hurt, & ſaying that he would become frends again with him. So he brought Dion one day to the ſea ſide vnder his caſtell, and ſhewed him theſe letters, burdning him to haue practiſed with the CARTHAGINIANS againſt him. And as Dion went about to make him anſwere to clear himſelfe: Dionyſius would not heare him, but cauſed him to be taken vp as he was, and put into a pinnaſe, and commaunded the mariners to ſet him a land vppon the coaſt of ITALIE. After this was done, and that it was knowen abroad in the city, euery man thought it a cruell part of Dionyſius: inſomuch that the tyraunts pallace was in a maruellous pecke of troubles, for the great ſorrow the women made for the departure of Dion. Moreouer, the city ſelfe of SYRACVSA began to looke about them, looking for ſome

ſodaine great change and innouation,for the tumult and vprore that would happen by means of Dions baniſhment, and for the miſtruſt alſo that all men would haue of Dionyſius. Dionyſius conſidering this, and being affrayed of ſome misfortune, he gaue his friendes and the women of his pallace comfortable words,telling them that he had not baniſhed him , but was contented that he ſhould abſent him ſelfe for a time : being afrayed, that in his ſodaine angry moode he might peraduenture be compelled to do him ſome worſe turne if he remained , becauſe of his obſtinacy and ſelfewill. Furthermore, he gaue vnto Dions friendes two ſhippes, to cary as much goods,money,and as many of Dions ſeruants as they would , and to conuey them vnto him vnto PELOPONNESVS. Dion was a maruellous rich man,& for the pompe of his ſeruice, and ſumptuous moueables of his houſe,they were like vnto the perſon of a tyrant. All theſe riches Dions friends brought abord vpon thoſe ſhips,and caried them vnto him:beſides many other rich gifts,which the women and his friends ſent vnto him. So that by meanes of his great riches,Dion was maruellouſly eſteemed among the GRECIANS: who by the riches of a baniſhed citizen, coniectured what the power of a tyranny might be. But now concerning Plato: when Dion was exiled, Dionyſius cauſed him to be lodged in his caſtell,and by this means craftily placed,vnder cloke of friendſhip, an honorable guard about him,becauſe he ſhould not returne into GREECE to ſeeke Dion, to tell him of the iniury he had done vnto him. Howbeit Dionyſius often frequenting his company, (as a wilde beaſt is made tame by company of man) he liked his talke ſo well, that he became in loue with him, but it was a tyrannicall loue. For he would haue Plato to loue none but him, and that hee ſhould eſteeme him aboue all men liuing, being ready to put the whole realme into his hands, and all his forces: ſo that hee would thinke better of him, then of Dion. Thus was this paſſionat affection of Dionyſius grieuous vnto Plato. For he was ſo drowned with the loue of him , as men extreamely iealous of the women they loue; that in a moment he would ſodainly fall out with him, and ſtraight againe become friends , and pray him to pardon him. And to ſay truely, he had a maruellous deſire to heare Platoes Philoſophy : but on the other ſide , he reuerenced them that did diſſwade him from it, and told him that he would ſpoile himſelf,if he entred ouerdeeply into it. In the meane time fell out warre, and thereuppon he ſent P*lato* againe away , promiſing him that the next ſpring he would ſend for Dion home. But he brake promiſe therein , and yet ſent him his reuenues: and praied P*lato* to pardon him, though he had not kept promiſe at his time appointed. For he alleadged the warre was the cauſe, and that ſo ſoone as he had ended his war, he would ſend for Dion: whom in the meane time he praied to haue patience and not to attempt any ſtir or alteration againſt him,nor to ſpeake euill of him among the GRECIANS. This P*lato* ſought to bring to paſſe, and brought Dion to ſtudy Philoſophy, and kept him in the Academy at ATHENS. Dion lay in the city of ATHENS with one Calippus , whom hee had knowen of long time, howbeit he bought him a houſe in the country, to lie there ſometime for his pleaſure,the which he gaue afterwards(at his returne into SICILIA)vnto Speuſippus that kept him cōpany, and was continually with him, more then with any other friend he had in ATHENS, through P*latoes* counſell : who to ſoften and recreate Dions manners, gaue him the company of ſome pleaſant conceited man,knowing that this Speuſippus could modeſtly obſerue time and place to be pleaſant and mery:for which reſpect, Timon in his Satyricall ieaſts, calleth Speuſippus a good ieaſter. Now P*lato* him ſelfe hauing vndertaken to defray the charges of common playes in the dauncings of young children: Dion tooke the paines to teach and exerciſe them, and moreouer was him ſelfe at the whole charge of theſe playes, P*lato* ſuffering him to beſtow that liberality and curteſie vpon the ATHENIANS: the which wan Dion a great deale more good will, then P*lato* honor. Dion kept not ſtill at ATHENS, but went alſo to ſee the other good cities of GREECE, paſſing his time away. He being at common feaſtes and aſſemblies with the chiefeſt men,and beſt learned in matters of ſtate and gouernment,and neuer ſhewing any light partes, nor ſigne of tyrannicall pride in his manner of life, nor of a man that had bene brought vp with al pompe and pleaſure,but like a graue vertuous man,and well ſtudied in Philoſophy, whereby he grewe to be generally beloued and eſteemed of all men : the citie graunted him publicke honors, and ſent him decrees of his glory,made in their councels and aſſemblies. Furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS made him a SPARTAN and burges of the city, not paſſing for Dionyſius diſpleaſure, though at that time he had giuen them great aide, in the warre they made againſt the THEBANS. Some report, that Dion on a time was intreated by Ptœodorus MEGARIAN, to come and ſee him at his houſe: and Dion went thither. This Ptœodorus was a maruellous great rich man, & therefore Dion ſeeing a great number of people ſtanding at his gates, and that it was a hard thing to come and ſpeake with him he had ſuch great buſines: he turned vnto his friends that did accompany him, who were angry they made him tary ſo long at the gate, and ſayd vnto them: what cauſe haue we to thinke euill of him, ſith we did the like when we were at SYRACVSA? But Dionyſius being incenſed with enuy againſt him, and fearing the good will the GRECIANS bare him: he kept backe his reuenue, and would no more ſend it him, and ſeazed all the goods, the which he gaue to his receiuers to keepe. Furthermore, becauſe he would cleare him ſelfe of the infamy he had gotten amongeſt the Philoſophers for Platoes ſake, he went for diuers wiſe and learned men, and vainly coueting to excell them all in wiſedome, he was driuen improperly, and out of time, to alleadge many wiſe ſayings he had learned of Plato. Thereupon he began againe to wiſh for him, and to condemne him ſelfe, for that he had no wit to vſe him well when hee had him at his commaundement, and that he had not heard ſo much as he ſhould haue done him: and like a tyrant as he was, madly caried away with light deſires, and eaſely changing minde from time to time, a ſodaine vehement deſire tooke him in the head, to haue Plato againe. So he ſought all the means and waies he could deuiſe, to pray Architas the Pythagorian Philoſopher to tell him, that he might boldly come, and to be his ſurety vnto him for that he would promiſe him: for firſt of al, they were acquainted together by his means. Therefore Archytas ſent thither Archidamus the Philoſopher. Dionyſius alſo ſent certaine gallies, & ſome of his friends thither, to pray Plato to come to him: and he him ſelfe wrote ſpecially, and plainely, that it ſhould not goe well with Dion, if Plato came not into SICILIA: but if he would be perſwaded to come, that then he would doe what hee would haue him. Many letters and requeſts came vnto Dion from his wife and ſiſter, inſomuch as Dion ſo vſed the matter, that Plato obeied Dionyſius, without making any excuſe at al. So Plato writeth himſelfe, that he was driuen to come again the 3. time into the ſtraight of SICILIA.

Now Plato being arriued in SICILIA, he made Dionyſius a great ioyfull man, and filled all SICILIA againe with great good hope: for they were all very deſirous, and did what they could, to make Plato ouercome Philiſtus and the tyranny, with his Philoſophy. The women of Dionyſius Court did entertaine Plato the beſt they could: but aboue all, Dionyſius ſeemed to haue a maruellous truſt and affiance in him, and more then in any other of all his friends. For he ſuffred Plato to come to him without ſearching of him, and oftentimes offred to giue him a great ſumme of money: but Plato would take none of it. Therefore Ariſtippus CYRENIAN being at that time in the tyrantes Court in SICILIA, ſayed that Dionyſius beſtowed his liberality ſurely. For, to vs that aske much he giueth litle, and much vnto Plato that requireth nothing. After Dionyſius had giuen Plato his welcome, he beganne to moue him againe of Dion. Dionyſius on the other ſide, at the firſt did vſe him with fine delayes, but afterwards he ſhewed him ſelfe angry in deede: and at length fell out with Plato, but yet ſo couertly, that others ſaw it not. For Dionyſius diſſembled that, and otherwiſe in all other things he did him as much honor as he could deuiſe, practiſing thereby to make him to forſake Dions friendſhippe. Now Plato found him at the firſt, that there was no truſt to be giuen to his wordes, and that all were but lies and deuiſes he either ſayed or did: howbeit he kept it to him ſelfe, and euer patiently bare all things, hoping for the beſt, and made as though he beleeued him. They two thus finely diſſembling with each other, thinking to deceiue all men, and that none ſhould vnderſtand their ſecrets: Helycon CYZICENIAN, one of Platoes friendes, did prognoſticate the eclipſe of the ſunne. The ſame falling out as he had prognoſticated, the tyrant eſteemed maruellouſly of him, & gaue him a ſiluer talent for his labor. Then Ariſtippus ſporting with other Philoſophers, ſayd he could tell them of a ſtraunger thing to happen then that. So when they prayed him to tell them what it was: I do prognoſticate, ſayd he, that Plato and Dionyſius will be enemies ere it be long. In the end it came to paſſe, that Dionyſius made port ſale of all Dions goods, and kept the money to him ſelfe, and lodged Plato that before lay the next Court to his pallace, among the ſouldiers of his guard, whom hee knew maliced him of long time, and ſought to kill him: becauſe he did perſwade Dionyſius to leaue his tyranny and to liue without his guard. Plato being in this inſtant danger, Archytas ſent Ambaſſadors forthwith vnto Dionyſius, in a galley of thirty owers, to demaund Plato againe: declaring that Plato came againe to SYRACVSA, vppon his word and caution. Dionyſius to excuſe him ſelfe, and to ſhew that he was not angry with him at his departure from him: hee made him all the great cheare and feaſtes he could, and ſo ſent him home with great ſhewes of good will. One day among the reſt, he ſayd vnto Plato: I am afrayd Plato, ſayd he, that thou wilt ſpeake euill of me, when thou art among thy friendes and companions in the Academy. Then Plato ſmiling, anſwered him againe: the goddes forbidde that they ſhould haue ſuch ſcarcety of matter in the Academy, as that they muſt needes talke of thee. Thus was Platoes returne, as it is reported, although that which he him ſelfe writeth agreeth not much with this report. Theſe things went to Dions heart, ſo that ſhortly after he ſhewed him ſelfe an open enemy vnto Dionyſius, but ſpecially when he heard how he had handled his wife. Plato vnder couert words, ſent Dionyſius word of it by his letters. And thus it was. After Dion was exiled, Dionyſius returning Plato backe againe, he willed him ſecretely to feele Dions minde, whether he would not be angry that his wife ſhould be maried to an other man: becauſe there ranne a rumor abroade (whether it were true, or inuented by Dions enemies) that he liked not his mariage, and could not liue quietly with his wife. Therefore when Plato was at ATHENS, and had told Dion of all things, he wrote a letter vnto Dionyſius the tyraunt, and did ſette all other things downe ſo plainely, that euery man might vnderſtand him, but this one thing onely ſo darkely, that he alone, and none other could vnderſtand him, but him to whom he had written: declaring vnto him, that he had ſpoken with Dion about the matter he wote of, and that he did let him vnderſtand he would be maruellous angry, if Dionyſius did it. So at that time, becauſe there was great hope of reconciliation betweene them, the tyraunt did nothing lately touching his ſiſter, but ſuffered her ſtill to remaine with Dions ſonne. But when they were ſo farre out, that there was no more hope to returne in fauour againe, and that he had alſo ſent home Plato in diſgrace and diſpleaſure: then he maried his ſiſter Aretè (Dions wife) againſt her will, vnto one of his friends called Timocrates, not following therein his fathers iuſtice and lenity. For Polyxenus that had maried his fathers ſiſter Theſta, being alſo become his enemy: he fled out of SICILIA. Dionyſius the elder ſent for his ſiſter Theſta, and tooke her vp very ſharpely, for that ſhe knowing her husband would flie, ſhe did not come and tell him of it. Theſta nobly anſwered him againe, and neuer was afraied nor abaſhed: why, Dionyſius, doeſt thou thinke mee a woman ſo faint hearted and beaſtly, that if I had knowen my husband would haue gone his way, and left me: that I would not haue taken the ſea with him, and both haue run one fortune together? Truely I knew not of his departure till he was gone: for it had bene more for mine honour to haue bene called the wife of the baniſhed Polyxenus, then the ſiſter of thee a tyraunt. Dionyſius maruelled to heare his ſiſter ſpeake thus boldly, and the SYRACVSANS wondred at her noble corage: inſomuch that when the tyranny was vtterly deſtroyed, they did not refuſe to doe her all the honor they could deuiſe, as vnto a Queene. And when ſhe was dead alſo, all the citizens of SYRACVSA by a common decree, did accompany her body at her buriall. This litle digreſſion from our hiſtory, is not altogether vnprofitable. But now again to our matter. Dion from thenceforth diſpoſed him ſelfe altogether vnto warre, againſt Platoes counſell and aduiſe: who did his beſt endeuour to diſſwade him from it, both for the reſpect of Dionyſius good entertainment he had giuen him, as alſo for that Dion was of great yeares. Howbeit on the other ſide, Speuſippus, and his other friends did prouoke him vnto it, and did perſwade him to deliuer SICILIA from the ſlauery and bondage of the tyrant, the which held vp her hands vnto him, and would receiue him with great loue and good will. For whileſt Plato lay at SYRACVSA, Speuſippus keeping the citizens company more then Plato did, he knew their minds better then he. For at the firſt they were afraied to open them ſelues vnto him, and franckly to ſpeake what they thought, miſtruſting he was a ſpy vnto the tyrant, ſent amongſt them to feele their minds: but within a ſhort time they beganne to truſt him, and were all of one mind, for they praid and perſwaded Dion to come, and not to care otherwiſe for bringing of ſhippes, ſouldiers, nor horſes horſes with him, but onely to hire a ſhippe, and to lend the SICILIANS his body and name againſt Dionyſius. Speuſippus reporting theſe newes vnto Dion, did put him in good heart again: whereupon he began ſecretly to leauy men by other mens meanes, to hide his purpoſe and intent. The Philoſophers doe ſet forward Dions warres. Many citizens dealing in the affaires of the common wealth did aide him, and diuers of them alſo that onely gaue their mindes to the ſtudy of Philoſophy: and among them, Eudemus CYPRIAN (on whoſe death Ariſtotle wrote his dialogue of the ſoule) and Timonides LEVCADIAN, went with him. Furthermore, there ioyned alſo with him Miltas THESSALIAN, a Soothſayer, and that had bene his companion in ſtudy in the Academy. Now of all them whom the tyraunt had baniſhed, (which were no leſſe then a thouſand perſons) there were but onely fiue and twenty that durſt accompany him in this war. For all the other were ſuch daſtards, that they forſooke him, and durſt not go with him. The place where they appointed to meete, was the Ile of ZACINTHE, where they leauied all their ſouldiers, that were not aboue eight hundred in all, but all of them braue ſouldiers, and valiant men, and excellently well trained in wars: & to conclude, ſuch luſty men, as would incorage all the army Dion hoped of at his arriuall in SICILE, to fight like valiant men with them. Theſe hiered ſouldiers, the firſt time that they vnderſtoode it was to go into SICILIA, to make warre with Dionyſius: they were amazed at the firſt, and miſliked the iorney, becauſe it was vndertaken rather of malice and ſpite that Dion had to be reuenged, then otherwiſe of any good cauſe or quarrell, who hauing no better hope, tooke vpon him deſperate and impoſſible enterpriſes. Therefore the ſouldiers were offended with their Captaines that had preſſed them, becauſe they had not told them of this warre before But after that Dion by a notable Oration had told them, how tirannies haue euill foundations, and are ſubiect vnto ruine, and that he led them not into SICILIA ſo much for ſouldiers, as he did to make them Captaines of the SYRACVSANS, and the other SICILIANS, who of long time deſired nothing more then occaſion to riſe. And, when after him alſo Alcimenes, (a companion with him in this warre, and the chiefeſt man of all the ACHAIANS, both for nobility and eſtimation) did ſpeake vnto them in like maner, then they were all contented to go whither they would lead them. It was then in the heart of ſommer, and the wind blew called the GRECIAN wind, the moone being at the full, and Dion hauing prepared to make a ſumptuous ſacrifice vnto the god Apollo, he led all his men armed with white corſelets in proceſſion into the temple: and after the ſacrifice done, he made them a feaſt in the parke or ſhew place of the ZACINTHIANS. There the tables were laied, and the ſouldiers wondred to ſee the great ſtate and magnificence of the great number of pots of gold and ſiluer, and ſuch other furniture & preparation, as paſſed a priuat mans wealth: then they thought with them ſelues, that a man being ſo old, & Lord of ſo great a good, would not attempt things of ſuch daunger, without good ground, and great aſſurance of his frends aid and helpe. But after his oblations of wine, and common praiers made to the gods at feaſtes: ſodainly the Moone eclipſed. Dion thought it not ſtrange to ſee an eclipſe, conſidering the reuolutions of the eclipſes, and knowing very well it is a ſhadow that falleth vpon the body of the Moone, becauſe of the direct interpoſition of the earth betwixt her and the Sun. But becauſe the ſouldiers that were afraid and aſtonied withal, ſtood in need of ſome comfort & encoragement: Miltas the Soothſayer ſtanding vp in the middeſt amongſt them, ſayed vnto them. My fellow ſouldiers, be of good cheare, and aſſure your ſelues that we ſhall proſper: for God doth foreſhew vs by this ſight we ſee, that ſome one of the chiefeſt things now in higheſt place and dignity ſhall be eclipſed. And at this preſent time what thing carieth greater glory and fame, then the tyranny of Dionyſius? Therefore you muſt thinke, that ſo ſoone as you arriue in SICILIA, your ſelues ſhal put out his light & glory. This interpretation of the eclipſe of the Moone, did Miltas the Soothſayer make, before all the whole company. But touching the ſwarme of Bees that lighted on the poope of Dions ſhippe, he told him, and his friends priuately: that he was afraied his acts which ſhould fall out famous and glorious, ſhould laſt but a while, and floriſhing a few daies, would ſtraight conſume away. It is reported alſo, that Dionyſius in like maner had many ſtraunge ſignes and wonderfull tokens from aboue. Among others, there came an Eagle that ſnatched the partiſan out of the ſouldiers handes, and caried it quite away with her, and then let it fall into the ſea. The ſea alſo beating againſt the walles of the caſtell, was as ſweete to drinke a whole day together, as any conduit or running water : as thoſe that taſted of it found it true. Furthermore, a ſow farrowed pigges that lacked no partes of the body, but onely their eares. This the Soothſayers ſayed did ſignifie rebellion, and diſobedience of his ſubiects:and that the Citizens would no more heare him, nor obey his tyranny. Furthermore, they told alſo, that the ſweetenes of the ſalt water prognoſticated to the SYRACVSANS, change of cruell and euill time, vnto good and ciuill gouernment: and that the Eagle, Iupiters miniſter, and the partiſan, the marke and token of the kingdome and Empire, did betoken that Iupiter the chiefe of all gods had determined to deſtroy and put downe the tyranny. Theopompus reporteth this matter thus. So Dions ſouldiers were imbarked into two great ſhippes of burden, and an other third ſhippe that was not very great, and two pinnaſes with thirty owers followed them. For their armour and weapon, beſide thoſe the ſouldiers had: he caried two thouſand targets, a great number of bowes and arrowes, of darts, of pikes, and plenty of victuals: that they ſhould lacke nothing all the time they were vpon the ſea, conſidering that their iourney ſtoode altogether at the curteſie of the windes and ſea, and for that they were affrayed to land, vnderſtanding that Philiſtus road at anker in the coaſt of APVLGLIA, with a fleete of ſhippes that lay in waite for their comming. So hauing a pleaſant gale of winde, they ſayled the ſpace of twelue dayes together, and the thirteenth day they came to the foreland of SICILIA called Pachynus. There the Pilot thought it beſt they ſhould land preſently: for if they willingly looſed into the ſea, and loſt that point, they were ſure they ſhould loſe alſo many nights and dayes in vaine in the middeſt of the ſea, being then ſommer time, and the winde at the South. But Dion being afrayed to land ſo neare his enemies, he was deſirous to goe farther, and ſo paſt by the foreland of Pachynus. Then the North winde roſe ſo bigge and great, that with great violence it draue backe their ſhips from the coaſt of SICILIA. Furthermore, lightning and thunder mingled withall (becauſe it was at that time when the ſtarre Arcturus beginneth to ſhew) it made ſo terrible a tempeſt, and powred downe ſuch a ſore ſhower of raine vpon them, that all the Mariners were amazed withall, and knew not whither the wind would driue them: till that ſodainly they ſaw the ſtorme had caſt them vpon the Ile of CERCINA, (which is on the coaſt of LIBYA) and ſpecially where it is moſt dangerous to arriue for the rocks, for their ſhippes were like to haue runne vppon them, and to haue made ſhippewracke. But with much a doe they bare off the ſhippes with their great long poles, and wandred vp and downe the ſea, not knowing whither they went, vntill the ſtorme ceaſed. Then they met a ſhippe, whereby they knew that they were in the flat, which the Mariners call the heads of the great Syrte. Thus they wandring vp and downe, being maruellous angry that the ſea was calme, there roſe a litle South wind from the land, although they leaſt looked for any ſuch wind at that time, and litle thinking it would ſo haue chaunged: but ſeeing the wind riſe bigger and bigger, they packed on all the ſayles they had, and making their prayers vnto the gods they croſſed the ſea, and ſailed from the coaſt of LIBYA, directly vnto SICILE, and had the winde ſo lucky, that at the fift day they were neare vnto a litle village of SICILIA, called MINOA, the which was ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS. Synalus CARTHAGINIAN, being at that time Captaine and gouernor of the towne of MINOA, and Dions friend, was there by chance at that preſent, who being ignorant of his enterpriſe and comming, did what he could to keepe Dions ſouldiers from landing. But they notwithſtanding ſodainly leapt a land armed, but ſlue no man. For Dion had commaunded them the contrary, for the friendſhip he bare the Captaine: and they following the townes men hard that fled before them, entred the towne, hand ouer head amongeſt them, and ſo wanne the market place. When both the Captaines met, and that they had ſpoken together, Dion redeliuered the towne into Synalus hands againe, without any hurt or violence offred him. Synalus on the other ſide did endeuor him ſelfe all he could to make much of the ſouldiers, and holpe Dion to prouide him of all things neceſſary. But this did moſt of all encorage the ſouldiers, becauſe Dionyſius at their arriuall, was not then in SICILIA: for it chaunced ſo, that not many dayes before he went into ITALY, with foure ſcore ſaile. Therefore when Dion willed them to remaine there a few dayes to refreſhe themſelues, becauſe they had bene ſo ſore ſea beaten a long time together: they them ſelues would not, they were ſo glad to imbrace the occaſion offered them, and prayed Dion to leade them forthwith to SYRACVSA Dion leauing all his ſuperfluous armor and prouiſion in the hands of Synalus, and praying him to ſend them to him when time ſerued: he tooke his way towardes SYRACVSA. So by the way, two hundred horſemen of the ARGENTINES, which dwell in that part called ECNOMVS, came firſt to ioyne with him, and after them, the GELOIANS. The rumor of their comming ranne ſtraight to SYRACVSA. Thereupon Timocrates that had maried Aretè, Dions wife, and Dionyſius the fathers ſiſter, and to whom Dionyſius the younger had left the charge and gouernment of all his men and friends in the citie: he preſently diſpatched a poaſt with letters, to aduertiſe Dionyſius of Dions comming. He himſelfe alſo in the meane time had taken ſuch order, that there roſe no tumult nor mutinie in the citie, though they all of them lacked no good will to rebell: but becauſe they were vncertaine whether this rumor was true or falſe, being affraid, euery man was quiet. Now there chaunced a ſtraunge misfortune vnto the meſſengers, which caryed the letters vnto Dionyſius. For after he had paſſed the ſtraight, and that he was arriued in the citie of RHEGGIO of ITALYES ſide, making haſte to come to the citie of CAVLONIA, where Dionyſius was: he met by the way one of his acquaintance that caried a mutton but newly ſacrificed. This good fellow gaue him a peece of it, and the meſſenger ſpurred away with all the ſpeede he could poſſible. But when he had ridden the moſt part of the night, he was ſo wearie and drowſie for lacke of ſleepe, that he was driuen to lye downe. So he lay downe vpon the ground in a wood hard by the high way. The ſauor of this fleſh brought a Wolfe to him that caried away the fleſh and the portmantew it was wrapt in, and in the which alſo were his letters of aduertiſement, which he caried vnto Dionyſius. When he awoke out of his ſleepe, and ſaw that his portmantew was gone: he enquired for it, and went wandring vp and downe a long time to ſeeke it: howbeit all in vaine, for he could neuer find it. Therefore he thought it was not good for him to goe to the tyrant without his letters, but rather to flie into ſome vnknowen place where no bodie knew him. Thus ouerlate receiued Dionyſius aduertiſement by others of this warre, which Dion made in SICILIA. In the meane time, the CAMARINIANS came & ioyned with Dions army, in the high way towards SYRACVSA: and ſtill there came vnto him alſo a great number of the SYRACVSANS that were vppe in armes, which were gotten into the field. On the other ſide, certaine CAMPANIANS and LEONTINES, which were gotten into the caſtle of EPIPOLES with Timocrates of purpoſe to keepe it: Vpon a falſe rumor Dion gaue out (& which came vnto them) that he would firſt go againſt their townes: they forſooke Timocrates, and went to take order to defend their owne goods. Dion vnderſtanding that, being lodged with his army in a place called MACRÆ: he preſently remoued his campe being darke night, and marched forwarde till he came vnto the riuer of Anapus, which is not from the citie aboue tenne furlongs off: and there ſtaying a while, he ſacrificed vnto the riuer, and made his prayer, and worſhipped the riſing of the Sunne. At the ſelfe ſame inſtant alſo, the Soothſayers came and told him, that the gods did promiſe him aſſured victory. And the ſouldiers alſo ſeeing Dion weare a garland of flowers on his head, which he had taken for the ceremony of the ſacrifice: all of them with one ſelfe good will, tooke euery man one of them, (being no leſſe then fiue thouſand men that were gathered together by the way, and but ſlenderly armed with ſuch things as came firſt to hand, howbeit ſupplying with good will their want of better furniture and armor) and when Dion commaunded them to march, for ioy they ranne, and incouraged one an other with great cries, to ſhew them ſelues valiant for recouery of their liberty. Now for them that were within the city ſelfe of SYRACVSA, the noble men and chiefe Citizens went to receiue them at the gates in their beſt gownes. The common people on the other ſide ranne and ſette vppon them that tooke part with the tyraunt, and ſpoyled them that were called the PROSAGOGIDES (as much to ſay, the common Promoters of men) the deteſtableſt villaines, hatefull to the gods and men. For they like Sicophants and buſie tale bearers, would iet vp and downe the city, and mingle among the Citizens, hauing an oer in euery mans matter, being full of prittle prattle, and buſie headed, to know what euery man ſayed and did, and then to goe carie it to the tyraunt. Theſe men were they that had their payment firſt of all, for they killed them with dry blowes, beating them to death with ſtaues. When Timocrates could not enter into the caſtell with them that kept it, he tooke his horſe backe, and fled out of the city, and flying made all men afrayed and amazed where he came, enlarging Dions power by his report, becauſe it ſhould not ſeeme that for feare of a trifle, he had forſaken the citie. In the meane time, Dion came on towards the citie with his men, and was come ſo neare, that they might ſee him plainely from the citie, marching foremoſt of all, armed with a fayer bright white corſelet, hauing his brother Megacles on his right hand of him, & Calippus ATHENIAN on the left hand, crowned with garlands of flowers: and after him alſo there followed an hundreth ſouldiers that were ſtrangers, choſen for his gard about him, and the reſt came marching after in good order of battell, being led by their Captaines.

The SYRACVSANS ſaw him comming, & went out and receiued him as a holy and bleſſed proceſſion, that brought them their liberty and popular ſtate againe, the which they had loſt the ſpace of eight and fortie yeares. When Dion was come into the citie by the gate called Menitide, he cauſed his trumpeter to ſound to appeaſe the rumor and tumult of the people. Then he commaunded an Herauld to proclaime aloud, that Dion and Megacles, who were come to put downe the tirannie, did ſet all the SYRACVSANS at libertie, and all the other SICILIANS alſo from the bondage & ſubiection of the tirant: and becauſe Dion himſelfe was deſirous to ſpeake vnto the people, he went to the vpper parte of the towne called ACRADINA.

Dion reſtoreth the Syracuſans to libertie.

The SYRACVSANS all the ſtreetes through as he paſſed by, had on either hand of him prepared ſacrifices, and ſet vp tables and cuppes vppon them: and as he paſſed by their houſes, they caſt flowers and frutes on him, and made prayers vnto him, as if he had bene a god.

Dionyſius clocke.

Now vnder the caſtle there was a place called Pentapyla, a clocke to know by the Sunne how the day went, the which Dionyſius had cauſed to be made, and it was of a good pretie height. Dion got vp vpon it, and from thence made his oration to the people that were gathered round about him, exhorting and perſwading his countrimen to doe their endeuour to recouer their libertie againe, and to maintaine it. They being in a maruellous ioy withall, and deſirous to pleaſe Dion: did chooſe him and his brother Megacles their Lieutenants generall, with abſolute power and authoritie. Afterwards alſo, by the conſent of Dion himſelfe and his brother, and at their requeſts in like manner, they choſe twentie other Captaines, of the which the moſt part of them had bene baniſhed by the tyrant, and were returned againe with Dion.

The predictions of the ſoothſayers.

The Soothſayers and Prognoſticators liked it well, and ſaid it was a good ſigne for Dion, that he trode that ſumptuous building and workemanſhippe of the tyrant vnder his feete, when he made his oration: but becauſe the hande of the dyall did ſhew the courſe of the Sunne, which neuer leaueth going, vpon the which he got vppe when he was choſen Lieutenant generall with abſolute power and authoritie: they were affraide againe, that it was a ſigne Dions affayres ſhould haue a ſodaine chaunge of fortune. After this, Dion hauing taken the caſtle of EPIPOLES, he ſet all the Citizens at libertie which were kept there as priſoners in captiuitie by the tyrant, and enuironed the caſtle round about with a wall. Within ſeuen dayes after, Dionyſius returned by ſea to the caſtle of SYRACVSA, and therewithall alſo came the carts loden with armor and weapon to SYRACVSA, the which Dion had left with Synalus: the which Dion cauſed to be diſtributed among the Citizens of SYRACVSA that had none. Others did furniſh them ſelues as well as they could, and ſhewed that they had corage and good will to fight for the maintenaunce and defence of their liberty.

In the meane time, Dionyſius ſent Ambaſſadours, firſt vnto Dion priuately, to ſee if he would yeelde to any compoſition. But Dion would not heare them, but bad them tell the SYRACVSANS openly what they had to ſay, being men that were free, and enioyed liberty. Then the Ambaſſadors ſpake in the behalfe of the tyraunt, vnto the people of SYRACVSA, promiſing them with milde and gentle wordes, that they ſhould paie no more ſubſedies and taxes, but very litle, and ſhould be no more troubled with warres, other then ſuch as they themſelues ſhould like of. The SYRACVSANS made a mockery at thoſe offers, and Dion alſo aunſwered the Ambaſſadors, and willed Dionyſius to ſend no more to the SYRACVSANS, before he had dipoſſeſt him ſelfe of his tyranny: and ſo that he would leaue it, he would be his meane to obtaine all things iuſt and reaſonable of the people. Dionyſius liked very well of this good offer, and therefore ſent his Ambaſſadors againe to pray the SYRACVSANS that they would appoint ſome amongeſt them to come to the caſtell, to talke with him for the benefite and commodity of the common wealth, that he might heare what they would alleadge, and they alſo what aunſwere he would make. Dion choſe certaine whom he ſent vnto him. Now there ranne a rumor in the citie among the SYRACVSANS, which came from the caſtle: that Dionyſius would willingly of himſelfe, rather then by reaſon of Dions comming, depoſe himſelfe of the tirannie. But this was but a falſe allarme, and craftie fetch of Dionyſius, to intrappe the SYRACVSANS by. For thoſe that were ſent him from the citie, he kept them priſoners euery man of them, and one morning hauing made his ſouldiers drinke wine luſtely, which he kept in pay to gard his perſon, he ſent them with great furie to aſſault the wall the SYRACVSANS had built againſt the caſtle. Now, becauſe the SYRACVSANS looked for nothing leſſe then for the ſodaine aſſault, and for that theſe barbarous people with a wonderfull courage & great tumult ouerthrew the wal, and others of them alſo did ſet vpon the SYRACVSANS: there was not a man of them that durſt make head to fight with them, ſauing the ſouldiers that were ſtraungers whom Dion had brought with him. Who when they heard the noyſe ranne ſtraight to repulſe them, and yet they themſelues could not well tell what they ſhould doe vpon that ſodaine. For they could heare nothing, for the great noyſe and hurley burley of the SYRACVSANS which fled with great diſorder, and came and mingled themſelues amongeſt them. Till at length, Dion perceiuing he could not be heard, to ſhew them by deede what they ſhould doe: he went firſt himſelfe againſt theſe barbarous people, and about him there was a cruell and bloody fight. For his enemies knewe him as well as his owne men, and they all ranne vpon him with great cryes. Now for Dion himſelfe, indeede becauſe of his age, he was heauier then was requiſite for one that ſhould away with the paines of ſuch battels: but he had ſuch a valiant courage in him, that he went thorough withall luſtily, and ſlew them that did aſſaile him. Yet he had his hand alſo thruſt thorough with a pyke, and very hardly did his curaces holde out the blowes of the dartes and thruſts by hande which he receiued on them, they were ſo mangled and hacked with ſuch a number of dartes and pykes paſſed thorough his ſhield and broken on him, that in the end he was beaten downe: howbeit his ſouldiers reſcued him ſtraight. Then he made Timonides their Captaine, and he himſelfe tooke his horſe backe, and went vp and downe the citie, ſtaying and quieting the flying of the SYRACVSANS. Then he ſent for his ſouldiers the ſtraungers, which he had put in garriſon in that part of the citie called the ACRADINE to keepe it, and brought them being freſh, againſt the barbarous people of the caſtle that were wearied, and almoſt all of them diſcouraged to attempt any further enterpriſe. For they had made this ſalie out, in hope to haue taken all the citie at the firſt onſet, onely running vp and downe: but when contrary to their expectation, they met theſe valiant ſouldiers and freſh ſupply, they then beganne to retyre againe vnto the caſtle. And the GRECIAN ſouldiers on the other ſide, perceiuing they gaue backe, they came the faſter vpon them, ſo that they were compelled to turne their backes, and were driuen within their wals, after they had ſlaine three ſcore and foureteene of Dions men, and loſt a great number of their owne. This was a noble victory, and therefore the SYRACVSANS gaue the ſouldiers that were ſtraungers, an hundred ſiluer Minas, in reward for their good ſeruice: and they gaue Dion their generall, a crowne of gold. After this, there came letters to Dion by a trumpet from the caſtell, written from the women of his houſe: and among the packet of letters, there was one of them directed: to my father: the which Hipparinus wrote vnto him. For that was Dions ſonnes name, though Timæus writeth he was called Areteus, after his mothers name Aretè. But in ſuch matters, me thinkes Timonides is better to be credited, becauſe he was his friend and companion in armes. All the other letters that were ſent, were openly read before the aſſembly of the SYRACVSANS, and did onely concerne requeſts of theſe women vnto Dion. The SYRACVSANS would not haue the ſuppoſed letter of his ſonne to be openly read: but Dion againſt their mindes opened it, and found that it was Dionyſius letter, who by wordes, made the direction of it vnto Dion, but in effect, he ſpake vnto the SYRACVSANS. For in ſight, it ſeemed a manner of requeſt and iuſtification of him ſelfe: but in truth, it was written of purpoſe to accuſe Dion. Firſt of all he remembred him of the things he had done before, for the eſtabliſhing and preſeruation of the tyranny: and afterwards of cruell threats againſt thoſe whom he ſhould loue beſt, as his wife, his ſonne and ſiſter: and laſt of all, full of moſt humble requeſtes and intreatkes with ſorrow and lamentation. But that which moſt moued Dion of all other was that he required him not to deſtroye the tyrannie, but rather to take it for himſelfe and not to ſet them at libertie that hated him, and would alwayes remember the miſchiefe he had done vnto them: & that he would himſelfe take vpon him to be Lord, ſauing by that meanes the liues of their parents & friends. When theſe letters had bene read before the whole aſſembly of the people, the SYRACVSANS thought not how to reuerence (as they ought) with admiration, the inflexible conſtancie and magnanimitie of Dion, that ſtood firme and faſt for iuſtice and vertue, againſt ſuch vehement intreatie and perſwaſion of his kinsfolke and friends: but they contrarily began to be afraied, and to miſtruſt him, as he that of neceſſitie ſhould be forced to pardon the tirant, for the great pledges and hoſtages he had of him. Wherefore, they began to chooſe them new gouernors, and the rather, becauſe they heard that Heraclides was comming vnto them, whom they loued ſingularly well.

Heraclides what he was.

This Heraclides was one of them that had beene baniſhed, a good ſouldier and Captaine, and well eſteemed of for the charge and office he bare vnder the tirants: howbeit a very vnconſtant man in euery thing, and would not continue long in a minde, and leaſt conſtant in warres where he had great charge of honor in hand. He had fallen out with Dion in PELOPONNESVS, wherefore he determined to come with a power by himſelfe and with his owne fleete againſt the tirant.

Heraclides returneth to Syracuſa.

So he arriued at length in SYRACVSA, with ſeuen gallies, and three other ſhips, where he found Dionyſius againe ſhut vp into his caſtle with a wall, and the SYRACVSANS alſo to haue the better hand of him. Then he began to currie fauor with the common people all the wayes he could poſſibly deuiſe, hauing by nature a certaine pleaſing manner to winne the common people, which ſeeke nothing elſe but to be flattered. Furthermore, he found it the eaſier for him to winne them, becauſe the people did alreadie miſlike Dions ſeueritie, as a man too ſeuere and cruell to gouerne a common wealth. For they had now their will ſo much, and were growen ſo ſtrong headed, becauſe they ſawe themſelues the ſtronger: that they would be flattered (as commonly the people be in free cities, where they onely be Lordes, and doe rule) before they were fully ſet at libertie. Therefore firſt of all, not being called together by the authoritie of the gouernours: they ranne in a furie, of their owne light heads, vnto the place of common aſſemblies, and there choſe Heraclides Admirall.

Then Dion vnderſtanding this, came to complaine of the iniurie they had done him, declaring vnto them, that to giue this power now vnto Heraclides, was to take that away which they had firſt giuen vnto him: becauſe he ſhould no more be generall, if they choſe any other Admirall by ſea then himſelfe. The SYRACVSANS then, as it were againſt their wils, did reuoke the power they had giuen vnto Heraclides: but afterwards Dion ſent for Heraclides, to pray him to come home to him. When he came, he rebuked him a litle, and tolde him that it was not honeſtly, nor profitably done of him, to ſue to the people, & to contend for honor againſt him in ſo daungerous a time, when the leaſt occaſion in the world was enough to haue marred all. Afterwards Dion himſelfe called an aſſembly againe of the city, and eſtabliſhed Heraclides Admirall: and perſwaded the Citizens to giue him ſouldiers, as he had in deede. Heraclides outwardly ſeemed to honour Dion, and confeſſed openly that he was greatly bound vnto him, and was alwayes at his heeles very lowly, being ready at his commaundement: but in the meane time, ſecretly he inticed the common people to rebell, and to ſtirre vppe thoſe whom he knew meete men to like of chaunge.

Heraclides, a diſſembler, practiſing to make the people to rebel againſt Dion.

Whereby he procured Dion ſuch trouble, and brought him into ſuch perplexity, that hee knew not well what way to take. For if he gaue them aduiſe to let Dionyſius quietlie come out of the caſtell: then they accuſed him, and ſayed he did it to ſaue his life. If on the other ſide, becauſe he would not trouble them, he continued ſiege ſtill, and did eſtabliſhe nothing: then they thought he did it of purpoſe to draw out the warres in length, becauſe hee might the longer time remaine their Chiefetaine generall, and ſo to keepe the Citizens longer in feare.

At that time there was one Soſis in SYRACVSA, a man of no name, but noted among the SYRACVSANS for his villany and wickednes, eſteeming that full and ample liberty, when he might vnchecked licentiouſly ſpeake what he would, as in deede he did. For he ſeeking to doe Dion a diſpleaſure: firſt of all one day at a common counſell he ſtoode vp on his feete, and called the SYRACVSANS beaſtes, (amongeſt many other vile wordes he gaue them) if they did not perceiue, that being come from a fond and druncken tyranny, they had now receiued a ſober maiſter, maſter, and a wiſe and warie tirant. So when he had thus openly ſhewed himſelfe an enemie vnto Dion, he came no more that daye into the market place: but the next morning he was ſeene running vp and downe the citie naked, his head and face all of a gore blood, as if he had bene followed of men to haue ſlaine him. Thus Soſis comming in this manner into the middeſt of the market place, cryed out that Dions ſtrangers had lyen in wayte for him, and had handled him in this ſort, ſhewing his wound on his head. Many of the people tooke this matter very grieuouſly, and cryed out vpon Dion, and ſayed it was vilely and tirrannically done of him: by feare of murther and danger, to take away the libertie from the Citizens to ſpeake. Nowe though the whole aſſembly hereuppon fell into an vprore withall, Dion notwithſtanding came thither to cleare himſelfe of theſe accuſations, and made them preſently ſee, that this Soſis was brother to one of Dionyſius gard: who had put into his head, in this ſort to put the citie of SYRACVSA in an vprore, becauſe Dionyſius had no other hope nor meanes to eſcape, but by ſtirring vp faction and ſedition among them, to make one of them fall out with another. The Surgeons were ſent for forthwith to ſearch the wound of this Soſis: who found that it was rather a litle ſcratch, then any violent wound giuen him. For the woundes or cuts of a ſword, are euer deepeſt in the middeſt: and Soſis cut was but very litle, and not deepe, hauing had many beginnings, and giuen him (as it ſeemed) at ſundry times, that for very paine, the party that cutte him was driuen to leaue off, and came to cutte him at diuerſe times. Furthermore, there came certaine of his friendes in the meane time, that brought a raſor before the aſſembly, and reported that as they came, they met Soſis by the way all bloudied: who ſaide, that he fled from Dions ſouldiers, which had but newly hurt him. Whereupon they preſently followed them, but found no man, and onely they ſawe a raſor, which ſome bodie had caſt vpon a hollow ſtone thereabout, where they firſt ſawe him comming vnto them. Thus Soſis deuiſe had but euill ſucceſſe. For beſide all theſe proofes and tokens, Dions houſhold ſeruantes came to be a witneſſe againſt him: that very earely in the morning he went abroad alone with a raſor in his hand. Then they that before did burden and accuſe Dion, knew not what to ſay to the matter, but ſhrunke away: whereupon the people condemning Soſis to death, they were quiet againe with Dion. Yet were they alwaies affraid of theſe ſouldiers that were ſtraungers, ſpecially when they ſaw the greateſt conflicts they had with the tyrant, was by ſea, after that Philiſtus was come from the coaſt of APVGLIA with a great number of gallies to aide the tyrant. For then they thought, that theſe ſouldiers the ſtraungers being armed at all partes to fight by lande, they would do them no more ſeruice by ſea: becauſe the Citizens themſelues were they that kept them in ſafetie, for that they were men practiſed to fight by ſea, and were alſo the ſtronger by meanes of their ſhips. But beſide all this, the onely thing that made them to be couragious again, was the good fortune they had at the battell by ſea, in the which when they had ouercome Philiſtus, they cruelly and barbarouſly vſed him. Truely Ephorus ſaith, that P*hiliſtus* ſlue him ſelfe, when he ſaw his galley taken. Howbeit Timonides (who was alway with Dion from the firſt beginning of this war) writing vnto Speuſippus the Philoſopher, ſaith that P*hiliſtus* was taken aliue, becauſe his galley ranne a land: and that the SYRACVSANS firſt tooke off his curaces, and ſtripped him naked, and after they had done him all the villany and ſpite they could, they cut off his head, and gaue his body vnto boyes, commaunding them to dragge it into that part of the city called ACRADINE, and then to caſt it into the common priuy. Timæus alſo to ſpite him the more, ſayeth that the boyes tyed the dead body by his lame legge, and ſo dragged him vp and downe the city, where all the SYRACVSANS did what villany to it they could, being glad to ſee him dragged by the legge, that had ſayed Dionyſius ſhould not flie from the tyranny vppon a light horſe, but that they ſhould pull him out by the legge againſt his will. Now P*hiliſtus* reporteth this matter thus, not as ſpoken to Dionyſius by him ſelfe, but by ſome other. But Timæus taking a iuſt occaſion & colour to ſpeake euill of the good will, fidelity, and care that P*hiliſtus* had alwaies ſeemed to ſhew in the confirmation and defence of the tyranny: doth liberally beſtow iniurious wordes on him in this place. Now for them whom he had in deede offended, if they of malice and ſpite to be reuenged, did offer him cruelty, peraduenture they were not much to be blamed: but for them that ſince his death haue written the ieaſts, who were neuer offended by him in his life time, and who ought to ſhewe themſelues diſcreete in their writing, me thinkes that if they had regarded their owne credit and eſtimation, they ſhould not ſo fondly and outragiouſly haue reproued the aduerſities and meſſortunes, which by fortune may as well chaunce to the honeſteſt man, as vnto him. Thus fondely did Ephorus praiſe Philiſtus, who although he haue an excellent fine wit to counterfeate goodly excuſes, and cunningly to hide wicked and diſhoneſt partes, and eloquently to deuiſe by honeſt wordes to defend an euill cauſe: yet can not he with all the fiue wits he hath, excuſe himſelfe, that he hath not bene the onely man of the world that hath moſt fauored tirantes, and that hath euer loued, and ſpecially deſired power, wealth and alliance with tirantes. But he in my opinion taketh the right courſe of an Hiſtoriographer, that neither doth commend Philiſtus doings, nor yet caſteth his aduerſities in his teeth to his reproach. After Philiſtus death, Dionyſius ſent vnto Dion, to make him an offer to deliuer him the caſtle, armor, munition, and ſouliers that were in it, with money alſo to paye them for fiue monethes ſpace. For himſelfe, he prayed that he might be ſuffered to goe ſafely into ITALY, and to ly there, to take the pleaſure of the frutes of the coũtrie called GYARTA, which was within the territorie of SYRACVSA, and lyeth out from the ſea towards the maine land. Dion refuſed this offer, and anſwered the Ambaſſadors that they muſt moue the SYRACVSANS in it. They ſuppoſing they ſhould eaſily take Dionyſius aliue,, would not heare the Ambaſſadors ſpeake, but turned them away. Dionyſius ſeing no other remedie, left the caſtle in the handes of his eldeſt ſonne Apollocrates, and hauing a luſtie gale of winde, he ſecretly imbarked certaine of his men he loued beſt, with the richeſt things he had, and ſo hoyſed ſaile, vnwares to Heraclides, the Admirall of SYRACVSA. The people were maruellouſly offended with Heraclides for it, and beganne to mutine againſt him. But Heraclides, to pacifie this tumult of the people, ſuborned one Hippon an Orator, who preferred the law Agraria vnto the people, for the diuiſion of all the Iland amongſt them: and that the beginning of libertie was equalitie, and of bondage pouertie, vnto them that had no landes. Heraclides giuing his conſent to this decree, and ſtirring the common people to ſedition againſt Dion, that withſtood it: perſwaded the SYRACVSANS not onely to confirme the law Hippon had propounded, but alſo to diſcharge the hyred ſtraungers, to chooſe other Captaines and gouernors, and to rid them ſelues of Dions ſeuere gouernment. But they ſuppoſing ſtraight to haue bene rid from the tyrannie, as from a long and grieuous ſickneſſe, ouerraſhly taking vpon them like people that of long time had bene at libertie, they vtterly vndid themſelues, and ouerthrew Dions purpoſe: who like a good Phiſitian was carefull to ſee the citie well ordered and gouerned. So when they were aſſembled to chooſe new officers in the middeſt of ſommer, there fell ſuch horrible thunders, and other terrible ſtormes, and vnfortunate ſignes in the element, that for the ſpace of fifteene daies together, the people were ſtill ſcattered and diſperſed when they were aſſembled: inſomuch, that being affraide of theſe ſignes aboue, they durſt not at that time create any new Captaines. Certaine daies after, as the Orators had choſen a faire time to proceede to the election of officers: an oxe drawing in a cart (being daily acquainted with euery ſight and noiſe) ſodainely without any occaſion offered, fell into a madneſſe againſt the carter that draue him, and breaking his yoke a ſunder, ranne ſtraight to the Theater, and there made the people runne into euery corner, to flye and ſaue them ſelues: and then flinging, and bearing all downe before him that ſtoode in his way, he ranne through as much of the city, as the enemies afterwards wanne of them. This notwithſtanding, the SYRACVSANS making light acompt of all theſe ſignes, they choſe fiue and twenty Captaines, of the which Heraclides was one: and ſecretely they ſent to feele the hiered ſouldiers, to ſee if they could entice them from Dion, to cauſe them to take their part, and made them large promiſes to make them free men, as them ſelues of SYRACVSA. The ſouldiers would not be enticed from him, but faithfully and louingly tooke Dion amongeſt them with their armour and weapon, and putting him in the middeſt of them, led him in this manner out of the city, and did no man hurt, but reprouing their vnthankefulnes and villany vnto all thoſe they met by the way. Then the SYRACVSANS deſpiſing them for their ſmall number, & becauſe they did not firſt ſet vpon them, but truſting on the other ſide to them ſelues for that they were the greater number: they came to aſſayle them, ſuppoſing they ſhould eaſily ouercome them in the city, & kill euery man of them. Dion

being thus in a ſtraight,that of neceſſitie he muſt fight againſt his owne countrymen,or els be ſlaine himſelf with his ſouldiers: he held vp his hands to the SYRACVSANS & very earneſtly prayed them to be content, pointing them with his finger to the caſtle that was full of their enemies,which ſhewed themſelues vpon the walles,& ſaw what they did. In the end when he ſaw that he could not pacifie their furie and tumult,and that all the citie was in an vprore with the prittle prattle of theſe ſeditious people,who like the ſea were caried with the wind: he did yet forbid his ſouldiers to giue any charge vpon them, who notwithſtanding made a countenance with great cries, and ratling of their harneſſe, as if they had ment to runne on them. Then the SYRACVSANS durſt not abide by it,but ran away like ſheepe through the ſtreets & no man chaſed them. So Dion called backe againe his men,& led them directly into the country of the LEONTINES. Thē the new officers & gouernors of SYRACVSA,perceiuing that the women laughed them to ſcorne: becauſe they would recouer the ſhame they had loſt, they armed their men a new againe,and did march after Dion to fight with him, whom they ouertooke at a riuer, as he was ready to paſſe ouer. Then began their horſemen a litle to skirmiſh with Dions company. But when they ſaw he did no more beare with their faults for countries ſake,but frowned indeed vpon them,and did ſet his men in battell ray againſt them: then they turned their backes againe, with more ſhame and reproache then before, and ſo fled vnto the citie of SYRACVSA,& had not many of their men ſlain. The LEONTINES receiued Dion very honorably,tooke the ſtrangers his ſouldiers,and gaue them pay, and made them free Citizens with them:& ſent ambaſſadors alſo vnto the SYRACVSANS,to will them to let the ſtrangers haue their pay. The SYRACVSAS on their ſide alſo, ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the LEONTINES to accuſe Dion. So all their confederats were aſſembled in the citie of the LONTINES, & in that aſſembly,after both parties had bin heard,to heare what they would ſay:it was iudged that the SYRACVSANS were to blame. Howbeit they would not ſtand to the iudgment of their confederats,for they were now grown proud & careles, becauſe they were gouerned by no man,but had Captaines that ſtudied to pleaſe them,and were affraid alſo to diſpleaſe them. After that,there arriued certen gallies of Dionyſius at SYRACVSA,of the which Nypſius NEAPOLITAN was captaine: which brought victuals & money,to helpe them that were beſeged within the caſtle. Theſe gallies were fought with,& the SYRACVSANS obtained victory,and tooke foure of the tirants gallies with three banks of owers a peece:howbeit they fondly abuſed their victorie. For they hauing no bodie to command nor rule them, imployed all their ioy, in ryoting and banquetting, and in fond and diſſolute meetings,taking ſo litle care & regard to their buſines,that now when they thought the caſtle was ſure their own, they almoſt loſt their citie. For Nypſius perceiuing that euery part of the citie was out of order, and that the common people did nothing all day long vnto darke night, but bib and drinke drunke, dauncing after their pypes and howboyes, and that the gouernours them ſelues were verie glad alſo to ſee ſuch feaſting, or elſe for that they diſſembled it, and durſt not commaund and compell them that were druncke: he wiſely tooke the occaſion offered him, and ſcaled the wall which had ſhut vp the caſtle, and wanne it, and ouerthrewe it. Then he ſent the barbarous ſouldiers into the citie, and commaunded them to doe with them they met, what they would or could. The SYRACVSANS then too late found their fault, and hardly gaue preſent remedie, they were ſo amazed and ſodainely ſet on: for indeed they made a right ſacke of the citie. Here men were killed, there they ouerthrewe the wall, in another place they caried away women and litle children priſoners into the caſtle, weeping and crying out: and laſtly, they made the Captaines at their wits end, who could giue no preſent order, nor haue their men to ſerue them againſt their enemies, that came hand ouer head on euery ſide amongeſt them. The city being thus miſerably in garboile, and the ACRADINE alſo in great hazard of taking, in the which they put all their hope and confidence to riſe againe: euery man thought then with himſelfe that Dion muſt be ſent for, but yet no man moued it notwithſtanding, being aſhamed of their vnthankfulnes and ouer great follie that they had committed, in driuing him away. Yet neceſſitie enforcing them vnto it, there were certaine of the horſemen and of their confederates that cryed, that they muſt ſend for Dion, and the PELOPONNESIANS his ſouldiers, which were with him in the territorie of the LEONTINES. Aſſoone as the firſt

The negligence and troubles of the Syracuſans word was heard, and that one had the heart to tell it to the people, all the SYRACVSANS cryed out, there was the poynt: and they were ſo glad of it, that the water ſtoode in their eyes for ioy, and beſought the gods it would pleaſe them to bring him vnto them, they were ſo deſirous to haue him againe. For they called to mind how valiant and reſolute he was in danger, and how that he was neuer affrayed, but did encourage them with his manhood in ſuch ſorte, that being ledde by him, they were not affrayed to ſet vppon their enemies. So the confederates for them, ſent preſently Archonides and Teleſides vnto him: and the noblemen that ſerued on horſebacke, they ſent him alſo fiue amongſt them, beſide Hellanicus. Who tooke their horſes, and poaſted for life, ſo that they came vnto the citie of the LEONTINES about Sunne ſet, and lighting off from their horſes, they went firſt of all and kneeled downe at Dions feete, and weeping, tolde him the miſerable eſtate of the SYRACVSANS. Straight there came diuerſe of the LEONTINES, and many of the PELOPONNESIAN ſouldiers vnto Dion, miſtruſting then that there was ſome newes in hand, to ſee the earneſt and humble ſute the Ambaſſadors of SYRACVSA made vnto him. Wherefore Dion tooke them preſently with him, and brought them himſelfe vnto the Theater, where the common councels and aſſemblies of the citie were holden. Thither ran euery man to heare what the matter was. Then Archonides and Hellanicus brought in by Dion, tolde openly before the whole aſſembly the greatneſſe of their miſerie, and requeſted the hiered ſouldiers to come and aide the SYRACVSANS, forgetting the iniurie they had receiued: conſidering that they had more derely payed for their folly, then they themſelues whom they had ſo iniuried, would haue made them to haue ſuffered. When they had ſayd their minds, there was a great ſilence through all the Theater: and then Dion roſe vp, and began to ſpeake. But the great teares that fell from his eyes would not ſuffer him to ſpeake: wherefore the hyred ſouldiers being ſorie to ſee him weepe, prayed him not to trouble himſelfe, but to be of good courage. Then Dion letting goe the ſorrow and griefe he had conceiued, he began to ſpeake vnto them in this manner. My Lords of PELOPONNESVS, and you alſo the confederats: I haue called you together to conſult with you, what you ſhould doe. For my ſelfe, it were no honeſtie for me to conſult what I ſhould doe now, when the citie of SYRACVSA ſtandeth in perill of deſtruction: and therfore if I cannot ſaue it from deſtruction, yet at the leaſt I will bury my ſelfe in the fire and ruine of my countrie. But for you, if it pleaſe you once more to helpe vs anaduiſed and more vnfortunate people: you ſhall by your meanes ſet the poore diſtreſſed city of SYRACVSA again a foot, which is your deed. Or if it be ſo, that remembring the iniuries the SYRACVSANS haue offred you, you will ſuffer it to be deſtroyed: yet I beſeech the gods that at the leaſt they will requite your valiantnes, fidelitie and good loue you haue borne me vntill this preſent, beſeeching you to remember Dion, who neither forſooke you at any time when you haue bene iniuried, nor his countriemen, when they were in trouble. So going on ſtill with his tale, the mercenary ſtraungers ſtepped forth with great noiſe, and prayed him to leade them to ayd SYRACVSA. Then the Ambaſſadors alſo that were ſent from the SYRACVSANS ſaluted and embraced them, and prayed the gods to bleſſe Dion, and them, with all the good hap that might be. So when all was whiſht and quiet, Dion willed them forthwith to go & prepare themſelues, and that they ſhould be there ready armed after ſupper, determining the very ſame night to go to aide SYRACVSA. But now at SYRACVSA, while day light laſted, Dionyſius ſouldiers and captaines did all the miſchiefe & villany, they could in the city, & when night came, they retired again into their caſtle, hauing loſt very few of their men. Then the ſeditious gouernors of the SYRACVSANS took hart againe vnto them, hoping that the enemies would be contented with that they had done: and therefore began a newe to perſwade the citizens to let Dion alone, and not to receiue him with his mercenary ſouldiers if they came to ayde him, ſaying that they themſelues were honeſter men then the ſtrangers to ſaue their citie, and to defend their libertie without helpe of any other. So other Ambaſſadors were ſent again vnto Dion, ſome from the captaines & gouernors of the citie, to ſtay them that they ſhould not come, and other alſo from the horſmen, and noble citizens his frends to haſten his iorney: whereupon by reaſon of this variance, Dion marched very ſoftly at his eaſe. Now by night, Dions enemies within the citie got to the gates, and kept them that Dion ſhould not come in. Nypſius on the other ſide made a ſaly out of the caſtle, with his mercenary ſouldiers, being better appointed, & a greater number of them then before: and with them he ſtraight plucked down all the wal which they had built before the caſtle, & ran & ſacked the city. At this ſaly out of the caſtle, they did not onely kill the men they met, but women & litle children alſo, & ſtayed no more to ſpoile but to deſtroy & put al to hauock. For, becauſe Dionyſius ſaw that he was brought to a ſtraight and deſperat caſe, he bare ſuch mortall malice againſt the SYRACVSANS, that ſith there was no remedy but that he muſt needs forgo his tirannie: he determined to bury it, with the vtter deſtruction and deſolation of their citie. And therfore, to preuent Dions aide, and to make a quicke diſpatch to deſtroy all: they came with burning torches in their hands, & did ſet fire on all things they could come to: & farther off, they fired their darts and arrowes, and beſtowed them in euery place of the citie. So, they that fled for the fire, were met withall, and ſlaine in the ſtreets by the ſouldiers, and others alſo that ran into their houſes, were driuen out again by force of fire. For there were a number of houſes that were on fire, and fell downe vpon them that went and came. This miſery was the chiefeſt cauſe why al the SYRACVSANS agreed together to ſet open the gates vnto Dion. For when Dion heard by the way, that Dionyſius ſouldiers were gone againe into the caſtle, he made no great haſt to march forward: but when day was broken, there came certen horſmen from SYRACVSA, vnto Dion, who brought him newes that the enemies had once againe taken the citie. Then alſo came other of his enemies vnto him and prayed him to make haſt. Now their miſerie increaſing ſtill, and they being brought into hard ſtate: Heraclides firſt ſent his brother vnto Dion, and then Theodotes his Vncle, to pray him to come quickely, and helpe them. For now there was no man left to reſiſt the enemies, becauſe he himſelfe was hurt, and the citie alſo was in manner cleane burnt and deſtroyed. When theſe men came to Dion, he was yet about three ſcore furlong from the towne. So he tolde his mercenary ſouldiers the danger that the towne was in, and hauing encoraged them, he led them no more fayer and ſoftly, but running toward the citie, & meeting Meſſengers one of anothers necke as he went, that prayed him to make all the poſſible ſpeed he could. By this meanes, the ſouldiers marching with wonderfull ſpeed & good will together, he entred the gates of the city at a place called HECATOMPEDON. Firſt of all, he ſent the lighteſt armed he had, againſt the enemeis, to the end that the SYRACVSANS ſeing them, they might take a good hart againe to them, whilſt he himſelf in the meane time did ſet all the other heauy armed ſouldiers and cityzens that came to ioyne with him, in battel ray, and did caſt them into diuerſe ſquadrons, of greater length and bredth, and appointed them that ſhould haue the leading of them, to the end that ſetting vpon the enemies in diuerſe places together, they ſhould put them in greater feare and terror. When he had ſet all things in this order, and had made his prayer vnto the gods, and that they ſaw him marching through the citie againſt their enemies: then there roſe ſuch a common noiſe and reioycing, and great ſhout of the ſouldiers, mingled with vowes, prayers, and perſwaſions of all the SYRACVSANS: that they called Dion their god and ſauior and the mercenary ſouldiers their bretheren, & fellowe citizens. Furthermore, there was not a SYRACVSAN that ſo much regarded his owne life and perſon, but he ſeemed to be more afrayed of the loſſe of Dion onely, then of all the reſt. For they ſaw him the foremoſt man running through the danger of the fire, treading in bloud, and vpon dead bodies that lay ſlaine in the middeſt of the ſtreets. Now indeed to charge the enemies, it was a maruellous dangerous enterpriſe: for they were like mad beaſtes, and ſtood beſide in battell ray alongſt the wall which they had ouerthrown, in a very dangerous place, and hard to win. Howbeit the danger of the fire, did moſt of all trouble and amaze the ſtrangers, and did ſtop their way. For on which ſide ſoeuer they turned them, the houſes round about them, were all on a fire, and they were driuen to march ouer the burnt timber of the houſes, & to runne in great danger of the walls of the houſe ſides that fell on them, and to paſſe through the thicke ſmoke mingled with duſt, & beſide to keepe their rancks with great difficulty. And when they came to aſſaile the enemies, they could not come to fight hand to hand, but a few of them in number, becauſe of the ſtraightnes of the place: howbeit the SYRACVSANS with force of cries & ſhouts did ſo animat, and encourage their men, that at length they draue Nypſius and his men to forſake the place. The moſt part of them got into the caſtle, being very nere vnto them: the other that could not get in in time, fledde ſtraglingly vp and downe, whom the Grecian ſouldiers ſlue, chaſing of them. The extremitie of the time did not preſently ſuffer the Conquerors to reape the frute of their victory, neither the ioyes & imbracings meet for ſo great an exployte. For the Syracvsans went euery man home to his owne houſe, to quench the fire, the which could ſcarcely be put out all the night. When day brake, there was none of theſe ſeditious flatterers of the people that durſt tary in the city, but condemning themſelues, they fled to take their fortune. Heraclides and Theodotes came together of their owne good willes to yeeld themſelues vnto Dion, confeſſing that they had done him wrong, and humbly praying him to ſhew himſelfe better vnto them, then they had ſhewed themſelues vnto him: and that it was more honorable for him, being euery way vnmatchable for his vertues, to ſhew himſelf more noble to conquer his anger, thẽ his vnthankfull enemies had done: who contending with him before in vertue, did now confeſſe themſelues to be farre inferior vnto him. This was the ſumme and effect of Heraclides & Theodotes ſubmiſſion vnto Dion. But his friends did perſwade him not to pardon two ſuch wicked men, who did malice and enuie his honor: and as he would doe the ſtrangers his ſouldiers any pleaſure, that he ſhould put Heraclides into their hands, to root out of the cõmon wealth of Syracvsa, his vile maner to flatter and curry fauor with the people, the which was as dangerous & great a plague to a citie, as the tyrannie. Dion pacifying them, anſwered. Other generals of armies ſaid he, do imploy all their wits in martiall exerciſe & warres: but for himſelfe, that he had of long time ſtudied and learned in the ſchoole of the Academy, to ouercome anger, enuy, & all malice & contention. The noble proofe whereof is moſt ſeene, not in vſing honeſt men and his friendes moderately, but ſhewing mercy alſo vnto his enemies, & forgetting his anger againſt them that haue offended him: and that for his part, he had rather ouercome Heraclides, not in riches and wiſdom, but in clemency & iuſtice, for therein chiefly conſiſted excellency, ſith no man elſe in warres can chalenge power and gouernment, but fortune, that ruleth moſt. And though Heraclides, ſaid he, through enuy hath done like a wicked man: muſt Dion therefore through anger bleamiſh his vertue? Indeed by mans law it is thought meeter to reuenge an iniurie offred, then to doe an iniurie: but nature ſheweth, that they both proceed of one ſelfe imperfection. Now though it be a hard thing to chaunge, and alter the euill diſpoſition of a man, after he is once nuſled in villany: yet is not man of ſo wilde and brutiſh a nature, that his wickedneſſe may not be ouercome with often pleaſures, when he ſeeth that they are continually ſhewed him. Dion anſwering his friends thus, he forgaue Heraclides, and beginning againe to ſhut vp the caſtle with a wal round about, he commanded the Syracvsans euery man of them to cut downe a ſtake, and to bring it thither. So when night was come, ſetting his ſouldiers the ſtrangers in hand withall whilſt the Syracvsans ſlept & tooke their eaſe: by morning he had compaſſed the caſtle round about with a pale. The next day, they that ſaw the greatnes and ſodaine expedition of this work, wondred much at it, as well the enemies, as alſo the Citizens & when he had buried the dead bodies, & redeemed them that were taken priſoners, (which were not much leſſe then two thouſand perſons) he called a common councell of the citie, in the which Heraclides made a motion, that Dion ſhould be choſen generall of Syracvsa, with abſolute power & authoritie, both by ſea and land. The chiefeſt men of the city liked yery well of it, & would haue had the people to haue paſſed it. But the rabble of theſe mariners, and other mechanicall people liuing by their labor, would not ſuffer Heraclides to be put from his Admiralſhip, but fell to mutinie, thinking that though Heraclides did them no pleaſure els, yet he would euer be a more popular man then Dion, and pleaſe the common people better. Dion granted their deſire, & made Heraclides Admirall againe of the ſea: howbeit he did anger them as much another way, whẽ he did not only reiect the earneſt ſute they made to haue the law Agraria paſſe for diuiſion of lands in equalitie amongſt them, but did alſo cancell & reuoke all that had bene done before. Wherfore Heraclides remaining at Messina, began thenceforth to enter into new practiſes againe, & to flatter the ſouldiers & ſea-faring men he had brought thither with him & to ſtirre them vp to rebel againſt Dion, ſaying that he would make himſelfe tirant: and himſelfe in the meane time ſecretly practiſed with Dionyſius, by meanes of a Spartan called Pharax. The nobleſt man of the Syracvsans miſtruſted it, & thereupon there fell out great mutiny in their campe, whereby alſo followed great famine in Syracvsa: ſo that Dion was at ſuch a ſtraight, that he could not tell what to ſay to it, and was reproued of all his friends for that he had againe preferred to great authoritie againſt himſelfe, ſo vntractable a man and ſo malicious & wicked a perſon as Heraclides was. Now when Pharax lay in campe with an army neare vnto the citie of NAPLES, in the marches of the AGRIGENTINES: Dion did bring the army of the SYRACVSANS into the field, being yet determined not to fight with him til an other time But through Heraclides, & the ſea-mens crying out, that ſaid he would not try this war by battell, but would draw it out in length becauſe he would be ſtill generall: he was forced to giue battell, and loſt it. Howbeit the ouerthrow was not great, and hapned rather becauſe his men were at a iarre among themſelues, by reaſon of their faction and diuiſion, then otherwiſe. Dion therfore prepared to fight another battell, & gathered his men together againe encouraging them, when euen at twy-light word was brought him that Heraclides with all his fleet was vnder ſaile towards SYRACVSA meaning to take the citie, and to ſhut Dion & his army out of it. Wherefore he preſently tooke with him the chiefeſt men of authoritie in the citie, and the moſt willingeſt men, and rode all night with them in ſuch haſt, that they were at the gates of SYRACVSA the next morning by nine of the clocke, hauing ridden ſeuen hundreth furlong. Heraclides that had ſailed with all the poſſible ſpeede he could to preuent him with his ſhippes, perceiuing that he came ſhort, he turned ſayle, and taking ſeaes at all aduenture by chance he met with Gæſylus LACEDÆMONIAN, who told him he was ſent from LACEDÆMON, to be generall to the SICILIANS in this warre, as Gylippus was ſent at other times before. He was glad he had met with him to haue ſuch a remedie and defence againſt Dion, & boaſted of it vnto the friends & confederats of SYRACVSA, & ſent an Herauld before vnto the SYRACVSANS, ſũmoning them to receiue Gæſylus LACEDÆMONIAN, who was ſent to be their generall. Dion made anſwer: that the SYRACVSANS had gouerners enough, and though that their affaires did of neceſſitie require a LACEDÆMONIAN captaine, yet that himſelfe was he, for that he was made free in SPARTA. Then Gæſylus perceiuing he could not obtaine to be generall, he went vnto SYRACVSA, & came to Dion, & there made Heraclides, and him frends againe, by the great and ſolemne othes he made: & becauſe Gæſylus alſo ſware, that he himſelfe would be reuenged of him for Dions ſake, & puniſh Heraclides, if euer after he did once more conſpire againſt him. After that the SYRACVSNAS brake vp their armie by ſea, becauſe it did them then no ſeruice, and was beſide chargeable keeping of it, & further did alſo breed ſedition and trouble amongſt their gouernors: and ſo went to lay ſtraighter ſiege to the caſtle then euer they did, and built vp the wall againe, which the enemies had ouerthrowen. Then Dionyſius ſonne ſeeing no aide to come to him from any parte, and that victuals failed them, and further, that the ſouldiers began to mutine, being vnable to keepe them: he fell to a compoſition with Dion, and deliuered vp the caſtle into his hands, with all the armor and munition in it: and ſo tooke his mother and his ſiſters of Dion, and put them abord vpon fiue gallies, with the which he went vnto his father, through the ſafe conduct of Dion. There was not a man at that time in all SYRACVSA, but was there to ſee this ſight, or if by chaunce there were any abſent, the other that were there called them thither as loud as they could crie, ſaying, that they did not ſee the goodlieſt daye and ſunneſhine, which the citie of SYRACVSA might ſee then at her riſing, the ſame being now reſtored againe to her former libertie. If vntill this preſent day they doe reckon the flying of Dionyſius, for one of the rareſt examples of fortunes chaunge, as one of the greateſt and notableſt things that euer was: what ioy thinke we had they that draue him out, and what pleaſure had they with themſelues, that with the leaſt meane that could be poſſible, did deſtroy the greateſt tirannie in the world? So when Apollocrates Dionyſius ſonne was imbarked, and that Dion was entred into the caſtle: the women within the caſtle would not tarie till he came into the houſe, but went to meete him at the gates, Ariſtomachè leading Dions ſon in her hand, and Aretè following her weeping, being very fearefull how ſhe ſhould call and ſalute her huſband, hauing lyen with another man. Dion firſt ſpake to his ſiſter, and afterwardes to his ſonne: and then Ariſtomachè offering him Aretè, ſaid vnto him. Since thy baniſhment ô Dion, we haue led a miſerable & captiue life: but now that thou art returned home with victorie, thou haſt rid vs out of care and thraldome, and haſt alſo made vs againe bolde to lift vp our heads, ſauing her here, whom I wretched creature haue by force (thy ſelfe aliue) »

ſeene maried vnto another man. Now then, ſith fortune hath made thee Lord of vs all, what iudgement giueſt thou of this compulſion? Howe wilt thou haue her to ſalute thee, as her Vncle, or husband? As Ariſtomache ſpake theſe wordes, the water ſtoode in Dions eyes: ſo, he gently & louingly taking his wife Aretè by the hand, he gaue her his ſonne, and willed her to goe home to his houſe where he then remained, and ſo deliuered the caſtle vnto the SYRACUSANS.

He hauing this proſperous ſucceſſe and victorie, would not reape any preſent benefite or pleaſure thereby, before he had ſhewed himſelfe thankefull to his friendes, giuen great giftes alſo vnto the confederates of SYRACUSA, and ſpecially, before he had giuen euerie one of his friends in the citie, and his mercenarie ſouldiers the ſtrangers, ſome honorable reward according to their deſerts, exceeding his habilitie with magnanimitie of minde: when he him ſelfe liued ſoberly, and kept a moderate dyet, contenting him with any thing that came firſt to hand.

Euery man that heard of it, wondred at him, conſidering that not onely all SICILIA and CARTHAGE, but generally all GRECE looked vpon his great proſperitie and good fortune, thinking no man liuing greater then himſeſe, nor that any Captaine euer attained vnto ſuch fame and wonderfull fortune, as he was come vnto. This notwithſtanding Dion liued as temperately and modeſtly in his apparell, and alſo in his number of ſeruantes, and ſeruice at his bord, as if he had liued with Plato in the Academy at ATHENS, and had not bene conuerſant amongeſt ſouldiers and Captaines, which haue no other comfort nor pleaſure for all the paines and daungers they ſuffer continually, but to eate and drinke their fill, and to take their pleaſure all day long. Plato wrote vnto him, that all the world had him in admiration. But Diō, in my opinion, had no reſpect but to one place, and to one citie (to wit, the Academy) and would haue no other Iudges nor lookers into his doings, but the ſchollers of the ſame: who neither wondred at his great exploites, valiantneſſe, nor victorie, but onely conſidered if he did wiſely and modeſtly vſe the fortune he had, and could ſo keepe himſelfe within modeſt boundes, hauing done ſo great things. Furthermore, touching the grauetie he had when he ſpake to any bodie, and his inflexible ſeueritie which he vſed towards the people, he determined neuer to alter or chaunge it: notwithſtanding that his affaires required him to ſhew courteſie and lenitie, and that Plato alſo reproued him for it, and wrote, that ſeueritie and obſtinacie (as we ſayed before) was the companion of ſolitarineſſe. But it ſeemeth to me that Dion did vſe it for two reſpectes. The firſt, becauſe nature had not framed him, curteous and affable to winne men: ſecondly he did what he could to drawe the SYRACUSANS to the contrarie, who were ouer licencious, & ſpoiled with too much flattery: for Heraclides began againe to be buſie with him.

Firſt of all, Dion ſending for him to come to counſel, he ſent him word he would not come: and that being a priuate citizen, he would be at the common councell amongeſt others when any was kept. Afterwardes he accuſed him, for that he had not ouerthrowen & raſed the caſtle: and alſo becauſe he would not ſuffer the people to breake open the tombe of Dionyſius the elder, to caſt out his bodie: & becauſe he ſent for counſellers to CORINTH, and diſdained to make the citizens his companions in the gouernment of the cōmon wealth. In deede to confeſſe a troth, Dion had ſent for certen CORINTHIANS, hoping the better to ſtabliſh the forme of a common wealth, which he had in his minde, when they were come. For his minde was vtterly to breake the gouernment of Democratia, (to wit, the abſolute gouernment and authoritie of the people in a citie, not being as it were a common wealth, but rather a fayer and market where things are ſolde, as Plato ſaieth) and to eſtabliſh the LACONIAN or CRETAN common wealth, mingled with a princely, & popular gouernment: and that ſhould be, Ariſtocratia, to wit, the number of a fewe noble men that ſhould gouerne and direct the chiefeſt and waightieſt matters of ſtate. And for that purpoſe, he thought the CORINTHIANS the meeteſt men to help him to frame this cōmon wealth, cōſidering that they gouerned their affaires more by chooſing a few number of the nobilitie, then otherwiſe, and that they did not referre many things to the voice of the people.

The murther of Heraclides

And becauſe he was aſſured that Heraclides would be againſt him in it all that he could, and that otherwiſe he knew he was a ſeditious, a troubleſome, and light headed fellow: he then ſuffered them to kill him who had long before done it, if he had not kept them from it, & ſo they went home to his houſe, and ſlue him there. The murther of Heraclides was much miſliked of the SYRACUSANS: howbeit Dion cauſed him to be honorably buried, and brought his bodie to the ground, followed with all his armie.

Then he made an oration himſelfe to the people, and told them, that it was impoſsible to auoyde ſedition and trouble in the citie, ſo long as Dion & Heraclides did both gouerne together. At that time there was one Callippus an Athenian, a familiar of Dions, who (as Plato ſayth) came not acquainted with Dion through the occaſion of his ſtudy in Philoſophie: but becauſe he had bene his guide to bring him to ſee the ſecret miſteries and ceremonies of the ſacrifices, and for ſuch other like common talke and companie. This notwithſtanding, Callippus did accompany him in all this warre, and was very much honoured of him, and was one of the firſt of all his friendes that entred into Syracusa with him, and did valiantly behaue himſelfe in all the battels and conflicts that were fought. This Callippus ſeeing that Dions beſt & chiefeſt friends were all ſlaine in this warre, & that Heraclides alſo was dead, that the people of Syracusa had no more any head, and beſides, that the ſouldiers which were with Dion did loue him better then any other man: he became the vnfaithfulleſt man and the verieſt villain of all other, hoping that for reward to kill his friend Dion, he ſhould vndoubtedly come to haue the whole gouernement of all Sicilia, and as ſome do report, for that he had taken a bribe of his enemies of twentie talents for his labour to commit this murther. So he began to practiſe, to bribe, and to ſubborne certaine of the mercenarie ſouldiers againſt Dion, and that by a maruellous craftie and ſuttle fetch. For, vſing commonly to report vnto Dion certaine ſeditious wordes, ſpoken peraduenture by the ſouldiers indeede, or elſe deuiſed of his owne head: he wan ſuch a libertie & boldneſſe by the truſt Dion had in him, that he might ſafely ſay what he would to any of the ſouldiers, and boldly ſpeake euill of Dion by his owne commaundement: to the end he might thereby vnderſtand the better whether any of the ſouldiers were angry with him, or wiſhed his death. By this pollicy, Callippus ſtraight foūd out thoſe that bare Dion grudge, & that were already corrupted, whom he drew to his conſpiracy. And if any mā vnwilling to geue eare vnto him, went and told Dion, that Callippus would haue intiſed him to conſpire againſt him: Dion was not angry with him for it, thinking that he did, but as he had commaunded him to do. Now as this treaſon was practiſing againſt Dion, there appeared a great and monſtruous ghoſt or ſpirit vnto him. By chaunce ſitting late one euening all alone, in a gallerie he had, and being in a deepe thought with himſelfe, ſodainly he heard a noyſe: and therwith caſting his eye to the end of his gallery, (being yet day light) he ſaw a monſtrous great woman, like vnto one of the furies ſhewed in playes, and ſaw her ſweeping of the houſe with a broome. This viſion ſo amazed and affrighted him, that he ſent for his friends, and told them what a ſight he had ſeene: and prayed them to tarie with him all night, being as it were a man beſide himſelfe, fearing leaſt the ſpirite would come to him againe if they left him alone, of the which notwithſtanding he neuer heard more afterwardes. Howbeit ſhortly after, his ſonne being growen to mans ſtate, for a certaine light anger he had taken when he was but a boy, he caſt himſelfe headlong downe from the toppe of the houſe, and ſo was ſlayne. Dion being in this ſtate, Callippus went on ſtill with his treaſon, and ſpread a rumour abroad among the Syracusans, that Dion ſeeing himſelfe now deſtitute of children, was determined to ſend for Apollocrates, Dionyſius ſonne, to make him his heire and ſucceſſour, being coſin germaine to his wife, and his ſiſters daughters ſonne. Then began Dion, his wife, and ſiſter to miſtruſt Callippus practiſes, and they were told of it by diuers ſundry and manifeſt proofes. But Dion being ſory (as I ſuppoſe) for Heraclides death, and inwardly taking that murther in very euill part, as a fowle blot to his life and doings: he ſayd he had rather dye a thouſand deathes, and to offer his throate to be cut to any that would, rather then he would liue in that miſerie, to be compelled to take heede as well of his friends, as of his enemies. Callippus then ſeeing the women ſo buſie and inquiſitiue of his doings, and fearing leaſt he ſhould be bewrayed: he came weeping vnto them, and told them it was nothing, and that he was ready to aſſure them of it by any manner of way they would deuiſe. The women then willed him to ſweare by the great othe, which was in this manner. He that muſt take this othe, commeth into the temple of the goddeſſes Theſmophores, which are, Ceres and Proſerpina. And after certaine ſacrifices done, he putteth on the purple chaplet of the goddeſſe Proſerpina, holding a burning torch in his hand and ſweareth in this manner. Callippus hauing done all theſe ceremonies, and made the oth in forme as I haue told you: he made ſo light account of the goddeſſes, that he taried no longer to do the murther he had determined, but till the very feaſt day of the goddeſſe ſhould come, by whom he had ſworne: and ſlue him on the day of the feaſt of Proſerpina. Now, I do not thinke that he choſe that day of ſet purpoſe, knowing right well that he did alwayes ſinne againſt her, what time ſoeuer he had killed his brother, being by his meanes ſpecially admitted to the ſocietie and brotherhood with him, of the fraternitie and miſteries of Ceres and Proſerpina. Of this conſpiracie there were diuers. For, as Dion was ſet in his chamber talking with his friends where there were many beds to ſit on: ſome compaſſed the houſe round about, others came to the doores and windowes of his chamber, and they that ſhould do the deede to diſpatch him, which were the ZACYNTHIAN ſouldiers, came into his chamber in their coates without any ſword. But when they were come in, they that were without did ſhut the doores after them, and locked them in, leaſt any man ſhould come out: and they that were within, fell vpon Dion, and thought to haue ſtrangled him. But when they ſaw they could not, they called for a ſword. Neuer a man that was within, durſt open the doores, though there were many with Dion. For they thought euery man to ſaue their owne liues, by ſuffering him to be killed, and therefore durſt not come to helpe him. So the murtherers taried a long time within, & did nothing. At length there was one Lycon a SYRACVSAN, that gaue one of the ZACYNTHIAN ſouldiers a dagger in at the window, with the which they cut Dions throate, as a weather they had holden a long time in their hands, euen dead for feare. The murther being executed, they caſt his ſiſter, and wife, great with child, into priſon, and there the poore Lady was pitifully brought to bed of a goodly boy: the which they rather determined to bring vp, then otherwiſe to do any thing with the child. Their keepers that had the charge of them, were contented to let them do it, becauſe Callippus began then a litle to grow to ſome trouble. For at the firſt, after he had ſlaine Dion, he bare all the whole ſway for a time, and kept the citie of SYRACVSA in his hands: and wrote vnto ATHENS, the which next vnto the immortall gods he was moſt affrayed of, hauing defiled his hands in ſo damnable a treaſon. And therfore, in my opinion, it was not euill ſpoken, that ATHENS is a citie of all other that bringeth forth the beſt whẽ they giue themſelues to goodneſſe, and the wickedeſt people alſo, when they diſpoſe themſelues to euill: as their country alſo bringeth forth the beſt honny that is, & hemlocke in like maner that quickely diſpatcheth a man of his life. Howbeit the gods, and fortune, did not ſuffer this treaſon and wicked man to raigne long, hauing come to the gouernement of a realme by ſo damnable a murther: but ſhortly after they gaue him his payment he had deſerued. For Callippus going to take a litle town called CATANA, he loſt the citie of SYRACVSA: whereupon he ſayd that he had loſt a citie, and got a * cheeſeknife. Afterwardes he went to aſſaile the MESSENIANS, and there he loſt a great number of his men, and amongſt them were ſlaine thoſe that killed Dion. Now Callippus finding no citie in all SICILIA, that would receiue him, but that they all did hate and abhorre him: he went to take the citie of RHEGIO in ITALIE. There being in great diſtreſſe and neede of all things, and not able to maintaine his ſouldiers: he was ſlaine by Leptines, and Polyperchon, with the ſelfe ſame dagger wherewith Dion before was ſlayne: the which was knowen by the faſhion, being ſhort after the LACONIAN daggers, and alſo by the workemanſhip vpon it, that was very excellently wrought. And thus was the end and death of Callippus. Now for Ariſtomaché and Aretè, they were taken out of priſon: and Icetes SYRACVSAN, that ſometimes had bene one of Dions friends, tooke them home to his owne houſe, & vſed them very well and faithfully for a certaine time, but afterwardes was wonne and corrupted by Dions enemies. So he cauſed a ſhip to be prouided for them, and bare them in hand that he would ſend them into PELOPONNESVS: but he gaue them charge that caried them away, to kill them as they went, and to throw them ouer bord into the ſea. Some ſay, that the two women, and the litle young boy, were caſt aliue into the ſea. But this reward of the ſinfull act that he committed, returned againe vpon himſelfe, as it had done before vnto others. For he was taken by Timoleon that put him to death: and beſides, the SYRACVSANS did alſo kill two of his daughters in reuenge of the vnfaithfulneſſe he had ſhewed vnto Dion.

Marcus Brutus.

MArcus Brutus* came of that Iunius Brutus, for whom the auncient ROMAINES made his ſtatue of braſſe to be ſet vp in the Capitol, with the images of the kings, holding a naked ſword in his hãd: becauſe he had valiantly put down the TARQVINES frõ their kingdome of ROME. But that Iunius Brutus being of a ſower ſtearne nature, not ſoftned by reaſon, being like vnto ſword blades of too hard a tẽper: was ſo ſubiect to his choller and malice he bare vnto the tyrants, that for their ſakes he cauſed his owne ſonnes to be executed. But this Marcus Brutus in contrary maner, whoſe life we preſently write, hauing framed his manners of life by the rules of vertue and ſtudy of Philoſophy, and hauing imployed his wit, which was gentle and conſtant, in attempting of great things: me thinkes he was rightly made and framed vnto vertue. So that his very enemies which wiſh him moſt hurt, becauſe of his conſpiracie againſt Iulius Cæſar: if there were any noble attempt done in all this conſpiracie, they referre it wholly vnto Brutus, and all the cruell and violent actes vnto Caſsius, who was Brutus familiar friend, but not ſo well giuen, and conditioned as he. His mother Seruilia, it is thought came of the bloud of Seruilius Hala, who, when Spurius Melius went about to make himſelfe king, and to bring it to paſſe had entiſed the common people to rebell: tooke a dagger and hid it cloſe vnder his arme, and went into the market place. When he was come thither, he made as though he had ſomewhat to ſay vnto him, and preſſed as neare him as he could: wherefore Melius ſtooping downe with his head, to heare what he would ſay, Brutus ſtabbed him in with his dagger, and ſlue him. Thus much all writers agree for his mother. Now touching his father, ſome for the euil wil & malice they bare vnto Brutus, becauſe of the death of Iulius Cæſar, do maintaine that he came not of Iunius Brutus that draue out the TARQVINES: for there were none left of his race, conſidering that his two ſonnes were executed for conſpiracie with the TARQVINES: and that Marcus Brutus came of a meane houſe, the which was raiſed to honour and office in the common wealth, but of late time. Poſidonius the Philoſopher writeth the contrarie, that Iunius Brutus indeede ſlue two of his ſonnes which were men growen, as the hiſtories do declare: howbeit that there was a third ſonne, being but a litle child at that time, from whom the houſe and familie afterwardes was deriued: and furthermore, that there were in his time certaine famous men of that familie, whoſe ſtature and countenaunce reſembled much the image of Iunius Brutus. And thus much for this matter. Marcus Cato the Philoſopher was brother vnto Seruilia M. Brutus mother: whom Brutus ſtudied moſt to follow of all the other ROMAINES, becauſe he was his vncle, and afterwardes he maried his daughter. Now touching the GRECIAN Philoſophers, there was no ſect nor Philoſopher of them, but he heard and liked it: but aboue all the reſt, he loued Platoes ſect beſt, and did not much giue himſelfe to the new nor meane Academie as they call it, but altogether to the old Academie. Therefore he did euer greatly eſteeme the Philoſopher Antiochus, of the citie of ASCALON: but he was more familiar with his brother Ariſton, who for learning and knowledge was inferior to many other Philoſophers, but for wiſedom & curteſie, equall with the beſt and chiefeſt. Touching Empylus, whom Marcus Brutus himſelfe doth mention in his Epiſtles, and his friends alſo in many places: he was an Orator, and left an excellent booke he wrote of the death of Iulius Cæſar, and tituled it Brutus. He was properly learned in the Latin tongue, and was able to make long diſcourſe in it, beſide that he could alſo plead very well in Latin. But for the Greeke tongue, they do note in ſome of his Epiſtles, that he counterfeited that briefe compendious manner of ſpeach of the LACEDÆMONIANS. As when the warre was begun, he wrote vnto the PARGAMENIANS in this ſort. I vnderſtand you haue giuen Dolabella money: if you haue done it willingly, you confeſſe you haue offended me: if againſt your wils, ſhew it then by giuing me willingly. An other time againe vnto the SAMIANS: Your councels be long, your doings be ſlow, conſider the end. And in an other Epiſtle he wrote vnto the PATAREINS: The XANTHIANS deſpiſing my good will, haue made their country a graue of diſpaire: & the PATAREIANS that put themſelues into my protection, haue loſt no iot of their libertie. And therefore whileſt you haue libertie, either chooſe the iudgement of the PATAREIANS, or the fortune of the XANTHIANS. Theſe were Brutus maner of letters which were honored for their briefeneſſe. So Brutus being but a young ſtripling went into CYPRVS with his vncle Cato, who was ſent againſt Ptolomy king of ÆGYPT, who hauing ſlaine himſelf, Cato ſtaying for certaine neceſſary buſines he had in the Ile of RHODES, had already ſent * Caninius, one of his friendes before to keepe his treaſure and goods. But Cato fearing he would be light fingered, wrote vnto Brutus forthwith to come out of PAMPHYLIA, (where he was but newly recouered of a ſickeneſſe) into CYPRVS, the which he did. The which iourney he was ſory to take vpon him, both for reſpect of Caninius ſhame, whom Cato as he thought wrongfully ſlaundered: as alſo becauſe he thought this office too meane and vnmeete for him, being a young man, and giuen to his booke. This notwithſtanding, he behaued himſelfe ſo honeſtly and carefully, that Cato did greatly commende him: and after all the goodes were ſold and conuerted into ready money, he tooke the moſt part of it, and returned withall to ROME. Afterwardes when the Empire of ROME was deuided into factions, and that Cæſar and P*ompey* both were in armes one againſt the other, and that all the Empire of ROME was in garboyle and vprore: it was thought then that Brutus would take part with Cæſar, becauſe P*ompey* not long before had put his father to death. But Brutus preferring the reſpect of his country and common wealth, before priuate affection, and perſwading himſelfe that P*ompey* had iuſter cauſe to enter into armes then Cæſar: he then tooke part with P*ompey*, though oftetimes meeting him before, he thought ſcorne to ſpeake to him, thinking it a great ſinne and offence in him, to ſpeake to the murtherer of his father. But then ſubmitting himſelfe vnto P*ompey*, as vnto the head of the common wealth: he ſailed into SICILIA, Lieutenant vnder Seſtius that was gouernour of that prouince. But when he ſaw that there was no way to riſe, nor to do any noble exployts, and that Cæſar & P*ompey* were both camped together, and fought for victory: he went of himſelfe vnſent for into MACEDON, to be partaker of the daunger. It is reported that P*ompey* being glad, and wondering at his comming when he ſaw him come to him: he roſe out of his chaire, and went and imbraced him before them all, and vſed him as honourably, as he could haue done the nobleſt man that tooke his part. Brutus being in P*ompeys* campe, did nothing but ſtudie all day long, except he were with P*ompey*, & not onely

the dayes before, but the ſelfe ſame day alſo before the great battell was fought in the fieldes of PHARSALIA, where Pompey was ouerthrowen. It was in the middeſt of ſommer, and the ſunne was very hot, beſides that the campe was lodged neare vnto mariſhes, and they that caried his tent, taried long before they came, whereupon, beyng very wearie with trauell, ſcant any meate came into his mouth at dinner time. Furthermore, when others ſlept, or thought what would happen the morrow after: he fell to his booke, and wrote all day long till night, writing a breuiarie of P*olybius*. It is reported that Cæſar did not forget him, and that he gaue his Captaines charge before the battell, that they ſhould beware they killed not Brutus in fight, and if he yeelded willingly vnto them, that then they ſhould bring him vnto him: but if he reſiſted, and would not be taken, then that they ſhould let him goe, and do him no hurt. Some ſay he did this for Seruiliaes ſake, Brutus mother. For when he was a young man, he had bene acquainted with Seruilia, who was extremelie in loue with him. And becauſe Brutus was borne in that time when their loue was hotteſt, he perſwaded himſelfe that he begat him. For proofe hereof the report goeth, that when the waightieſt matters were in hand in the Senate, about the conſpiracie of C*atiline*, which was likely to haue vndone the citie of ROME, Cæſar and C*ato* ſate neare together, and were both of contrarie mindes to each other: and then, that in the meane time one deliuered Cæſar a letter. C*æſar* tooke it, and read it ſoftly to himſelfe; but C*ato* cried out vpon C*æſar*, and ſayd he did not well to receiue aduertiſementes from enemies. Whereupon the whole Senate began to murmure at it. Then Cæſar gaue C*ato* the letter as it was ſent him, who read it, and founde that it was a loue letter ſent from his ſiſter Seruilia: thereupon he caſt it againe to C*æſar*, and ſayd vnto him, hold, dronken ſoppe. When he had done ſo, he went on with his tale, and maintayned his opinion as he did before: ſo commonly was the loue of Seruilia knowen which ſhe bare vnto C*æſar*. So, after P*ompeys* ouerthrow at the battell of PHARSALIA, and that he fled to the ſea: when C*æſar* came to beſiege his campe, Brutus went out of the campe gates vnſeene of any man, and lept into a mariſh full of water and reedes. Then when night was come, he crept out, and went vnto the citie of LARISSA: from whence he wrote vnto C*æſar*, who was very glad that he had ſcaped, and ſent for him to come vnto him. When Brutus was come, he did not onely pardon him, but alſo kept him alwayes about him, and did as much honour and eſteeme him, as any man he had in his companie. Now no man could tell whither P*ompey* was fled, and all were maruellous deſirous to know it: wherefore C*æſar* walking a good way alone with B*rutus*, he did aske him which way he thought P*ompey* tooke. C*æſar* perceiuing by his talke that B*rutus* geſſed certainly whither P*ompey* ſhould be fled: he left all other wayes, and tooke his iourney directly towardes ÆGYPT. P*ompey*, as Brutus had coniectured, was indeede fled into ÆGYPT, but there he was villanouſly ſlayne. Furthermore, B*rutus* obtained pardon of C*æſar* for C*aſsius*: and defending alſo the king* of LYBIAES cauſe, he was ouerlayed with a world of accuſations againſt him, howbeit intreating for him, he ſaued him the beſt part of his realme and kingdome. They ſay alſo that C*æſar* ſayd, when he heard B*rutus* plead: I know not, ſayd he, what this young man would, but what he would, he willeth it vehemently. For as B*rutus* grauitie and conſtant minde would not graunt all men their requeſtes that ſued vnto him, but being moued with reaſon and diſcretion, did alwayes encline to that which was good and honeſt: euen ſo when it was moued to follow any matter, he vſed a kinde of forcible and vehement perſwaſion that calmed not, till he had obtained his deſire. For by flattering of him, a man could neuer obtaine any thing at his handes, nor make him to do that which was vniuſt. Further he thought it not meete for a man of calling and eſtimation, to yeeld vnto the requeſtes and intreaties of a ſhameleſſe and importunate ſuter, requeſting things vnmeete: the which notwithſtanding, ſome men do for ſhame, becauſe they dare deny nothing, and therefore he was wont to ſay, that he thought them euill brought vp in their youth, that could deny nothing. Now when C*æſar* tooke ſea to go into AFRICKE, againſt Cato and Scipio, he left B*rutus* gouernour of GAVLE in ITALIE, on this ſide of the Alpes, which was a great good hap for that prouince. For where others were ſpoyled and polled by the inſolencie and couetouſneſſe of the gouernours, as if it had bene a country conquered: Brutus was a comfort and reſt vnto their former troubles and miſeries they ſuſtained. But he referred it wholly vnto Cæſars grace and goodneſſe. For, when Cæſar returned out of AFRICKE, and progreſſed vp and downe ITALIE: the things that pleaſed him beſt to ſee, were the cities vnder Brutus charge and gouernement, and Brutus him ſelfe: who honoured Cæſar in perſon, and whoſe companie alſo Cæſar greatly eſteemed. Now there were diuers ſortes of Prætorſhippes at ROME, and it was looked for, that Brutus or Caſsius would make ſute for the chiefeſt Prætorſhip, which the called the Prætorſhip of the citie: becauſe he that had that office, was as a Iudge to miniſter iuſtice vnto the citizens. Therfore they ſtroue one againſt the other, though ſome ſay that there was ſome litle grudge betwixt them for other matters before, and that this contention did ſet them further out, though they were allyed together. For Caſsius had maried Iunia, Brutus ſiſter. Others ſay, that this contention betwixt them came by Cæſar himſelfe, who ſecretly gaue either of them both hope of his fauour. So their ſute for the Prætorſhip was ſo followed and laboured of either partie, that one of them put an other in ſute of law. Brutus with his vertue and good name contended againſt many noble exploits in armes, which Caſsius had done againſt the PARTHIANS. So Cæſar after he had heard both their obiections, he told his friends with whom he conſulted about this matter: Caſsius cauſe is the iuſter, ſayd he, but Brutus muſt be firſt preferred. Thus Brutus had the firſt Prætorſhip, and Caſsius the ſecond: who thanked not Cæſar ſo much for the Prætorſhip he had, as he was angry with him for that he had loſt. But Brutus in many other things taſted of the benefite of Cæſars fauour in any thing he requeſted. For if he had liſted, he might haue bene one of Cæſars chiefeſt friendes, and of greateſt authoritie and credit about him. Howbeit Caſsius friendes did diſſwade him from it (for Caſsius and he were not yet reconciled together ſithence their firſt contention and ſtrife for the Prætorſhip) and prayed him to beware of Cæſars ſweet intiſements, and to flie his tyrannicall fauours: the which they ſayd Cæſar gaue him, not to honour his vertue, but to weaken his conſtant minde, framing it to the bent of his bow. Now Cæſar on the other ſide did not truſt him ouermuch, nor was not without tales brought vnto him againſt him: howbeit he feared his great minde, authority, & friends. Yet on the other ſide alſo, he truſted his good nature, & fayre conditions. For, intelligence being brought him one day, that Antonius and Dolabella did conſpire againſt him: he aunſwered, that theſe fat long haired men made ~~him not~~ affrayed, but the leane and whitely faced fellowes, meaning that, by Brutus and Caſsius. At an other time alſo when one accuſed Brutus vnto him, and bad him beware of him: What, ſayd he againe, clapping his hand on his breſt: thinke ye that Brutus will not tarie till this body dye? Meaning that none but Brutus after him was meete to haue ſuch power as he had. And ſurely, in my opinion, I am perſwaded that Brutus might indeed haue come to haue bene the chiefeſt man of ROME, if he could haue contented himſelfe for a time to haue bene next vnto Cæſar, and to haue ſuffred his glory and authoritie, which he had gotten by his great victories, to conſume with time. But Caſsius being a chollericke man, and hating Cæſar priuatly, more then he did the tyranny openly: he incenſed Brutus againſt him. It is alſo reported, that Brutus could euill away with the tyranny, and that Caſsius hated the tyrant: making many complaintes for the iniuries he had done him, and amongeſt others, for that he had taken away his Lyons from him. Caſsius had prouided them for his ſports, when he ſhould be Ædilis, and they were found in the citie of MEGARA, when it was wonne by Calenus, & Cæſar kept them. The rumor went, that theſe Lyons did maruellous great hurt to the MEGARIANS. For when the citie was takē, they brake their cages where they were tied vp, and turned them looſe, thinking they would haue done great miſchiefe to the enemies, & haue kept them from ſetting vpō them: but the Lyons contrary to expectation, turned vpon themſelues that fled vnarmed, and did ſo cruelly teare ſome in peeces, that it pitied their enemies to ſee them. And this was the cauſe, as ſome do report, that made Caſsius conſpire againſt Cæſar. But this holdeth no water. For Caſsius euen frō his cradle could not abide any maner of tyrants, as it appeared whē he was but a boy, and went vnto the ſame ſchoole that Fauſtus, the ſonne of Sylla did. And Fauſtus bragging among other boyes, highly boaſted of his fathers kingdome: Caſsius roſe vp on his feete, and gaue him two good whirts on the eare. Fauſtus gouernors would haue put this matter in ſute againſt Caſsius:

But P*ompey* would not ſuffer them, but cauſed the two boyes to be brought before him, and asked them how the matter came to paſſe. Then Caſsius, as it is written of him, ſayd vnto the other: goe to Fauſtus, ſpeake againe and thou dareſt, before this noble man here, the ſame wordes that made me angry with thee, that my fiſtes may walke once againe about thine eares. Such was Caſsius hot ſtirring nature. But for B*rutus*, his friendes and countrey men, both by diuers procurements, and ſundry rumours of the citie, and by many bils alſo, did openly call and procure him to do that he did. For, vnder the image of his aunceſter Iunius B*rutus*, that draue the kings out of ROME, they wrote: O, that it pleaſed the goddes thou wert now aliue, B*rutus*: and againe, that thou wert here among vs now. His tribunall (or chaire) where he gaue audience during the time he was Prætor, was full of ſuch billes: B*rutus*, thou art a ſleepe, and art not B*rutus* indeede. And of all this, C*æſars* flatterers were the cauſe: who beſide many other exceeding and vnſpeakeable honours they dayly deuiſed for him, in the night time they did put Diademes vpon the heades of his images, ſuppoſing thereby to allure the common people to call him king, in ſtead of Dictator. Howbeit it turned to the contrary, as we haue written more at large in Iulius C*æſars* life. Now when Caſsius felt his friendes, and did ſtirre them vp againſt C*æſar*: they all agreed and promiſed to take part with him, ſo B*rutus* were the chiefe of their conſpiracie. For they told him, that ſo high an enterpriſe and attempt as that, did not ſo much require men of manhood, and courage to draw their ſwordes: as it ſtood them vpon to haue a man of ſuch eſtimation as B*rutus*, to make euery man boldly thinke, that by his onely preſence the fact were holy, and iuſt. If he tooke not this courſe, then that they ſhould goe to it with fainter hartes, and when they had done it, they ſhould be more fearefull: becauſe euery man would thinke that B*rutus* would not haue refuſed to haue made one with them, if the cauſe had bene good and honeſt. Therefore C*aſsius* conſidering this matter with himſelfe, did firſt of all ſpeake to B*rutus*, ſince they grew ſtraunge together for the ſute they had for the Prætorſhippe. So when he was reconciled to him againe, and that they had imbraced one an other: C*aſsius* asked him if he were determined to be in the Senate houſe, the firſt day of the moneth of Marche, becauſe he heard ſay that C*æſars* friendes ſhould moue the councell that day, that C*æſar* ſhould be called king by the Senate. Brutus aunſwered him, he would not be there. But if we be ſent for ſayd C*aſsius*: how then? For my ſelfe then ſayd B*rutus*, I meane not to hold my peace, but to withſtand it, and rather dye then loſe my libertie. C*aſsius* being bold, and taking hold of this word: why, quoth he, what ROMAINE is he aliue that will ſuffer thee to dye for the libertie? What, knoweſt thou not that thou art Brutus? Thinkeſt thou that they be cobblers, tapſters, or ſuch like baſe mechanicall people, that write theſe billes and ſcrowles which are found dayly in thy Prætors chaire, and not the nobleſt men and beſt citizens that do it? No, be thou well aſſured, that of other Prætors they looke for giftes, common diſtributions amongeſt the people, and for common playes, and to ſee fenſers fight at the ſharpe, to ſhew the people paſtime: but at thy handes, they ſpecially require (as a due debt vnto them) the taking away of the tyrannie, being fully bent to ſuffer any extremitie for thy ſake, ſo that thou wilt ſhew thy ſelfe to be the man thou art taken for, and that they hope thou art. Thereupon he kiſſed Brutus, and imbraced him: and ſo each taking leaue of other, they went both to ſpeake with their friendes about it. Now amongeſt P*ompeys* friendes, there was one called * C*aius Ligarius*, who had bene accuſed vnto Cæſar for taking part with Pompey, and C*æſar* diſcharged him. But Ligarius thanked not Cæſar ſo much for his diſcharge, as he was offended with him for that he was brought in daunger by his tyrannicall power. And therefore in his hart he was alway his mortall enemie, and was beſides verie familiar with Brutus, who went to ſee him being ſicke in his bed, and ſayd vnto him: O Ligarius, in what a time art thou ſicke? Ligarius riſing vp in his bed, and taking him by the right hand, ſayd vnto him: Brutus, ſayd he, if thou haſt any great enterpriſe in hand worthy of thy ſelfe, I am whole. After that time they began to feele all their acquitaunce whom they truſted, and layed their heades together conſulting vpon it, and did not onelie picke out their friendes, but all thoſe alſo whom they thought ſtout enough to attempt any deſperate matter, and that were not affrayed to loſe their liues.

For this cauſe they durſt not acquaint Cicero with their conſpiracie, although he was a man whom they loued dearely, and truſted beſt: for they were affrayed that he being a coward by nature, and age alſo hauing increaſed his feare, he would quite turne and alter all their purpoſe, and quench the heate of their enterpriſe, the which ſpecially required hot and earneſt execution, ſeeking by perſwaſion to bring all things to ſuch ſafetie, as there ſhould be no perill. Brutus alſo did let other of his friendes alone, as Statilius EPICVRIAN, and Faonius, that made profeſſion to follow Marcus Cato. Becauſe that hauing caſt out wordes a farre off, diſputing together in Philoſophie to feele their mindes: Faonius aunſwered, that ciuill warre was worſe then tyrannicall gouernement vſurped againſt the law. And Statilius told him alſo, that it were an vnwiſe part of him, to put his life in daunger, for a ſight of ignoraunt fooles and aſſes. Labeo was preſent at this talke, and maintained the contrary againſt them both. But Brutus held his peace, as though it had bene a doubtfull matter, and a hard thing to haue decided. But afterwardes, being out of their companie, he made Labeo priuie to his intent: who very readily offered himſelfe to make one. And they thought good alſo to bring in an other Brutus to ioyne with him, ſurnamed Albinus: who was no man of his handes himſelfe, but becauſe he was able to bring good force of a great number of ſlaues, and fenſers at the ſharpe, whom he kept to ſhew the people paſtime with their fighting, beſides alſo that Cæſar had ſome truſt in him. Caſsius and Labeo told Brutus Albinus of it at the firſt, but he made them no aunſwere. But when he had ſpoken with Brutus himſelfe alone, and that Brutus had told him he was the chiefe ringleader of all this conſpiracie; then he willingly promiſed him the beſt aide he could. Furthermore, the onely name and great calling of Brutus, did bring on the moſt of them to giue conſent to this conſpiracie. Who hauing neuer taken othes together, nor taken or giuen any caution or aſſuraunce, nor binding themſelues one to an other by any religious othes: they all kept the matter ſo ſecret to themſelues, and could ſo cunningly handle it, that notwithſtanding the goddes did reueale it by manifeſt ſignes and tokens from aboue, and by predictions of ſacrifices: yet all this would not be beleeued. Now Brutus, who knew very well that for his ſake all the nobleſt, valianteſt, and moſt couragious men of ROME did venture their liues, waighing with himſelfe the greatneſſe of the daunger: when he was out of his houſe, he did ſo frame and faſhion his countenaunce and lookes, that no man could diſcerne he had any thing to trouble his minde. But when night came that he was in his owne houſe, then he was cleane chaunged. For, either care did wake him againſt his will when he would haue ſlept, or elſe oftentimes of himſelfe he fell into ſuch deepe thoughtes of this enterpriſe, caſting in his minde all the daungers that might happen: that his wife lying by him, founde that there was ſome maruellous great matter that troubled his minde, not being wont to be in that taking, and that he could not well determine with himſelfe. His wife Porcia (as we haue told you before) was the daughter of Cato, whom Brutus maried being his coſin, not a mayden, but a young widow after the death of her firſt huſband Bibulus, by whom ſhe had alſo a young ſonne called Bibulus, who afterwardes wrote a booke of the actes and geſtes of Brutus, extant at this preſent day. This young Lady being excellently well ſeene in Philoſophie, louing her huſband well, and being of a noble courage, as ſhe was alſo wiſe: becauſe ſhe would not aske her huſband what he ayled before ſhe had made ſome proofe by her ſelfe, ſhe tooke a litle raſour ſuch as barbers occupie to pare mens nayles, and cauſing her maydes and women to go out of her chamber, gaue her ſelfe a great gaſh withall in her thigh, that ſhe was ſtraight all of a goare bloud, and incontinently after, a vehement feuer tooke her, by reaſon of the payne of her wounde. Then perceiuing her huſband was maruellouſly out of quiet, and that he could take no reſt: euen in her greateſt payne of all, ſhe ſpake in this ſort vnto him. I being, O Brutus, (ſayd ſhe) the daughter of Cato, was maried vnto thee, not to be thy bedfellow and companion in bed and at borde onelie, like a harlot, but to be partaker alſo with thee, of thy good and euill fortune. Now for thy ſelfe, I can finde no cauſe of fault in thee touching our matche: but for my part, how may I ſhewe my duetie towardes thee, and how much I would do for thy ſake, if I can not conſtantlie beare a ſecret miſchaunce or grieſe with thee, which requireth ſecrecie and fidelity? I confeſſe, that a womans wit commonly ,, is too weake to keepe a ſecret ſafely: but yet, Brutus, good education, and the companie ,, of vertuous men, haue ſome power to reforme the defect of nature. And for my ſelfe, I ,, haue this benefit moreouer: that I am the daughter of Cato, & wife of Brutus. This notwithſtãding, ,, I did not truſt to any of theſe things before: vntill that now I haue found by experience, ,, that no paine nor grieſe whatſoeuer can ouercome me. With thoſe wordes ſhe ſhewed him ,, her wounde on her thigh, and told him what ſhe had done to proue her ſelfe. Brutus was amazed ,, to heare what ſhe ſayd vnto him, and lifting vp his handes to heauen, he beſought the ,, goddes to giue him the grace he might bring his enterpriſe to ſo good paſſe, that he might be founde a husband, worthie of ſo noble a wife as Porcia: ſo he then did comfort her the beſt he could. Now a day being appointed for the meeting of the Senate, at what time they hoped Cæſar would not fayle to come: the conſpiratours determined then to put their enterpriſe in execution, becauſe they might meete ſafelie at that time without ſuſpition, and the rather, for that all the nobleſt and chiefeſt men of the citie would be there. Who when they ſhould ſee ſuch a great matter executed, would euery man then ſet to their handes, for the defence of their libertie. Furthermore, they thought alſo that the appointment of the place where the councell ſhould be kept, was choſen of purpoſe by diuine prouidence, and made all for them. For it was one of the porches about the Theater, in the which there was a certaine place full of ſeates for men to ſit in, where alſo was ſet vp the image of Pompey, which the citie had made and conſecrated in honour of him: when he did beautifie that part of the citie with the Theater he built, with diuers porches about it. In this place was the aſſembly of the Senate appointed to be, iuſt on the fifteenth day of the moneth of March, which the ROMAINES call, Idus Martias: ſo that it ſeemed ſome god of purpoſe had brought Cæſar thither to be ſlaine, for reuenge of Pompeys death. So when the day was come, Brutus went out of his houſe with a dagger by his ſide vnder his long gowne, that no body ſaw nor knew, but his wife onely. The other conſpiratours were all aſſembled at Caſſius houſe, to bring his ſonne into the market place, who on that day did put on the mans gowne, called Toga Virilis, and from thence they came all in a troupe together vnto Pompeys porche, looking that Cæſar would ſtraight come thither. But here is to be noted, the wonderfull aſſured conſtancie of theſe conſpiratours, in ſo daungerous and waightie an enterpriſe as they had vndertaken. For many of them being Prætors, by reaſon of their office, whoſe duetie is to miniſter iuſtice to euery body: they did not onely with great quietneſſe and curteſie heare them that ſpake vnto them, or that pleaded matters before them, and gaue them attentiue eare, as if they had had no other matter in their heades: but moreouer, they gaue iuſt ſentence, and carefully diſpatched the cauſes before them. So there was one among them, who being condemned in a certaine ſumme of money, refuſed to pay it, and cried out that he did appeale vnto Cæſar. Then Brutus caſting his eyes vpon the conſpiratours, ſayd, Cæſar ſhall not let me to ſee the law executed. Notwithſtanding this, by chaunce there fell out many miſfortunes vnto them, which was enough to haue marred the enterpriſe. The firſt and chiefeſt was, Cæſars long tarying, who came very late to the Senate: for becauſe the ſignes of the ſacrifices appeared vnluckie, his wife Calpurnia kept him at home, and the Soothſayers bad him beware he went not abroad. The ſecond cauſe was, when one came vnto Caſca being a conſpiratour, and taking him by the hand, ſayd vnto him: O Caſca, thou kepteſt it cloſe from me, but Brutus hath told me all. Caſca being amazed at it, the other went on with his tale, and ſayd: why, how now, how commeth it to paſſe thou art thus rich, that thou doeſt ſue to be Ædilis? Thus Caſca being deceiued by the others doubtfull wordes, he told them it was a thouſand to one, he blabbed not out all the conſpiracie. An other Senator called Popilius Læna, after he had ſaluted Brutus and Caſſius more friendly then he was wont to do: he rounded ſoftly in their eares, and told them, I pray the goddes you may go through with that you haue taken in hand, but withall, diſpatch I read you, for your enterpriſe is bewrayed. When he had ſayd, he preſently departed from them, and left them both affrayed that their conſpiracie would out. Now in the meane time, there came one of Brutus men poſt haſt vnto him, and told him his wife was a dying. For Porcia being verie carefull and penſiue for that which was to come, and being too weake to away with ſo great and inward griefe of minde: ſhe could hardly keepe within, but was frighted with euery litle noyſe and crie ſhe heard, as thoſe that are taken and poſſeſt with the furie of the Bacchantes, asking euery man that came from the market place, what Brutus did, and ſtill ſent meſſenger after meſſenger, to know what newes. At length, Cæſars comming being prolonged as you haue heard, Porciaes weakeneſſe was not able to hold out any longer, and thereupon ſhe ſodainly ſwounded, that ſhe had no leaſure to go to her chamber, but was taken in the middeſt of her houſe, where her ſpeach and ſenſes failed her. Howbeit ſhe ſoone came to her ſelfe againe, and ſo was layed in her bed, and tended by her women. When Brutus heard theſe newes, it grieued him, as it is to be preſuppoſed: yet he left not off the care of his country and common wealth, neither went home to his houſe for any newes he heard. Now, it was reported that Cæſar was comming in his litter: for he determined not to ſtay in the Senate all that day (becauſe he was affrayed of the vnlucky ſignes of the ſacrifices) but to adiorne matters of importaunce vnto the next ſeſsion and councell holden, fayning himſelfe not to be well at eaſe. When Cæſar came out of his litter: Popilius Læna, that had talked before with Brutus and Caſsius, and had prayed the goddes they might bring this enterpriſe to paſſe: went vnto Cæſar, and kept him a long time with a talke. Cæſar gaue good eare vnto him. Wherefore the conſpiratours (if ſo they ſhould be called) not hearing what he ſayd to Cæſar, but coniecturing by that he had told them a litle before, that his talke was none other but the verie diſcouerie of their conſpiracie: they were affrayed euerie man of them, and one looking in an others face, it was eaſie to ſee that they all were of a minde, that it was no tarying for them till they were apprehended, but rather that they ſhould kill themſelues with their owne hands. And when Caſsius and certaine other clapped their handes on their ſwordes vnder their gownes to draw them: Brutus marking the countenaunce and geſture of Læna, and conſidering that he did vſe himſelfe rather like an humble and earneſt ſuter, then like an accuſer: he ſayd nothing to his companion (becauſe there were many amongeſt them that were not of the conſpiracie) but with a pleaſaunt countenaunce encouraged Caſsius. And immediatly after, Læna went from Cæſar, and kiſſed his hand: which ſhewed plainly that it was for ſome matter concerning himſelfe, that he had held him ſo long in talke. Now all the Senators being entred firſt into this place or chapter houſe where the councell ſhould be kept, all the other conſpiratours ſtraight ſtood about Cæſars chaire, as if they had had ſome thing to haue ſayd vnto him. And ſome ſay, that Caſsius caſting his eyes vpon Pompeys image, made his prayer vnto it, as if it had bene aliue. * Trebonius on the other ſide, drew Antonius aſide, as he came into the houſe where the Senate ſate, and held him with a long talke without. When Cæſar was come into the houſe, all the Senate roſe to honour him at his comming in. So when he was ſet, the conſpirators flocked about him, & amongſt them they preſented one * Tullius Cimber, who made humble ſute for the calling home againe of his brother that was baniſhed. They all made as though they were interceſſours for him, and tooke him by the handes, and kiſſed his head and breſt. Cæſar at the firſt, ſimply refuſed their kindneſſe and intreaties: but afterwardes, perceiuing they ſtill preſſed on him, he violently thruſt them from him. Then Cimber with both his hands plucked Cæſars gowne ouer his ſhoulders, and Caſca that ſtood behind him, drew his dagger firſt, and ſtrake Cæſar vpon the ſhoulder, but gaue him no great wound. Cæſar feeling himſelfe hurt, tooke him ſtraight by the hand he held his dagger in, and cried out in Latin: O traitour, Caſca, what doeſt thou? Caſca on the other ſide cried in Greeke, and called his brother to helpe him. So diuers running on a heape together to flie vpon Cæſar, he looking about him to haue fled, ſaw Brutus with a ſword drawen in his hand ready to ſtrike at him: then he let Caſcaes hand go, and caſting his gowne ouer his face, ſuffered euery man to ſtrike at him that would. Then the conſpiratours thronging one vpon an other becauſe euery man was deſirous to haue a cut at him, ſo many ſwordes and daggers lighting vpon one body, one of them hurt an other, and among them Brutus caught a blow on his hand, becauſe he would make one in murdering of him, and all the reſt alſo were euery man of them bloudied. Cæſar being ſlaine in this maner, Brutus ſtanding in the middeſt of the houſe, would haue ſpoken, and ſtayed the other Senatours that were not of the conſpiracie, to haue told them them the reaſon why they had done this fact. But they as men both affrayed and amazed, fled one vpon an others necke in haſt to get out at the doore, and no man followed them. For it was ſet downe, and agreed betweene them, that they ſhould kill no man but Cæſar only, and ſhould intreate all the reſt to looke to defend their libertie. All the conſpiratours, but Brutus, determining vpon this matter, thought it good alſo to kill Antonius, becauſe he was a wicked man, and that in nature fauoured tyranny: beſides alſo, for that he was in great eſtimation with ſouldiers, hauing bene conuerſant of long time amongeſt them: and ſpecially hauing a minde bent to great enterpriſes, he was alſo of great authoritie at that time, being Conſull with Cæſar. But Brutus would not agree to it. Firſt, for that he ſayd it was not honeſt: ſecondly, becauſe he told them there was hope of chaunge in him. For he did not miſtruſt, but that Antonius being a noble minded and couragious man (when he ſhould know that Cæſar was dead) would willingly helpe his countrey to recouer her libertie, hauing them an example vnto him, to follow their courage & vertue. So Brutus by this meanes ſaued Antonius life, who at that preſent time diſguiſed himſelfe, and ſtale away. But Brutus & his conſorts, hauing their ſwordes bloudy in their handes, went ſtraight to the Capitoll, perſwading the ROMAINES as they went, to take their libertie again. Now, at the firſt time when the murther was newly done, there were ſodaine outcryes of people that ranne vp and downe the citie, the which indeede did the more increaſe the feare and tumult. But when they ſaw they ſlue no man, neither did ſpoyle or make hauock of any thing: then certaine of the Senators, and many of the people imboldening them ſelues, went to the Capitoll vnto them. There a great number of men being aſſembled together one after an other: Brutus made an oration vnto them to winne the fauour of the people, and to iuſtifie that they had done. All thoſe that were by, ſayd they had done well, and cryed vnto them that they ſhould boldly come downe from the Capitoll. Whereupon, Brutus and his companions came boldly downe into the market place. The reſt followed in troupe, but Brutus went formoſt, very honourably compaſſed in round about with the nobleſt men of the citie, which brought him from the Capitoll, through the market place, to the pulpit for orations. When the people ſaw him in the pulpit, although they were a multitude of rakehels of all ſortes, and had a good will to make ſome ſturre: yet being aſhamed to do it for the reuerence they bare vnto Brutus, they kept ſilence, to heare what he would ſay. When Brutus began to ſpeake, they gaue him quiet audience: howbeit immediatly after, they ſhewed that they were not all contented with the murther. For when an other called Cinna would haue ſpoken, and began to accuſe Cæſar: they fell into a great vprore among them, and maruellouſly reuiled him. In ſomuch that the conſpiratours returned againe into the Capitoll. There Brutus being affrayed to be beſieged, ſent backe againe the noble men that came thither with him, thinking it no reaſon, that they which were no partakers of the murther, ſhould be partakers of the daunger. Then the next morning the Senate being aſſembled, and holden within the temple of the goddeſſe Tellus, to wit the earth: and Antonius, Plancus, and Cicero, hauing made a motion to the Senate in that aſſembly, that they ſhould take an order to pardon and forget all that was paſt, and to ſtabliſh friendſhip and peace againe: it was decreed, that they ſhould not onely be pardoned, but alſo that the Conſuls ſhould referre it to the Senate what honours ſhould be appointed vnto them. This being agreed vpon, the Senate brake vp, and Antonius the Conſull, to put them in hart that were in the Capitoll, ſent them his ſonne for a pledge. Vpon this aſſurance, Brutus and his companions came downe from the Capitoll, where euery man ſaluted and imbraced eche other, among the which, Antonius himſelfe did bid Caſsius to ſupper to him: and Lepidus alſo bad Brutus, and ſo one bad an other, as they had friendſhip and acquaintance together. The next day following, the Senate being called againe to councell, did firſt of all commend Antonius, for that he had wiſely ſtayed and quenched the beginning of a ciuill warre: then they alſo gaue Brutus and his conſorts great prayſes, and laſtly they appointed them ſeuerall gouernements of prouinces. For vnto Brutus, they appointed CRETA: AFRICK, vnto Caſsius: ASIA, vnto Trebonius: BITHYNIA, vnto Cimber: and vnto the other Decius Brutus Albinus, GAVLE on this ſide the Alpes. When this was done, they came to talke of Cæſars will and teſtament, and of his funerals and tombe. Then Antonius thinking good his teſtament ſhould be read openly, and alſo that his body ſhould be honorably buried, and not in hugger mugger, leaſt the people might thereby take occaſion to be worſe offended if they did otherwiſe: Caſsius ſtoutly ſpake againſt it. But Brutus went with the motion, & agreed vnto it: wherein it ſeemeth he committed a ſecond fault. For the firſt fault he did was, when he would not conſent to his fellow conſpiratours, that Antonius ſhould be ſlayne: And therefore he was iuſtly accuſed, that thereby he had ſaued and ſtrengthened a ſtrong and grieuous enemy of their conſpiracy. The ſecond fault was, when he agreed that Cæſars funerals ſhould be as Antonius would haue them: the which indeede marred all. For firſt of all, when Cæſars teſtament was openly read among them, whereby it appeared that he bequeathed vnto euery Citizen of ROME, 75. Drachmas a man, and that he left his gardens and arbors vnto the people, which he had on this ſide of the riuer of Tyber, in the place where now the temple of Fortune is built: the people then loued him, and were maruellous ſory for him. Afterwards when Cæſars body was brought into the market place, Antonius making his funerall oration in prayſe of the dead, according to the auncient cuſtome of ROME, and perceiuing that his wordes moued the common people to compaſsion: he framed his eloquence to make their harts yerne the more, and taking Cæſars gowne all bloudy in his hand, he layed it open to the ſight of them all, ſhewing what a number of cuts and holes it had vpon it. Therewithall the people fell preſently into ſuch a rage and mutinie, that there was no more order kept amongeſt the common people. For ſome of them cryed out, kill the murtherers: others plucked vp formes, tables, and ſtalles about the market place, as they had done before at the funerals of Clodius, and hauing layed them all on a heape together, they ſet them on fire, and thereupon did put the body of Cæſar, and burt it in the middeſt of the moſt holy places. And furthermore, when the fire was throughly kindled, ſome here, ſome there, tooke burning fire brands, and ranne with them to the murtherers houſes that had killed him, to ſet them a fire. Howbeit the conſpiratours foreſeeing the daunger before, had wiſely prouided for themſelues, and fled. But there was a Poet called Cinna, who had bene no partaker of the conſpiracy, but was alway one of Cæſars chiefeſt friends: he dreamed the night before, that Cæſar bad him to ſupper with him, and that he refuſing to go, Cæſar was very importunate with him, and compelled him, ſo that at length he led him by the hand into a great darke place, where being maruellouſly affrayd, he was driuē to follow him in ſpight of his hart. This dreame put him all night into a feuer, and yet notwithſtanding, the next morning when he heard that they caried Cæſars body to buriall, being aſhamed not to accompany his funerals: he went out of his houſe, and thruſt himſelfe into the preaſe of the common people that were in a great vprore. And becauſe ſome one called him by his name, Cinna: the people thinking he had bene that Cinna, who in an oration he made had ſpoken very euill of Cæſar, they falling vpon him in their rage, ſlue him outright in the market place. This made Brutus and his companions more affrayd, then any other thing, next vnto the chaunge of Antonius. Wherefore they got them out of ROME, and kept at the firſt in the citie of ANTIVM, hoping to returne againe to ROME, when the furie of the people were a litle aſswaged. The which they hoped would be quickly, conſidering that they had to deale with a fickle and vnconſtant multitude, eaſie to be caried, and that the Senate ſtood for them: who notwithſtanding made no enquiery of them that had torne poore Cinna the Poet in peeces, but cauſed them to be ſought for and apprehended, that went with fire brands to ſet fire of the conſpiratours houſes. The people growing weary now of Antonius pride and inſolency, who ruled all things in manner with abſolute power: they deſired that Brutus might returne againe, and it was alſo looked for, that Brutus would come himſelfe in perſon to play the playes which were due to the people, by reaſon of his office of Prætorſhip. But Brutus vnderſtanding that many of Cæſars ſouldiers which ſerued vnder him in the warres, and that alſo had lands and houſes giuen them in the cities where they lay, did lye in wait for him to kill him, and that they dayly by ſmall companies came by one and by one into ROME: he durſt no more returne thither, but yet the people had the pleaſure and paſtyme in his abſence, to ſee the games and ſportes he made them, which were ſumptuouſly ſet forth and furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, ſparing for no coſt. For he had bought a great number of ſtraunge beaſtes, of the which he would not giue one of them to any friend he had, but that they ſhould all be employed in his games: and went himſelfe as farre as BYZANTIVM, to ſpeake to ſome plaiers of comedies and Muſitions that were there. And further he wrote vnto his friends for one Canutius an excellent player, that whatſoeuer they did, they ſhould intreate him to play in theſe playes: For, ſaid he, it is no reaſon to compell any GRECIAN, vnleſſe he will come of his owne good will. Moreouer, he wrote alſo vnto Cicero, and earneſtly prayed him in any caſe to be at theſe playes. Now the ſtate of ROME ſtanding in theſe termes, there fell out an other chaunge and alteration, when the young man Octauius Cæſar came to ROME. He was the ſonne of Iulius Cæſars Nece, whom he had adopted for his ſonne, and made his heire, by his laſt will and teſtament. But when Iulius Cæſar his adopted father was ſlaine, he was in the citie of APOLLONIA, where he ſtudied tarying for him, becauſe he was determined to make warre with the PARTHIANS: but when he heard the newes of his death, he returned againe to ROME, where to begin to currie fauour with the common people, he firſt of all tooke vpon him his adopted fathers name, and made diſtribution among them of the money which his father had bequeathed vnto them. By this meanes he troubled Antonius ſorely, and by force of money, got a great number of his fathers ſouldiers together, that had ſerued in the warres with him. And Cicero himſelfe, for the great malice he bare Antonius, did fauour his proceedings. But Brutus maruellouſly reproued him for it, and wrote vnto him, that he ſeemed by his doings not to be ſorie to haue a Maiſter, but onely to be affraide to haue one that ſhould hate him: and that all his doings in the common wealth did witneſſe, that he choſe to be ſubiect to a milde and curteous bondage, ſith by his words and writings he did commend this young man Octauius Cæſar, to be a good and gentle Lorde. For our predeceſſors ſaide he, would neuer abide to be ſubiect to any Maiſters, how gentle or milde ſoeuer they were: and for his owne part that he had neuer reſolutely determined with himſelfe to make warre, or peace, but otherwiſe, that he was certainely minded neuer to be ſlaue nor ſubiect. And therefore he wondred much at him, how Cicero could be affraide of the daunger of ciuill warres, and would not be affraide of a ſhamefull peace: and that to thruſt Antonius out of the vſurped tyrannie, in recompence he went about to ſtabliſh young Octauius Cæſar tyrant. Theſe were the contentes of Brutus firſt letters he wrote vnto Cicero. Now, the citie of ROME being deuided in two factions, ſome taking part with Antonius, other alſo leaning vnto Octauius Cæſar, and the ſouldiers making port ſale of their ſeruice to him that would giue moſt: Brutus ſeeing the ſtate of ROME would be vtterly ouerthrowen, he determined to goe out of ITALY, and went a foote through the countrie of LVKE, vnto the citie of ELEA, ſtanding by the ſea. There Porcia being ready to depart from her husband Brutus, and to returne to ROME, did what ſhe could to diſſemble the griefe and ſorrow ſhe felt at her heart: But a certaine painted table bewrayed her in the end, although vntill that time ſhe alwaies ſhewed a conſtant and patient minde. The deuiſe of the table was taken out of the Greeke ſtories, how Andromachè accompanied her husband Hector, when he went out of the citie of TROY to goe to the warres, and how Hector deliuered her his litle ſonne, and how her eyes were neuer off him. Porcia ſeeing this picture, and likening her ſelfe to be in the ſame caſe, ſhe fell a weeping: and comming thither oftentimes in a day to ſee it, ſhe wept ſtill. Acilius one of Brutus friendes perceiuing that, rehearſed the verſes Andromachè ſpeaketh to this purpoſe in Homer:

Porciaes ſorowfull returne to Rome for the abſence of her husband Brutus.

The ſtorie of Hector and Andromachè ſet forth in painted tables.

Thou Hector art my father, and my mother, and my brother,
And husband eke, and all in all: I mind not any other.

Then Brutus ſmyling, aunſwered againe: but yet (ſaide he) I can not for my part ſay vnto Porcia, as Hector aunſwered Andromachè in the ſame place of the Poet:

Tuſh, meddle thou with weying dewly out
Thy maydes their taske, and pricking on a clout.

For in deede the weake conſtitution of her bodie, doth not ſuffer her to performe in ſhewe, the valiant acts that we are able to do: but for courage and conſtant mind, ſhe ſhewed her ſelfe as ſtout in the defence of her country, as any of vs. Bibulus, the ſonne of Porcia, reporteth this ſtorie thus. Now Brutus imbarking at ELEA in LVKE, he ſayled directly towardes ATHENS. When he arriued there, the people of ATHENS receiued him with common ioyes of reioycing, and honorable decrees made for him. He lay with a friend of his, with whom he went daily to heare the lectures of Theomneſtus ACADEMICK Philoſopher, & of Cratippus the PERIPATETICKE, and ſo would talke with them in Philoſophie, that it ſeemed he left all other matters, & gaue himſelfe only vnto ſtudie: howbeit ſecretly notwithſtanding, he made preparation for warre. For he ſent Heroſtratus into MACEDON, to win the Captaines and ſouldiers that were vpon thoſe marches, and he did alſo entertaine all the young gentlemen of the ROMAINES, whom he found in ATHENS ſtudying Philoſophie: amongſt them he found Ciceroes ſonne, whom he highly prayſed and commended, ſaying: that whether he waked or ſlept, he found him of a noble mind and diſpoſition, he did in nature ſo much hate tyrants. Shortly after, he began to enter openly into armes: and being aduertiſed that there came out of ASIA a certaine fleete of ROMAINE ſhips that had good ſtore of money in them, and that the Captaine of thoſe ſhips (who was an honeſt man, and his familiar friend) came towards ATHENS: he went to meete him as farre as the Ile of CARYSTOS, and hauing ſpoken with him there, he handled him ſo, that he was contented to leaue his ſhips in his hands. Whereupon he made him a notable banquet at his houſe, becauſe is was on his birth day. When the feaſt day came, and that they began to drinke luſtily one to another: the gueſts dranke to the victorie of Brutus, and the libertie of the ROMAINES. Brutus therefore to encourage them farther, called for a bigger cup, and holding it in his hand, before he dranke ſpake this aloud:

My deſtinie and Phœbus are agreede,
To bring me to my finall end with ſpeede.

A ſtrange diſeaſe tooke Brutus at Dyrrachium. why by ſnow this hungry diſeaſe taketh men that are wearied with trauell.

Brutus thankfulneſſe and clemencie.

And for proofe hereof, it is reported, that the ſame day he fought his laſt battell by the citie of PHILIPPES, as he came out of his tent, he gaue his men for the word and ſignall of battell, Phœbus: ſo that it was thought euer ſince, that this his ſodaine crying out at the feaſt, was a prognoſtication of his misfortune that ſhould happen. After this, Antiſtius gaue him of the money he caried into ITALY, 50. Myriades. Furthermore, all Pompeys ſouldiers that ſtraggled vp and downe THESSALY, came with very good will vnto him. He tooke from Cinna alſo, fiue hundred horſemen, which he caried into ASIA, vnto Dolabella. After that, he went by ſea vnto the citie of DEMETRIADE, and there tooke a great deale of armor and munition which was going to Antonius: and the which had bene made and forced there by Iulius Cæſars commaundement, for the warres againſt the PARTHIANS. Furthermore, Hortenſius gouernour of MACEDON, did reſigne the gouernement thereof vnto him. Beſides, all the princes, kings and noble men thereabouts, came and ioyned with him, when it was told him that Caius (Antonius brother) comming out of ITALIE, had paſſed the ſea, & came with great ſpeede towards the citie of DYRRACHIVM, and APOLLONIA, to get the ſouldiers into his hands, which Gabinius had there. Brutus therefore to preuent him, went preſently with a fewe of his men in the middeſt of winter when it ſnewe hard, and tooke his way thorough hard and foule countries, and made ſuch ſpeede in deede, that he was there long before Antonius ſumpters, that caried the victuals. So that when he came neere vnto DYRRACHIVM, a diſeaſe tooke him which the Phiſitians call Βȣλιμία, to ſay, a cormorant and vnſatiable appetite to eate: by reaſon of the cold and paines he had taken. This ſickneſſe chanceth often, both to men and beaſts, that trauell when it hath ſnowen: Either becauſe the naturall heate being retyred into the inward parts of the bodie, by the coldnes of the aire hardening the ſkinne, doth ſtraight digeſt and conſume the meate: or elſe becauſe a ſharpe ſubtle winde comming by reaſon of the ſnow when it is molten, doth pearce into the bodie, and driueth out the naturall heate which was caſt outward. For it ſeemeth, that the heate being quenched with the cold, which it meeteth withall comming out of the ſkinne of the bodie: cauſeth the ſweates that followe the diſeaſe. But hereof we haue ſpoken at large in other places. Brutus being verie faint, and hauing nothing in his campe to eate: his ſouldiers were compelled to go to their enemies, and comming to the gates of the citie, they prayed the warders to helpe them to bread. When they heard in what caſe Brutus was, they brought him both meate and drinke: in requitall whereof, afterwardes when he wanne the citie, he did not onely intreate and vſe the Citizens thereof curteouſly, but all the inhabitants of the citie alſo for their ſakes. Now, when Caius Antonius was arriued in the citie of APOLLONIA, he ſent vnto the ſouldiers thereabouts to come vnto him. But when he vnderſtoode that they went all to Brutus, and furthermore, that the Citizens of APOLLONIA did fauor him much: he then forſooke that citie, and went vnto the citie of BVTHROTVS, but yet he loſt three of his enſignes by the way, that were ſlaine euerie man of them. Then he ſought by force to winne certaine places of ſtrength about BYLLIS, & to driue Brutus men from thence, that had taken it before: and therefore to obtaine his purpoſe, he fought a battell with Cicero, the ſonne of Marcus Tullius Cicero, by whom he was ouercome. For Brutus made the younger Cicero a Captaine, and did many notable exploites by his ſeruice. Shortly after, hauing ſtolen vpon Caius Antonius in certaine mariſhes farro from the place from whence he fled: he would not ſet on him with furie, but onely rode round about him, commaunding his ſouldiers to ſpare him & his men, as reckoning them all his own without ſtroke ſtriking: and ſo indeed it hapned. For they yeelded themſelues, and their Captaine Antonius, vnto B*rutus*: ſo that B*rutus* had now a great army about him. Now Brutus kept this Caius Antonius long time in his office, and neuer tooke from him the markes and ſignes of his Conſulſhip, although many of his friendes, & Cicero among others, wrote vnto him to put him to death. But when he ſaw Antonius ſecretly practiſed with his Captaines to make ſome alteration: then he ſent him into a ſhippe, and made him to be kept there. When the ſouldiers whom C. Antonius had corrupted, were gotten into the citie of APOLLONIA, and ſent from thence vnto B*rutus* to come vnto them: he made them anſwere, that it was not the maner of ROMAINE Captaines to come to the ſouldiers, but the ſouldiers to come to the Captaine, and to craue pardon for their offences committed. Thereupon they came to him, and he pardoned them. So B*rutus* preparing to goe into ASIA, newes came vnto him of the great chaunge at ROME. For Octauius Cæſar was in armes, by commandement and authoritie from the Senate, againſt Marcus Antonius. But after that he had driuen Antonius out of ITALY, the Senate then began to be affraid of him: becauſe he ſued to be Conſull, which was contrary to the law, and kept a great army about him, when the Empire of ROME had no neede of them. On the other ſide, Octauius Cæſar perceiuing the Senate ſtayed not there, but turned vnto Brutus that was out of ITALIE, and that they appointed him the gouernment of certaine prouinces: then he began to be affraid for his part, and ſent vnto Antonius to offer him his friendſhip. Then comming on with his armie neere to ROME, he made himſelfe to be choſen Conſull, whether the Senate would or not, when he was yet but a ſtrippling or ſpringal of twenty yere old, as himſelfe reporteth in his owne commentaries. So when he was Conſull, he preſently appointed Iudges to accuſe B*rutus* and his companions, for killing of the nobleſt perſon in ROME, & chiefeſt Magiſtrate, without law or iudgement: and made L. Cornificus accuſe B*rutus*, and M. Agrippa, Caſſius. So, the parties accuſed were condemned, becauſe the Iudges were compelled to giue ſuch ſentence. The voice went, that when the Herauld (according to the cuſtome after ſentence giuen) went vp to the chaire or pulpit for orations, & proclaimed Brutus with a loude voice, ſummoning him to appeare in perſon before the Iudges: the people that ſtoode by ſighed openly, and the noble men that were preſent hong downe their heades, & durſt not ſpeake a word. Among them, the teares fell from Publius Silicius eyes: who ſhortly after, was one of the proſcripts or outlawes appointed to be ſlaine. After that, theſe three Octauius Cæſar, Antonius and Lepidus, made an agreement betwene themſelues, and by thoſe articles deuided the prouinces belonging to the Empire of ROME among themſelues, and did ſet vp bils of proſcription & outlawry, cõdemning two hundred of the nobleſt men of ROME to ſuffer death, and among that number, C*icero* was one. Newes being brought thereof into MACEDON, B*rutus* being then inforced to it, wrote vnto Hortenſius, that he ſhould put Caius Antonius to death, to be reuenged of the death of C*icero*, and of the other B*rutus*, of the which the one was his friend, and the other his kinſman. For this cauſe therfore, Antonius afterwards taking Hortenſius at the battell of PHILIPPES, he made him to be ſlaine vpon his brothers tombe. But then B*rutus* ſaid, that he was more aſhamed of the cauſe for the which C*icero* was ſlaine, then he was otherwiſe ſorie for his death: and that he could not but greatly reproue his friends he had at ROME, who were ſlaues more through their own fault, then through their valiantnes or manhood which vſurped the tyrannie: conſidering that they were ſo cowardly and faint harted, as to ſuffer the ſight of thoſe things before their eies, the report wherof ſhould onely haue grieued them to the heart. Now when B*rutus* had paſſed ouer his armie (that was very great) into Asia, he gaue order for the gathering of a great number of ſhips together, as well in the coaſt of Bithynia, as alſo in the citie of Cyzicum, becauſe he would haue an army by ſea: and himſelfe in the meane time went vnto the cities, taking order for all things, and giuing audience to Princes & noble men of the country that had to do with him. Afterwards he ſent vnto Caſſius in Syria, to turne him from his iorney into Ægypt, telling him that it was not for the conqueſt of any kingdome for themſelues, that they wandred vp and down in that ſort, but contrarily, that it was to reſtore their country againe to their libertie: and that the multitude of ſouldiers they gathered together, was to ſubdue the tyrants that would keep them in ſlauerie and ſubiection. Wherefore regarding their chiefe purpoſe and intent, they ſhould not be farre from Italy, as neere as they could poſſible, but ſhould rather make all the haſte they could, to helpe their countrymen. Caſſius beleeued him, & returned. Brutus went to meete him, & they both met at the citie of Smyrna, which was the firſt time that they ſaw together ſince they tooke leaue each of other, at the hauen of Piræa, in Athens: the one going into Syria, and the other into Macedon. So they were maruellous ioyfull, and no leſſe coragious, when they ſaw the great armies together which they had both leauied: conſidering that they departed out of Italy, like naked and poore baniſhed men, without armor & mony, nor hauing any ſhip readie, nor ſouldier about them, nor any one towne at their commandement: yet notwithſtanding, in a ſhort time after they were now met together, hauing ſhips, money and ſouldiers enow, both footemen and horſemen, to fight for the Empire of Rome. Now Caſſius would haue done Brutus as much honor, as Brutus did vnto him: but Brutus moſt cōmonly preuented him, and went firſt vnto him, both becauſe he was the elder man, as alſo for that he was ſickly of body. And men reputed him commonly to be very skilfull in warres, but otherwiſe maruellous chollericke & cruell, who ſought to rule men by feare, rather then with lenitie: and on the other ſide he was too familiar with his friends, and would ieſt too broadly with them. But Brutus in contrary manner, for his vertue and valiantneſſe, was welbeloued of the people and his owne, eſteemed of noble men, and hated of no man, not ſo much as of his enemies: becauſe he was a maruellous lowly and gentle perſon, noble minded, and would neuer be in any rage, nor caried away with pleaſure and couetouſneſſe, but had euer an vpright mind with him, and would neuer yeeld to any wrong or iniuſtice, the which was the chiefeſt cauſe of his fame, of his riſing, and of the good will that euery man bare him: for they were all perſwaded that his intent was good. For they did not certainly beleeue, that if Pompey himſelf had ouercome Cæſar, he would haue reſigned his authoritie to the law: but rather they were of opinion, that he would ſtill keepe the ſoueraigntie and abſolute gouernment in his hands, taking onely, to pleaſe the people, the title of Conſull or Dictator, or of ſome other more ciuill office. And as for Caſſius, a hot, chollericke, & cruell man, that would oftentimes be caried away from iuſtice for gaine: it was certainly thought that he made warre, and put himſelfe into ſundry dangers, more to haue abſolute power and authoritie, then to defend the libertie of his country. For, they that will alſo conſider others, that were elder men then they, as Cinna, Marius, and Carbo: it is out of doubt that the end & hope of their victorie, was to be Lords of their country: and in manner they did all confeſſe that they fought for the tyranny, and to be Lords of the Empire of Rome. And in contrary manner, his enemies themſelues did neuer reproue Brutus, for any ſuch change or deſire. For, it was ſaid that Antonius ſpake it openly diuers times that he thought, that of all them that had ſlaine Cæſar, there was none but Brutus only that was moued to do it, as thinking the act commendable of it ſelfe: but that all the other conſpirators did conſpire his death, for ſome priuate malice or enuie, that they otherwiſe did beare vnto him. Hereby it appeareth, that Brutus did not truſt ſo much to the power of his army, as he did to his owne vertue: as is to be ſeene by his writings. For approching neere to the inſtant danger, he wrote vnto Pomponius Atticus, that his affayres had the beſt happe that could be. For, ſaid he, either I will ſet my country at libertie by battell, or by honorable death rid me of this bondage. And furthermore, that they being certaine & aſſured of all things elſe, this one thing only was doubtfull to them: whether they ſhould liue or die with liberty. He wrote alſo that Antonius had his due paimēt for his folly. For where he might haue bin a partner equally of the glory of Brutus, Caſſius, & Cato, and haue made one with them: he liked better to chooſe to be ioyned with Octauius Cæſar alone: with whom, though now he be not ouercome by vs, yet ſhall he ſhortly after alſo haue warre with him. And truely he proued a true Prophet, for ſo came it in deede to paſſe. Now whileſt B*rutus* and C*aſſius* were together in the city of SMYRNA: B*rutus* prayed C*aſſius* to let him haue ſome part of his money whereof he had great ſtore, becauſe all that he could rappe and rend of his ſide he had beſtowed it in making ſo great a number of ſhippes, that by meanes of them they ſhould keepe all the ſea at their commaundement. C*aſſius* friends hindered this requeſt, and earneſtly diſſwaded him from it: perſwading him, that it was no reaſon that Brutus ſhould haue the money which C*aſſius* hath gotten together by ſparing, and leauied with great euill will of the people their ſubiectes, for him to beſtow liberally vpon his ſouldiers, and by this meanes to winne their good willes, by C*aſſius* charge. This notwithſtanding, C*aſſius* gaue him the thirde part of his totall ſumme. So C*aſsius* and Brutus then departing from ech other, Caſsius tooke the city of RHODES, where he too diſhoneſtly & cruelly vſed himſelfe: although when he came into the citie, he anſwered ſome of the inhabitants, who called him Lord and King, that he was neither Lord nor King, but he only that had ſlaine him, that would haue bene Lord and King. Brutus departing from thence, ſent vnto the LYCIANS to require money, and men of warre. But there was a certaine Orator called Naucrates, that made the cities to rebell againſt him, inſomuch that the countrimen of that country kept the ſtraights and litle mountaines, thinking by that meanes to ſtoppe Brutus paſſage. Wherefore B*rutus* ſent his horſemen againſt them, who ſtale vppon them as they were at dinner, and ſlew ſixe hundred of them: and taking all the ſmall townes and villages, he did let all the priſoners he tooke, goe without payment of ranſome, hoping by this his great courteſie to winne them, to draw all the reſt of the country vnto him. But they were ſo fierce and obſtinate, that they would mutine for euery ſmall hurt they receiued as they paſſed by their countrie, and did deſpiſe his curteſie and good nature: vntill that at length he went to beſiege the citie of the XANTHIANS, within the which were ſhut vp the cruelleſt and moſt warlikeſt men of LYCIA. There was a riuer that ranne by the wals of the citie, in the which many men ſaued themſelues, ſwimming betwene two waters, and fled: howbeit they laide nets ouerthwart the riuer, and tyed litle belles on the toppe of them, to ſound when any man was taken in the nets. The XANTHIANS made a ſalie out by night, and came to fire certaine engines of batterie that beate downe their walles: but they were preſently driuen in againe by the ROMAINES, ſo ſoone as they were diſcouered. The winde by chaunce was maruellous bigge, and increaſed the flame ſo ſore, that it violently caried it into the cranewes of the wall of the citie, that the next houſes vnto them were ſtraight ſet a fire thereby. Wherefore B*rutus* being affraide that all the citie would take on fire, he preſently commaunded his men to quench the fire, and to ſaue the towne if it might be. But the LYCIANS at that inſtant fell into ſuch a frenſie, and ſtraunge and horrible deſpaire, that no man can well expreſſe it: and a man can not more rightly compare or liken it, then to a franticke and moſt deſperate deſire to die. For all of them together, with their wiues and children, Maiſters and ſeruantes, and of all ſortes of age whatſoeuer, fought vppon the ramper of their walles, and did caſt downe ſtones and fireworkes on the ROMAINES, which were verie buſie in quenching the flame of the fire, to ſaue the citie. And in contrarie manner alſo, they brought faggots, drie wood, and reedes, to bring the fire further into the citie aſmuch as might be, increaſing it by ſuch thinges as they brought. Nowe when the fire had gotten into all the partes of the citie, and that the flame burnt bright in euerie place: B*rutus* being ſorie to ſee it, got vppon his horſe, and rode rounde about the walles of the citie, to ſee if it were poſſible to ſaue it, and helde vppe his handes to the inhabitantes, praying them to pardon their citie, and to ſaue themſelues. Howbeit they would not be perſwaded, but did all that they could poſſible to caſt themſelues away, not onely men and women, but alſo litle children. For ſome of them weeping and crying out, did caſt them ſelues into the fire: others headlong throwing themſelues downe from the walles, brake their neckes: others alſo made their neckes bare, to the naked ſwordes of their fathers, and vndid their clothes, praying them to kill them with their owne handes. After the citie was burnt, they found a woman hanged vp by the necke, holding one of her children in her hande dead by her, hanged vp alſo: and in the other hande a burning torch ſetting fire on her houſe. Some would haue had Brutus to haue ſeene her, but he would not ſee ſo horrible and tragicall a ſight: but when he heard it, he fell a weeping, and cauſed a Herauld to make proclamation by ſound of trumpet, that he would giue a certaine ſumme of money, to euery ſouldier that could ſaue a XANTHIAN. So there were not (as it is reported) aboue fiftie of them ſaued, and yet they were ſaued againſt their willes. Thus the XANTHIANS hauing ended the reuolution of their fatall deſtinie, after a long continuance of time: they did through their deſperation, renew the memorie of the lamentable calamities of their Aunceſtors. Who in like manner, in the warres of the PERSIANS, did burne their citie, and deſtroyed themſelues. Therefore Brutus likewiſe beſieging the citie of the PATAREIANS, perceiuing that they ſtoutly reſiſted him: hee was alſo affraide of that, and could not well tell whether he ſhould giue aſſault to it, or not, leaſt they would fall into the deſpaire and deſperation of the XANTHIANS. Howbeit hauing taken certaine of their women priſoners, he ſent them backe againe, without payment of ranſome. Nowe they that were the wiues and daughters of the nobleſt men of the citie, reporting vnto their parents, that they had found Brutus a mercifull, iuſt, and courteous man: they perſwaded them to yeelde themſelues and their citie vnto him, the which they did. So after they had thus yeelded themſelues, diuers other cities alſo followed them, and did the like: and founde Brutus more mercifull and courteous, then they thought they ſhould haue done, but ſpecially farre aboue Caſſius. For Caſſius, about the ſelfe ſame time, after he had compelled the RRODIANS euery man to deliuer all the readie money they had in gold and ſiluer in their houſes, the which being brought together, amounted to the ſumme of eight thouſand talents: yet he condemned the citie beſides, to pay the ſumme of fiue hundred talents more. Where Brutus in contrarie manner, after he had leauied of all the countrie of LYCIA but a hundred and fiftie talentes onely: he departed thence into the countrie of IONIA, and did them no more hurt. Now Brutus in all this iourney, did many notable acts and worthy of memorie, both for rewarding, as alſo in puniſhing thoſe that had deſerued it: Wherefore among the reſt, I will tell you of one thing, of the which he himſelfe, and all the noble men of the ROMAINES were maruellous glad. When Pompey the great (hauing loſt the battell againſt Iulius Cæſar, in the fields of PHARSALIA) came and fell vpon the coaſt of ÆGYPT, hard by the citie of PELVSIVM: thoſe that were protectors to the young king Ptolomy, being then but a childe, ſate in councell with his ſeruantes and friendes, what they ſhould determine in that caſe. They were not all of one minde in this conſultation: for ſome thought it good to receiue Pompey, others alſo, that they ſhould driue him out of ÆGYPT. But there was a certaine Rethoritian called Theodotus, that was borne in the Ile of CHIO, who was the kings ſchoolemaiſter to teach him Rethoricke. He being called to this councell for lacke of ſufficient men, ſaide, that both the one and the other ſide went awry, aſwell thoſe that were of opinion to receiue Pompey, as the other that would haue had him driuen away: and that the beſt way was (conſidering the preſent time) that they ſhould lay holde on him, and kill him, adding withall, this ſentence, that a dead man biteth not. The whole councell ſtucke to this opinion. So, for a notable example of incredible misfortune, and vnlooked for vnto Pompey: Pompey the great was ſlaine, by the motion and counſell of this wicked Rethoritian Theodotus, as Theodotus afterwardes did him ſelfe boaſt of it. But when Iulius Cæſar came afterwardes into ÆGYPT, the wicked men that conſented to this counſell, had their payment according to their deſerts: for they died euery man of them a wicked death, ſauing this Theodotus, whom fortune reſpighted a litle while longer, and yet in that time he liued a poore and miſerable life, neuer tarying long in anie one place. So Brutus going vppe and downe ASIA, Theodotus could hide himſelfe no longer, but was brought vnto Brutus, where he ſuffered paines of death: ſo that he wanne more fame by his death, then euer he did in his life. About that time, Brutus ſent to pray Caſſius to come to the citie of SARDIS, and ſo he did. Brutus vnderſtanding of his comming, went to meete him with all his friendes. There, both their armies being armed, they called them both Emperors. Now, as it commonly hapneth in great affaires betweene two perſons, both of them hauing many friends, and ſo many Captaines vnder them: there ranne tales and complaints betwixt them. Therefore, before they fell in hand with with any other matter, they went into a litle chamber together, and bad euery man auoide and did ſhut the dores to them. Then they began to powre out their complaintes one to the other, and grew hot and loude, earneſtly accuſing one another, and at length fell both a weeping. Their friends that were without the chamber hearing them loud within, and angry betweene them ſelues, they were both amaſed, and afraied alſo leaſt it would grow to further matter: but yet they were commaunded, that no man ſhould come to them. Notwithſtanding, one Marcus Phaonius, that had bene a frend and follower of Cato while he liued, and tooke vpon him to counterfeate a Philoſopher, not with wiſedome & diſcretion, but with a certaine bedlem and franticke motion: he would needes come into the chamber, though the men offered to keepe him out. But it was no boot to let Phaonius, when a mad moode or toy tooke him in the head: for he was a hot haſty man, and ſodaine in all his doings, and cared for neuer a Senator of them all. Now, though he vſed this bold manner of ſpeach after the profeſſion of the Cynicke Philoſophers, (as who would ſay, dogs) yet this boldnes did no hurt many times, becauſe they did but laugh at him to ſee him ſo mad. This Phaonius at that time, in deſpite of the doorekeepers, came into the chamber, and with a certaine ſcoffing and mocking geſture which hee counterfeated of purpoſe, he rehearſed the verſes which old Neſtor ſayd in Homer:

Brutus and Caſsius complaints one vnto the other.

M. Phaonius a follower of Cato.

Cynicke Philoſophers, counted dogs.

My Lords, I pray you hearken both to me,
For I haue ſeene moe yeares than ſuchie three.

Caſsius fell a laghing at him: but Brutus thruſt him out of the chamber, and called him dog, and counterfeate Cynicke. Howbeit his comming in brake their ſtrife at that time, and ſo they left each other. The ſelfe ſame night Caſsius prepared his ſupper in his chamber, and Brutus brought his frends with him. So when they were ſet at ſupper, Phaonius came to ſit downe after he had waſhed. Brutus told him aloude, no man ſent for him, and bad them ſet him at the vpper end: meaning in deede at the lower end of the bed. Phaonius made no ceremony, but thruſt in amongeſt the middeſt of them, and made all the company laugh at him: So they were merry all ſupper time, and full of their Philoſophy. The next day after, Brutus, vppon complaint of the SARDIANS, did condemne and noted Lucius Pella for a defamed perſon, that had beene a Prætor of the ROMAINES, and whom Brutus had giuen charge vnto: for that he was accuſed and conuicted of robbery, and pilferie in his office. This iudgement much miſliked Caſsius: becauſe he him ſelfe had ſecretely (not many daies before) warned two of his friends, attainted and conuicted of the like offences, and openly had cleared them: but yet he did not therefore leaue to employ them in any manner of ſeruice as he did before. And therefore he greatly reproued Brutus, for that he would ſhew him ſelfe ſo ſtraight and ſeuere in ſuch a time, as was meeter to beare a litle, then to take things at the worſt. Brutus in contrary manner aunſwered, that he ſhould remember the Ides of Marche, at which time they ſlue Iulius Cæſar: who neither piled nor polled the country, but onely was a fauorer and ſuborner of all them that did robbe and ſpoile, by his countenaunce and authority. And if there were any occaſion whereby they might honeſtly ſette aſide iuſtice and equity: they ſhould haue had more reaſon to haue ſuffered Cæſars friendes, to haue robbed and done what wrong and iniury they had would, then to beare with their owne men. For then ſayed he, they could but haue ſayed they had bene cowardes: and now they may accuſe vs of iniuſtice, beſide the paines we take, and the daunger we put our ſelues into. And thus may we ſee what Brutus intent and purpoſe was. But as they both prepared to paſſe ouer againe, out of ASIA into EVROPE: there went a rumor that there appeared a wonderfull ſigne vnto him. Brutus was a carefull man, and ſlept very litle, both for that his diet was moderate, as alſo becauſe he was continually occupied. He neuer ſlept in the day time, and in the night no longer, then the time he was driuen to be alone, and when euery body elſe tooke their reſt. But now whileſt he was in warre, and his head euer buſily occupied to thinke of his affaires, and what would happen: after he had ſlumbered a litle after ſupper, he ſpent all the reſt of the night in diſpatching of his waighteſt cauſes, and after he had taken order for them, if hee had any leyſure left him, he would reade ſome booke till the third watch of the night, at what time the Captaines, petty Captaines and Colonels, did vſe to come to him. So, being ready to goe into EVROPE, one night very late (when all the campe tooke quiet reſt) as hee was in his tent with a litle light, thinking of waighty matters: he thought he heard one come in to him, and caſting his eye towards the dore of his tent, that he ſaw a wonderfull ſtraunge and monſtruous ſhape of a body comming towards him, and ſayd neuer a word. So Brutus boldly asked what he was, a god or a man, and what cauſe brought him thither. The ſpirit aunſwered him, I am thy euill ſpirit, Brutus: and thou ſhalt ſee me by the city of PHILIPPES. Brutus being no otherwiſe afraied, replied againe vnto it: well, then I ſhall ſee thee againe. The ſpirite preſently vaniſhed away: and Brutus called his men vnto him, who tolde him that they heard no noiſe, nor ſaw any thing at all. Thereupon Brutus returned againe to thinke on his matters as he did before: and when the day brake, he went vnto Caſſius, to tell him what viſion had appeared vnto him in the night. Caſſius being in opinion an EPICVRIAN, and reaſoning thereon with Brutus, ſpake to him touching the viſion thus. In our ſect, Brutus, we haue an opinion, that we doe not alwayes feele, or ſee, that which we ſuppoſe we doe both ſee and feele: but that our ſenſes being credulous, and therefore eaſily abuſed (when they are idle and vnoccupied in their owne obiects) are induced to imagine they ſee and coniecture that, which they in truth doe not. For, our minde is quicke and cunning to worke (without either cauſe or matter) any thing in the imagination whatſoeuer. And therefore the imagination is reſembled to clay, and the minde to the potter: who without any other cauſe then his fancy and pleaſure, chaungeth it into what faſhion and forme he will. And this doth the diuerſity of our dreames ſhew vnto vs. For our imagination doth vppon a ſmall fancy grow from conceite to conceite, altering both in paſſions and formes of things imagined. For the minde of man is euer occupied, and that continual mouing is nothing but an imagination. But yet there is a further cauſe of this in you. For you being by nature giuen to melancholicke diſcourſing, and of late continually occupied: your wittes and ſences hauing bene ouerlabored, doe eaſilier yeelde to ſuch imaginations. For, to ſay that there are ſpirits or angels, and if there were, that they had the ſhape of men, or ſuch voyces, or any power at all to come vnto vs: it is a mockery. And for mine owne part, I would there were ſuch, becauſe that we ſhould not onely haue ſouldiers, horſes, and ſhippes, but alſo the aide of the goddes, to guide and further our honeſt and honorable attempts. With theſe words Caſſius did ſomwhat comfort and quiet Brutus. When they raiſed their campe, there came two Eagles that flying with a maruellous force, lighted vppon two of the foremoſt enſignes, and alwaies followed the ſouldiers, which gaue them meat, and fed them, vntill they came neare to the city of PHILIPPES: and there one day onely before the battell, they both flew away. Now Brutus had conquered the moſt part of all the people, and nations of that countrey: but if there were any other city or Captaine to ouercome, then they made all cleare before them, and ſo drew towardes the coaſtes of THASSOS. There Norbanus lying in campe in a certaine place called the ſtraights, by another place called SYMBOLON: (which is a port of the ſea) Caſſius & Brutus compaſſed him in in ſuch ſort, that he was driuen to forſake the place which was of great ſtrength for him, and he was alſo in danger beſide to haue loſt all his army. For, Octauius Cæſar could not follow him becauſe of his ſicknes, and therefore ſtayed behinde: whereuppon they had taken his army, had not Antonius aide bene, which made ſuch wonderfull ſpeed, that Brutus could ſcant beleeue it. So Cæſar came not thither of ten daies after: and Antonius camped againſt Caſſius, and Brutus on the other ſide againſt Cæſar. The ROMAINS called the valley betweene both camps, the PHILIPPIAN fields: and there were neuer ſeene two ſo great armies of the ROMAINS, one before the other, ready to fight. In truth, Brutus army was inferior to Octauius Cæſars, in number of men: but for brauery and rich furniture, Brutus army far excelled Cæſars. For the moſt part of their armors were ſiluer & gilt, which Brutus had bountifully giuen them: although in all other things he taught his Captaines to liue in order without exceſſe. But for the brauery of armour, and weapon, which ſouldiers ſhould cary in their hands, or otherwiſe weare vpon their backes: he thought that it was an encoragement vnto them that by nature are greedy of honor, and that it maketh them alſo fight like deuils that loue to get, and to be afraied to loſe: becauſe they fight to keepe their armor and weapon, as alſo their goods and lands. Now when they came to muſter their armies, Octauius Cæſar tooke the muſter of his army within the trenches of his campe, & gaue his men onely a litle corne, and fiue ſiluer Drachmas to euery man to ſacrifice to the gods, and to

to pray for victory. But Brutus ſkorning this miſery and nigardlines, firſt of all muſtered his army, and did purifie it in the fields, according to the maner of the ROMAINS: and then he gaue vnto euery band a number of weathers to ſacrifice, and fifty ſiluer Drachmas to euery ſouldier. So that Brutus and Caſsius ſouldiers were better pleaſed, and more coragiouſly bent to fight at the day of battell, then their enemies ſouldiers were. Notwithſtanding, being buſily occupied about the ceremonies of this purification, it is reported that there chanced certaine vnlucky ſignes vnto Caſsius. For one of his Sergeaunts that caried the roddes before him, brought him the garland of flowers turned backwards, the which he ſhould haue worne on his head in the time of ſacrificing. Moreouer it is reported alſo, that an other time before, in certaine ſportes and triumphe where they caried an image of Caſsius victory of cleane golde, it fell by chaunce, the man ſtumbling that caried it. And yet further, there were ſeene a maruellous number of fowles of prey, that feed vpon dead carkaſſes: and bee-hiues alſo were found, where Bees were gathered together in a certaine place within the trenches of the campe: the which place the Soothſayers thought good to ſhut out of the precinct of the campe, for to take away the ſuperſtitious feare and miſtruſt men would haue of it. The which began ſomewhat to alter Caſsius minde from Epicurus opinions, and had put the ſouldiers alſo in a maruellous feare. Thereuppon Caſsius was of opinion not to try this warre at one battell, but rather to delay time, and to draw it out in length, conſidering that they were the ſtronger in money, and the weaker in men and armors. But Brutus in contrary manner, did alway before and at that time alſo, deſire nothing more, then to put all to the hazard of battell, as ſoone as might be poſſible: to the end he might either quickly reſtore his countrey to her former liberty, or rid him forthwith of this miſerable world, being ſtill troubled in following and maintaining of ſuch great armies together. But perceiuing that in the daily ſkirmiſhes and bickerings they made, his men were alway the ſtronger, and euer had the better: that yet quickened his ſpirits againe, and did put him in better heart. And furthermore, becauſe that ſome of their owne men had already yeelded them ſelues to their enemies, and that it was ſuſpected moreouer diuerſe others would doe the like: that made many of Caſsius friendes, which were of his minde before, (when it came to be debated in councel whether the battel ſhould be fought or not) that they were then of Brutus minde. But yet was there one of Brutus friends called Atellius, that was againſt it, and was of opinion that they ſhould tary the next winter. Brutus asked him what he ſhould get by tarying a yeare longer? If I get nothing els, ꝗ Atellius againe, yet haue I liued ſo much longer. Caſsius was very angry with this aunſwer: and Atellius was maliced and eſteemed the worſe for it of all men. Thereupon it was preſently determined they ſhould fight battell the next day. So Brutus all ſupper time looked with a chearefull countenaunce, like a man that had good hope, and talked very wiſely of Philoſophy, and after ſuper went to bed. But touching Caſsius, Meſſala reporteth that he ſupped by him ſelfe in his tent with a few of his frindes, and that all ſupper time he looked very ſadly, and was full of thoughts, although it was againſt his nature: and that after ſupper he tooke him by the hand, and holding him faſt (in token of kindneſſe as his manner was) told him in Greeke: Meſſala, I proteſt vnto thee, and make thee my witnes, that I am compelled againſt my minde and will (as Pompey the great was) to ieopard the liberty of our countrey, to the hazard of a battell. And yet we muſt be liuely, and of good corage, conſidering our good fortune, whom we ſhould wrong too much to miſtruſt her, although wee follow euill counſell. Meſſala writeth, that Caſsius hauing ſpoken theſe laſt wordes vnto him, he bad him farewell, and willed him to come to ſupper to him the next night following, becauſe it was his birth day. The next morning by breake of day, the ſignall of battell was ſet out in Brutus and Caſsius campe, which was an arming ſcarlet coat: and both the Chieftaines ſpake together in the middeſt of their armies. There Caſsius began to ſpeake firſt, and ſayd: the gods grant vs, O Brutus, that this day we may win the field, and euer after to liue all the reſt of our life quietly, one with another. But ſith the gods haue ſo ordayned it, that the greateſt & chiefeſt things amongeſt men are moſt vncertaine, and that if the batell fall out otherwiſe to day then we wiſh or looke for, we ſhall hardly meete againe: what art thou then determined to doe, to flie, or die? Brutus auſwered him, being yet but a young man, and not ouer greatly experienced in the world: I truſt, (I know not how) a certaine rule of Philoſophy, by the which I did

greatly blame and reproue Cato for killing of himſelfe, as being no lawfull nor godly acte, touching the gods, nor concerning men, valiant, not to giue place and yeeld to diuine prouidence, and not conſtantly & patiently to take whatſoeuer it pleaſeth him to ſend vs, but to draw back and flie: but being now in the middeſt of the danger, I am of a contrary mind. For if it be not the will of God, that this battell fall out fortunate for vs: I will looke no more for hope, neither ſeeke to make any new ſupply for war again, but wil rid me of this miſerable world, and content me with my fortune. For, I gaue vp my life for my countrey in the Ides of March, for the which I ſhall liue in an other more glorious world. Caſsius fell a laughing to heare what he ſaied, and imbracing him, come on then ſaied he, let vs goe and charge our enemies with this minde. For either we ſhall conquer, or we ſhall not neede to feare the Conquerors. After this talke, they fell to conſultation among their friends for the ordering of the battell. Then Brutus praied Caſsius he might haue the leading of the right wing, the which men thought was farre meeter for Caſsius: both becauſe he was the elder man, and alſo for that he had the better experience. But yet Caſsius gaue it him, and willed that Meſſala (who had charge of one of the warrelikeſt legions they had) ſhould be alſo in that wing with Brutus. So Brutus preſently ſent out his horſemen, who were excellently well appointed, and his footmen alſo were as willing and ready to giue charge. Now Antonius men did caſt a trench from the mariſhe by the which they lay, to cutte off Caſsius way to come to the ſea: and Cæſar, at the leaſt his army ſtirred not. As for Octauius Cæſar him ſelfe, he was not in his campe, becauſe he was ſicke. And for his people, they litle thought the enemies would haue giuen them battell, but onely haue made ſome light skirmiſhes to hinder them that wrought in the trench, and with their darts and ſlings to haue kept them from finiſhing of their worke: but they taking no heede to them that came full vpon them to giue them battell, maruelled much at the great noiſe they heard, that came from the place where they were caſting their trench. In the meane time Brutus that ledde the right wing, ſent litle bils to the Colonels and Captaines of priuate bandes, in the which hee wrote the word of the battell: and he him ſelfe riding a horſe backe by all the troupes, did ſpeake to them, and incoraged them to ſticke to it like men. So by this meanes very few of them vnderſtoode what was the word of the battell, and beſides, the moſt part of them neuer taryed to haue it told them, but ranne with great furie to aſſaile the enemies: whereby through this diſorder, the legions were maruellouſly ſcattered and diſperſed one from the other. For firſt of all, Meſſalaes legion, and then the next vnto them, went beyond the left wing of the enemies, and did nothing, but glauncing by them, ouerthrew ſome as they went, and ſo going on further, fell right vpon Cæſars campe, out of the which (as him ſelfe writeth in his commentaries) he had bene conueyed away a litle before, through the counſell and aduiſe of one of his friendes called Marcus Artorius: Who dreaming in the night, had a viſion appeared vnto him, that commaunded Octauius Cæſar ſhould be caried out of his campe. Inſomuch as it was thought he was ſlaine, becauſe his litter (which had nothing in it) was thruſt through and through with pikes and darts. There was great ſlaughter in this campe. For amongeſt others, there were ſlaine two thouſand LACEDÆMONIANS, who were arriued but euen a litle before, comming to aid Cæſar. The other alſo that had not glanced by, but had giuen a charge full vpon Cæſars battell: they eaſily made them flie, becauſe they were greatly troubled for the loſſe of their campe, and of them there were ſlaine by hand, three legions. Then being very earneſt to follow the chaſe of them that fled, they ranne in amongeſt them hand ouer head into their campe, and Brutus among them. But that which the conquerours thought not of, occaſion ſhewed it vnto them that were ouercome: and that was, the left wing of their enemies left naked, and vnguarded of them of the right wing, who were ſtrayed too farre off, in following of them that were ouerthrowen. So they gaue a hot charge vpon them. But notwithſtanding all the force they made, they could not breake into the middeſt of their battell, where they found men that receiued them, and valiantly made head againſt them. Howbeit they brake and ouerthrew the left wing where Caſsius was, by reaſon of the great diſorder among them, and alſo becauſe they had no intelligence how the right wing had ſped. So they chaſed them beating them into their campe, the which they ſpoyled, none of both the Chieftaines being preſent there. For Antonius, as it is reported, to flie the furie of the firſt charge, was gotten into the next mariſh:and no man could tel what became of Octauius Caſar, after he was caried out of his campe. Inſomuch that there were certaine ſouldiers that ſhewed their ſwords bloodied, and ſayd that they had ſlaine him, and did deſcribe his face, and ſhewed what age he was of. Furthermore the voward, and the middeſt of Brutus battell, had already put all their enemies to flight that withſtoode them, with great ſlaughter: ſo that Brutus had conquered all on his ſide, and Caſsius had loſt all on the other ſide. For nothing vndid them, but that Brutus went not to helpe Caſsius, thinking he had ouercome them, as him ſelfe had done: and Caſsius on the other ſide taried not for Brutus, thinking he had bene ouerthrowen, as him ſelfe was. And to proue that the victory fell on Brutus ſide, Meſſala confirmeth it: that they wan three Eagles, and diuers other enſignes of their enemies, and their enemies wan neuer a one of theirs. Now Brutus returning from the chaſe, after he had ſlaine and ſacked Caſars men: he wondred much that he could not ſee Caſsius tent ſtanding vp high as it was wont, neither the other tents of his campe ſtanding as they were before, becauſe all the whole campe had bene ſpoiled, & the tents throwen downe, at the firſt cōming in of the enemies. But they that were about Brutus, whoſe ſight ſerued them better, told him that they ſaw a great gliſtering of harneſſe, and a number of ſiluered targets, that went and came into Caſsius campe, and were not (as they tooke it) the armors, nor the number of men that they had left there to guard the camp: and yet that they ſaw not ſuch a number of dead bodies, and great ouerthrow, as there ſhould haue bene, if ſo many legions had bene ſlaine. This made Brutus at the firſt miſtruſt that which had hapned. So he appointed a number of men to keepe the campe of his enemy which he had taken, and cauſed his men to be ſent for that yet followed the chaſe, and gathered them together, thinking to lead them to aide Caſsius, who was in this ſtate as you ſhall heare. Firſt of all he was maruellous angry, to ſee how Brutus men ran to giue charge vpon their enemies, and taried not for the word of the battell, nor commandement to giue charge: and it grieued him beſide, that after he had ouercome them, his men fell ſtraight to ſpoile, and were not carefull to compaſſe in the reſt of the enemies behinde. But with tarying two long alſo, more then through the valiantneſſe or foreſight of the Captaines his enemies: Caſsius found him ſelfe compaſſed in with the right wing of his enemies army. Whereuppon his horſemen brake immediatly, and fled for life towardes the ſea. Furthermore, perceiuing his footemen to giue ground, hee did what he could to keepe them from flying, and tooke an enſigne from one of the enſigne bearers that fled, and ſtucke it faſt at his feete: although with much a do he could ſcant keepe his owne guard together. So Caſsius himſelfe was at length compelled to flie, with a few about him, vnto a litle hill, from whence they might eaſily ſee what was done in all the plaine: howbeit Caſsius him ſelfe ſaw nothing, for his ſight was very bad, ſauing that he ſaw (and yet with much a do) how the enemies ſpoiled his campe before his eyes. He ſaw alſo a great troupe of horſmen, whom Brutus ſent to aide him, and thought that they were his enemies that followed him: but yet he ſent Titinnius, one of them that was with him, to go and know what they were. Brutus horſemen ſaw him comming a far off, whom when they knew that he was one of Caſsius chiefeſt frends, they ſhouted out for ioy: and they that were familiarly acquainted with him, lighted from their horſes, and went and embraced him. The reſt compaſſed him in round about a horſebacke, with ſongs of victory and great ruſhing of their harneſſe, ſo that they made all the field ring againe for ioy. But this marred all. For Caſsius thinking in deede that Titinnius was taken of the enemies, he then ſpake theſe words: deſiring too much to liue, I haue liued to ſee one of my beſt friendes taken, for my ſake, before my face. After that, he got into a tent where no body was, and tooke Pyndarus with him, one of his freede bondmen, whom he reſerued euer for ſuch a pinch, ſince the curſed battel of the PARTHIANS, where Craſsus was ſlain, though he notwithſtanding ſcaped from that ouerthrow: but then caſting his cloke ouer his head, and holding out his bare necke vnto Pindarus, he gaue him his head to be ſtriken off. So the head was found ſeuered from the body: but after that time Pindarus was neuer ſeene more. Whereuppon, ſome tooke occaſion to ſay, that he had ſlaine his maiſter without his commandement. By and by they knew the horſemen that came towardes them, and might ſee Titinnius crowned with a garland of triumphe, who came before with great ſpeed vnto Caſsius. But when he perceiued by the cries and teares of his friendes which tormented them ſelues, the miſfortune

that had chaunced to his Captaine Caſsius, by miſtaking: he drew out his ſword, curſing him ſelfe a thouſand times that he had taried ſo long, and ſo ſlue him ſelfe preſently in the fielde. Brutus in the meane time came forward ſtill, and vnderſtoode alſo that Caſsius had bene ouerthrowen: but he knew nothing of his death, till he came very neare to his campe. So when he was come thither, after he had lamented the death of Caſsius, calling him the laſt of all the ROMAINES, being vnpoſſible that ROME ſhould euer breede againe ſo noble and valiant a man as he: he cauſed his body to be buried, and ſent it to the city of THASSOS, fearing leaſt his funerals within the campe ſhould cauſe great diſorder. Then he called his ſouldiers together, & did encorage them againe. And when he ſaw that they had loſt all their cariage, which they could not brooke well: he promiſed euery man of them two thouſand Drachmas in recompence. After his ſouldiers had heard his Oration, they were all of them pretily cheared againe, wondering much at his great liberality, and waited vpon him with great cries when he went his way, praiſing him, for that he onely of the foure Chieftaines, was not ouercome in battell. And to ſpeake the trueth, his deedes ſhewed that he hoped not in vaine to be conquerour. For with few legions, he had ſlaine and driuen all them away, that made head againſt him: and yet if all his people had fought, and that the moſt of them had not out gone their enemies to runne to ſpoile their goods: ſurely it was like enough he had ſlaine them all, and had left neuer a man of them aliue.

There were ſlaine of Brutus ſide, about eight thouſand men, counting the ſouldiers ſlaues, whom Brutus called Brigas: and of the enemies ſide, as Meſſala writeth, there were ſlaine as he ſuppoſeth, more then twiſe as many moe. Wherefore they were more diſcoraged then Brutus, vntill that very late at night, there was one of Caſsius men called Demetrius, who went vnto Antonius, and caried his maiſters clothes, whereof he was ſtripped not long before, and his ſword alſo. This encoraged Brutus enemies, and made them ſo braue, that the next morning betimes they ſtoode in battell ray againe before Brutus. But on Brutus ſide, both his campes ſtoode wauering, and that in great daunger. For his owne campe being full of priſoners, required a good guard to looke vnto them: and Caſsius campe on the other ſide tooke the death of their Captaine very heauily, and beſide, there was ſome vile grudge betweene them that were ouercome, and thoſe that did ouercome. For this cauſe therefore Brutus did ſet them in battell ray, but yet kept him ſelfe from giuing battell. Now for the ſlaues that were priſoners, which were a great number of them, and went and came to and fro amongſt the armed men, not without ſuſpition: he commanded they ſhould kill them. But for the freemen, he ſent them freely home, and ſaid, that they were better priſoners with his enemies, then with him. For with them, they were ſlaues and ſeruaunts: and with him, they were free men, and citizens.

So when he ſaw that diuers Captaines and his friends did ſo cruelly hate ſome, that they would by no meanes ſaue their liues: Brutus him ſelfe hid them, and ſecretly ſent them away. Among theſe priſoners, there was one Volumnius a ieſter, and Sacculio a common player, of whom Brutus made no accompt at all. Howbeit his friends brought them vnto him, and did accuſe them, that though they were priſoners, they did not let to laugh them to ſcorne, and to ieaſt broadly with them. Brutus made no anſwere to it, becauſe his head was occupied otherwaies. Whereupon, Meſſala Coruinus ſayd: that it were good to whippe them on a ſkaffold, and then to ſend them naked, well whipped, vnto the Captaines of their enemies, to ſhewe them their ſhame, to keepe ſuch mates as thoſe in their campe, to play the fooles, to make them ſport. Some that ſtoode by, laughed at his deuiſe. But Publius Caſca, that gaue Iulius Cæſar the firſt wound when he was ſlaine, ſayd then: It doth not become vs to be thus merry at Caſsius funerals: and for thee, Brutus, thou ſhalt ſhew what eſtimation thou madeſt of ſuch a Captaine thy compeere, by putting to death, or ſauing the liues of theſe bloods, who heareafter will mocke him, and defame his memory. Brutus aunſwered againe in choller: why then doe you come to tell me of it, Caſca, and doe not your ſelues what you thinke good? When they heard him ſay ſo, they tooke his aunſwere for a conſent againſt theſe poore vnfortunate men, to ſuffer them to doe what they thought good: and therefore they caried them away, & ſlue them. Afterwardes Brutus performed the promiſe he had made to the ſouldiers, and gaue them the two thouſand Drachmas a peece, but yet he firſt reproued them, becauſe they went and gaue charge vpon the enemies at the firſt battell, before they had the worde of battell giuen them: and made them a new promiſe alſo, that if in the ſecond battell they fought like men, he would giue them the ſacke and ſpoyle of two cities, to wit, THESSALONICA, & LACEDÆMON. In all Brutus life there is but this only fault to be found, and that is not to be gainſaid: though Antonius and Octauius Cæſar did reward their ſouldiers farre worſe for their victory. For when they had driuen all the natural ITALIANS out of ITALY, they gaue their ſouldiers their lands & townes, to the which they had no right: and moreouer, the only marke they ſhot at in all this warre they made, was but to ouercome, and raigne. Wherein contrary manner they had ſo great an opinion of Brutus vertue, that the common voice & opinion of the world would not ſuffer him, neither to ouercome, nor to ſaue himſelf, otherwiſe then iuſtly and honeſtly, and ſpecially after Caſſius death: whom men burdened, that oftentimes he moued Brutus to great crueltie. But now, like as the mariners on the ſea after the rudder of their ſhip is broken by tempeſt, do ſeek to naile on ſome other peece of wood in lieu thereof, & do helpe themſelues to keepe them from hurt, as much as may be vpon that inſtant daunger: euen ſo Brutus, hauing ſuch a great armie to gouerne, and his affaires ſtanding verie tickle, and hauing no other Captaine coequall with him in dignitie & authoritie: he was forced to imploy them he had, and likewiſe to be ruled by them in many things, & was of mind himſelfe alſo to grant them any thing, that he thought might make them ſerue like noble ſouldiers at time of neede. For Caſſius ſouldiers were very euill to be ruled, and did ſhew thēſelues very ſtubborne and luſtie in the campe, becauſe they had no Chieftaine that did cōmand them: but yet ranke cowards to their enemies, becauſe they had once ouercome them. On the other ſide Octauius Cæſar, & Antonius, were not in much better ſtate: for firſt of al, they lacked victuals. And becauſe they were lodged in low places, they looked to abide a harde and ſharpe winter, being camped as they were by the mariſh ſide, and alſo for that after the battell there had fallen plentie of raine about the autumne, where through, all their tents were full of myre and durt, the which by reaſon of the cold did freeze incontinently. But beſide all theſe diſcommodities, there came newes vnto them of the great loſſe they had of their men by ſea. For B*rutus* ſhippes met with a great aide and ſupply of men, which were ſent them out of ITALY, and they ouerthrew them in ſuch ſort, that there ſcaped but few of them: and yet they were ſo famiſhed, that they were compelled to eate the tackle and ſailes of their ſhips. Thereupon they were very deſirous to fight a battell againe, before Brutus ſhould haue intelligence of this good newes for him: for it chanced ſo, that the battell was fought by ſea, on the ſelfe ſame day it was fought by land. But by ill fortune, rather then through the malice or negligence of the Captaines, this victorie came not to Brutus eare, till twenty daies after. For had he knowen of it before, he would not haue bene brought to haue fought a ſecond battell, conſidering that he had excellent good prouiſion for his army for a long time, and beſides, lay in a place of great ſtrength, ſo as his campe could not be greatly hurt by the winter, nor alſo diſtreſſed by his enemies: & further, he had bene a quiet Lord, being a conqueror by ſea, as he was alſo by land. This would haue maruellouſly encoraged him. Howbeit the ſtate of ROME (in my opinion) being now brought to that paſſe, that it could no more abide to be gouerned by many Lords, but required one onely abſolute Gouernor: God, to preuent Brutus that it ſhould not come to his gouernment, kept this victorie from his knowledge, though in deede it came but a litle too late. For the day before the laſt battell was giuen, very late in the night, came Clodius, one of his enemies into his camp, who told that Cæſar hearing of the ouerthrow of his army by ſea, deſired nothing more then to fight a battell before Brutus vnderſtood it. Howbeit they gaue no credite to his words, but deſpiſed him ſo much, that they would not vouchſafe to bring him vnto Brutus, becauſe they thought it was but a lie deuiſed, to be the better welcome for this good newes. The ſelfe ſame night, it is reported that the monſtrous ſpirit which had appeared before vnto Brutus in the citie of SARDIS, did now appeare againe vnto him in the ſelfe ſame ſhape & forme, and ſo vaniſhed away, and ſaid neuer a word. Now Publius Volumnius, a graue and wiſe Philoſopher, that had bene with Brutus from the beginning of this warre, he doth make no mention of this ſpirite, but ſaith: that the greateſt Eagle and enſigne was couered ouer with a ſwarme of bees, and that there was one of the Captaines, whoſe arme ſodainely fell a ſweating, that it dropped oyle of roſes from him, and that they oftentimes went about to drie him, but all would do no good. And that before the battell was fought, there were two Eagles fought betwene both armies, and all the time they fought, there was a maruellous great ſilence all the valley ouer, both the armies being one before the other, marking this fight betwene them: and that in the end, the Eagle towardes Brutus gaue ouer, and flew away. But this is certaine, and a true tale: that when the gate of the campe was open, the firſt man the ſtanderd bearer met that caried the Eagle, was an ÆTHIOPIAN, whom the ſouldiers for ill lucke mangled with their ſwords.

Now after that Brutus had brought his armie into the fielde, and had ſet them in battell ray, directly againſt the voward of his enemie: he pawſed a long time, before he gaue the ſignall of battell. For Brutus riding vp and downe to view the bandes and companies: it came in his head to miſtruſt ſome of them, beſides, that ſome came to tell him ſo much as he thought. Moreouer, he ſaw his horſemen ſet forward but faintly, and did not go luſtily to giue charge: but ſtill ſtaied, to ſee what the footemen would doe. Then ſodainely, one of the chiefeſt Knights he had in all his armie called Camulatius, and that was alway maruellouſly eſteemed of for his valiantneſſe, vntill that time: he came hard by Brutus on horſebacke, and rode before his face to yeeld himſelfe vnto his enemies. Brutus was maruellous ſorie for it, wherefore partly for anger, and partly for feare of greater treaſon and rebellion, he ſodainly cauſed his armie to march, being paſt three of the clocke in the after noone. So in that place where he himſelfe fought in perſon, he had the better: and brake into the left wing of his enemies, which gaue him way, through the helpe of his horſemen that gaue charge with his footemen, when they ſawe the enemies in a maze, and affraid. Howbeit the other alſo on the right wing, when the Captaines would haue had them to haue marched: they were affraid to haue bene compaſſed in behind, becauſe they were fewer in number then their enemies, and therefore did ſpread themſelues, and leaue the middeſt of their battell. Whereby they hauing weakened themſelues, they could not withſtand the force of their enemies, but turned taile ſtraight, and fled.

Brutus valiantneſſe and great ſkill in warres.

And thoſe that had put them to flight, came in ſtraight vpon it to compaſſe Brutus behind, who in the middeſt of the conflict, did all that was poſſible for a ſkilfull Captaine and valiant ſouldier: both for his wiſedom, as alſo for his hardineſſe, for the obtaining of victorie. But that which wanne him the victory at the firſt battell, did now loſe it him at the ſecond. For at the firſt time, the enemies that were broken and fled, were ſtraight cut in peeces: but at the ſecond battell, of Caſsius men that were put to flight, there were fewe ſlaine: and they that ſaued themſelues by ſpeede, being affraid becauſe they had bene ouercome, did diſcourage the reſt of the army when they came to ioyne with them, and filled all the armie with feare and diſorder.

There was the ſonne of M. Cato ſlaine, valiantly fighting amongſt the luſtie youthes. For, notwithſtanding that he was verie wearie, and ouerharried, yet would he not therefore flie, but manfully fighting and laying about him, telling aloud his name, and alſo his fathers name, at length he was beaten downe amongſt many other dead bodies of his enemies, which he had ſlaine rounde about him. So there were ſlaine in the field, all the chiefeſt gentlemen & nobility that were in his armie: who valiantly ranne into any daunger to ſaue Brutus life.

Amongſt them there was one of Brutus friends called Lucilius, who ſeeing a troupe of barbarous men making no reckoning of al men elſe they met in their way, but going all together right againſt Brutus, he determined to ſtay them with the hazard of his life, and being left behind, told them that he was Brutus: and becauſe they ſhould beleeue him, he prayed them to bring him to Antonius, for he ſaid he was affraide of Cæſar, and that he did truſt Antonius better. Theſe barbarous men being very glad of this good happe, and thinking themſelues happie men: they caried him in the night, and ſent ſome before vnto Antonius, to tell him of their comming. He was maruellous glad of it, and went out to meete thẽ that brought him. Others alſo vnderſtãding of it, that they had brought Brutus priſoner: they came out of all parts of the campe to ſee him, ſome pitying his hard fortune, and others ſaying, that it was not done like himſelfe ſo cowardly to be taken aliue of the barbarous people, for feare of death. When they came neere together, Antonius ſtaied a while bethinking himſelfe howe he ſhould vſe Brutus. In the meane time Lucilius was brought to him, who ſtoutly with a bold cõuntenance ſaid. Antonius, I dare aſſure thee, that no enemy hath taken nor ſhall take Marcus Brutus a liue: and I beſeech God keepe him from that fortune. For whereſoeuer he be found, aliue or dead: he will be found like himſelfe. And now for my ſelfe, I am come vnto thee, hauing deceiued theſe men of armes here, bearing them downe that I was Brutus: and do not refuſe to ſuffer any torment thou wilt put me to. Lucilius words made them all amazed that heard him. Antonius on the other ſide, looking vpon all them that had brought him, ſaid vnto them: my cōpanions, I thinke ye are ſorie you haue failed of your purpoſe, and that you thinke this man hath done you great wrong: but I do aſſure you, you haue taken a better bootie, then that you followed. For, in ſtead of an enemy, you haue brought me a friend: and for my part, if you had brought me Brutus aliue, truely I can not tell what I ſhould haue done to him. For, I had rather haue ſuch men my friends, as this man here, then enemies. Then he embraced Lucilius, and at that time deliuered him to one of his friendes in cuſtodie, and Lucilius euer after ſerued him faithfully, euen to his death. Nowe Brutus hauing paſſed a litle riuer, walled in on either ſide with hie rockes, and ſhadowed with great trees, being then darke night, he went no further, but ſtayed at the foote of a rocke with certaine of his Captaines and friends that followed him: and looking vp to the firmament that was full of ſtarres, ſighing, he rehearſed two verſes, of the which Volumnius wrote the one, to this effect,

Let not the wight from whom this miſchiefe went
(O Ioue) eſcape without dew puniſhment.

And ſaith that he had forgotten the other. Within a litle while after, naming his friendes that he had ſeene ſlaine in battell before his eyes, he fetched a greater ſigh then before: ſpecially when he came to name Labio and Flauius, of the which the one was his Lieutenant, and the other Captaine of the pioners of his campe. In the meane time, one of the companie being a thirſt, and ſeeing Brutus a thirſt alſo: he ranne to the riuer for water, and brought it in his ſallet. At the ſelfe ſame time they heard a noiſe on the other ſide of the riuer. Whereupon Volumnius tooke Dardanus, Brutus ſeruant with him, to ſee what it was: and returning ſtraight againe, aſked if there were any water left. Brutus ſmiling, gently tolde them all was drunke, but they ſhall bring you ſome more. Thereupon he ſent him againe that went for water before, who was in great danger of being taken by the enemies, and hardly ſcaped, being ſore hurt. Furthermore, Brutus thought that there was no great number of men ſlaine in battell, and to knowe the truth of it, there was one called Statilius, that promiſed to goe through his enemies (for otherwiſe it was impoſſible to goe ſee their campe) and from thence if all were well, that he would lift vp a torch light in the aire, and then returne againe with ſpeede to him. The torch light was lift vp as he had promiſed, for Statilius went thither. Nowe Brutus ſeeing Statilius tarie long after that, and that he came not againe, he ſaid: if Statilius be aliue, he will come againe. But his euill fortune was ſuch, that as he came backe, he lighted in his enemies hands, and was ſlaine. Now, the night being farre ſpent, Brutus as he ſate bowed towards Clitus one of his men, and told him ſomwhat in his eare, the other anſwered him not, but fell a weeping. Thereupon he proued Dardanus, and ſaid ſomewhat alſo to him: at length he came to Volumnius himſelfe, and ſpeaking to him in Greeke, praied him for the ſtudies ſake which brought them acquainted together, that he would helpe him to put his hand to his ſword, to thruſt it in him to kill him. Volumnius denied his requeſt, and ſo did many others: and amongſt the reſt, one of them ſaid, there was no tarying for them there, but that they muſt needs flie. Then Brutus riſing vp, we muſt flie in deede ſaid he, but it muſt be with our handes not with our feete. Then taking euery man by the hand, he ſaid theſe words vnto them with a cheerefull countenance. It reioyceth my heart that not one of my friends hath failed me at my neede, and I doe not complaine of my fortune, but only for my countries ſake: for, as for me, I thinke my ſelfe happier than they that haue ouercome, conſidering that I leaue a perpetuall fame of our courage and manhoode, the which our enemies the conquerors ſhall neuer attaine vnto by force nor money, neither can let their poſteritie to ſay, that they being naughty and vniuſt men, haue ſlaine good men, to vſurpe tyrannicall power not pertaining to them. Hauing ſaid ſo, he praied euery man to ſhift for themſelues, and then he went a litle aſide with two or three only, among the which Strato was one, with whom he came firſt acquainted by the ſtudie of Rethoricke. He came as neere to him as he could, and taking his ſword by the hilts with both his handes, and falling downe vppon the point of it, ranne himſelfe through. Others ſay, that not he, but Strato (at his requeſt) held the ſword in his hand, and turned his head aſide, and that Brutus fell downe vpon it: and ſo ranne himſelfe through, and dyed preſently. Meſſala, that had beene Brutus great friend, became afterwards Octauius Cæſars friend. So, ſhortly after, Cæſar being at good leaſure, he brought Strato, Brutus friend vnto him, and weeping ſaid: Cæſar, behold, here is he that did the laſt ſeruice to my Brutus. Cæſar welcomed him at that time, and afterwardes he did him as faithfull ſeruice in all his affaires, as any GRECIAN elſe he had about him, vntill the battell of ACTIVM. It is reported alſo, that this Meſſala himſelfe anſwered Cæſar one day, when he gaue him great praiſe before his face, that he had fought valiantly, and with great affection for him, at the battell of ACTIVM: (notwithſtanding that he had bene his cruell enemie before, at the battell of PHILIPPES, for Brutus ſake) I euer loued, ſaide he, to take the beſt and iuſteſt part. Now, Antonius hauing found Brutus bodie, he cauſed it to be wrapped vp in one of the richeſt cote armors he had. Afterwards alſo, Antonius vnderſtanding that this cote-armor was ſtolen, he put the theefe to death that had ſtolen it, and ſent the aſhes of his bodie vnto Seruilia his mother. And for Porcia, Brutus wife: Nicolaus the Philoſopher, and Valerius Maximus doe write, that ſhe determining to kill her ſelfe (her parents and friendes carefully looking to her to keepe her from it) tooke hotte burning coles, and caſt them into her mouth, and kept her mouth ſo cloſe, that ſhe choked her ſelfe. There was a letter of Brutus found written to his friends, complaining of their negligence, that his wife being ſicke, they would not helpe her, but ſuffred her to kill her ſelfe, chooſing to die, rather then to languiſh in paine. Thus it appeareth, that Nicolaus knew not well that time, ſith the letter (at the leaſt if it were Brutus letter) doth plainely declare the diſeaſe and loue of this Ladie, and alſo the manner of her death.

THE COMPARISON OF ## Dion with Brutus.

TO come now to compare theſe two noble perſonages together, it is certaine that both of them hauing had great gifts in them (& ſpecially Dion) of ſmall occaſions they made themſelues great men: & therfore Dion of both deſerueth chiefeſt praiſe. For, he had no cohelper to bring him vnto that greatneſſe, as Brutus had of Caſſius: who doubtleſſe was not comparable vnto Brutus, for vertue and reſpect of honor, though otherwiſe in matters of warre, he was no leſſe wiſe and valiant then he. For many doe impute vnto Caſſius, the firſt beginning and originall of all the warre and enterpriſe: and ſaid it was he that did encourage Brutus, to conſpire Cæſars death. Where Dion furniſhed himſelfe with armor, ſhips and ſouldiers and wanne thoſe friendes and companions alſo that did helpe him, to proſecute his warre. Nor he did not as Brutus, who roſe to greatneſſe by his enterpriſes, and by warre got all his ſtrength and riches. But he in contrarie maner, ſpent of his owne goods to make warre for the libertie of his countrie and disburſed of his owne money, that ſhould haue kept him in his baniſhment. Furthermore, Brutus and Caſſius were compelled of neceſſitie to make warres, becauſe they could not haue liued ſafely in peace, when they were driuen out of ROME: for that they were condemned to death, and purſued by their enemies. And for this cauſe therefore they were driuen to hazard themſelues in warre, more for their owne ſafetie, then for the libertie of their country men. Whereas Dion on the other ſide, liuing more merily and ſafely in his baniſhment, then the tyrant Dionyſius himſelfe that had baniſhed him: did put himſelfe to that danger, to deliuer SICILE from bondage. Now the matter was not a like vnto the ROMAINES, to be deliuered from the gouernement of Cæſar: as it was for the SYRACVSANS, to be rid of Dionyſius tyranny. For Dionyſius denyed not, that he was not a tyrant, hauing filled SICILE with ſuch miſery and calamitie. Howbeit Cæſars power and gouernment when it came to be eſtabliſhed, did in deede much hurt at his firſt entry and beginning vnto thoſe that did reſiſt him: but afterwardes, vnto them that being ouercome had receiued his gouerment, it ſeemed he rather had the name and opinion onely of a tyrant, then otherwiſe that he was ſo in deede. For there neuer followed any tyrannicall nor cruell act, but contrarily, it ſeemed that he was a mercifull Phiſitian, whom God had ordeined of ſpeciall grace to be Gouernor of the Empire of ROME, and to ſet all things againe at quiet ſtay, the which required the counſell & authoritie of an abſolute Prince. And therefore the ROMAINES were maruellous ſorie for Cæſar after he was ſlaine, and afterwards would neuer pardon them that had ſlaine him. On the other ſide, the cauſe why the SYRACVSANS did moſt accuſe Dion, was: becauſe he did let Dionyſius eſcape out of the caſtle of SYRACVSA, and becauſe he did not ouerthrow and deface the tombe of his father. Furthermore, touching the warres: Dion alway ſhewed himſelfe a Captaine vnreproueable, hauing wiſely and ſkilfully taken order for thoſe things, which he had enterpriſed of his owne head and counſell: and did amend the faults others committed, and brought things to better ſtate then he found them. Wher it ſeemeth, that Brutus did not wiſely to receiue the ſecond battell: conſidering his reſt ſtood vpon it. For, after he had loſt the battell, it was vnpoſſible for him euer to riſe againe: and therefore his heart failed him, & ſo gaue vp all, and neuer durſt ſtriue with his euill fortune as Pompey did, conſidering that he had preſent cauſe enough in the field to hope of his ſouldiers, and being beſide a dreadfull Lord all the ſea ouer. Furthermore, the greateſt reproach they could obiect againſt Brutus, was: that Iulius Cæſar hauing ſaued his life, and pardoned all the priſoners alſo taken in battell, as many as he had made requeſt for, taking him for his friend, and honoring him aboue all his other friends: Brutus notwithſtanding had imbrued his hands in his bloud, wherewith they could neuer reproue Dion. For on the contrarie ſide, ſo long as Dion was Dionyſius friend and kinſman, he did alway helpe him to order and gouerne his affaires. But after he was baniſhed his countrie, and that his wife was forcibly married to another man, and his goods alſo taken from him: then he entred into iuſt and open warres againſt Dionyſius the tyrant. But in this point, they were contrarie together. For wherein their chiefeſt praiſe conſiſted, to wit, in hating of tyrants and wicked men: it is moſt true that Brutus deſire was moſt ſincere of both. For hauing no priuate cauſe of complaint or grudge againſt Cæſar, he ventred to kil him, only to ſet his cõtry againe at libertie. Where if Dion had not receiued priuate cauſe of quarrell againſt Dionyſius: he would neuer haue made warre with him. The which Plato proueth in his Epiſtles, where is plainly ſeene: that Dion being driuen out of the tyrants Court againſt his will, and not putting himſelfe to voluntarie baniſhment, he draue out Dionyſius. Furthermore, the reſpect of the cõmon wealth cauſed Brutus, that before was Pompeys enemie, to become his friend, and enemie vnto Cæſar, that before was his friend: onely referring his friendſhip and enmitie, vnto the conſideration of iuſtice and equitie. And Dion did many things for Dionyſius ſake and benefite, all the while he truſted him: and when he began to miſtruſt him, then for anger he made warre with him. Wherfore all his friends did not beleeue, but after he had driuen out Dionyſius, he would ſtabliſh the gouernment of himſelfe, flattering the people with a more courteous and gentle title then the name of a tyrant. But for Brutus, his very enemies themſelues confeſſed, that of all thoſe that conſpired Cæſars death, he onely had no other ende and intent to attempt his enterpriſe, but to reſtore the Empire of ROME againe to her former ſtate and gouernement. And furthermore, it was not all one thing to deale with Dionyſius, as it was to haue to do with Iulius Cæſar. For no man that knew Dionyſius, but would haue deſpiſed him, conſidering that he ſpent the moſt part of his time in drinking, dycing, and in haunting lewd womens companie. But to haue vndertaken to deſtroy Iulius Cæſar, and not to haue ſhrunke backe for feare of his great wiſedome, power, and fortune, conſidering that his name only was dreadfull vnto euery man, and alſo not to ſuffer the kings of PARTHIA and INDIA to be in reſt for him: this could not come but of a maruellous noble mind of him, that for feare neuer fainted, nor let fall any part of his courage. And therefore, ſo ſoone as Dion came into SICILIA, many thouſandes of men came and ioyned with him, againſt Dionyſius. But the fame of Iulius Cæſar did ſet vp his friends againe after his death, and was of ſuch force, that it raiſed a young ſtripling, Octauius Cæſar, (that had no meanes nor power of himſelfe) to be one of the greateſt men of ROME: and they vſed him as a remedie to encounter Antonius malice and power. And if men will ſay, that Dion draue out the tyrant Dionyſius with force of armes, and ſundrie battels: and that in contrarie maner Brutus ſlew Cæſar, being a naked man, and without guard: then do I anſwere againe, that it was a noble part, and of a wiſe Captaine, to chooſe ſo apt a time and place, to come vpon a man of ſo great power, and to find him naked without his guard. For he went not ſodainly in a rage, and alone, or with a ſmall company to aſſaile him: but his enterpriſe was long time before determined of, and that with diuers men, of all the which, not a man of them once failed him: but it is rather to be thought, that from the beginning he choſe them honeſt men, or elſe that by his choiſe of them, he made them good men. Whereas Dion, either from the beginning made no wiſe choiſe in truſting of euill men, or elſe becauſe he could not tell how to vſe them he had choſen: of good men he made them become euill, ſo that neither the one nor the other could be the part of a wiſe man. For Plato himſelfe reproueth him, for that he had choſen ſuch men for his friends, that he was ſlaine by them, and after he was ſlaine, no man would then reuenge his death. And in contrarie maner, of the enemies of Brutus, the one (who was Antonius) gaue his bodie honorable buriall: and Octauius Cæſar the other, reſerued his honors and memories of him. For at Millaine, (a citie of GAVLE on ITALY ſide) there was an image of his in braſſe, very like vnto him: the which Cæſar afterwardes paſſing that way, beheld very aduiſedly, for that it was made by an excellent workman, and was very like him, and ſo went his way. Then he ſtayed ſodainly againe, and called for the Gouernors of the citie, and before them all told them, that the citizens were his enemies, and traitors vnto him, becauſe they kept an enemie of his among them. The Gouernors of the citie at the firſt were aſtonied at it, and ſtoutly denyed it: and none of them knowing what enemie he ment, one of them looked on an other. Octauius Cæſar then turning him vnto Brutus ſtatue, bending his browes, ſaid vnto them: this man you ſee ſtanding vp here, is he not our enemie? Then the Gouernors of the citie were worſe affraid then before, and could not tell what aunſwere to make him. But Cæſar laughing, and commending the GAVLES for their faithfulneſſe to their friends, euen in their aduerſities: he was contented Brutus image ſhould ſtand ſtill as it did.

Brutus image or ſtatue ſtanding in braſſe in Millaine, was preſerued and kept by Octauius Cæſar.

THE LIFE OF Aratus.

CHriſyppus the Philoſopher (my friend Polycrates) being afrayed as it ſeemeth of the euill ſound of an auncient prouerbe not rightly as it was ſpoken, and in vſe, but as he thought it beſt, hee wrote in this manner:

VVhat children do their aunceſtors commend,
But thoſe whom fortune fauors to the end?

But Dionyſodorus TROEZENIAN reprouing him, doth rehearſe the prouerbe rightly as in deede it is?

VVhat children do their aunceſtors commend,
But thoſe whoſe life is vertuous to the end?

Saying, that this prouerbe ſtoppeth their mouthes who of them ſelues are vnworthy of praiſe, and yet are ſtill boaſting of the vertues of their auncesters, whoſe praiſe they highly extoll. But before thoſe that (as Pindarus ſaith,)

Do match their noble aunceſtors in proweſſe of their owne,
And by their fruites commend the ſtocke whence they them ſelues are growne.

(As thy ſelfe that comformeſt thy life vnto the examples and manners of thy vertuous aunceſters:) it is no ſmall good happe for them, often to remember the noble deedes of their parentes in hearing them ſpoken of, or otherwiſe for them ſelues oftentimes to remember ſome notable doings of their parents. For in them, it is not for lacke of commendable vertues, that they report others praiſe and glory: but in ioyning their owne vertues, to the vertues of their aunceſters, they do increaſe their glory, as inheriting their vertuous life, as challenging their diſcent by bloud. Therefore, hauing written the life of Aratus thy countrey man, and one of thy aunceſters, whoſe glory and greatneſſe thou doeſt not blemiſhe, I doe ſend it vnto thee, not that I thinke but that thou haſt more diligently then any man elſe, ſearched out all his deedes and ſayings: But yet, becauſe that thy two ſonnes, Polycrates, and Pythocles, reading, and ſtill hearing ſomething reported, might be brought vp at home by the example of their aunceſters, whoſe deedes ſhall lie before them to follow. For he loueth him ſelfe more, then he regardeth perfect vertue, or his credite: that thinketh him ſelfe ſo perfect, as he neede not follow any others example.

The city of SICYONE, after it fell from her firſt gouernment of the optimacy and nobility, which is proper to the city of the DORIANS: like an inſtrument out of tune, it fell into ciuill warres and ſeditious practiſes, through the Orators of the people: and neuer ceaſed to be plagued with thoſe troubles and miſeries, alway chaunging new tyraunts, vntill that Cleon being ſlaine they choſe Timoclidas and Clinias their Gouernors, two of the nobleſt men and of greateſt authority in all the city. Now when the common wealth beganne to grow to a certaine ſtate of gouernment, Timoclidas died: and Abantidas, the ſonne of Paſeas, pretending to make him ſelfe Lord of the city, he ſlue Clinias, and put to death ſome of his parentes and friendes, draue away others, and ſought alſo to put his ſonne Aratus to death, that was then but ſeuen yeare old. But in this hurly burly and tumult, Aratus flying out of his fathers houſe, among them that ranne away, and wandering vp and downe the city, being ſcared and affrayed, finding no man to helpe him: by good fortune he gotte into a womans houſe, called Soſo, which was Abantidas ſiſter, and wife vnto Periphantus, his father Clinias brother. Shee being of a noble minde, and iudging that the childe Aratus by Gods prouidence fledde vnto her: hidde him in her houſe, and in the night ſecretly ſent him vnto the city of ARGOS. Now after that Aratus had ſcaped, and was ſafe from this danger: from that time there bred in him a vehement malice againſt tyraunts, the which ſtill increaſed in him, as he grewe in yeares. So he was vertuouſly brought vp in the city of ARGOS, with his fathers friends: and perceiuing with him ſelfe that he waxed bigge and ſtrong, he diſpoſed his body to diuerſe exerciſes, and became ſo excellent in them, that he contended in fiue manner of exerciſes, and oftentimes bare the beſt away. And in his images and ſtatues, he appeared in face, full and well liking, as one that fed well, and the maieſty of his countenaunce argueth that he vſed ſuch exerciſe: and ſuch commonly are large eaters. From whence it came, that he did not giue him ſelfe ſo much to pleading, as peraduenture was requiſite for a Gouernor of a common wealth. Howbeit, ſome doe iudge by his Commentaries he wrote, that he had an eloquenter tong then ſeemed vnto ſome: becauſe he wrote them in haſt, hauing other buſineſſe in hand, and euen as things came firſt into his minde. But afterwardes, Dinias and Ariſtotle Logitian, ſlue Abantidas, who did commonly vſe to ſit in the market place, to heare their matters, and to talke with them. And this gaue them good meanes and opportunity to worke their feate they did. After Abantidas death, his father Paſeas poſſeſſed the tyranny: whom Nicocles afterwardes ſlue alſo by treaſon, and made him ſelfe tyrant in his place. It is reported that this Nicocles did liuely reſemble the countenance of Periander, the ſonne of Cypſelus, as Orontes PERSIAN was very like vnto Alcmæon, the ſonne of Amphiaraus: and an other young LACEDÆMONIAN, vnto Hector of TROIA, whom Myrſillus writeth, was troden vnder mens feete, through the ouer great preſſe of people that came to ſee him, when they heard of it. This Nicocles was tyrant foure monethes together, in the which he did wonderfull great hurt to the city, and had almoſt loſt it, the ÆTOLIANS comming on a ſodaine, who were like to haue taken it. Now Aratus was come to the ſtate of a ſtripling, and was greatly eſteemed for the noble houſe he came of, and alſo for the great courage they found in him, which was no ſmall matter: and beſides that, he had a maieſty in his countenaunce, being wiſer then was looked for in a young man of his yeares. Therefore the baniſhed men from the city of SICYONE, repaired vnto him before any other man. Nicocles for his part alſo was not careleſſe of his doings, but had an eye euer to ſee what Aratus intended, although he litle miſtruſted any ſuch bolde enterpriſe, nor ſo daungerous an exploite of him: but did onely coniecture that he did ſtirre vp the kings which had bene his dead fathers friendes. And ſo in deede Aratus tooke that courſe. But when hee ſaw that Antigonus ſtill delayed his promiſes, and did alwaies tract time, and that the hope of aide from king Ptolomy of ÆGYPT was too farre off: at length he determined to vndertake to deſtroy the tyraunt him ſelfe. So hee firſt conſulted with Ariſtomachus and * Ecdelus: of the which the one was baniſhed from SICYONE, and the other an ARCADIAN, from the city of MEGALIPOLIS, a Philoſopher, and a valiaunt man of his handes, and had bene ſcholler to Arceſilaus the Academicke, in the citie of ATHENS. Theſe two men being contented to ioyne with Aratus, he practiſed with other of the baniſhed men alſo: of the which there were ſome that were aſhamed, not to be partakers of his hope and noble attempt, and ſo did alſo ioyne with him. Howbeit the moſt part of them did not onely refuſe to enter into that practiſe, but further, went about to diſſwade Aratus from his enterpriſe, ſaying: that for lacke of knowledge and experience, he vnderſtood not the danger in vndertaking ſuch a matter, altogether ſo vnlikely. Now, as Aratus was thinking in his minde to keepe a certaine place in the territory of Sicyone, from whence they might make warre with the tyraunts: there came a priſoner vnto them out of the city of Argos, that had broken priſon from the tyrant of Sicyone: and was brother vnto Xenocles, one of the baniſhed men. He being brought by the ſame Xenocles vnto Aratus, told that in the place whereby he had ſaued him ſelfe, the ground within was almoſt as high as the toppe of the wall, the which in that part ioyned vnto high ſtony places: and that without the wall the height was not ſo great, but that it was eaſily ſcalable with ladders. When Aratus heard that, he ſent two of his men, Seuthas, and Technon, with Xenocles to view the wall, being determined if it were true, rather to proue ſecretly to execute his pretended enterpriſe, and quickely to put it to a venture: then to beginne a long warre, and to prepare an open army, he being a priuate man, to goe againſt the power of a tyraunt. Xenocles being returned againe to Aratus, after he had meaſured the height of the wall: he reported that the place was not vnſcalable, but yet very hard to come to it vndiſcouered, because of certaine litle curſt curres a gardiner kept hard by the wall, which would neuer leaue barking. Howbeit Aratus would not leaue off his enterpriſe ſo. Now it was not ſtraunge to ſee euery man prepare them ſelues of armor and weapon, becauſe at that time there were great robberies and cruell murthers committed by high wayes, and one would aſſault an other: but for the ladders, Euphranor that was a carpenter and maker of engines, did not ſticke to make them openly, becauſe his common occupation did take away all ſuſpition why they were made. For this carpenter was himſelfe alſo a baniſhed man from Sicyone, as the reſidue were. Furthermore, Aratus friendes hee had in Argos, of thoſe few men they had, did euery man of them lend him tenne men, and armed thirty of his owne men: beſide them, Aratus himſelfe alſo did hire ſome prety number of ſouldiers, by the practiſe of Xenophilus, whom the Captaines of the theeues did furniſhe him. They were giuen to vnderſtand that they ſhould be led to the territory of Sicyone, to take a prey of cattell and coltes of the king: and they were ſent before, ſome one way, ſome an other, with commaundement, all to meete together at the tower of Polygnotus, where they ſhould tary. So he ſent Capheſias alſo before, without any weapons, with foure companions with him: who ſhould come to this gardiners houſe in the night, like ſtrangers and trauellers, to lie in his houſe, and to locke him vp and his dogs, becauſe they had no other deuiſe to get in but that way. But in the meane time, there were certain ſpials of Nicocles the tyrant diſcouered, that walked vp and downe the city (making no countenance of any matter) to ſee what Aratus did. Wherefore, Aratus went out of his houſe early in the morning (as his manner was) and walked to the market place with his friends. Then he went to the ſhew place (or place of exerciſes) and there ſtripped himſelfe, annointed him, and wreſtled, and in the end tooke certaine of the yong gentlemen home with him, that were wont to make mery, and to paſſe the time away with him: and immediatly after, one of his ſeruants was ſeen in the market place, carying of garlands of flowers. An other was ſeene alſo buying of linckes and torches, and an other hiring of theſe common dauncing and ſinging women, which follow feaſtes and banquets with their inſtruments. Nicocles ſpials ſeeing that, were deceiued: for one of them laughing on an other ſayd, that they might eaſily ſee by that, there was nothing more fearfull and timerous then a tyrant: conſidering that Nicocles being Lord of ſo great a city, was afraied of a yong ſtripling, that ſpent all that he could rap and rend to keepe him in his baniſhment, vpon vaine banquets, and feaſts, at noone daies. And thus were the tyrants ſpials finely mocked. Aratus ſelfe departed immediatly after dinner out of Argos, and went vnto his ſouldiers, whom he had appointed before to meete him at the tower of Polygnotus, & led them ſtraight vnto Nemea. There he told them openly his full intent and purpoſe, hauing before made an Oration vnto them to encourage them, and alſo made them maruellous faire promiſes. Then he gaue them for their watch word, Apollo fauorable, and ſo went directly to the city of Sicyone, marching with great ſpeede at the firſt becauſe of the going downe of the Moone, and afterwards ſlackened his pace a litle, ſo that they had Moone light all the way as they came, and the Moone went not downe, vntill they were come to the gardiners houſe that was hard by the wall. So Capheſias, whom he had ſent before vnto the gardiners houſe, came to meete with Aratus, and brought him word that he could not take the dogges, becauſe they ranne away: howbeit that he had made faſt the gardiner in his owne houſe. This diſcouraged the moſt part of all the company, who would needes haue him in any caſe to returne backe againe. But Aratus then began to comfort them, and promiſed that he would lead them backe againe, if it chaunced that the dogges were too buſie with them: and therewithall preſently cauſed the ladder men to goe before, whom Ecdelus and Mnaſitheus led, and he him ſelfe came faire and ſoftly after. The dogges made a fowle barking, and were baying about Ecdelus and his company. This notwithſtanding, they came ſafely to the wall, and did ſet vp their ſcaling ladders. But euen as the firſt men got vp on them, the Captain of the watch that had giuen place to him that ſhould ward in the morning, came by chaunce, and paſſed hard by them, viſiting the ſouldiers with a litle bell, and there was a number of torches, and a great noiſe of men that followed him. They that were vppon the ladders hearing them, ducked downe, and ſtirred not: and thereby the ſouldiers that paſſed by them, could not ſee them. But now the new morning watch came towardes them alſo, which did put them in great daunger to be diſcouered: but yet they once againe ſcaped them and were not diſcouered, becauſe the ſecond watch went beyond them, and ſtayed not. Then Ecdelus and Mnaſitheus immediatly ſcaled the wall, and ſent Technon with all poſſible ſpeed vnto Aratus, to will him to make all the haſt he could to come to them. Now there was no great diſtance betwixt the garden where the dogs were, and the wall, and and a litle tower where they kept a great greyhound to keepe watch: but the greyhound neuer heard their comming, either becauſe he was a cowardly curre of nature, or elſe for that he had bene ouercourſed and wearied the day before. But the gardiners litle curres that bald and barked beneath, had wakened the greyhound with their barking, who at the firſt began to anſwere them with a ſoft girning: but when they came by the tower where he lay, he barked out aloude, that all the place thereabouts rang of his barking. Inſomuch, that the ſkoute which was farther off, called aloude to the hunt that kept the dogge, and asked what he ailed, that he made ſuch a barking, and whether there were any thing ſtirring or not that angered him. The hunt within the tower aunſwered, that it was nothing, but that his dogge was waked, and fell a barking at the lights of the watch that paſſed by, and at the noyſe of the bell. This made Aratus ſouldiers a great deale the bolder: becauſe they thought that the hunt had beene made priuy to their enterpriſe, and that he went about to hide their ſecrete attempt, and hoped alſo that there were many other within the city that would further their enterpriſe. When they came to get vp vpon the wall, it was of a great height, and very daungerous, becauſe the ladders ſhooke, and bowed by reaſon of the waight of the men, vnles they did come vp faire and ſoftly one after another. Furthermore the time did put them in ſome perill, becauſe the cocks began to crow, and the countrey folke that brought things to the market to ſell, beganne to come a pace to the towne out of euery quarter. And therefore Aratus made haſt to get vppe, hauing only forty men aboue with him, and looked for ſome beſides to come vp, which were yet beneath. Then he marched directly towards the tyrants pallace, where his hiered ſouldiers kept watch and ward: and comming ſodainely vpon them, layd hold of euery man of them, & ſlue not one. Then he ſent into the city to his friends, to will them to come vnto him. Thereuppon they ranne out of euery corner to Aratus. Now the day began to breake, and ſtraight the Theater was full of people that gathered together, becauſe of the noyſe and ſturre they heard in the city, not knowing what the matter ment: vntill at length an Heraulde proclaymed with open voice, that it was Aratus the ſonne of Clinias, who called his country men and Citizens to the recouery of their liberty. Then they perſwading them ſelues, that the thing which they long wiſhed and looked for, was now come to paſſe: they ranne all in a troupe together to the tyrants houſe, and ſet it a fire. But the flame roſe ſo high and great after the fire had taken it in euery part, that it was ſeene to the city of CORINTHE: inſomuch that the CORINTHIANS wondring what the matter ſhould be, were in minde to haue gone to helpe it. Now for Nicocles, he ſaued him ſelfe, and got out of the city by ſecret vaultes he had made

vnder the ground. The ſouldiers on the other ſide quenching the fire with the helpe of the Citizens, did ſacke all they found in the tyrants pallace. The which Aratus hindered not, but did moreouer make all the reſt of the tyrants goods common amongeſt them. So his enterpriſe had ſo good ſucceſſe, that there was none of his owne company ſlaine he brought with him, neither any of their enemies that were within the city, fortune kept this exploite ſo pure and cleane from any bloudſhed. Then Aratus reſtored foure ſcore men vnto their lands and goods againe, whom the tyraunt Nicocles had baniſhed: and others alſo, that had beene baniſhed by former tyrants, to the number of fiue hundred men, who had bene well neare fifty yeres ſpace baniſhed out of their countrey. Now the moſt of them being come home poore and needy, would haue entred on their goods and lands they enioyed before: and ſo, entring againe vpon their lands in their countrey, and their houſes in the city, they amazed Aratus withall, ſeeing Antigonus on the one ſide practiſe all the meanes he could to winne Sicyone being now free, and they all in an vprore and mutiny in the city. Therefore, following the beſt counſell he could thinke vppon and deuiſe, conſidering the daunger of the preſent time: he ioyned the city in league and friendſhippe with the Achaians, and of them all, made but one body. And becauſe the Citizens of Sicyone were Dorians, they were glad to ſubmit themſelues to be gouerned and protected by the name of the Achaians, who were at that time of no great fame nor power. For they dwelt in litle villages, and had no great bounds of lands, neither were they very ſpeciall good, for that they ſtoode vpon the ſea ſide, where was no manner of hauen nor port, but ſtones and rockes good ſtore: and the ſea beating vppon them, did eate into the maine land. This notwithſtanding, they made their enemies know, that the power of Greece when it was vnited and gouerned by good policy was of great force, and almoſt inuincible. For the Achaians being in compariſon of the ancient force of Greece, of no regard, and but a part of one city enfeebled with ciuill and forraine warre: So long as they could ſubmit them ſelues to be ruled by the wiſdome and vertue of their Captaine, and not enuy and malice his proſperity and ſoueraintry: they did not onely maintaine them ſelues as free men, in the middeſt of the ſeruitude of ſo many great cities, large and mighty, but did alſo deliuer many other people of Greece from their tyrants. Now, for Aratus maners: he was one that in nature loued ciuill gouernment, and equality among Citizens in one ſelfe city: he was nobly minded, and more painefull about the affaires of the common weale, then carefull of his owne buſines, and hated tyrants to the death, and imployed his good or euill will wholy for the ſeruice of the common wealth. And therefore he ſeemed not to be ſo ſound a friend, as he was a gentle and mercifull enemy: framing him ſelfe in either of both, as time ſerued for the common wealth. To be ſhort, it was a generall and common voyce among all the cities confederates, in priuate company, and at open meetings in the Theaters: that Aratus loued nothing but vertue, and honeſty. That in open warres he was not ſo valiant and couragious, as he was crafty and ſubtill, to take a city on the ſodaine. Furthermore, though he was valiant to attempt many great things, the which men thought he would neuer haue brought to paſſe: yet it ſeemeth he left many things poſſible vndone, the which hee might eaſily haue done, for that he durſt not venter on them. For as there be beaſtes whoſe ſight is perfecteſt by night, and by day they can ſee nothing, becauſe the ſubtilty of the humor & moyſture in their eyes is dried vp, and can not abide the bright light of the day: euen ſo, men that otherwiſe by nature are very wiſe, are eaſily afrayed of danger, when they muſt venter on it at noone dayes, where contrarily they are bold in ſecrete enterpriſes, ſodainely to attempt any thing. Now, this contrariety and difference in men well brought vp, groweth through ignoraunce and lacke of instruction of Philoſophy, which of it ſelfe doth noriſh vertue, as frute that ſpringeth vp without planting, or helpe of mans hand. But this is beſt diſcerned by examples. So Aratus hauing ioyned himſelfe and his city Sicyone vnto the Achaians, and ſeruing in perſon as a man of arms amōg the reſt: he was maruellouſly beloued of his generals, that ſaw him ſo obedient. For, notwithſtanding that he had made ſo large a contribution as the eſtimation of him ſelfe, and the force of his city vnto the common wealth of the Achaians: yet he was as ready to obey and execute the commandements of the generals, as the pooreſt and meaneſt ſouldier, were he of Dyma, or of Trita, or of any other ſmall village whatſoeuer. more, a great ſumme of money being ſent him from king Ptolomy for a gift, amounting to twenty and fiue talents, he tooke it, but forthwith diſpoſed it amongeſt his poore countrey men, both to releeue their want, as alſo to redeeme priſoners. This notwithſtanding the baniſhed men ſtill vexed and troubled them that had their goods and landes, to haue them out of their hands, and otherwiſe would be ſatisfied by no means. Their common wealth therefore being in great danger to fall into ciuill warre, Aratus perceiuing there was no other way to helpe this miſchiefe, but by Ptolomies liberality: he determined to goe vnto him, to pray him to helpe him with money, to pacifie this grudge and tumult. So he imbarked at the hauen of METHONA, aboue the foreland of MALEA, to ſaile from thence into ÆGYPT: howbeit he had ſuch a contrary winde, and the ſea roſe ſo high, that the maiſter of the ſhippe was driuen to let her go whither ſhe would to take ſea roome. So being driuen quite from his direct courſe, with great danger he got to the city of ADRIA, which was his enemy: becauſe Antigonus kept it, and had a garriſon in it. But Aratus did wiſely preuent it, going a ſhoare, and wandred farre from the ſea, with one of his friends called Timanthes, and got into a wod, whereby they had an euill nights reſt. He had not gone farre after he had left his ſhippe, but the Captaine of the garriſon came, and ſought for him. Notwithſtanding, his ſeruaunts had mocked him finely, (being before inſtructed by Aratus what anſwere they ſhould make) ſaying that he was gone, and fled into the Ile of EVBOEA. Howbeit, the Captaine of the garriſon ſtayed the ſhippe, his men, and all things els ſhe had in her, and tooke her for a good priſe. Within few dayes after, Aratus being maruellouſly troubled, and at a ſtraight with him ſelfe what he ſhould doe: there happily arriued a ROMAINE ſhippe hard by the place where he kept moſt, partly to hide himſelfe, and partly alſo to ſee if he could diſcouer any thing. This ſhippe was bound for SYRIA. So he had dealt with the maiſter of the ſhip in that ſort, that he tooke him abourd, and promiſed he would deliuer him in CARIA, and ſo he did. But he was in as much daunger, this ſecond iourney againe by ſea, as he was in the firſt he made towards ÆGYPT. From CARIA, a long time after, Aratus went into ÆGYPT, and ſpake with the king, who made very much of him: for Aratus fed him ſtill by ſending of him paſſing faire tables, and pictures of GREECE, of excellent workemanſhip. And in deede hauing a ſingular good wit, he alwayes got together, and bought the excellenteſt painted pictures he could get, but ſpecially the pictures of Pamphilus and Melanthus, to ſend them vnto the king. For learning floriſhed yet in the city of SICYONE, and they eſteemed the painting of tables in that city, to be the perfecteſt for true colours, and fine drawing, of all other places. Inſomuch as Apelles, (though he was then of a maruellous fame for painting) went thither, and gaue to theſe two excellent painters a talent, to remaine a while in their company: not ſo much to attaine to the perfection of the art, as thereby to winne him ſelfe fame. And therefore when Aratus had reſtored his city againe to liberty, he cauſed all the images of the tyraunts to be defaced and plucked downe: howbeit hee ſtood doubtfull a long time, whether he ſhould deface Ariſtratus picture or not, who raigned in the time of Philip. For it was painted with the hands of all the ſchollers of Melanthus, being by a triumphant chariot, that caried a victory, and as Polemon the Geographer writeth, Apelles hand was to it. This picture was a paſſing peece of worke to ſee to, ſo that Aratus at the firſt yeelded, and was contented to ſaue it for the excellency of the workemanſhip: yet in the end, ouercome with the extreame hate he bare vnto tyrants, he bad it ſhould be defaced. Now it is reported alſo, that Nealces the painter being one of Aratus friends, prayed him with the teares in his eyes to pardon ſuch a notable peece of worke. But when he ſaw Aratus ſo hard hearted that he would not graunt it: he told him it was good reaſon to make war with tyrants, but not with their pictures. Let vs then (quoth he) leaue the chariot of triumphe and victory, and I will make thee ſee Ariſtratus, willingly to come out of the table. Aratus was contented to let him haue his will. Then Nealces defaced the picture of Ariſtratus, and in place thereof drew onely a palme tree, and durſt adde nothing elſe to it of his owne deuiſe. Some ſay, that vnder the chariot were conueied Ariſtratus feete defaced. So Aratus by meanes of theſe tables and pictures, was maruellouſly well beloued of king Ptolomy. But after that he was acquainted with him, and knew his conuerſation: he loued him then better then before. Inſomuch that he gaue him a hundred and fifty talents to helpe his city withall: of the which, hee caried forty away away with him vnto Peloponnesvs, and the king afterwards ſent him the reſt at ſundrie times. Now this was a maruellous matter of him to get ſuch a maſſe of money together for his Citizens: conſidering that the Orators, Captaines and Gouernors of free cities, for a litle ſumme of money onely which they haue taken of kings and princes, haue bene corrupted and betrayed their townes and coũtry. But this was a more wonder, that by meanes of this money, he made peace and loue betwixt the poore and rich, and furthermore, ſaued vpright all the people of Sicyone, where he ſhewed himſelfe maruellous wiſe and temperate, being of that great power and authoritie he was. For after they had choſen him Arbitrator to iudge compounde, and abſolutely to decide all quarrels and ſtriſe betwene the baniſhed men: he would neuer vndertake it himſelfe alone, but tooke fifteene other of the chiefeſt Citizens with him, and with them, with great paines and trouble, at length he pacified all matters among his Citizens, and made them good friends one with another. Therefore, not onely all the inhabitants and Citizens of Sicyone together, did not onely decree publike honors meete for him: but alſo the baniſhed men themſelues did priuately caſt his image in braſſe, and ſet it vp, vnder the which they cauſed this inſcription to be grauen.

Aratus hauing done all theſe things, he ſuppreſſed the enuie of the Citizens, through the great good turnes he had done vnto them. But then king Antigonus being angry with Aratus in his mind, and ſeeking either to make him his friend, or to bring him to be miſtruſted of Ptolomy: he did him many other great curteſies, Aratus neuer ſeeking them at his hands. But one day ſpecially aboue the reſt, as he did ſacrifice vnto the gods at Corinth, he ſent Aratus part of his weathers he had ſacrificed, vnto Sicyone. And at the feaſt of his ſacrifice in the hearing of many noble men that were bidden gueſts, he ſaid openly of Aratus: I did alway thinke that this young Sicyonian could not but haue a liberall mind, louing the liberty of his contrie and countrimen: but I perceiue now he is a man that can iudge of Princes manners and affaires. For heretofore he made no account of vs, becauſe his hope was out of his countrie, and he greatly eſteemed the riches of Ægypt, hearing talke of ſo many Elephants, of ſuch a great fleete of ſhippes, and of ſuch a ſumptuous Court, as king Ptolomyes Court. But now that he knoweth by experience, that it is onely but a ſmoke and vaine pompe, he is come to vs: & for my part, he is welcome to me, and I wil haue you al to take him for my frend. Theſe words of king Antigonus, were ſtraight taken at bound of certaine enuious men, and carried for lacke of better matter vnto king Ptolomy, euery man ſtriuing who ſhould write all the euill they could againſt him: So that Ptolomy thereuppon ſent a Meſſenger of purpoſe vnto him, to reproue him for it. Thus fell there out much enuy and malice, betweene the earneſt loue of theſe Princes and kings, that contended with each other who ſhould haue Aratus. Furthermore, the firſt time that Aratus was choſen Lieutenant generall of the tribe of the Achaians, hee forraged and ſpoiled the country of Locride, which lieth directly ouer againſt Achaia, & Calydonia alſo. Howbeit he came not time enough to aide the Boeotians, in the battell which they loſt before the city of Chæronea, againſt the Ætolians: where Abæocritus, Gouernor of Boeotia was ſlain in the field, with a thouſãd other Boeotians. Howbeit the next yeare following, he being the ſecond time choſen Lieutenant generall, he attempted to winne the caſtell of Corinth againe, being an enterpriſe which not onely concerned the priuat benefite of Sicyone it ſelfe, and the tribe of the Achaians, but alſo of all Greece beſides. For, he was fully bent to driue the garriſon of the Macedonians thence, the which ſeemed euen a very yoke that held al the Grecians noſes to the grindſtone. wrote to the ATHENIANS that had wonne a victory halfe ſiſter to the victory of Marathon. Euen ſo me thinkes it were no diſgrace to ſay, that this execution was like (as one brother to another) to the killing of the tirants, which was done by Pelopidas THEBAN, and Thraſybulus ATHENIAN, ſauing that this laſt acte was more famous, becauſe it was not againſt GRECIANS, but againſt ſtrangers and forren power and gouernment, vpon whom it was executed. For the Iſthmus or barre of PELOPONNESVS, which ſeparateth the ſea Ægeum from the ſea Ionium, doth come and ioine the firme land of the reſt of GRECE, with the PRESCHE an Iland of PELOPONNESVS. Euen ſo likewiſe the mountaine called Acrocorinth, on the which the caſtle ſtandeth, riſing vp in the middeſt of GRECE, when there is any garriſon of men of warre in it, it cutteth off all traffike and paſſage by, of any armies of them which inhabit within the ſtraight: for them that are without the ſtraight, both by ſea and by lande, and maketh him onely Lord of the countrie that keepeth the caſtle. So that it was not for ſporte, but for truth, and in good earneſt, that Philip the young king of MACEDON was wont to call the citie and caſtle of CORINTH the ſtockes and gyues of GRECE. And therefore was this caſtle maruellouſly wiſhed and deſired of euerie man, but ſpecially of Kings and Princes. But the deſire Antigonus had of it was ſo vehement, that it differed nothing from the paſſions of a franticke louer. For he did nothing elſe continually but ſtudy and deuiſe how he might winne it vpon the ſodaine, from them that kept it: becauſe otherwiſe by open force, it was impoſſible to be had. Wherefore after the death of Alexander that kept that caſtle, being poyſoned (as it is reported) by Antigonus practiſe, the caſtle being left in the handes of his wife Nicæa, who gouerned the ſtate of CORINTHE, and did carefully cauſe the Acrocorinthe to be kept: he immediatly ſent his ſonne Demetrius thither, and put Nicæa in good hope to marry her with this young Prince: a thing that pleaſed this Ladie well, though ſhe was verie olde. So, for her ſelfe ſhe was wonne ſtraight, by meanes of his young ſonne Demetrius, whom he vſed as a ſtale to intrappe her. Howbeit Nicæa for all this goodly offer, forſooke not her caſtle, but alwaies made it ſtraightly to be looked vnto. Antigonus ſeemed to make no account of it, but daily gaue himſelfe to make ſumptuous ſacrifices, feaſtes, and playes to the gods, within the citie of CORINTHE for the mariage: as though he had ment no other thing, but banqueting and iolitie all that might be. When the houre was come to ſee theſe ſportes, and that the Muſitian Amœbeus began to ſing: he himſelfe made as though he would accompanie Nicæa vnto the Theater, being conueyed thither in a ſumptuous rich litter, as it had bene for a Queene. She was very glad of this honor, and thought nothing leſſe then of that which happened her. But when Antigonus came to the end of a ſtreete that turned to goe vp the hill towardes the caſtle, he bad her keepe on ſtill to the Theater: and himſelfe in the meane time left Amœbeus there with his ſinging, and all the feaſt of the mariage, and went ſtraight vp to the caſtle, forcing himſelfe aboue his ſtrength and yeares. When he was at the toppe of the hill, and found the gates ſhut, he knocked with his ſtaffe, and commaunded the garriſon to open him the gates. They wondring to ſee him there in perſon, did let him in. When he was gotten into the caſtell, he was ſo exceeding ioyfull of it, that he had no reaſon to moderate his ioy, but would banquet in the middeſt of ſtreetes, and in the market place, hauing minſtrels to play vppon their inſtruments at his table, wearing garlandes of flowers on their heads for ioy, and did ſo fondly and lightly behaue him ſelfe, as if he had beene a light young man, (and not as he was) an old man: who had proued ſuch ſundry chaunges of fortune, and yet ſuffered him ſelfe to be thus caried away with pleaſure, that he embraced, and ſpake to euery man he met. Whereby it is eaſy to iudge, that ioy poſſeſſing a man without wit or diſcretion, it maketh him beſides him ſelfe, and doth more trouble his wits, then paine or feare. Now Antigonus hauing wonne the caſtell of the Acrocorinthe, as you haue heard, he put it into the handes of thoſe he truſted beſt, to be ſafely kept: and therefore made Perſæus the Philoſopher Captaine of the caſtell. But in deede Aratus was in minde to haue attempted the taking of the caſtell, in Alexanders life time: yet he let it alone, becauſe he ioyned him ſelfe with the ACHAIANS. But at that time there was offered him an other occaſion againe to attempt it, and this it was. At CORINTHE, there were foure brethren borne in SYRIA, of the which, one of them being called Diocles, was a ſouldier of the garriſon of the caſtell: and the reſt, hauing robbed the kings treaſure, ſure, went ſtraight vnto Sicyone, to Aegias the banker, whom Aratus imployed in his facultie. Theſe three brethren immediatly ſold him part of the gold they had robbed: and afterwards, one of them called Erginus, comming often to ſee him, by litle and litle ſold him all the reſt. By this meanes Aegias fell into familiar acquaintance with him, and talked with him of the garriſon of the caſtle of the Acrocorinthe. Erginus told him, that going vnto his brother vp thoſe ſteepe and high rockes, he found a path as it were cut out of the rocke, that went to a place of the wall of the caſtle, which was verie lowe. Eegias hearing that, aunſwerd him ſmyling: alas, my friend, what meane you to ſteale a litle peece of gold to hinder the king, when in one houres ſpace you can ſell ſuch a great maſſe of money together? For as well ſhall you dye if you be apprehended for this felonie, as if you were otherwiſe attainted for treaſon. Erginus with that fell a laughing, and promiſed that he would feele his brother Diocles minde in it, for he did not greatly truſt his other bretheren. So, returning ſhortly after, he bargayned with Aratus to bring him to a place of the wall that was not aboue fifteene foote high, promiſing that he would helpe him to execute the reſt, with his brother Diocles. Aratus promiſed then to giue him fifty talentes, if he brought his enterpriſe to paſſe: and if he fayled, that he would then giue either of them, a houſe & a talent. Erginus would haue the whole 50 talents put into Aegias the bankers hands. Aratus had not ſo much readie money, and beſides, he would not take it vp at vſury, for feare of giuing cauſe to ſuſpect his enterpriſe. Wherefore he tooke all his plate of gold and ſiluer, and his wiues iewels, and layde them to gage to AEgias, to disburſe the ſaid ſumme. But Aratus had ſo great and noble a mind in him, and was ſo bent to doe notable actes: that knowing how Phocion and Epaminondas had bene eſteemed for the iuſteſt and honeſteſt men of Grece, becauſe they had refuſed great giftes that were offered them, and would neuer ſell nor ſtaine their honor for money: he yet ſurpaſſing them, was contented to ſpend his owne, to bring any good enterpriſe to paſſe, and did put his life in danger for the common benefite of his country men, they themſelues knowing nothing of his enterpriſe, which turned all to their benefite. What is he then, that will not wonder at the great magnanimitie and courage of ſuch a man, and that will not euen now as it were, be willing to aide him: conſidering how dearely he bought ſo great a daunger of his perſon, and howe he laide his plate and all the riches he had to gage, to be brought in the night among the middeſt of his enemies, where he was to fight for his owne life, hauing no other gage nor pledge, but the hope of ſuch a noble enterpriſe, and nothing elſe? But now, though the enterpriſe of it ſelfe was daungerous, an error chauncing through ignorance at the firſt, made it yet more daungerous. For Aratus had ſent Technon, one of his men before with Diocles, to view the wall. This Technon had neuer ſpoken with Diocles, howbeit he thought in his mind what manner of man he was, by the markes that Erginus had giuen him of him: that he had a blacke curled haire, that his face was blacke, and that he had no beard. Nowe Technon being come to the place where Erginus ſayd he would be with Diocles: he ſtayed before the towne in a place called Ornis. So whileſt he was tarying there, the elder brother of Diocles, called Dionyſius (who knew nothing of the enterpriſe, nor was made acquainted withall, and looked very like his brother Diocles) came that way by chaunce. Technon being moued by the markes he ſaw in him, like vnto thoſe he was told of: asked him if he were nothing a kinne vnto Erginus. The other anſwered, he was his brother. Then Technon perſwading him ſelfe it was certainly Diocles that ſpake to him, without asking him his name, or making other inquirie of him: he tooke him by the hand, and began to talke with him of the practiſe he had with Erginus, and to aske him of it. Dionyſius taking the matter vpon him, & feeding on his error, returned forthwith into the city, holding him on ſtill with talke, Technon miſtruſting nothing. But euen as Dionyſius was ready to take him faſt by the choller: his brother Erginus came. Who, perceyuing how Technon had miſtaken the matter, and the daunger he was in: beckned to him with his head to flie, and ſo they both ranne for life vnto Aratus, to ſaue them ſelues. Howbeit Aratus was nothing the more diſcoraged for this, but ſent Erginus ſtraight to cary his brother Dionyſius money, and to pray him not to be acknowen of anie thing: who furthermore brought him with him vnto Aratus. But after they had him once, they made him ſure for ſtarting: for the bound him, and locked him vp faſt in a chamber, whileſt they went about their enter-

By this meanes Aegias fell into familiar acquaintance with him, and talked with him of the garriſon of the caſtle of the Acrocorinthe. Erginus told him, that going vnto his brother vp thoſe ſteepe and high rockes, he found a path as it were cut out of the rocke, that went to a place of the wall of the caſtle, which was verie lowe. Eegias hearing that, aunſwerd him ſmyling: alas, my friend, what meane you to ſteale a litle peece of gold to hinder the king, when in one houres ſpace you can ſell ſuch a great maſſe of money together? For as well ſhall you dye if you be apprehended for this felonie, as if you were otherwiſe attainted for treaſon. Erginus with that fell a laughing, and promiſed that he would feele his brother Diocles minde in it, for he did not greatly truſt his other bretheren. So, returning ſhortly after, he bargayned with Aratus to bring him to a place of the wall that was not aboue fifteene foote high, promiſing that he would helpe him to execute the reſt, with his brother Diocles. Aratus promiſed then to giue him fifty talentes, if he brought his enterpriſe to paſſe: and if he fayled, that he would then giue either of them, a houſe & a talent. Erginus would haue the whole 50 talents put into Aegias the bankers hands. Aratus had not ſo much readie money, and beſides, he would not take it vp at vſury, for feare of giuing cauſe to ſuſpect his enterpriſe. Wherefore he tooke all his plate of gold and ſiluer, and his wiues iewels, and layde them to gage to AEgias, to disburſe the ſaid ſumme. But Aratus had ſo great and noble a mind in him, and was ſo bent to doe notable actes: that knowing how Phocion and Epaminondas had bene eſteemed for the iuſteſt and honeſteſt men of Grece, becauſe they had refuſed great giftes that were offered them, and would neuer ſell nor ſtaine their honor for money: he yet ſurpaſſing them, was contented to ſpend his owne, to bring any good enterpriſe to paſſe, and did put his life in danger for the common benefite of his country men, they themſelues knowing nothing of his enterpriſe, which turned all to their benefite. What is he then, that will not wonder at the great magnanimitie and courage of ſuch a man, and that will not euen now as it were, be willing to aide him: conſidering how dearely he bought ſo great a daunger of his perſon, and howe he laide his plate and all the riches he had to gage, to be brought in the night among the middeſt of his enemies, where he was to fight for his owne life, hauing no other gage nor pledge, but the hope of ſuch a noble enterpriſe, and nothing elſe? But now, though the enterpriſe of it ſelfe was daungerous, an error chauncing through ignorance at the firſt, made it yet more daungerous. For Aratus had ſent Technon, one of his men before with Diocles, to view the wall. This Technon had neuer ſpoken with Diocles, howbeit he thought in his mind what manner of man he was, by the markes that Erginus had giuen him of him: that he had a blacke curled haire, that his face was blacke, and that he had no beard. Nowe Technon being come to the place where Erginus ſayd he would be with Diocles: he ſtayed before the towne in a place called Ornis. So whileſt he was tarying there, the elder brother of Diocles, called Dionyſius (who knew nothing of the enterpriſe, nor was made acquainted withall, and looked very like his brother Diocles) came that way by chaunce. Technon being moued by the markes he ſaw in him, like vnto thoſe he was told of: asked him if he were nothing a kinne vnto Erginus. The other anſwered, he was his brother. Then Technon perſwading him ſelfe it was certainly Diocles that ſpake to him, without asking him his name, or making other inquirie of him: he tooke him by the hand, and began to talke with him of the practiſe he had with Erginus, and to aske him of it. Dionyſius taking the matter vpon him, & feeding on his error, returned forthwith into the city, holding him on ſtill with talke, Technon miſtruſting nothing. But euen as Dionyſius was ready to take him faſt by the choller: his brother Erginus came. Who, perceyuing how Technon had miſtaken the matter, and the daunger he was in: beckned to him with his head to flie, and ſo they both ranne for life vnto Aratus, to ſaue them ſelues. Howbeit Aratus was nothing the more diſcoraged for this, but ſent Erginus ſtraight to cary his brother Dionyſius money, and to pray him not to be acknowen of anie thing: who furthermore brought him with him vnto Aratus. But after they had him once, they made him ſure for ſtarting: for the bound him, and locked him vp faſt in a chamber, whileſt they went about their enter-priſe. So when all things were readie, Aratus commanded the reſt of his army that they ſhould tarie behind, armed all night: and he himſelfe with foure hundreth of the beſt men he had (not knowing themſelues whither they went, nor to what intent) went ſtraight to the gates of the citie, paſſing by the temple of Iuno. This was about the middeſt of ſummer, when the Moone was at the full, and the element verie cleare without cloudes: inſomuch that they were afraid their armors would gliſter by moonelight, and bewray them. But as the formoſt of them came neare vnto the citie, there roſe cloudes out of the ſea that darkened all the citie and places thereabouts, and ſhadowed them. Then all of them ſitting downe on the ground, plucked off their ſhooes, both becauſe they ſhould make leſſe noiſe, as alſo for that their footing ſhould be ſurer, and that they ſhould ſlippe leſſe vpon the ladders. But Erginus, and ſeuen other companions with him like men that trauell, came ſecretly into the gate of the citie, and ſlewe the porter and warders there. At that verie inſtant, Aratus cauſed the ladders to be ſet vp againſt the walles, and made an hundreth of his ſouldiers get vp on them: and ſent alſo to command the reſt, that they ſhould follow him with all poſſible ſpeede. Then drawing vp his ladders after him, as faſt as he could, he went through the citie with his hundreh men toward the caſtle, with ſuch a ioyfull cheere, as if he had had it alreadie in his hand, for that he ſawe he was not diſcouered. But as he went on, he ſaw foure of the watch comming with a light againſt them. They ſaw not Aratus and his company, but the enemies ſaw them plainly a far off. Aratus and his men therefore ſtood vp cloſe againſt old wals to tarrie their comming, and at the firſt onſet, ſlew three of them: but the fourth hauing a blow on his head with a ſworde, ranne away, making an outcry, that the enemies were in the citie. The trumpets forthwith ſounded the alarme, all the citie was in an vprore, the ſtreetes were ſtraight full of people running vp and downe, and of lights in euery corner, both beneath in the citie, as alſo in the caſtle, and the noyſe was great euery where. Aratus in the meane time forced to get vp the hie rockes faire & ſoftly at the firſt, and with great paine and difficulty, being out of his path he ſhould haue found, which he miſſed, being very deepe into the rockes, and with many crookes & crankes went to the foote of the caſtle: but ſodainely, euen as it had bene by miracle, the Moone appearing through the cloudes, when they were in their worſt way, it gaue thē light, & brought them to that part of the wall where they ſhould be, and ſtraight the Moone was ſhadowed againe. Now the three hundred ſouldiers whom Aratus had left at the gate by the temple of Iuno, when they were come into the citie, being full of lightes, and in vprore, and beſides could not find the path by the which their Captaine Aratus went before them: they ſtood cloſe together vnder a rocke that ſhadowed them, ſorowfully looking to heare ſome news of Aratus: who was then fighting with the garriſon of the caſtle, the which made head againſt him with all the force and power they could. Vnder the caſtle there was a great noyſe heard of men that fought, but yet the noyſe was ſo confuſed by the ſound rebounding againſt the rockes and mountaine, that they could not deuiſe whence it ſhould come. So they being in this perplexitie, not knowing which way to turne them ſelues: Archelaus, Captaine of king Antigonus men, hauing a good number of ſouldiers with him, went vp the hil with great cries and noiſe of trumpets to ſet vppon Aratus, and his company behinde. But after he was paſſed by theſe three hundred ſouldiers of Aratus band, they gaue charge vpon him, as if they had bene layed there in ambuſh of purpoſe, and ſlue the firſt they encountred withall, and made the others ſo affrayed, and Archelaus him ſelfe, that they diſperſed them, and made ſome flie one waie, ſome an other way. So, as they were ouerthrowen, Erginus came to theſe three hundred men, comming immediatly from them that fought, and brought them newes that Aratus and them of the caſtell, were come to the ſword together, and valiantly defended themſelues, luſtely fighting for the wall, and therefore it was time for them to helpe him quickely. Then the ſouldiers bad him bring them thither ſtraight, and ſo he did. So they climing vp the hill, did ſignifie by their cries to their men, that they came to ayde him. Furthermore, the Moone being then at the full, and ſhining on their harneſſe, made their enemies in the caſtell thinke that they were a greater number then in deede they were, becauſe of the long way they had to make to gette vppe vppon the rockes: and alſo becauſe of the ſound in the night, that made their cry ſeeme to be of a greater number then they were. they ioyning with Aratus, they fought it out ſo luſtely, that they draue the garriſon out of the walles, and by breake of day wanne the caſtle. So that their exployte was diſcouered by the riſing of the Sunne, and beſides, all the reſt of their armye that came from the citie of SICYONE: whom the CORINTHIANS verie gladly receiued, and did ſet open their gates vnto them, and ayded them to take King Antigonus men. Afterwardes, when they thought that all was ſafe, then Aratus came from the caſtle vnto the Theater of the citie, whither repaired an infinite number of people, aſwell for the deſire they had to ſee him, as alſo to heare him ſpeake vnto the CORINTHIANS. So, hauing placed the ACHAIANS of either ſide, at the comming into the Theater: Aratus being armed, went vp into the chaire or pulpit for orations, hauing his face quite chaunged, both for the great paines he had taken, and alſo for lacke of ſleepe: ſo that his bodie being ouerwearied, his ſpirits were euen done. Now when all the aſſemblie of the people (ſeeing him in the chayer) did humble themſelues to ſhew him all the honor and kindneſſe they could poſſible: he tooke his ſpeare out of his left hand into his right, and bowing his knee and bodie ſomewhat, he leaned vpon it, and ſo ſtoode a great while in this manner before he ſpake, receiuing the cryes of ioy and clapping of hands which the people made, praiſing his valiantnes, and bleſſing his good hap and fortune. Then when they had done, and were quiet againe, he framed his countenance, and began to make an oration vnto them in the name of all the tribe and common wealth of the ACHAIANS, meete for the enterpriſe from whence he came: and perſwaded them to ioyne to the ACHAIANS. So therewithall, they preſently deliuered him the keyes of their citie, the which were neuer before that time in their power, ſince the raigne of king Philip. Nowe touching the other Captaines of king Antigonus: Aratus hauing taken Archelaus priſoner, he let him goe, but put Theophraſtus to death, becauſe he would not goe out of CORINTH. Perſaus (Captaine of the caſtle) ſeeing the caſtle but loſt: he ſecretly ſaued himſelfe, & fled vnto the citie of CENCHREES. And it is reported, that as he was afterwards in talke of Philoſophie, where one maintaining that a man could not be a good Captaine, vnles he were a perfect wiſe man: This (q; he) is one of Zenoes opinions rightly, the which heretofore pleaſed me beſt: but now this young SICYONIAN Aratus, hath made me of an other mind. Many writers doe report this ſaying of Perſaus. Furthermore, Aratus wanne preſently the temple of Iuno, and the hauen of LECHÆVM where he tooke fiue and twentie ſhippes of king Antigonus, and fiue hundred horſe of ſeruice for the warre, & foure hundred SYRIANS, which he ſold euery one of them. The ACHAIANS left within the caſtle of the Acrocorinthe, a garriſon of foure hundred footemen, and fiftie dogges, and as many hunts, all the which were kept for the watch of the caſtle. Now, the ROMAINS wondring at the valiantnes of Philopæmen: they called him the laſt of the GRECIANS. Euen ſo might I alſo (in my opinion) ſay, that this act is the laſt and moſt famous of all the GRECIANS, and deſerueth to be equall, aſwell for valiantnes, as alſo good ſucceſſe, with the greateſt exploites of the moſt famous auncients: as that which followed immediately after doth amply declare. For the MEGARIANS reuolting from king Antigonus, did ſtraight ioine with Aratus: and the TROEZENIANS alſo with the EPIDAVRIANS, did likewiſe enter into league and friendſhip with the ACHAIANS. So at the firſt inuaſion he made, he went to ſpoile the country of ATTICA, and croſſed ouer to the Ile of SALAMINA, and ſpoiled and deſtroyed it, euen as if he had deliuered the power and force of the ACHAIANS out of priſon, to ſerue his owne turne in any thing he thought good of. Howbeit, he ſent home the ATHENIAN priſoners without paying of ranſome: and all of policy to make them deſirous to rebell againſt the MACEDONIANS, Furthermore, he made king Ptolomy a frend and confederat of the ACHAIANS, with condition, that he ſhould be Lieutenaunt generall both by ſea and by land. For theſe reſpects Aratus was of maruellous eſtimation and credit with the ACHAIANS: inſomuch that where they could not yearely chooſe him their generall, being cōtrary to their law: they choſe him at the leaſt euery ſecond yeare, but in effect, all was done by his aduiſe and counſell. For they ſaw plainely, that it was neither honor, nor riches, nor friendſhip of kings & Princes, nor the priuate benefite of his owne city wherein he was borne, nor any other thing elſe that hee preferred, before the glory and increaſe of the common weath of the ACHAIANS. For he was of opinion, that cities by themſelues were but weake, & being ioyned together with the chaine

of common benefit, they were a ſtrength one to preſerue the other. And in like manner, euen as the parts that are in the bodies of brute beaſtes haue life & ſuſtenance, being ioyned & knit together, and ſtraight ſo ſoone as there is any ſeperation of them the one from the other, they liue no more & putrifie: euen ſo cities alſo were brought to decay by thẽ that did diſperſe their ſocietie among them, & in contrary manner did then againe increaſe, when ioyning with any other great body & city, they were gouerned with wiſdom & good counſell. So Aratus ſeeing the chiefeſt cities thereaboutes enioy their lawes and liberties: thought it a ſhamefull thing to leaue the ARGIVES in ſlauerie & bondage. Wherfore he praſtiſed to kill the tirant Ariſtomachus that gouerned them, both to ſhew himſelfe thankefull to the citie for his bringing vppe there: as alſo to ioyne that great & mightie citie vnto the tribe of the ACHAIANS. Now there were diuerſe men, that had the harts and courage to vndertake to do it, of the which the chiefeſt were Aeſchylus and Charimenes the Soothſayer, but they had no ſwordes: for they were ſtraightly forbidden by the tirant, and grieuous puniſhments ordayned for them that ſhould be found with their ſwordes. Aratus therefore cauſed certen litle ſhort daggers to be made at CORINTHE for them, the which he ſowed vp in packs caried on certen beaſts loden with other baggage and ſtuffe. But the ſoothſayer Charimenes, did impart this enterpriſe vnto a third man, and made him one of the conſpiracie with them. Aeſchylus being very much offended with it, began therefore to enter into practiſe by himſelfe, and left their companie. Charimenes perceiuing that, tooke ſuch a toy in his head in a mad moode, that he bewrayed them as they went about to execute their enterpriſe. This notwithſtanding, the moſt part of the conſpirators ſaued themſelues, and fled to CORINTHE. So the tyrant Ariſtomachus was ſlaine ſhortly after, by his owne men. But then another tyrant Ariſtippus, a crueller man than the firſt, made haſte to take the tyranny before he could be reſiſted. This notwithſtanding, Aratus, with all the yong men of the ACHAIANS able to ſerue in the field, went ſodainly thither with aide, hoping to find them of the city very glad to recouer their liberty. Howbeit the people being acquainted, and of long time vſed patiently to beare the yoke of bondage: there was not a man of them that would once take his part. So he returned backe againe, and did nothing, ſauing that therby the ACHAIANS were accuſed, becauſe that in open peace they had made warre, and therefore they were put in ſute before the MANTINIANS, at Ariſtippus requeſt, tyrant of ARGOS. The matter was pleaded in Aratus abſence, and the ACHAIANS were condemned to pay the ſumme of 30. Minas. After this proofe & attempt of Aratus, Ariſtippus being affraid of Aratus, & hating him to the death, ſought waies to kill him, with the help of Antigonus, who did aide him in it: and almoſt there were ſpials in euery corner, that did nothing els but lie in waite to execute Ariſtippus minde. Now, there is no ſurer guard vnto a Prince, than the perfect loue and good will of his ſubiects. For, after that the nobilitie and common people haue beene vſed to feare, not him, but thoſe that for him commaund them: he then ſeeth with many eyes, heareth with many eares, and knoweth what is done farre off. Here therefore I will a litle digreſſe from my hiſtory, to ſhew you the manner of Ariſtippus life the tyraunt, whereunto hee was brought by this ſo much deſired tyrannicall gouernment, and ſmoke of ſignory, ſo eſteemed of all men. Now, though Ariſtippus had king Antigonus his friend, & that he kept a great gard of ſouldiers about him for the ſafety of his perſon, and that there was not an enemy of his left aliue in all the city: yet he made his ſouldiers watch and lie without his pallace, vnder the cloiſters and galleries thereabous, and after ſupper turned all his men out of the dores, and then ſhut his Court gates to him, and locked himſelf alone with his Concubine, in a litle high chamber with a trappe dore, and ſet his bed vpon it, and ſo ſlept, as one that continuallie was afraied of him ſelfe. Then after he was come vp, his Concubines mother came to take vp the ladder, and locked it in an other chamber: and ſo did let it downe againe the next morning, and called this trimme tyraunt, that went downe out of his chamber, like a ſnake that ſhould haue crept out of her hole. Where Aratus in contrary manner, not hauing obtained by force of armes, but lawfully through vertue a continuall gouernment, being ſimply apparelled with a poore gowne of ſmall price, & ſhewing himſelf a mortall enemy vnto al ſorts of tyrants: hath left a race & noble offſpring among the GRECIANS, which remaine yet vntill this preſent day. Contrarily alſo, there are few tyrants that doe vſurpe the caſtels of free cities, that keepe ſo

many ſouldiers in pay, that make ſuch prouiſion for armor and weapon, & haue ſo many gates and draw-bridges for the ſafetie of their perſons, that in the ende can keepe themſelues from violent death, no more then hares: neither do leaue alſo any poſteritie, houſe, or graue, why their memorie ſhould be honored after their death. So Aratus hauing diuerſe waies made ſundry attempts, both by open force, and otherwiſe ſodainely, to take the citie of ARGOS, and to thruſt out the tirant Ariſtippus: he euer failed of his purpoſe, but ſpecially one night among the reſt, when he entred the citie verie dangerouſly, with a few ſouldiers with him, and ſlue the ſouldiers that came to giue ſupply to them that fought. But after that day was broken, and that the tirant with all his forces came to ſet vpon him: the ARGIVES ſturred not at all, as if Aratus had not fought for their libertie, but as though they had bene Iudges appoynted to ſit to ſee the ſportes of the games Nemee, to iudge the game vnto the Conquerour without partiality, and with indifferency. Aratus in the meane time fighting like a valiant man, was thruſt at with a pike, and runne through the thigh. This notwithſtanding, at length he wanne that part of the citie where he fought, and was not thruſt out till night, what force ſoeuer the enemies made vpon him: and if he could poſſibly haue holden it out all night, he had vndoubtedly obtained his purpoſe. For the tirant looked for none other but to flie, and had alreadie ſent diuerſe of his goods to the ſea. Howbeit no man once came to tell Aratus any newes of it, beſides alſo lacking water, and for that he could not helpe himſelfe becauſe of his wound, he was driuen to leade his men away, and failed of his purpoſe. So, diſpairing that he could euer take it by ſtelth, he went thither with open warres, and ſpoiled and deſtroied all the country of ARGOS: and hauing fought a great battell againſt the tirant Ariſtippus, by the riuer of Chares, they blamed Aratus much, that he forſooke the victorie, and cowardly retired out of the battell. For the reſt of his armie doubtles had the better, and had followed the enemies farre in chaſe: when he fled being affraid, not compelled by his enemies, but miſtruſting his fortune, and retyred to his lodging. So, when they that returned from the chaſe of their enemies were offended, for that they hauing put them to flight, and alſo ſlayne a greater number more of them then they had loſt of theirs, and yet for cowardlineſſe ſhould ſuffer their enemies (whom they had ouercome and put to flight) to ſette vppe markes of triumph in token of victorie: Aratus beeing aſhamed of it, determined to fight once againe, for the markes of triumphe. Whereuppon, reſting his men but one day, he ledde them againe into the fielde, and ſetting his armie in battell raye, offered to fight once more. This notwithſtanding, when he ſawe a great ſupply comming to his enemie, and that the tirantes men came to fight more luſtely, and with better courage then before: Aratus durſt not abide them, but retired, and ſent to demaund leaue to take away his dead men to burie them, yet he could ſpeake ſo courteouſly, and behaue himſelfe ſo wiſely, by the experience he had in gouernment, and alſo for the good will they bare him: that they forgat the fault he committed, and he wanne the citie of CLEONES vnto the ACHAIANS, where he cauſed the feaſts of the games Nemee to be celebrated, as belonging of great antiquitie, rather vnto the CLEONEIANS then vnto the ARGIVES. This notwithſtanding, the ARGIVES did keepe it alſo, & then was the firſt time that the ſanctuarie and priuiledge was broken, which was wont to be granted vnto all them that came to play for the games: becauſe the ACHAIANS did make them priſoners that fought in ARGOS, as they returned through their countrie, and ſold them as enemies. So maruellouſly did Aratus & the ACHAIANS hate all ſorts of tirants, without reſpect of pardon. Shortly after he was aduertiſed, that the tirant Ariſtippus did lye in waite to ſpye oportunitie, to take the citie of CLEONES from him: howbeit that he was affraid of it, becauſe he remained at that time in CORINTHE. So Aratus ſtraight ſent out commaundement into euery place, to aſſemble the armie of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, & that they ſhould bring victuals with them for many dayes: and ſo craftily came downe to the citie of CENCHREES, to intiſe Ariſtippus, by his going away ſo farre off, that in his abſence he ſhould attempt to ſet vpon the CLEONIANS, as indeede he did. For he fayled not preſently to goe thither with his armye. But Aratus returning from CENCHREES vnto CORINTHE, very late in the night, and hauing layed good watch euerie way: he ſodainely brought the armie of the ACHAIANS vnto CLEONES with ſuch ſpeede and quietnes, that they were not ſeene as they came, but entred into the citie of Cleones by night, and were readie to fight with the tiraunt, before he knewe they were come. So the gates of the citie were ſet open by breake of daye, and the ſignall of battell giuen by ſound of trumpettes: and ſo ſetting vppon the tirantes men with great cryes, they ſuſpecting nothing, they were preſently put to flight.

And becauſe the place where the ouerthrow was giuen, had many turnings: Aratus following the chaſe, tooke the way which he thought the tirant fled in. The chaſe continued to the citie of Mycenes. There the tirant was ouertaken by a Cretan called Tragiſcus, (as Dinias reporteth) who ſlue him: and there were ſlaine of his men alſo, aboue fifteene thouſand. But now Aratus hauing wonne ſuch a famous victorie, and loſt neuer a man: he could not yet winne the citie of Argos, nor ſet it againe at libertie. For one Aegias, & another Ariſtomachus, got into the towne with the kings armie, and kept it. But notwithſtanding, by this noble victory Aratus did race out a great part of the reproach that they gaue him, and of the ſcoffes and ſlentes the flatterers of the tirants deuiſed of him. Who to pleaſe them, reported that when they ſhould come to fight indeede, the generall of the Achaians had the winde collicke in his belly, and a dimneſſe in his eyes with a guydines in his head, when he heard but the ſound of the trumpettes. And furthermore alſo, when he had ſet his men in battell ray, and giuen them the word of battell: he asked the generalls if he ſhould neede to be there in perſon, becauſe he was hurt in the heele, and then would get him as farre off as he could, to ſee the end of the battell. This talke was ſo common, that the Philoſophers themſelues diſputing of it, to wit, whether to tremble and chaunge colour in preſent danger and perill, be ſignes of a faint heart or of an euill complexion and coldnes of bodie: they alway vouched Aratus, that had bene a good and valiant Captaine, and yet when he began to fight, he was euer in that taking.

A Philoſophicall queſtion whether trembling, & changing of colour in danger, be a ſigne of cowardlines. Lyſiadas tirãt of Megalipolis

So when he had ouercome Ariſtippus, he ſought meanes alſo to deſtroy Lyſiadas Megalopolitan, who as abſolute Lord & king of the country, kept the city of Megalopolis. Notwithſtanding, he had no baſe mind in him, neither was he caried away with a cruell deſire of tirannie to liue at his pleaſure, nor through extreame couetouſnes, as moſt princes be: but being a yong man, & pricked forward with deſire of honor & fame, & hauing vnaduiſedly conceiued in his mind, (which was great & highly bent) the vaine reaſons he heard men talke of principalitie, as of a ſtate moſt bleſſed, & worthy of admiration: he found the meanes to make himſelfe Lord of his coũtry. But afterwards, he was ſoone wearie of the dangers & troubles ſuch manner of gouernment bringeth with it, & deſired to follow Aratus, whom he ſaw proſper, and of great honor. Furthermore, alſo fearing his ſecret practiſes againſt him, he tooke hold of a noble deuiſe: firſt to rid himſelfe of the malice and feare of the priſon and garde of his ſouldiers: and laſtly, to be a benefactor to his coũtrie. So he ſent for Aratus, gaue vp his gouernment, and deliuered vp his citie to the tribe of the Achaians.

Lyſiadas, tirãt of Megalipolis leaueth the tirannie & yeelded himſelfe and his dominion vnto the Achaians.

They ſo extolled him for this acte, that they choſe him their Lieutenant generall of all their tribe. Wherfore, Lyſiadas ſtriuing at the firſt to excell Aratus in honor, attempted diuerſe things which were not verie needefull: as among others, to make warre with the Lacedæmonians. But Aratus was very much againſt him in that, though ſome think it was for enuie. Thereupon they choſe Lyſiadas generall of the Achaians the ſecond time: although Aratus openly both ſpake and made what meanes he could to the contrary, & would haue had another to haue bene choſen. For, he himſelfe was euery other yeare generall. So, Lyſiadas was choſen again generall of the Achaians the third time, with euery bodies good will: and Aratus and he had abſolute power and gouernment by turnes, one after the other.

But when they ſaw that Lyſiadas became open enemie vnto Aratus, and did ſtill accuſe him in all their councels and aſſemblies: they fell in ſuch miſliking with him, that they reiected him. For they thought his but a coũterfeat vertue, to contend with the perfectnes of Aratus vertue.

One of Iſopes tales of the Cuckowes queſtion to litle byrdes.

Much like vnto one of Iſopes fables, ſaying that litle birds did anſwer the cuckow on a time, asking them why they did flie from her: becauſe we are affrayd (ſayd they) thou wilt be a ſparhawke one day. Euen ſo it ſeemeth, that there was a certen ſuſpition in mens mindes of Lyſiadas tirannie, which made them miſtruſt that he went not from his tirannie with good will.

Now Aratus on the other ſide, wan as great praiſe and honor by his doings againſt the Ætolians. For when the Achaians would needes haue fought vpon the confines of the territory of the Megarians, & that Agis, king of Lacedæmon, being come with his army to the campe of the tribe of the Achaians, did perſwade them hardily to giue battell: Aratus was ſtoutly againſt it, and did abide many mocks and tauntes they gaue him, ſaying, that it was for cowardlines he would not go. This notwithſtanding, he would not leaue his wiſe and ſafe determination, for all that open ſhame: but ſuffered the enemies to paſſe ouer the Mountaine Gerania, and to inuade Peloponnesvs, and would neuer fight with them. But afterwards, when he ſaw that at their firſt comming they had taken the citie of Pallena: he then changed his mind, and would deferre time no longer to tary till al his power were come together, but marched forthwith againſt his enemies, with thoſe fewe he had, who maruelouſly weakned themſelues by their inſolency & diſorder after their victorie, keeping no watch nor ward. For after they had entred the citie of Pallena, the ſouldiers ran into euery houſe, one thruſting in anothers necke, and fighting for the goods they found. The Captaines alſo fell to rauiſhing of maydes, and the Pallenians wiues, and put their burganets and morrions vpon their heades, that none other ſhould take them, becauſe that by the ſame the ſouldiers ſhould know whoſe they were, and to whom the women belonged. So they being in this ruffe and iolitie: newes came ſodainly that Aratus was come. This made them quake for feare, when they ſaw they were like to be taken out of order. For before they all vnderſtood of the danger by their ſodaine ſetting on thẽ, the Achaians were fighting alreadie within the ſuburbs and gates of the citie, againſt the firſt that reſiſted, whom they ſlue. They being broken & put to flight, made the reſt ſo affraied that were gathered together to aide them, that they wiſt not what to do. In this tumult and great hurly burly, there was one of the Ladies a priſoner, that was the daughter of Epigethes one of the nobleſt men of the citie, and ſhe a maruellous goodly woman, and paſſing fayre: who being ſet in the temple of Diana, whither a Captaine had brought her that had choſen her for himſelfe, and had put his burganet on her head: ſhe ſodainely ranne to the gate of the temple with the burganet on her head, when ſhe heard the noyſe of them that fought, to ſee them fight. The Citizens ſeeing her in that aray, found her the goodlier to behold, and of greater maieſtie, then any worldly creature. The enemies on the other ſide were ſo affraid to ſee her, thinking ſhe had bene ſome ſpirit: that not a man of them durſt once defend themſelues. So the Pallenians ſay, that the image of Diana all the reſt of the time is kept locked vp, and no bodie toucheth it, and that when the Nunne that keepeth it doth carie it elſe where, no man dare looke on it, but euerie man turneth his eyes away: becauſe the ſight of it is not onely fearefull and hurtfull vnto men, but it alſo killeth the frute of the trees it paſſeth by, and maketh them barren. This was the cauſe that then troubled the Ætolians mindes ſo much, becauſe the Nunne remouing the image of the goddeſſe Diana, ſhe turned it towards them. Howbeit Aratus in his commentaries maketh no mention of this at all, but onely writeth, that when he had defeated the Ætolians, following them in chaſe, he entred hand ouer head with them that fled into the citie, out of the which he draue them, and ſlue ſeuen hundreth of them. This noble victorie hath bene eſteemed amongſt the chiefeſt afterwards: and the paynter Timanthes hath drawen and ſet it forth in table verie liuely. This notwithſtanding, becauſe diuerſe Princes and people did immediatly prepare force againſt the Achaians: Aratus preſently made peace with the Ætolians by the practiſe of Pantaleon, who bare great ſway and authoritie amongeſt them. Furthermote, Aratus being deſirous to ſet the Athenians at libertie, he ſodainly attempted to take the hauen of Pirea: for the which the Achaians reproued him, becauſe he had broken the peace they had made with the Macedonians. But Aratus in his commentaries doth ſtoutly denie that it was he, and layeth the faulte vpon Erginus, by whoſe meanes he wanne the calſte of the Acrocorinthe: ſaying that it was he, that of his owne minde did ſet a ſcaling ladder to the wall, and that his ladder breaking vnder him, he fledde vpon it, and perceiuing he was followed neare by the enemies, he ſtill cryed out, Aratus as if he had bene there, and by this pollicie mocked his enemies, and ſaued himſelfe. Howbeit, me thinketh this aunſwer is not true. For it is not credible, that Erginus a priuate ſouldier, and a Syrian borne, ſhoulde haue ſo great an enterpriſe in his head, vnleſſe it had bene by Aratus conſent and commandement, who had giuen him men, time and meanes to vndertake it. And this appeared plainely afterwardes, for, Aratus did not attempt it twiſe or thrice onely, but oftener then ſo (as thoſe that extreamely deſire a thing) to take the hauen of PIREA on the ſodaine, not giuing ouer for once failing, but rather emboldening himſelfe againe with good hope becauſe he miſſed it but litle, and that he came ſo neare the taking of it. And another time alſo amongeſt others, flying through the playne of THRIASIA, he brake his legge, and was driuen to make many inciſions to heale it: ſo that he was a long time together caryed in his lytter vnto the warres. After that King Antigonus was dead, and that Demetrius his ſonne ſucceeded him in the kingdome: he attempted then more earneſtly then euer before, to ſet the citie of ATHENS at libertie, making ſmall account of the MACEDONIANS. Aratus therefore beeing ouerthrowen in battell neare vnto PHYLACIA, by King Demetrius Lieutenant, called Bithys, and the rumor running ſtraight abroade, that Aratus was deade, or at the leaſt that he was taken priſoner: one named Diogenes, Captaine of the hauen of PIREA, wrote a letter vnto CORINTHE, and commanded the garriſon of the ACHAIANS that kept it, to deliuer the towne for Aratus was dead. But he by chaunce was at the ſelfe ſame time in CORINTHE: ſo that they which brought the letters went home with a mocke, without their purpoſe, and made all the companie merrie. Furthermore, King Demetrius him ſelfe ſent a galley out of MACEDON, to bring Aratus bound vnto him. The ATHENIANS themſelues alſo to pleaſe the MACEDONIANS, exceeding all lightneſſe of flatterie, wore garlands on their heads a whole day together, in token of cõmon ioy, when newes was brought them of Aratus death. Aratus was ſo madde in his minde to heare this, that he brought his armie preſently againſt them, euen to the verie ſuburbes of the Academy. Notwithſtanding at their earneſt requeſts, he did no hurt there. And afterwards the ATHENIANS acknowledging his valiantnes, when king Demetrius dyed: it tooke them in the heads to recouer their libertie againe. So Aratus, though that yeare another man was generall of the ACHAIANS, and that he kept his bedde lying ſicke of a long diſeaſe: yet to further this, he was caryed vnto ATHENS in a lytter, and ſo perſwaded Diogenes, Captaine of the garriſon there, that for the ſumme of an hundreth and fiftie talents (towards the which Aratus gaue of his owne, twenty talents) he made him deliuer to the ATHENIANS the hauen of PIREA, the caſtle of MVNYCHIA, the Ile of SALAMINA, and the caſtle of SVNIVM. After this the ÆGINETES, the HERMIONIANS, and the moſt parte of ARCADIA it ſelfe, did preſently ioyne with the ACHAIANS: ſo that the MACEDONIANS beeing occupied with warres at that time in other places againſt their neighbours, the power of the ACHAIANS maruellouſly encreaſed, hauing alſo the ÆTOLIANS their confederates. Then Aratus to performe his oulde promiſe, and beeing angrie to ſee the citie of ARGOS (being ſo neere neighbour vnto them) yet kept in bondage: he ſent vnto Ariſtomachus, to perſwade him to be contented to ſet his citie againe at libertie, and to ioyne it to the tribe of the ACHAIANS, as Lyſiadas had done his towne of MEGALOPOLIS, and rather to like to be made a Generall with honor and praiſe of ſo great and famous a ſtate as the ACHAIANS: then tirant of one onely citie, hated, and euerie houre of the night and daye in daunger of his life. Ariſtomachus gaue eare to his perſwaſions, and ſent vnto Aratus, telling him that he had neede of fiftie talents to diſcharge the ſouldiers he had about him. The money was ſtraight prepared. And Lyſiadas that was at that time Generall of the ACHAIANS, and that maruellouſly deſired this matter might be brought to paſſe by his meanes: he ſecretly ſent vnto Ariſtomachus to accuſe Aratus, and ſhewed how he had bene alwaye a mortall enemie vnto tirants, and therefore counſelled him rather to put himſelfe into his hands, as indeede he did. For Lyſiadas brought Ariſtomachus vnto the councell of the ACHAIANS. There all the councell plainely ſhewed their good willes, and the confidence they had in Aratus: for when he ſpake againſt it, that they ſhould not receiue Ariſtomachus, they reiected him with great anger. But afterwardes alſo when Aratus was won, and that he began to moue the contrary to the councell: they ſtraight agreed to receiue the ARGIVES, & the PHLIASIANS in league with them, & alſo the next yere following they choſe Ariſtomachus Lieutenant generall of all their tribe. Ariſtomachus ſeing himſelfe in credit now with the ACHAIANS, would needes inuade the countrie of LACONIA with a maine armie, and ſent for Aratus being then at ATHENS. Aratus wrote vnto him, & wiſhed him in any wiſe not to meddle with that iorney, becauſe he would not haue the ACHAIANS to deale with Cle-

king of LACEDÆMON, that was a couragious and ſtout young Prince, and maruellouſly growen in ſhort time. Howbeit Ariſtomachus being ſelfewilled in that point, Aratus obeyed him, and was there in perſon all that iorney. So Cleomenes being come to them vppon the ſodaine with his armie, neare vnto the citie of PALANTIVM: Ariſtomachus would needs fight with him. But Aratus diſſwaded him from it. Whereupon Lyſiadas afterwards accuſed him to the ACHAIANS, and the next yere following he contended with him, ſuing to be Generall: howbeit he was reiected by moſt voyces, and Aratus choſen Generall the twelfth time. The ſelfe ſame yeare he was ouerthrowen in battell by Cleomenes, neare vnto the mountaine Lycæum, and being fledde, wandred vp and downe in the night, that euerie man thought he had bene ſlaine, and it ranne for good payment among all the GRECIANS. Howbeit he ſaued himſelfe, and hauing gathered his men together againe, not contenting him that he had eſcaped with life, but wiſely taking the oportunitie and occaſion offered, no man knowing it, nor miſtruſting his comming: he ſodainely went to aſſayle the MANTINEANS, which were confederates of Cleomenes, and hauing taken the citie of MANTINEA, he left a great garriſon in it, and made the ſtraungers that were there, free of the citie. Thus Aratus was he alone, that being ouercome wanne the ACHAIANS that, which they themſelues could ſcarcely haue wonne if they had bene conquerors. Afterwards the LACEDÆMONIANS inuading the territories of the MEGALOPOLITANS with a great armie, Aratus ſodainly went thither to aide them, but would hazard battell no more, nor giue Cleomenes vantage, who deſiredonly to fight, and ſtill conſtantly reſiſted the MEGALOPOLITANS, that prouoked him to come into the field. For beſides that in nature he was not meete for a ſet battell, at that time alſo he was the weaker in men, and had to doe with a venturous young man, that was all fire: where his courage & ambition on the other ſide was coole, & quiet enough. Furthermore, he conſidered, that as king Cleomenes ſought honour by valiant venturing, which he had not before: euen ſo it was his parte wiſely to keepe that which he had long ſince gotten, and to ſtand vpon his guard and ſafetie. This notwithſtanding, the light armed men being put out into the fielde, and hauing chaſed the LACEDÆMONIANS euen into their campe, & entring in with thẽ hand ouer head: Aratus would neuer bring out his citizens, but ſtayed them in a great valley that lay betwene them both, and would not let them come on any farther. Wherewithall Lyſiadas being mad with himſelfe, and falling out with Aratus: he called for the horſmen and ſayd that he would yet helpe them that followed the chaſe, and prayed them not to loſe the victorie ſo cowardly, of the which they were ſo ſure: nor to forſake him at a pinch, fighting for the defence of their countrie. So hauing gotten a great number of choyſe horſmen together, he went with great furie, and gaue charge on the right wing of his enemies battell, and hauing diſperſed them, and put them to flight, he vnaduiſedly followed them with great courage, into euill fauored crooked wayes, among trees, and great broade ditches. Whereupon Cleomenes came, and ſo luſtely ſet on him, that he ſlue him dead in the place, valiantly fighting and defending himſelfe. The other men of armes flying alſo, ruſhed in againe into the battell of the footemen, and ſo diſordered their rankes, that they made all their armie flie for feare. For this cauſe they greatly blamed Aratus, becauſe he had forſaken Lyſiadas: and being enforced vnto it by the ACHAIANS that went without his leaue, he followed them at length, and fled himſelfe alſo vnto the city of ÆGIVM. There the ACHAIANS ſitting in coũcell, they decreed that they would furniſh Aratus with no more money, neither would they pay his ſtrangers any more: and bad him pay them at his owne charge, if he would entertaine them for the warre. Aratus perceiuing that they did him great wrong, ſtood euen indifferẽt to deliuer vp his cõmiſſion of Lieutenancy, and to diſcharge himſelfe of his office: but after he had bethought himſelfe better, he bare it patiently, and led the ACHAIANS directly to the citie of ORCHOMENE. There he valiantly fought with Megiſtonus, king Cleomenes father in lawe, and had the vpper hand of him: for he ſlue three hundreth of his men, and tooke Megiſtonus ſelfe priſoner. Furthermore, where before euerie ſecond yeare they did vſe to chooſe him their Lieutenant generall: when his turne came about againe, they called him to giue him the office, but he refuſed it, and Timoxenus was choſen in his roome. Now the cauſe alledged for his refuſall, was ſayed to be, for that he miſliked of the common people. But that ſoundeth like a lye: for the truth of it, to my ſeeming was, for that he ſawe the ſtate of the ACHAIANS to decline. For king Cleomenes proceeded no more fayer and ſoftly as he did at the firſt, when he was controlled & bridled by the Ephori: but hauing ſlaine them, and equalitie deuided the landes through LACEDÆMONIA, and made the ſtrangers free Citizens of SPARTA, being then abſolute Lord of LACEDÆMON: he ſtraight ſet vpon the ACHAIANS with all the power he could, and ſought to conquer them. And therefore Aratus deſerueth iuſt reproofe, for that he forſooke his countrie in ſuch extreame trouble and danger, that being as the maiſter of a ſhippe he gaue another the ſtearne to ſteare, when it had bene moſt honorable & meeteſt for him to haue taken it in hand (though they would not haue giuen it him) to haue ſaued his countrie. Or otherwiſe, if he had indeed vtterly diſpaired of the good ſucceſſe of the ACHAIANS, he ſhould then haue put it rather into Cleomenes hands, and not to haue poiſoned PELOPONNESVS againe, with the maners of the barbarous people (bringing in as he did, the garriſõ of the MACEDONIANS, filling the caſtle of the Acrocorinth with GAVLES and ILLYRIAN ſouldiers, and making them his Lordes and Maiſters, whom he had ſo often ouercome in warres, and deceiued of their gouernment, and of whom he alſo ſpake ſo much euill in his Commentaries) nor to haue put them into townes and calling them friends and confederates, to thinke thereby to colour and diſguiſe his wicked practiſe. Admit Cleomenes had bene a tirant, and a cruell man (if I ſhould ſo terme him) yet came he of the blood of Hercules, and was borne in SPARTA: from whence they ſhould rather haue choſen the meaneſt man Gouernor, then the greateſt king of MACEDON, and thoſe ſpecially that preferre the honour and glorie of GRECE, before ſtraungers. Yet king Cleomenes required no more of all the ACHAIANS but the name onely to be their Lieutenant generall: and ſo they would graunt him that honour, he promiſed he would be verie good vnto the cities confederats to ACHAIA. Where Antigonus notwithſtanding, whẽ they had choſen him their Lieutenant generall with abſolute power and authoritie, both by ſea and alſo by land, refuſed the charge, vnleſſe they would let him haue the caſtle of the Acrocorinthe for his hyer. The which was euen like to Eſopes hunter, that brideled his horſe. For he would not get vp vpon the ACHAIANS that requeſted him, and that by their Ambaſſadors and decrees of counſell did referre all vnto himſelfe: before he had firſt ſaddled and brideled them, by the garriſon he made them receiue, and the pledges he cauſed them to giue him, and yet he ſpake as much as might be to cleere himſelfe of the accuſation againſt him, bearing them in hand that he was forced to it. Howbeit Polybius writeth: that long time before he was compelled, being affrayed of Cleomenes valiantnes, he had ſecretly practiſed that with Antigonus, which he was openly ſeene in afterwards: and that he had intiſed the MEGALOPOLITANS (who were the firſt that moued it to the councell of the ACHAIANS) to call king Antigonus to their aide, becauſe they were neareſt neighbours to the fire, and continually harried with Cleomenes warre, that alwaies knocked at their gates to come and ſpoyle them. Thus much is affirmed by Philarchus in his hiſtorie, who were hardly to be credited notwithſtanding, had not Polybius confirmed it. For he loued Cleomenes ſo well, that it ſeemed he was rauiſhed with ſome ſpirite as often as he ſpake of him: and frameth his hiſtorie, as a common counſeller that ſhould pleade a caſe in lawe before the Iudges, ſtill accuſing the one, and defending the other. The ACHAIANS loſt the citie of MEGALOPOLIS againe, the which king Cleomenes tooke of them, and ouercame them in a great battell, by Hecatombæon. Wherewithall they were ſo amazed, that they ſent Ambaſſadors preſently vnto him, and praied him to come to the citie of ARGOS, & there they would make him their Lieutenant generall. But when Aratus heard he came indeede, and that he was not farre from the citie of LERNA with his armie: being affrayed, he ſent other Ambaſſadors to tell him that he ſhould ſafelie come with three hundreth men only, as vnto his frends and confederats, & yet if he miſtruſted craft and euill dealing, that then they woulde giue him pledges for the ſafetie of his perſon. Cleomenes aunſwered him, that was a plaine mockerie, and an iniurie they offered him. Wherefore he preſently departed thence, and ſent a letter before to the councell of the ACHAIANS, full of foule words and reproaches he gaue vnto Aratus: who likewiſe replyed to him againe, bitterly taunting eache other, that they came to talke of their mariage and wiues. After this letter, Cleomenes ſent defyance by an Herauld vnto the ACHAIANS, and proclaimed open

warre againſt them: in ſomuch as he had almoſt gotten the citie of Sicyone by practiſe of traitors. Howbeit failing of his purpoſe, he returned ſodainly, and went vnto the city of Pallena, which he tooke, and draue out the Generall of the Achaians thence, and immediatly after he wanne the cities alſo of Phenea, and Pentelion. After that, the Argives and Phliasians willingly yeelded vnto him, ſo that of all that which the Achaians had conquered, and ioyned vnto their tribe, they could reckon of nothing elſe of certainty vnto them. Then Aratus was maruellouſly troubled in his mind, to ſee all Peloponnesvs in tumult & vprore, and that all the cities fell to open rebellion by thoſe that practiſed chaunge and alteration. For no man was contented with the ſtate and gouernement at that time, but diuers of the Sicyonians and Corinthians both were bewrayed which had ſecretly practiſed with Cleomenes, & that of long time maliced the gouernement of the Achaians, deſiring thẽ ſelues to be Lords and Gouernours of their cities. Aratus hauing full commiſsion and authoritie from the councell of the Achaians, to make inquirie of them, and to put them to death, without further triall of law: he did execute them accordingly, whom he found faultie in the city of Sicyone. Furthermore, attempting to do the like at Corinthe, he made inquiry of them, & put them to death: whereby he made the common people very angry with him, who otherwiſe of themſelues were weary of the gouernement & ſubiectiõ of the Achaians. The Corinthians therfore gathering together in the tẽple of Apollo, they ſent for Aratus, intending to make him priſoner before they would opẽly enter into actuall rebellion. Aratus went thither, to ſhew that he neither feared nor miſtruſted them, but yet he held his horſe in his hand following of him. Then many roſe vp againſt him, and did both reproue and iniuriouſly intreate him. But Aratus with ſtayed countenaunce and gentle words, prayed them to keepe their places, and not to crie out in ſuch rage vpon their feete, and withall, cauſed them alſo to come in that were at the temple doore. But as he ſpake vnto them, by litle and litle he drew backe out of the preſſe, as though he meant to haue giuen his horſe to ſome body to hold. So being gotten out of the preſſe, he gently ſpake without any feare vnto the Corinthians he met, and bad them go to the temple of Apollo. When he was come to the caſtle, he then ſodainly tooke his horſe backe, and commaunded Cleopater, Captaine of the garriſon of the Achaians there, to looke well to the ſafe keeping of the caſtle. Then he ſet ſpurres to his horſe, and gallopped towardes the citie of Sicyone for life, being followed onely by thirtie of his ſouldiers, all the reſt hauing forſaken him, and diſperſed themſelues here and there. Shortly after, the Corinthians vnderſtanding that Aratus was gone, they followed after, but could neuer ouertake him: whereupon they ſtraight ſent for king Cleomenes, and deliuered the citie of Corinthe into his hands, the gaine whereof pleaſed him not ſo much, as he was ſory for the loſſe of Aratus, whom they had let go. So king Cleomenes ioyning vnto him all the people dwelling alongeſt the ſea coaſt, commonly called the riuer of Corinthe, who yeelded vp themſelues, holdes and townes into his handes: he then intrenched in the caſtle of the Acrocorinthe with a great trench. Furthermore, when Aratus came to the citie of Sicyone, many of the Achaians gathered about him, and holding a councell and aſſembly, he was choſen their Lieutenant generall, hauing abſolute power and authoritie to do what he would, and gaue him of their owne citizens to gard his perſon. So, he hauing managed the affaires of the ſtate and common wealth of the Achaians, the ſpace of three and thirtie yeares together, and hauing all that time bene counted of all men, the chiefeſt man of power and authoritie in Grece: he then found himſelfe in poore eſtate, forſaken, and in great miſerie, as in the ſhipwracke of his country beaten with ſtorme, and in great daunger of himſelfe. For when he ſent vnto the Ætolians for aide, they flatly denied him, and would ſend him none. Furthermore, the Athenians being very deſirous to ſend aide for Aratus ſake, were diſſwaded frõ it through the practiſe of Euclidas, & Micion. Aratus alſo had a houſe in Corinthe, where all his money was: the which king Cleomenes at the firſt meddled not withall, neither would ſuffer any other to touch it, but ſent for his friendes and officers, and charged them to looke well to it, to giue Aratus a good account of it afterwardes. Furthermore, he priuately ſent Tripylus vnto him, and his father in law Megiſtonus, and offered him great gifts, and ſpecially an annuall penſion of twelue talents, which was double as much as king Ptolomie gaue him, who ſent him yearely ſix talents. Beſides, he only prayed the ACHAIANS that they would make him their Lieutenãt generall, & alſo that the garriſon in the caſtle of the Acrocorinthe, might be deuided in common betweene them. Aratus made aunſwere, that he had no abſolute power in his hands, & that it was in the ACHAIANS, not in him. Cleomenes thinking this but a deuiſe and excuſe of Aratus, he preſently inuaded the country of the SICYONIANS, and deſtroyed all as he came, and continued the ſpace of three moneths. Aratus in the meane time ſtood doubtfull how to determine, whether he ſhould receiue king Antigonus or not: becauſe Antigonus would not aide him, before he deliuered him the caſtle of the Acrocorinthe into his handes. So the ACHAIANS meeting at the citie of ÆGIVM to conſult vpon it, they ſent for Aratus thither. Howbeit it was daungerous comming thither, becauſe Cleomenes campe lay hard by the citie of SICYONE, beſides alſo that the citizens kept Aratus, and held him by force, ſaying that they would not let him venture himſelfe in ſuch apparaunt daunger, their enemies being ſo neare vnto them. Moreouer, the women and litle children hung about him, weeping, and compaſsing him about, as their common father and ſauiour. But Aratus comforting them, bad them not be affrayed, and ſo tooke his horſe, with ten of his friends (and his ſonne that was a young ſtripling growen) and went towards the ſea, and imbarked in certaine ſhips that roade at ancker. Thence he ſailed vnto ÆGIVM, where the diet or parlament was kept: and there it was reſolued, that they ſhould ſend for Antigonus, and deliuer the caſtle of the Acrocorinthe into his handes. And ſo it was performed: for Aratus ſent thither his owne ſonne amõg the other hoſtages. The CORINTHIANS were ſo ſore offended withall, that they made hauocke of his goods, and gaue his houſe he had in CORINTHE, vnto king Cleomenes. So king Antigonus being onwardes on his way come into PELOPONNESVS with his army, bringing with him twenty thouſand footemen, all MACEDONIANS, & foure hundred horſemen: Aratus, with the greateſt ſtates and officers of the ACHAIANS, vnwitting to their enemies, went to meete him, as farre as the citie of PEGES, hauing no great truſt nor confidence in Antigonus, nor the MACEDONIANS. For he remembred very well, that he came firſt to his greatneſſe, by the iniuries he had offered them: and how that the chiefeſt cauſe of his riſing, was the malice he bare vnto old Antigonus. Howbeit, making vertue of neceſsitie, and weighing the inſtant occaſion of their preſent extremitie: (of Gouernours, to be driuen to be ſubiectes) he put himſelfe in aduenture. So, when Antigonus was told that Aratus was come in perſon to him: hauing with good countenaunce after a common ſort ſaluted thoſe that came in his company: to Aratus ſelfe at his firſt comming he gaue him an honourable welcome and enterteinement. Afterwardes alſo, finding him a good and diſcreete man: he fell into inward friendſhip and familiaritie with him. For Aratus was not onely ſkilfull to giue direction in matters of ſtate touching good order and gouernement: but moreouer, his companie and conuerſation was very pleaſaunt, to entertaine a Princes leaſure with. Wherefore though Antigonus was but young at that time, yet ſeeing throughly into Aratus nature, and that he was a meete man to be well thought of, and eſteemed about a Prince: he vſed his counſell and aduiſe more then any other mans, in all matters, not onely touching the affaires of the ACHAIANS, but of the MACEDONIANS alſo. And ſo all things came to paſſe, which the goddes had promiſed in their ſacrifices. For in a beaſt that was ſacrificed, there were two galles wrapped in one ſelfe cawle: the which the Soothſayers interpreted did prognoſticate, that two which before were mortall enemies, ſhould now become aſſured friendes. But Aratus made no account of their prediction, neither did alſo giue any credit to the ſacrifices, but truſted more to his owne determination. So, the warres afterwardes hauing good ſucceſſe, and Antigonus making a feaſt in the citie of CORINTHE, where he had bidden many gueſts: he would needs haue Aratus lye vpon him at the table, and a litle while after, commaunded his men to bring him a couerlet, and turning to him, asked him if he were not a cold. Aratus aunſwered him, it freezed. Then Antigonus bad him come neare him, and when the ſeruaunts brought a couerlet for the king, they caſt it ouer them both. Then Aratus remembring the ſacrifice, fell a laughing, and told the king what a wonder he had ſeene in the ſacrifice, and what interpretation the Soothſayers made of it. This was long after. So, Antigonus and Aratus being at that time in the citie of PEGES, they were ſworne brethren together: and then went both with all ſpeede againſt the enemies. Thus there fell out hot skirmiſhes betweene them, hard by the citie of CORINTHE. For Cleomenes was very well fortified, and the CORINTHIANS valiantly defended themſelues. In the meane time, Ariſtoteles of ARGOS, (Aratus friend) ſecretly ſent him word, that he would make the citie rebell, if he came himſelfe with any number of ſouldiers, Aratus told it vnto king Antigonus, who gaue him fifteen hundred men, with the which he imbarked, and paſſed ouer with great ſpeede from the Iſthmus (or barre in the ſtraight) vnto the citie of EPIDAVRVM. Howbeit the ARGIVES taried not Aratus comming, but were all vp before he came and did ſet vpon king Cleomenes men, and had driuen them into the caſtle. Cleomenes being aduertiſed of it, and fearing leaſt his enemies (keeping the citie of ARGOS) ſhould cut off his way from returning into his country againe with ſafetie if he were driuen to a ſtraight: he forſooke the caſtle of the Acrocorinthe, and went his way by night to helpe his men in the citie of ARGOS. So he came thither in time, and ouerthrew certaine of his enemies. But ſhortly after, Aratus, and king Antigonus both being come thither with all their aide, Cleomenes was driuen to flie to the citie of MANTINEA. After the recouerie againe of the citie of ARGOS, all the reſidue of the cities of PELOPONNESVS did againe returne to the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus tooke the caſtle of the Acrocorinthe. So Aratus being choſen generall by the ARGIVES, he counſelled them to preſent Antigonus with all the tyrants goods, and thoſe that had bene traitours to the common wealth. And after they had cruelly tormented the tyrant Ariſtomachus in the citie of CENCHREES, in the end they caſt him into the ſea, and drowned him. Aratus was maruellouſly reproued for his death, that would ſuffer the poore man to be ſo vilely handled, that was a good man, and one that had done him great pleaſure: who through his perſwaſion willingly reſigned vp his tyrannie, and deliuered the city of ARGOS vnto the ACHAIANS. But beſides this, they blamed him for many other things elſe. For that the ACHAIANS through his meanes had put the citie of CORINTHE into Antigonus handes, as though it had bene ſome meane village: for that when they had ſacked the citie of ORCHOMENE, they ſuffered him to place a garriſon of the MACEDONIANS there: for that they had enacted by Parliament, that they ſhould neither write, nor ſend Ambaſſadours any whither, without Antigonus priuitie and conſent: furthermore, for that they were compelled to giue pay to the MACEDONIANS: for that they made ſacrifices, feaſtes, and games vnto Antigonus, as if he had bene a god, following the example of Aratus citizens, who were the firſt that began, and had receiued Antigonus into the citie by the perſwaſion of Aratus, that lodged and feaſted him in his owne houſe. With all theſe faults they burdened Aratus, and conſidered not that after they had put the reynes of the gouernement into Antigonus hand, Aratus himſelfe (whether he would or not) was compelled to follow the ſwing of the vnbridled Prince, hauing no other meanes to ſtay it, but onely the libertie of ſpeach to admoniſh him: and that alſo was not to be exerciſed, without apparant and great daunger. For it is moſt true, that many things were done greatly againſt Aratus minde, as amongeſt others, that Antigonus cauſed the tyrants images of ARGOS to be ſet vp, which he had before pulled downe: and alſo that he made them to be ouerthrowen, which Aratus had ſet vp for thoſe that had taken the caſtle of CORINTHE, and onely left Aratus owne ſtatue, notwithſtanding all the earneſt intreatie Aratus made to the contrarie, yet he could get no graunt of any thing he requeſted. Beſides alſo, it appeareth that the ACHAIANS delt not ſo friendly with the MANTINIANS, as became GRECIANS one to an other. For they hauing the citie in their handes by Antigonus meanes, did put all the nobleſt and chiefeſt men of MANTINEA to death, others they ſold as ſlaues, and ſent the reſt into MACEDON with irons on their legges, & brought the poore women and children into bondage, and ſold them for ſlaues: and of the money they got by ſpoyle, they deuided the third part among themſelues, and left the other two partes vnto the MACEDONIANS. Now ſurely it can not be ſayd, but this was done for ſome cruell reuenge. For though it was an ouergreat crueltie, in rage & paſſion of minde, to handle people of one ſelfe bloud and language in this lamentable ſort: yet, Simonides ſayth, when men are driuen and forced to it, it is a gentle (no cruell) thing, to eaſe their great ſtomackes inflamed with rage and malice. But for that which was done afterwards vnto the citie, no man can excuſe Aratus, nor ſay that he was either driuen to it by neceſſitie, or that he had otherwiſe any honeſt occa-

ſion to do it. For king Antigonus hauing giuen the citie of MANTINEA vnto the ARGIVES, they determined to make it a Colonie, and choſe Aratus their generall: who made a decree, that thenceforth the citie ſhould no more be called MANTINEA, but ANTIGONIA, as it beareth name vnto this day. Thus it ſeemeth that gentle MANTINEA (for ſo the Poetes called it) was vtterly deſtroyed, and bare the name of an other citie through Aratus meanes; preferring the name of him that deſtroyed the city, & did put all the inhabitants of the firſt to death. After that, king Cleomenes being ouerthrowen in a great battell by the citie of SELASIA, he left the citie of SPARTA, and fled into ÆGYPT. So Antigonus hauing vſed Aratus with all kind of honourable curteſie, he returned againe into MACEDON. There falling ſicke, he ſent Philip that ſhould ſucceede him in the kingdom (being a young ſtrippling growen) into PELOPONNESVS, and ſtraightly charged him ſpecially to follow Aratus councell, and to imploy him when he would ſpeake vnto the cities, and become acquainted with the ACHAIANS. So Aratus hauing receiued him in that ſort, made him ſo well affected and louing towardes him, that he ſent him againe into MACEDON, being throughly determined to make warres with GRECE. So after the death of Antigonus, the ÆTOLIANS began to deſpiſe the careleſneſſe and cowardlineſſe of the ACHAIANS (becauſe that they being acquainted to be defended by ſtraungers, and hauing bene altogether gouerned by the armies of the MACEDONIANS, they liued very idlely & diſſolutely) whereupon they tooke vpon them to make themſelues Lords of PELOPONNESVS. So they aſſembled an armie, and by the way as they went, they onely tooke ſome prey and ſpoyle vpon the lands of the PATRÆIANS, and the DYMÆIANS: but inuading the territorie of MESSINA with all their army, they deſtroyed the whole country before them. Aratus being angry withall, and perceiuing that Timoxenus (who at that time was Generall of the ACHAIANS) did ſtill tract and delay time in vaine, becauſe he was vpon his going out of his yeare: he being appointed Generall for the yeare following, did anticipate his time fiue dayes before, to go and aide the MESSENIANS. Wherefore, leauing an armie of the ACHAIANS, whoſe perſons were now neither exerciſed in armes, nor yet had any deſire to go to the warres: he was ouerthrowen by the citie of CAPHYES. Now, becauſe it was thought that he went ſomewhat too hotly and couragiouſly to the warres, he ſo extremely cooled againe, and left things in ſuch caſe, that all hope being caſt aſide, he ſuffred the ÆTOLIANS in maner to tread PELOPENNESVS vnder their feete, before his eyes, with all the inſolencie and cruelty that might be poſſible, notwithſtanding that they ſundrie times gaue him great aduauntages of them. Thus were the ACHAIANS once againe forced to pray ayde out of MACEDON, and to ſend for young king Philip to make warres in GRECE: hoping for the loue he bare vnto Aratus, and the great truſt he had in him, that he would vſe them gently, and do as they would haue him. But then firſt of all began Apelles, Megareus, and a few other Courtiers to accuſe Aratus: vnto whom king Philip giuing eaſie eare, he procured that one Eparatus, of contrarie faction vnto Aratus, was choſen Generall by the ACHAIANS. Howbeit this new Generall Eparatus being extremely hated by the ACHAIANS, and Aratus alſo leauing to deale any more with matters of ſtate: no acte was done to any purpoſe. Whereupon king Philippe finding his fault, returned againe vnto Aratus, and was ruled altogether by him: and when he found that his affaires proſpered in all things he went about, he then let him alone withall, as from whom came all his honour and greatneſſe. Thereupon euery man eſteemed Aratus a wiſe Gouernour, not onely to rule a common wealth, but alſo a whole realme and kingdome. For his manners, intent, and chiefeſt purpoſe appeared, in the deedes of this young king, as a riche colour that did ſet forth and beautifie them. For the clemencie this young Prince Philippe vſed to the LACEDÆMONIANS, that had offended him, the great curteſie he ſhewed to the CRETANS, whereby in few dayes he wanne all the Iſle of CRETA: and the iourney he made againſt the ÆTOLIANS, which was a wonderfull great exploit: wanne the Prince great fame, for following good councell, and Aratus accounted to be a wiſe Gouernour, and of deepe vnderſtanding. Now the kings flatterers enuying Aratus more then before, and perceiuing that they got no good by ſecret backebyting of him: they then began with open mouth very inſolently to reuile him at the table, and with great deriſion: in ſomuch as one night going home to his tent after ſupper, they pelted him with ſtones all the way as he went. King Philippe when he knew it, was ſo offended therewith, that he did condemne them in the ſumme of twentie talentes: and afterwardes alſo, becauſe they troubled his affaires, he did put them to death. But king Philip in the end being puffed vp with the good fortune and ſucceſſe of this warre, which proſpered as he would haue it: he then grew to be couetous, and began to ſhewe his naughtie nature, and to bewray his diſsimulation wherewith he diſguiſed himſelfe: and by litle and litle to make his vices plainly to appeare. For firſt of all, he abuſed young Aratus wife, which was kept ſecret a long time, becauſe he lay in their houſe, and began dayly to growe more ſeuere and cruell to the common weales: and then the world ſawe plainlie, that he cared no more for Aratus. For the firſt ſuſpition and beginning of the miſtruſt he had of Aratus, came for that which was done at MESSENA. For the MESSENIANS being fallen together by the eares, and in great ciuill warres one with another: Aratus went thither to make peace betweene them. Howbeit king Philip came thither the next day following, and in ſteade of pacifying the quarrell, he ſet them further out together then they were before. Firſt he asked the Gouernours of the citie, and if they had no lawes to bridle the inſolencie and ſtomacke of the common people, and priuately alſo talked with the heades of the faction of the people, and asked them if they had not handes to defende themſelues from tyrantes. So both the one and the other faction truſting to king Philip, the Gouernours would haue layed hold of the Oratours of the citie: but they riſing with the common people, ſlue of their Nobilitie and Magiſtrates, well neare two hundred of them. Aratus that came ſoone after this fact, ſhewed that he was greatly offended with king Philippe, and cauſed his ſonne with open mouth ſhamefully to reproue him. Now it ſeemed that this young Aratus was in loue with king Philippe before: but then he told him before all the people, that for this ſhamefull acte he had done, he thought him now no more fayre of face, but the fowleſt creature that could be. Philippe made no aunſwere to it, although euery man looked he would haue aunſwered him in rage, and that oftentimes as the other reproued him, he byt it in with his teeth: but as if he had not bene offended at all with the bigge wordes his ſonne had ſpoken againſt him, for that he was a ciuill man, and mylde of nature, he tooke Aratus the father by the hand, and caried him out of the Theater where the aſſembly was kept, to the caſtle of Ithome, to do ſacrifice there to Iupiter, and to ſee the forte. This forte was of no leſſe ſtrength then the caſtle of the Acrocorinthe: and when any garriſon is in it, it keepeth all the country about it in obedience, and beſides, it is very hard to driue them out of it. Now Philip being gotten vp into that caſtle, he did ſacrifice there: and when the Soothſayer had brought him the intrals of the oxe which they had ſacrificed, he tooke it himſelfe with both his handes and ſhewed them vnto Aratus, and to Demetrius PHALERIAN, now turning to the one, then vnto the other, and asked them what they iudged of theſe ſignes of the ſacrifice: whether he ſhould keepe the caſtle to himſelfe, or elſe deliuer it to the MESSENIANS. Demetrius ſmiling aunſwered him: if thou beeſt of the Soothſayers minde, then thou ſhalt deliuer it vp: but if thou haſt a kings minde in thee, thou ſhalt then hold the oxe by both hornes. (By the oxe, he meant the country of PELOPONNESVS, and moreouer, that if he kept both theſe caſtles of Ithome, & the Acrocorinthe, all PELOPENNESVS were wholly at his commaundement. (Aratus ſtill held his peace, and ſayd not a word. In the end, Philip praying him to ſpeake, he ſayd. In CRETA, and in the country of the BOEOTIANS and PHOCIANS, there are many ſtrong caſtles ſituated on high hils from the vallies. Moreouer, there are alſo many places of great ſtrength in the marches of the ACARNANIANS, both within maine land, as alſo vpon the ſea coaſt: of all the which thou haſt not taken one of them by force, and yet they all do willingly obey thee notwithſtanding. It is for theeues to hide their heades in high rockes and mountaines, but a king can haue no ſtronger caſtle, then the loue, faith, and good will of men. That is it that opened the ſea of CRETA. That is it that hath brought thee into PELOPONNESVS. Thoſe are the meanes which haue made thee being ſo young a man, ſome of them to chooſe thee their Captaine, and others alſo to make thee their abſolute Lord and Maiſter. Aratus going on with his tale, Philip gaue the intrals againe to the Soothſayer that brought them, and taking Aratus by the hand, (as if by force he had caſt him out of the caſtle, and had alſo taken the citie of MESSINA from him) ſayd vnto him: come on then, let vs euen take that courſe. But after that time, Aratus came as litle to the Court as might be, and ſo by litle and litle left Philips companie. For when he went to make warre in the realme of EPIRVS, he was earneſtly in hand with Aratus to go that iourney vnto him. But Aratus prayed him to hold him excuſed, and ſo remained at home, being affrayed to be brought into an euill name with Philips doings. For Philip afterwards hauing ſhamefully loſt his army by ſea, againſt the ROMAINES, and beſides, hauing had alſo very euill ſucceſſe in all other his affaires: he returned againe to PELOPONNESVS, & thought once more to haue deceiued the MESSENIANS. But when they founde his practiſe, then he began with open force to ſpoyle their country. Aratus then flatly fell out with Philip, and vtterly refuſed his friendſhip, for that he perceiued then the iniurie he had done his ſonnes wife, the which grieued him to the hart, but yet he made not his ſonne priuie to it: becauſe he could get no other amendes, then to know what iniurie had bene done to him, conſidering that he had no way nor meanes to be reuenged. For, king Philip was maruellouſly changed, and from a curteous and chaſt young Prince, become a vitious and cruell tyrant: the which to ſpeake truely, was not a chaunge or alteration in nature, but a manifeſt declaration (when he was no more affrayed of any man) of his wicked and deuiliſh minde, the which through feare had of long time bene kept ſecret. Now, to proue that Philips firſt loue and good will he bare vnto Aratus, was alſo mingled with feare and reuerence: that which he did afterwardes vnto him did plainly ſhew it. For he being deſirous to put Aratus to death, not thinking himſelfe free ſo long as he liued, neither king, nor tyrant: he durſt not go about to kill him himſelfe, but procured one of his Captaines called Taurion, and commaunded him to make him away as ſecretly as he could poſsible, & ſpecially with poyſon, in his abſence. This Taurion fell in friendſhip with Aratus, and poyſoned him with no violent poyſon, but ſo tempered and qualified it, as it did by litle and litle heate the body, and procure a pretie coffe which brought him into a conſumption. Aratus knew he was poyſoned, but becauſe he ſaw it booted not to bewray it, he bare it patiently, and made no wordes of it, as if he had had ſome naturall diſeaſe about him. Yet on a time, one of his chiefeſt friends being in his chamber with him, who wondred to ſee him ſpit bloud as he did: he told him, friend Cephalon mine, this is the reward of a kings loue. So he died of this poiſon in the citie of ÆGIVM, being the ſeuenteenth time choſen generall of the ACHAIANS: who would haue had him buried in the ſelfe ſame place, and haue made ſome honourable monument for him, worthy of his noble life. But the SICYONIANS thinking themſelues diſhonored, if his body were buried any where elſe but in their owne citie: they ſo perſwaded the counſell of the ACHAIANS, that they ſuffered them to take Aratus body with them. Yet was there an auncient law that forbad buriall within the wals of the citie, of any maner of perſon whatſoeuer: and beſides that law, they had a certaine ſuperſtitious feare in them that made them they durſt not. Whereupon they ſent to Apolloes temple at DELPHES, to aske councell of his Nunne that gaue the Oracles, who made them this aunſwere.

This Oracle being brought, all the ACHAIANS were maruellous glad of it, but the SICYONIANS ſpecially: who preſently chaunging their mourning into publike ioy, they caried the body from the citie of ÆGIVM, & brought it home as in maner of proceſsion, in white robes, and garlands of flowers on their heades, ſinging hymnes and ſonges of ioy, and daunſing, till they came to the citie of SICYONE. And there they choſe out the chiefeſt place, and buried him as their founder, father, and ſauiour of their citie: and the place is called at this preſent time, ARATIVM. There they yearely make two ſolemne ſacrifices, the one the fift of Nouember, at which time he deliuered the citie of SICYONE from tyrannie, & they call this ſacrifice

Yearely ſacrifices appointed to honor Aratus memorie.

Soteria, as much to ſay, as the feaſt of health : and the other on his birth day, as it is reported. For the firſt ſacrifice, that was done by the Prieſt of Iupiter the ſauiour. The ſecond ſacrifice alſo was done by Aratus ſonne, who was girt about with a cloth, not altogether white, but mingled with purple colour. So during the ſacrifice, they ſong hymnes vpon the harpe in prayſe of him, and the maiſter of the Muſitians made a proceſsion round about, being accompanied with boyes and young men of the citie, after whom followed the Senate crowned with garlands of flowers, and other citizens that were diſpoſed to go a proceſsion. Howbeit the moſt part of the honours that were appointed to be done vnto him, were left off by proceſſe of time, and chaunge of things that followed afterwardes. Thus you ſee what the life of Aratus the father hath bene, as we finde in hiſtories. Now Philip being a wicked man, and cruell of nature, cauſed his ſonne Aratus alſo to be poyſoned, not with a deadly poyſon, but with ſuch poyſon as troubleth a mans wits ſo, that through their deuiliſh receit, he becometh a ſtarke foole without any wit at all, and maketh him to attempt ſtraunge and abhominable things, and to haue certaine ſhamefull and deteſtable deſires: in ſomuch as his death (though he dyed in the pryme of his youth) could be not thought miſerable, but rather a happy deliuerance to him of all his miſeries and miſhappes. But Philip afterwardes, ſo long as he liued, payed vnto Iupiter (protectour of all iuſtice and friendſhip) the puniſhment his wicked life deſerued. For, after he was ouercome in battell by the ROMAINES, he was compelled to yeeld himſelfe to their mercy, by whom he was depriued from all the reſt of his landes and dominions he had, and of all his ſhips, but fiue onely, and condemned beſides to pay a thouſand talents for a fine, & to giue his ſonne in hoſtage: and they onely left him for pities ſake, the kingdome of MACEDON, with all the appertenaunces. And there he dayly putting to death the chiefeſt of his Nobilitie, and neareſt of bloud vnto him: he filled his realme with crueltie and mortall hate againſt him. Furthermore, amongeſt ſuch a heape of euils, hauing but one onely ioye, to haue a vertuous ſonne: he put him to death, for ſpight and malice that he ſaw the ROMAINES honour him, and left his other ſonne Perſeus ſucceſſour of his realme: who, as it is reported, was not his lawfull begotten ſonne, but taken for his ſonne, and borne of a taylours wife called Gnathenium. It is that Perſeus whom Paulus AEmylius ouercame and lead in triumphe in ROME: and at him, the race of the kings diſcended from Antigonus, fayled. Where the iſſue and offſpring of Aratus, continueth yet vntill our time, in the cities of SICYONE, and PALLENA.

The Empire of Rome, wherto likened.

Iphicrates the Athenian Captaine ſaid, that a mercenarie ſouldier ſhould be couetous, a louer, and voluptuous: that to get wherewith to maintaine his pleaſure, he ſhould be the valianter, and readier to put himſelfe into any daunger. But moſt men thinke, that ſouldiers ſhould be as one entire ſtrong body, that ſturreth not of it ſelfe without the mouing of the generall. And to approue this opiniō, it is ſayd that Paulus Æmylius arriuing in Macedon, & finding the ſouldiers full of wordes & curioſitie (euery man medling with the affaires of the generall) he made opē proclamatiō, no man ſo hardy to medle with his office and affaires, but euery man onely to keepe his ſword ſharpe, and to be quicke of hand againſt the enemy: and for the reſt, to referre all to him, who would take ſufficient order for things of his charge and gouernement. Therefore Plato, that ſaith it litle preuaileth to haue a good and wiſe Captaine, if the ſouldiers alſo be not wiſe and obedient, thinking it as requiſite for the vertue of obedience, to haue men of a noble minde and good education, as otherwiſe it is meete for a Captaine to know how to direct and commaunde well, conſidering it is that which with lenity & mildnes doth mitigate all furie and choller: he hath diuers other examples and ſufficient proofes to proue his wordes true, and namely, the great miſeries and calamities which came to the Romaines after the death of Nero, do plainly ſhew, that nothing is more daungerous nor dreadfull in an Empire, then a great armie liuing licentiouſly and diſorderly. For Demades after the death of Alexander the great, compared Alexanders armie, vnto Cyclops Polyphemus after his eye was put out: conſidering how blindly and looſely they were gouerned. Howbeit the Empire of Rome being deuided into ſundry factions at one ſelfe time, and riſing againſt it ſelfe in many places, it fell into the like miſfortunes and calamities fayned of the Poetes by the Titans: not ſo much through the ambitiouſneſſe of the Emperours, as by meanes of the couetouſneſſe & inſolency of the ſouldiers, who draue the Emperours out of their Imperiall ſeates one after an other, as one nayle driueth out an other. And Dionyſius alſo the tyrant of Sicilia, was wont to call Pheraus, who had bene onely tyrant of Thessalie ten monethes ſpace a tyrant in a play, deriding his ſo ſodaine chaunge of ſtate. But the Imperiall houſe of the Cæſars at Rome receiued foure Emperours, in leſſe then ten monethes ſpace, the ſouldiers now putting in one, and then taking out an other, as if they had bene in a play on a ſcaffold. So that, the ROMAINES being thus grieuouſly oppreſſed, had yet this comfort: that they needed not to ſeeke to be reuenged of them that did oppreſſe them. For they ſaw one of them murther an other, and him firſt and moſt iuſtly of all other murthered, that had firſt of all corrupted the ſouldiers, in teaching them to make gaine of the chaunge of Emperours: and ſo deprauing a worthy deed of it ſelfe, which was their forſaking of Nero: and mingling it with briberie, made it plaine treaſon. For Nymphidius Sabinus, being a Captaine of the Emperours gard, which are called the Prætorian ſouldiers, together with Tigellinus, when he ſaw Nero in diſpaire of himſelf & of his eſtate, and that he was ready to flie into ÆGYPT: he perſwaded the gard they ſhould call Galba Emperour, as if Nero had not bene at ROME, but fled and gone, and promiſed euery one ſeuen thouſand fiue hundred Drachmas a peece. And to the reſt of the ſouldiers that were diſperſed vp and downe in garriſon vpon the prouinces, twelue hundred & fifty Drachmas a man. For the leauying of which ſumme, they could not poſsibly do it, but they muſt needes commit ten thouſand times more extortion to euery body, then Nero had done. This large promiſe made them preſently put Nero to death, and ſhortly after him, Galba himſelfe alſo. For the ſouldiers forſooke Nero, for the hope they had to receiue this promiſed gift: and ſhortly after they ſlue the ſecond, which was Galba, becauſe they receiued not their gifts in time to their contentment. Afterwardes alſo, in ſeeking who ſhould ſtill feede them with like gifts, before they could obtaine their wiſhed hope, one of them deſtroyed an other by treaſon and rebellion. But now to ſet downe all things particularly which hapned at that time, it were to write one whole entire hiſtorie: and therefore, I will content my ſelfe, not to paſſe ouer with ſilence the notableſt deedes and lamentable calamities which happened at that time vnto the Cæſars.

Nymphidius Sabine, and Tigellinus, betrayed Nero.

The hope of gifts deſtroyed the Empire of Rome.

It is manifeſtly knowen to all men, that Sulpitius Galba of a priuate man, was the richeſt and wealthieſt that came to be in the number of the Cæſars: who, though he came of a very noble houſe, deriuing himſelfe from the race and family of the Seruij: yet he was honored the more, becauſe he was a kinne vnto Quintus Catulus, who for vertue and eſtimation, was one of the chiefeſt men of his time, albeit that otherwiſe, he willingly reſigned his authoritie and power vnto others. So Galba thereby was ſomwhat a kinne vnto Liuia, the wife of Auguſtus Cæſar, & therefore for her ſake he came out of the Emperours pallace, when he went to take poſſeſsion of his Conſulſhip. Moreouer, it is reported, that when he had charge of the army in GERMANIE, he did valiantly behaue himſelfe. And in the gouernement of LIBYA alſo, where he was Viceconſull, he did as honourably behaue himſelfe, as any man whatſoeuer. Howbeit his meane and ſimple ordinary of dyet, voyde of all exceſſe, was imputed miſery & niggardlines in him, when he was proclaimed Emperour: becauſe the praiſe of ſober & temperate diet which he would haue brought in vſe, was then ſo raw a thing, that it was taken for a new & ſtrange deuiſe. He was ſent gouernour alſo into SPAYNE by Nero, before he had learned to be affrayed of the citizens of great authoritie: howbeit, beſides that he was of a curteous & gentle nature, his age moreouer increaſed the opinion they had of him, that he was timerous and fearefull. For when the wretched officers of Nero did cruelly vexe & torment the prouinces, and that it lay not in Galba any way to helpe them: yet was it ſome cōfort to them, which were iudged & ſold as ſlaues by the officers, to ſee that Galba did lament the miſeries and calamities they endured, as if they had bene done vnto himſelfe. So when any ſlaunderous rymes were made againſt Nero, which were ſong vp and downe in euery place, he would neither forbid them, nor yet was offended, as Neroes officers were. Therefore he was maruellouſly beloued in the countrey, with them that were acquainted with him: becauſe he was then in the eight yeare of his gouernement as Proconſull amongſt them, at which time Iunius Vindex being Proprætor of GAVLE, rebelled againſt Nero, who as it is reported, had writtē vnto Galba, before he entred into opē action of rebelliō. But Galba, did neither beleeue him, nor alſo accuſe & bewray him, as diuers others which were gouernors of armies & prouinces did: who ſent Vindex letters vnto Nero which he himſelfe had written vnto them, and ſo did as much as in them lay to hinder the enterpriſe, who afterwards being of the conſpiracie did confeſſe they were traitors to them ſelues, as much as vnto him. Howbeit, when Vindex afterwardes had proclaimed open warre againſt Nero, he wrote againe vnto Galba, & prayed him to take the Imperiall crown vpō him, and to become the head of a ſtrong and mightie body (which were the GAVLES) that lacked nothing but a head and gouernour, being a hundred thouſand fighting men ready armed, and might alſo leaue a great number more of them. Then Galba conſulted thereupon with his friends, & among them, ſome were of opinion that he ſhould ſtay a while, to ſee what change and alteration would grow at ROME vpon this ſturre. Howbeit Titus Iunius, Captaine of the Prætorian band, ſayd vnto him: O Galba, what meaneth this ſo doubtfull a deliberation? Be not we wiſe men to call in queſtion, whether we ſhall allow of Vindex friendſhip, or accuſe him? Yea, and with armes perſecute him, that deſired rather to haue thee Emperour, then Nero tyrant ouer the eſtate of ROME? Afterwardes Galba by bils ſet vp euery where, appointed a day certaine, to enfranchiſe ſuch as would make ſute for it. This rumour flying ſtraight abroad, he gathered a great number of ſouldiers together, that were very willing to rebell: & he was no ſooner gotten vp into the tribunall or chaire of ſtate, but all the ſouldiers did ſalute him, by the name of Emperour. Howbeit he was not content with this name at the firſt, but accuſing Nero, and lamenting the deathes of the nobleſt men whom he had cruelly put to death: he promiſed that he would imploy his beſt wit and diſcretion to the ſeruice and benefit of his country, neither naming himſelfe Caſar, nor Emperour, but onely Lieutenant to the Senate, and ſtate of ROME. Now, that Vindex did wiſely to call Galba to be Emperour, Nero himſelfe in his doings doth witneſſe it. Who hauing alwayes made a countenance as though he paſſed not for Vindex, & that he waighed not the rebelliõ of the GAVLES: whẽ it was told him that Galba was called Emperour, he being thẽ at ſupper, for ſpight he ouerthrew the table. Moreouer, though the Senate had iudged Calba an enemy, yet Nero to be pleaſaunt with his friendes, made as though he was nothing affrayed of it, and ſayd, this newes made all for him, becauſe he ſtood in neede of money, and alſo that it was a happy occaſion offred him to helpe him withall. For ſayd he, we ſhall ſoone haue all the GAVLES goodes, as the ſpoyle of a iuſt warre, after we haue once againe ouercome and conquered them: and moreouer, Galbaes goods alſo would quickly be in his hands, that he might ſell them, conſidering that he was become his open enemy. So he preſently commaunded Galbaes goods ſhould be openly ſold, to them that would giue moſt. Galba vnderſtanding that, did alſo by ſound of trumpet ſell all Neroes goods he had in all the prouince of SPAYNE, and did alſo finde more men readier to buy, then there were goods to ſell. Daily men roſe againſt Nero in euery coũtry, who tooke Galbaes part, Clodius Macer only excepted in AFRICK, and Verginius Rufus in GAVLE, both of them hauing charge of legions appointed for the ſafe keeping of GERMANIE: and both of them did follow ſeuerall directiõs by themſelues, varying in mind & intent. For Clodius Macer hauing robbed much, & put diuers men alſo to death through his cruelty & couetouſneſſe: he ſhewed plainly, that he ſwamme betweene two waters, as one that could neither let go his charge, nor yet kept it. Verginius alſo on the other ſide, being generall ouer great & mighty legions, who had ſundry times called him Emperour, & did in maner force him to take vpon him the name and Empire: he notwithſtanding did euer aunſwere them, that he neither minded to take the Empire vpon him, nor yet to ſuffer any other to do it, then ſuch as the Senate ſhould chooſe and call vnto the ſame. This at the firſt ſomewhat amazed Galba. But when both the armies of Vindex and Verginius, in ſpight of their Captaines (who could not ſtay nor keepe them backe, no more then couchmen can keepe backe the horſe with their bridles) were ioyned in a great battell together, where were ſlaine twenty thouſand GAVLES in the field, & Vindex alſo ſlue himſelfe ſhortly after: it was giuen out, that the conquerours after ſo great a victory obtained, would cõpell Verginius to take vpon him to be Emperour, or elſe that they would take Neroes part againe. Then Galba being not a litle perplexed, wrote vnto Verginins, & perſwaded him to ioyne with him, to hold vp the Empire & liberty of the ROMAINES, & therupon fled ſtraight into a city of SPAYNE called *COLONIA, rather repẽting him of that he had done, & wiſhing for his wonted peaceable & quiet life wherwith he was brought vp: thẽ otherwiſe occupying himſelfe about any neceſſary or profitable thing for the furtherance of his enterpriſe. Now it was about the beginning of ſommer, and one day towards euening, there came to Galba one of his ſlaues infranchiſed, a SICILIAN borne, that was come from ROME in ſeuẽ dayes: who vnderſtãding that Galba was alone, went preſently to his chamber doore & opened it, & cõming in againſt the wils of the grõmes of the chãber that ſtood at the doore, he told him that Nero being yet aliue, but ſeen no more, firſt the people of ROME, & then the Senate, had proclaimed him Emperor, & that immediatly after, newes came that Nero was dead, the which he hardly beleeuing notwithſtanding, went thither himſelfe, ſaw his body layed out vpon the ground, & then made towardes him with all ſpeede to bring him theſe newes. The newes maruellouſly reuiued Galba, and a multitude of men thronged ſtraight about his doore, which began to be couragious, ſeeing him liuely againe, although the ſpeede of the Meſſenger ſeemed incredible. Howbeit two dayes after, Titus alſo arriued, with certaine other of the campe, who told Galba particularly what the Senate had decreed in his behalfe. So, this Titus was called to great honour, and the ſlaue infranchiſed had priuiledge giuen him to weare rings of gold, and he was called Martianus Vicellus, who afterwards of all the infranchiſed bond men, became the chiefeſt man about his maiſter Galba. In the meane time, Nymphidius SABINE began at ROME, not couertly, but with open force, to take vpon him the abſolute gouerment of the Empire, perſwading himſelf that Galba was ſo old, that he could hardly be brought in a litter vnto ROME, being at the leaſt three ſcore and thirteen yeare old: beſides alſo, that the army of the PRÆTORIANS which were in ROME, did beare him good will of long time, and then acknowledged none other Lord but him onely, for the large promiſe he had made them, for the which he receiued the thankes, and Galba remained the debter. So he preſently commaunded Tigellinus, his companion & Captaine with him of the army of the PRÆTORIANS, to leaue off his ſword: and diſpoſing himſelfe to bancketing and feaſting, he ſent for all thoſe that had bene Conſuls, Prætors, or Proconſuls of prouinces, and made them all to be inuited in the name of Galba. So there were certaine ſouldiers gaue out this rumour in the campe, that they ſhould do well to ſend Ambaſſadours vnto Galba, to pray him that Nymphidius might be their onely Captaine ſtill, without any companion ioyned with him. Furthermore, the honor and good will the Senate bare him, calling Nymphidius their benefactour, and going dayly to viſite him in his houſe, procuring him to be Authour of all their decrees paſſed in Senate, and that he ſhould authoriſe them: this made him high minded, and the bolder by much, in ſomuch that ſhortly after, they that came to honour him in this ſort, did not onely hate and miſlike his doings, but moreouer he made them affrayd of him. Furthermore, when the Conſuls had giuen to common purſeuants any commiſsions vnder ſeale, or letters pattents ſignifying the decrees of the Senate, to cary them to the Emperour, by vertue of which letters pattents, when the officers of the citie do ſee the ſeale, they ſtraight prouide the purſeuants of couches and freſh horſes to further their ſpeede and haſty iourney: Nymphidius was very angry with them: becauſe they did not alſo come to him for his letters, ſealed by him and his ſouldiers, to ſend likewiſe vnto the Emperour. But beſides all this, it is alſo reported that he was like to haue depoſed the Conſuls: howbeit they excuſing themſelues vnto him, and crauing pardon, did appeaſe his anger. And to pleaſe the Commons alſo, he ſuffred them to put any of Neroes friends to death they could meete withall. Among other, they ſlue a Fenſer called Spicillus, whom they put vnder Neroes ſtatues, which they dragged vp and downe the citie. An other alſo called Aponius, one of Neroes accuſers, they threw him to the ground, and draue charts ouer him loden with ſtones. And diuers others alſo, whom they ſlue in that manner: of the which ſome had done no manner of offence. Hereupon one Mauriſcus, one of the nobleſt men of the citie & ſo eſteemed, ſayd openly in the Senate. I feare me we ſhall wiſh for Nero againe, before it be long. So Nymphidius being come in manner to the fulneſſe of his hope: he was very glad to heare that ſome repyned at him, becauſe he was the ſonne of Caius Cæſar, that was the next Emperour after Tiberius. For this Caius Cæſar, whẽ he was a young man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had bene a fayre young woman, and the daughter of one Calliſtus, one of Cæſars infranchiſed bond men, whom he had gotten of a laundres he kept. Howbeit it is found contrary, that this Nymphidius was borne before Caius Cæſar could know his mother, and men thought that he was begotten by a Fenſer called Martianus, with whom his mother Nymphidia fell in fancie, for that he had a great name at that time in ROME, and indeede Nymphidius was liker to him in fauour, then vnto any other. So, he confeſſed that he was the ſonne of this Nymphidia, howbeit he did aſcribe the glory of the death of Nero vnto himſelfe, and thought himſelfe not ſufficiently recompenſed with the honours they gaue him, neither alſo with the goods he enioyed, neither for that he lay with Sporus whom Nero loued ſo dearely, whom he ſent for to Neroes funerals whileſt his body was yet a burning, and kept him with him as if he had bene his wife, and called him Poppæus. Furthermore, all this did not content him, but yet ſecretly he aſpired to be Emperour, partly practiſing the matter in ROME it ſelfe, by the meanes of certaine women and Senatours which were ſecretly his friendes: and partly alſo through one Gellianus, whom he ſent into SPAYNE, to ſee how all things went there. Howbeit after the death of Nero, all things proſpered with Galba, ſauing Verginius Rufus onely, who ſtood doubtfull yet, & made him ſorely miſtruſt him, for that he was affrayed (beſides that he was generall ouer a great and puiſſant army, hauing alſo newly ouerthrowen Vindex, and ſecretly ruling the beſt part of the Empire of ROME, which was all GAVLE, and then in tumult and vprore, ready to rebell) leſt he would harken vnto them that perſwaded him to take the Empire to himſelfe. For there was no Captaine of ROME at that time ſo famous, and of ſo great eſtimation as Verginius, and that deſeruedly, for that he had done great ſeruice to the Empire of ROME in time of extremitie, hauing deliuered ROME at one ſelfe time from a cruell tyranny, and alſo from the daunger of the warres of the GAVLES. This notwithſtanding, Verginius perſiſting ſtill in his firſt determination, referred the election of the Emperour vnto the Senate: although, that after the death of Nero was openly knowen, the common ſort of ſouldiers were earneſtly in hand with him, and that a Tribune of the ſouldiers (otherwiſe called a Colonel of a thouſand men) went into his tent with a ſword drawen in his hand, and bad Verginius either determine to be Emperour, or elſe to looke to haue the ſword thruſt into him. Yet after that Fabius Valens, Captaine of a legiō, was ſworne vnto Galba, and that he had receiued letters from ROME, aduertiſing him of the ordinaunce & decree of the Senate: in the end, with much a do, he perſwaded the ſouldiers to proclaime Galba Emperour, who ſent Flaccus Ordeonius to ſucceede him, vnto whom he willingly gaue place. So, when Verginius had deliuered vp his army vnto him, he went to meete with Galba, on whom he waited, comming on ſtill towardes ROME. And Galba all that time neither ſhewed him euill countenance, nor yet greatly eſteemed of him, Galba himſelfe being cauſe of the one who feared him, and his friends of the other, but ſpecially Titus Iunius: who for the malice he bare vnto Verginius, thinking to hinder his riſing, did vnwittingly in deede further his good hap, and deliuered him occaſion to draw him out of the ciuill warres and miſchieues, (the which lighted afterwardes vpon all the other Captaines) and to bring him to a quiet and peaceable life in his age. Furthermore, Ambaſſadours were ſent from the Senate, and met with Galba at NARBONA, a citie of GAVLE: where after they had preſented their humble duetie, they perſwaded him to make all the haſt he could poſſible to ſhew himſelfe to the people of ROME, who were maruellous deſirous to ſee him. Galba receiued them very gratiouſly and curteouſly, & made them great cheare, howbeit very modeſtly notwithſtanding. For notwithſtanding that Nymphidius had ſent him diuers Officers, and ſtore of Neroes moueables: yet he would neuer be ſerued with any of them, at any feaſtes or bankets he made, with other then his owne ſtuffe, wherein he ſhewed his noble minde, and how he could maiſter all vanitie. But Titus Iunius ſhortly after told Galba, that this noble mind and ciuill moderatiō, without pride or pompe, was too lowly a manner to flatter the people, and that it was a certaine reſpect of honeſtie that knew not it ſelfe, and became not his greatnes and maieſtie. So, he perſwadid him to vſe Neroes money and ſtuffe, and to be ſumptuous & Princely in his feaſtes, without niggardlineſſe. To conclude, the old man Galba began plainly to ſhew that he would be ruled by Titus Iunius: who aboue all other was extreme couetous, and beſides too much giuen to women. For when he was a young man, the firſt time he went to the warres vnder Caluiſius SABINE, he brought his Captaines wife (which liked good felowſhip) diſguiſed like a ſouldier into the campe, into his generals tent (which the ROMAINES called Principia) and there was ſomwhat bold with her: Wherefore Caius Cæſar committed him to priſon, but he eſcaped at his death. An other time, when he ſupped with Clodius Cæſar, he ſtale a ſiluer pot. Clodius hearing of it, bad him againe to ſupper the next night: but he commaunded his men they ſhould giue him drinke in an earthen cruſe. Thus this theft (through Cæſars pleaſauntneſſe) ſeemed rather a matter of ſport, then of anger: howbeit the faults which he committed afterwards through extreme couetouſnes of money, (at what time he ruled Galba, and bare all the ſway about him) gaue vnto ſome iuſt cauſe, and vnto others apparant colour of tragicall miſchiefes, and grieuous calamities. For Nymphidius, ſo ſoone as Gellianus was returned out of SPAINE, whō he had ſent thither to ſee what Galba did: he enforming him that Cornelius Lacon was Captaine of the guard and houſe of the Emperor, and that Titus Iunius did all in all about him, and that he could neuer be ſuffered to come neere Galba, not to ſpeake with him a part, becauſe thoſe which were about Galba did miſtruſt him, & euer had an eie to him to ſee what he did, he was maruellouſly perplexed withall. Thereuppon he called for all the Centurions, Captaines, and petie Captaines of the campe of the PRÆTORIAN army, and perſwaded them that Galba touching his owne perſon, was a good old and diſcreete man, howbeit that he did not follow his owne aduiſe & counſell, but was ruled altogether by Iunius and Lacon, who marred all: and therefore, that it were good before they came to be of greater power, and to haue ſuch great authority in maneging the affaires of the Empire, as Tigellinus had before, to ſende Ambaſſadours to the Emperor in the name of all the campe, to tell him that in putting thoſe two men from about him, he ſhould be the better welcome vnto ROME, and to all men elſe beſides. The Captaines vtterly miſliked this deuiſe. For they thought it too ſtrange, and beyong all reaſon, to ſeeme to teach an olde Emperor, as if he were but a child that did not know what it was to gouerne: and to appoint him what ſeruants and friendes he ſhould keepe, and whom he ſhould truſt or miſtruſt. Nymphidius perceiuing this, tooke another courſe, and wrote letters vnto Galba to terrifie him, one time ſending him word that he was maruellous euill beloued of many in ROME, & that they were ready to rebell againſt him: an other time alſo, that the legions of GERMANY were reuolted, and that he vnderſtoode the like from the legions in IVRY and SYRIA. And another time alſo, that Clodius Macer in AFRICKE ſtaied all the ſhips fraughted with corne that were bound for ROME. But in the end, finding that Galba made no account of him, and that he gaue no credite to his words nor writings: he determined firſt of all to ſet vpon him. Howbeit Clodius Celſus, borne in the citie of ANTIOCH, a wiſe man, and his faithfull friend, diſſwaded him maruellouſlly not to doe it: declaring vnto him, that he thought there was no one houſe nor family in ROME that would call Nymphidius, Cæſar. Howbeit in contrary manner, diuers others mocked Galba and ſpecially one Mithridates of the Realme of PONT, that ſaid he was a bauld writhen man. For the ROMAINES (ſaid he) haue him in deede now in ſome eſtimation, but when they haue once ſeene him, they will thinke it a perpetuall ſhame and reproch to our time, that he was called Cæſar. So they thought it good to bring Nymphidius about midnight into the campe, and there openly to proclaime him Emperor. Howbeit the chiefe Tribune of the ſouldiers called Antonius Honoratus, gathered his ſouldiers together in the night, and before them all did firſt openly reproue himſelfe, and then them, for that they had ſo often turned and chaunged in ſo ſhort time, without any wit or diſcretion, hauing no iudgement to chuſe the beſt way, but to be pricked forward and caried headlong in that ſort by ſome wicked ſpirit, which brought them out of one treaſon into an other. And yet (ſaid he) our firſt chaunge had ſome countenance of reaſon, to wit, the horrible vices and faults of Nero: but now, where- » in can we accuſe Galba, to haue any countenãce to falſifie our faith vnto him? hath he ſlaine his » mother? hath he put her to death? hath he ſhamefully played the tumbler or cõmon plaier vp- » on a ſcaffold in the Theater? And yet for all theſe vile parts, we neuer durſt once begin to for- » ſake Nero, but gaue credit to Nymphidius words, who told vs that Nero had firſt forſaken vs, » and that he was fled into ÆGYPT. What ſhall we doe? Shall we kill Galba after Nero? what, » ſhal we kill him that is a kinne to Liuia, to make the ſonne of Nymphidia Emperor: as we haue » alreadie ſlaine the ſonne of Agrippina? or ſhall we rather kill him that hath raſhly entred into » this enterpriſe, and thereby to reuenge the death of Nero, and to ſhew our ſelues faithfull ſoul- »

diers vnto Galba? »
All the ſouldiers yeelded ſtraight to the Colonels words, & therewith went to their other companions to perſwade them to keep their faith & promiſe they auowed vnto the Emperor: ſo that they made many of them reuolt againe from Nymphidius. Thereuppon the noyſe and cryes being great, Nymphidius ſuppoſing (as ſome thought) that the ſouldiers did call for him, or elſe hoping betimes to quench this tumult, to ſtay ſuch as were yet wauering:

he went thither himſelfe with great ſtore of torch light, and caried an oration in his hand, the which Ciconius Varro had made for him, & the which he had learned without booke to ſpeak vnto the ſouldiers. But when he found the gates of the campe ſhut, and ſaw diuers men armed vpon the walles, he began to be affraid: and comming nearer, asked them what they ment by it, and by whoſe commandement they had armed themſelues as they did. Anſwere was made him by them all, that they did acknowledge no other Emperor but Galba: the which he ſeemed to like of, and alſo commaunded them that followed him to do the like, and therewithall drew neerer. Whereupon certaine of the ſouldiers that warded at the gate, did open him the gate, and ſuffred him to com in with a few men with him. Howbeit aſſoone as he was come in, firſt there was a dart throwen at him, the which one Septimius that went before him receiued vpon his ſhield, and then others alſo came with their ſwords drawen in their handes to ſet on him, and followed him as he fled into a ſouldiers cabbin, where they ſlew him. Then they layed his body in an open place, and railed it about, that euery man that would, might the next day ſee it. So Nymphidius being ſlaine in this ſort, Galba vnderſtanding of his death, commanded that all Nymphidius friends and confederators that had not bene ſlaine at that time, ſhould for his ſake be put to death, as in deede they were. Amongſt them they ſlew Ciconius that had made the oration for Nymphidius, and Mithridates alſo of PONT. Howbeit, though in deede they had deſerued it, yet men thought it a very cruell part to command theſe men to be put to death in that ſort, which were men of ſuch quality and calling as they were, without due forme and order of law. For euery man ſtoode in good hope vpon the comming in of this new Emperor, to haue ſeene another manner of gouernment, then they had yet ſeene: howbeit they were deceiued of their hope at the firſt choppe. But yet they miſliked this moſt of all, when he commaunded them to kill Petronius Tertullianus, that had bene Conſull, becauſe he was Neroes faithfull friend. But now for the death of Clodius Macer, whom Trebonianus ſlew in AFRICKE by his commandement, and for Fonteius that was alſo ſlaine in GERMANY by Valens: he had ſome reaſon to feare them, becauſe they were in armes, and commanded great armies. But for Tertullianus that was an old man, naked, and vnarmed: truely he ſhould haue put him to his triall by law, if he would haue miniſtred iuſtice, the which he promiſed to keepe at his firſt comming to the Imperiall crowne. Herein they greatly reproued Galba. Now, when he drew neare to ROME within fiue and twentie furlongs, he was compaſſed about with a multitude of Mariners and ſea faring men, that kept the high way on euery ſide, wandring vp and downe in euery place. Theſe were the men whom Nero had gathered together into one legion, and had taken them from the ower and made them ſouldiers. So they were come thither to be ſuters to him, that he would allowe them ſtill to be ſouldiers, and they ſo preſſed arrogantly vpon him, that they would not ſuffer thoſe which came to the new Emperor, to ſee him nor ſpeake with him: but they fell to tumult and vprore, crying out to haue enſignes for their legion, and to be appointed a place to lye in, in garriſon. Galba referred them ouer to an other time, and bad them they ſhould then let him vnderſtand their demand. They told him againe, that this delay was a kinde of deniall, and thereupon fell to plaine mutinie, and followed him with great cryes: inſomuch that ſome of them ſtuck not to draw out their ſwords. Then Galba commaunded the horſemen he had about him, to ſet vpon them. So there was not a man of them that reſiſted, but ſome of them were ouerthrowen, and troden vnder their horſe feete: and others alſo ſlaine as they fled. This was a very euil ſigne and preſage for him, to enter into ROME with ſuch boudſhed, vpon ſo many poore mens dead bodies as lay ſlain on the ground. Howbeit, where ſome before did deſpiſe and mocke him for an old and feeble man, euery man then was affraid of him, and quaked for feare. Furthermore, becauſe he would ſhewe a great change and alteration from the vnreaſonable vaine giftes and expenſes of Nero: it ſeemeth he did many vncomely things. As when one Canus, an excellent plaier on the recorder, had plaid all ſupper time, becauſe it was a maruellous ſweete Muſicke to heare: he praiſed and commended it maruellouſly, and commaunded one to bring him his casket, out of the which he tooke a few crownes, and put them into his hande, ſaying, that it was not money of the common treaſure, but of his owne. Furthermore, he gaue ſtraight commaundement that they ſhould require and call backe againe the gifts Nero had giuen, and beſtowed vpon common players, minſtrels, wreſtlers, and people of ſuch kind of facultie and profeſſion, and to leaue them only the tenth part. But he got litle by this deuiſe. For the moſt part of thoſe that had giftes giuen them, had ſpent and conſumed it all, as men that liue without any rule or order, and ſpent at night that which they get in the day: and beſides, they were to hunt after them that had either taken or bought any thing of them, and to make them to reſtore it againe. But this was an endleſſe worke, for things had bene ſo conueyed from man to man, that in the end it came to an infinite number of mens hands. But of all this, the ſhame and diſhonor returned to Galba himſelfe, though the malice and hatred lighted on Titus Iunius: who onely made the Emperour ſtraight laced to all others, whileſt he himſelfe tooke vnreaſonably of all men, making portſale of euery thing that came to hand. For Heſiodus the Poet ſaith:

As well when the veſſell is full that it ſpill,
As when it is emptie, thirſt craueth drinke ſtill.

But Iunius perceiuing Galba to be old and feeble, would wiſely take his fortune and time, while time ſerued, ſuppoſing it almoſt to be at an end, ſo ſoone as he beganne to enter into it. So in the meane time he did much diſhonor the poore old man, ouergreatly abuſing (vnder cloke of his authoritie) the chiefeſt and waightieſt matters, in reprouing, or altogether hindering thoſe, the which the Prince himſelfe had a good deſire to deale vprightly in, as to puniſh the officers of Nero. For he put ſome of them to death, among the which Elius was one, and certaine other, as Polyclitus, Petinus, and Patrobius: whereat the people maruellouſly reioyced, and cryed out as they went to execution through the market place, that it was a goodly and bleſſed proceſſion, and required Tigellinus of the gods & men, that had bene chiefe maſter and guide of all Neroes tyrannie. Howbeit the trimme man had gotten the vantage, and had largely fed Iunius before: for afterwardes he put poore Tertullianus to death, who had neither betraied nor hated Nero, being as he was, and had neuer offended, nor was partaker of any of his wicked parts he plaied when he was aliue. Whereas he that made Nero worthy of death, and that afterwards had alſo betrayed him: he was left alone, and nothing ſaide vnto him, being a manifeſt proofe to all others, that they ſhould not doubt to hope to obtaine any thing at Titus Iunius hands, ſo they fed him with gifts. For the common people of ROME neuer deſired thing ſo much, as to ſee Tigellinus to be caried to execution: and they neuer left crying out to demaund him in all aſſemblies of the Theater or ſhew place, vntill ſuch time as the Emperour Galba did forbid thē by proclamation, the which declared that Tigellinus would not liue long, becauſe he was ſicke of a conſumption of the lungs, which by litle and litle did weare him to nothing: and Galba prayed the people that they would not make his Empire tyrannicall and bloudie. The people were much offended with this, but yet they ſeemed to laugh at it: and Tigellinus did ſacrifice to the goddes for his health and ſafetie, and prepared a ſumptuous feaſt. Where Iunius riſing from ſupper, being ſet by the Emperor, went vnto Tigellinus to be mery with him, and tooke his daughter being a widdow with him, vnto whom Tigellinus dranke, and offred her a gift of fiue and twentie Myriades of ſiluer: and commaunded one of his chiefeſt concubines to take a carcanet from her necke ſhe wore, & to giue it the other, being worth fifteene Myriades. After he had handled the matter thus, thoſe things that were done vprightly and with iuſtice, were reproued and taken in euill part: as the thing that was graunted to the GAVLES, becauſe they did rebell with Vindex. For men thought that they were not diſcharged of the ſubſidies & taxes they were wont to pay, & that they were made free of ROME, ſo much through the bountie and liberalitie of the Emperour, as it was by Iunius meanes, of whom they had bought it. For theſe cauſes the people hated the Emperor Galba. Howbeit the ſouldiers ſtill liued in good hope, for the gift that was promiſed them at the beginning, thinking that though they had not as much as was promiſed them, they ſhould yet enioy as much as Nero had giuen them. But Galba vnderſtanding that they complained of him, he ſpake a word meete for ſo noble and worthie a Prince as he was: that he vſed to chooſe ſouldiers, not to buy them. This word being reported to the ſouldiers, it bred a maruellous mortal hatred in them againſt him: becauſe they thought it was not only to take the gift away frō them which they hoped preſently to haue receiued, but that it was alſo a preſident to teach the Emperours that ſhould come after him, what they ſhould doe. Howbeit the rebelling mindes of the Prætorian guard at ROME appeared not yet, but was ſecretly kept in for the reuerence they bare vnto the maieſty and perſon of Galba, who kept them that were deſirous to rebel, becauſe they ſaw as yet no beginning of any change or alteration. This did ſomwhat ſmother and keepe in the ſhew of their wicked intent. But they which had before ſerued vnder Verginius, & were at that time vnder Flaccus in GERMANY, thinking themſelues worthy of great rewarde for the battell they had wonne againſt Vindex, and hauing nothing giuen them in recompence: they would not be pleaſed with any thing their Captaine ſaid vnto them, neither did they make any account of Flaccus, becauſe he could not ſturre himſelfe, he was ſo plagued with the gout, and beſides that, he had no maner of experience in warres. So one day when certaine ſports were made, at the bringing in of the which, the Colonels and Captaines (according to the maner of the ROMAINES) made praiers vnto the gods for the health and proſperitie of the Emperour Galba: there were diuers of them that made a noyſe at the firſt, and afterwards when the Captaines continued on their prayers, in the end the ſouldiers aunſwered, if he be worthy. The legions in like maner vnder Tigellinus charge, did oftentimes vſe ſuch inſolent partes: whereof Galbaes officers did aduertiſe him by letters. Wherefore Galba being affraide, and miſtruſting that they did not only deſpiſe him for his age, but alſo becauſe he had no children: he determined to adopt ſome young gentleman for his ſonne, of the nobleſt houſe of the citie of ROME, and to proclaime him his ſucceſſor in the Empire. At that time there was one Marcus Otho, of a noble houſe, but euer giuen to ſenſuality and pleaſure from his cradle, as much as any ROMAINE could be. And as Homer oftentimes doth call Paris, the husband of the faire Helen, naming him by the name of his wife, becauſe he had no other commendable vertue in him: euen ſo Otho came to be knowen in ROME, by marying Poppæa, whom Nero loued when ſhe was Criſpinus wife, howbeit bearing ſome reſpect to his wife, and being affraid alſo of his mother, he had intiſed Otho to be his bawd vnto her. Nero loued Otho dearely, and much delighted in his company, becauſe he was ſo good a fellow and free of his fleſh: and was verie glad ſometime to heare how he mocked him, calling him niggard. The report went, that as Nero on a time was nointing himſelfe with precious oyles and perfumes, he caſt a litle vppon Otho as he went by: who the next day made him a feaſt in his houſe, where ſodainely were thruſt into the hall, diuers veſſels of gold and ſiluer full of this perfumed oyle, that ranne out of them like conduit water, and did wette all the hall. So Otho hauing firſt poſſeſſed Poppæa, and abuſed her vnder hope of Neroes loue: he perſwaded her to be diuorſed from her husband. The which ſhe did, and he receiued her home to his owne houſe, as his lawfull wife: not being ſo well pleaſed to haue part, as he was ſorie and angry alſo to let an other enioy her. Now Poppæa her ſelfe (as it is reported) did not miſlike this his gealouzie, for ſometimes ſhe would ſhut her dore againſt Nero, though Otho were not within: either becauſe ſhe would keepe Nero in breath, and in loue liking ſtill, or elſe as ſome thought, becauſe ſhe would not haue Cæſar to her husband, and likewiſe that ſhe would not refuſe him for her friend, becauſe ſhe was wantonly giuen. But ſo it is, Otho was in danger of his life by marrying of Poppæa: and ſo was it alſo a ſtrange thing, that Nero hauing put his wife and ſiſter to death, only to mary Poppæa, he did yet pardon Otho, & ſaued his life. Howbeit it was for Senecaes ſake that was his friend, through whoſe perſwaſion he was ſent to the fartheſt part of SPAINE alongſt the Ocean ſea, to be Gouernor of LVSITANIA. And there he gouerned ſo wiſely, that he was nothing chargeable nor troubleſome vnto the countrie: knowing that this honorable charge was giuen him, only to mitigate and hide his baniſhment. Afterwards when Galba had rebelled, he was the firſt of all the Gouernors of the prouinces that ioyned with him, and bringing with him all his plate, both golde and ſiluer, vnto the mynt maiſter, he gaue it him to put into bullion, and ſo to be conuerted into currant coine. Moreouer he gaue of his officers vnto Galba, thoſe which he thought the meeteſt men to ſerue a Prince: and otherwiſe, when he was tryed, he ſhewed himſelfe as faithfull & ſkilfull in matters of ſtate, as any one that followed the Emperors traine. Inſomuch as all the way he went many dayes iorney in coch with Galba himſelfe, & did maruellouſly curry fauour with Titus Iunius, beſtowing great gifts vpon him, & alſo entertaining him with pleaſant ſpeches: but ſpecially, becauſe he willingly gaue him the vpper hãd wherby he was aſſured to be the ſecond perſon in credit about Galba. So in all that he did, he far excelled Iunius, for that he graunted mens ſutes frankely and freely without one penny taking, and was beſides eaſie to be ſpoken with of euery man that had any ſute to him: but ſpecially of the ſouldiers, whom he did greatly helpe & further, and cauſed diuers alſo to be called to honorable office, he himſelfe partly mouing the Emperor for them, without any labour or ſute made vnto him, and partly alſo obteining them at Iunius hands, and of the two infranchiſed bondmen of Galba, Icellus, and Aſiaticus. For, theſe three men did beare all the ſway & credit about the Emperor in the court. Moreouer, alwaies when he inuited the Emperor to his houſe, he bribed the Prætorian guard that waited vpon him, and gaue euery ſouldier a crowne. Now this in ſight, ſeemed chiefly to be done to honor the Emperor with: though in deede it was a fine deuiſe to ouerthrow him, to bribe the ſouldiers in that ſort as he did. So Galba conſulting whom he ſhould make his ſucceſſor: T. Iunius preferred Otho vnto him: the which he did not ſimply of himſelfe, nor without reward, but only with promiſe that Otho ſhould marry his daughter if Galba did adopt him his ſonne, and proclaime him ſucceſſor in the Empire. Howbeit Galba did alway ſpecially regard the common wealth before his priuate liking, and ſought to adopt ſuch a one, as ſhould not ſo much pleaſe himſelfe, as otherwiſe he ſhould be profitable & meete for the Empire. But ſurely in my opinion, Galba would not make Otho his heire of his goods, conſidering what an vnreaſonable ſpender he was, & how ſumptuous in all his things, & beſides, farre gone in debt: for he ought aboue fiue thouſand Myriades. So when he had heard Iunius counſell about this adoption, he gently without other anſwere, did put ouer his determination vntil another time, and made Otho onely Conſull at that time, and T. Iunius Conſull with him: whereby it was ſtraight ſuppoſed, that at the beginning of the new yere, he wouldproclaime him his ſucceſſor in the Empire. Which was the thing the ſouldiers moſt deſired of all other. But now, delaying ſtill his determination, the legions of the ROMAINES in GERMANY, did riſe & rebell againſt him all at an inſtant. For he was generally hated of allhis ſouldiers, becauſe he paid thē not the gift he had promiſed them. So they particularly to cloke their malicious intent, alleaged for their cauſe of riſing, that he had diſhonourably reiected Verginius Rufus: and that the GAVLES which had fought againſt them, were rewarded with great & rich priuiledges, and they that tooke not part with Vindex, had bene grieuouſly puniſhed & put to death. Moreouer, that Galba did only honor Vindex death after he was dead, as acknowledging his goodwil vnto him, offring publique oblations and funerall ſacrifices for him, as if by him onely he had bene proclaimed Emperor. Now ſuch ſpeeches & rumors ran through the campe amongſt them, when the firſt day of the yeare came, which the ROMAINES call the calendes of Ianuary, on which day when Flaccus had called the ſouldiers together, to ſweare them to the Emperor according to the cuſtome: they plucked downe Galbaes images, & ſware only in the name of the people, and the Senate of ROME. The Captaines ſeeing what courſe they tooke, were as much affraid of the danger to be without a head, as they ſtood doubtfull of the miſchiefe of their rebellion. So there ſtept vp one amongſt them & ſaid. My fellowes in armes, what do we mean?

Othoes practiſe aſpiring to the Empire.

The legions in Germanie doe rebell againſt Galba.

The ſouldiers doe rebell againſt Galba.

We neither chooſe any other Emperor, nor yet do allow of him that is Emperor at this preſent: »
wherby we ſhew plainly, that we do not only refuſe Galba, but alſo al other to be our head » & Emperor that may command vs. Now for Flaccus Ordeonius, that is but Galbaes ſhadow & » image: I would wiſh we ſhould let him alone there as he is. And for Vitellius, gouernor of the » lower GERMANY, he is not farre from vs, but one daies iorney onely, whoſe father was Cenſor » at ROME, and thrice alſo Conſull, and that was in a maner a Peere & companion of Clodius »
Cæſar in the gouernment of the Empire: whoſe pouertie if any man miſlike in him, is a maniſeſt » proofe of his goodnes & magnanimity. Him therfore let vs chooſe & let the world know » that we can tell how to chooſe an Emperor, better then the SPANIARDS or LVSITANIANS. »

Some of the ſouldiers that ſtood by, confirmed theſe words, but others alſo miſliked of them: inſomuch that among the reſt there was an enſigne bearer that ſtale ſecretly out of the campe, to carrie Vitellius newes hereof, who that night made a great ſupper, and had great ſtore of good company with him. Theſe newes running ſtraight through his campe, Fabius Valens, Colonell of a legion, came the next morning with a great number of horſemen, and was the firſt man that named Vitellius Emperour, who before ſeemed to refuſe that name, as one that was affraid to take the charge of ſo great an Empire vpon him: but after dinner, being full of wine and meate, he came out among them, and accepted the name of Germanicus which they gaue him, and refuſed the name of Cæſar. But therewithall incontinently after, Flaccus ſouldiers leauing their goodly popular oth which they had ſworne in the name of the people & Senate, they all then tooke their othes faithfully to doe what it ſhould pleaſe the Emperor Vitellius to command them. Thus Vitellius was choſen Emperor in GERMANY. So Galba hearing of this new chaunge, thought it not good to deferre time any longer for the adoption he had intended, wherefore certainely vnderſtanding that thoſe whom he truſted moſt about him, were parties in this matter, ſome taking part with Dolabella, and the moſt part of them with Otho, he neither liking the one nor the other, ſodainely without any word ſpoken to any man, he ſent for Piſo (that was the younger ſonne of Craſſus and Piſo, whom Nero had put to death) a young man fairer conditioned, and ſhewed by his graue and modeſt countenance he had by nature, that he was indued with many noble vertues.

Galba came downe preſently from his pallace, and went ſtraight to the campe to proclaime Piſo Cæſar, and his ſucceſſor in the Empire. Howbeit at his ſetting out of his pallace, there appeared many great ſigns in the firmamēt which followed him. And moreouer, when he was alſo come into his campe, and that he began to ſay without booke part of his oration, and partly alſo to read it: it lightned al the while he ſpake, & there fell ſuch a great ſhower of raine vpon it, and a maruellous thicke miſt in the campe, & ouer all the city, that men might eaſily ſee the gods did not like this adoption, & that it would not proſper.

The ſouldiers themſelues ſhewed their diſcontentment by their heauie lookes, & the rather, becauſe at that time there was no ſpeech of reward or liberality. And furthermore, they that were preſent alſo, maruelled much (for that they could gather by the countenance and words of Piſo) that Piſo nothing reioyced at this great fauour, although he lacked not wit & vnderſtanding otherwiſe to acknowledge it. And on the other ſide alſo, they found eaſily by Othoes looks, many ſignes & proofes that he was maruellouſly offended in his mind, to ſee that he was thus deceiued of his hope. For he being the man that was firſt ſpoken of, and thought moſt worthieſt of all other, and being come alſo ſo nere vnto it: now to ſee himſelfe thus wiped out of it, he ſuppoſed that it was a plaine proofe that Galba had no good opinion of him, & that he maliced him in his hart, ſo that after that time he ſtil ſtood in fear of his life. For be being affraid of Piſo, hating alſo Galba, and being grieuouſly offended with T. Iunius: he went his way full of diuers thoughts in his mind. For the Soothſaiers, Aſtronomers, & Chaldeans which he euer kept about him, they did perſwade him not to be diſcoraged for this, & to caſt all hope aſide: but ſpecially one Ptolomy, in whom he had great confidence, becauſe he had oftentimes before foretold & aſſured him, that Nero ſhould not put him to death, but contrarily, that Nero ſhould die firſt, and he himſelfe ſuruiue him, and ſhould become Emperor of ROME.

Whereby Ptolomy hauing proued his firſt prediction true vnto him, he bad him be bold, and feare not that to come. But now beſides him, thoſe that ſecretly complained vnto him, did prick him forward the more, ſighing to ſee him ſo euill dealt with by Galba, & diuers of them chiefly, which bare great authoritie & credit about Tigellinus and Nymphidius: who being then caſt off, and diſcountenanced, came all vnto him, & ſtirred him vp the more.

Otho bribed the Pretorian ſouldiers.

As amongſt others, Veturius & Barbius chiefly, of the which the one had bene Optio, and the other Teſſerarius: (for ſo the ROMAINES call thoſe that be their meſſengers, ſpials, and officers to the Captaines) who with an infranchiſed bondman of his called Onomaſtus, went vnto the campe, and there corrupted ſome ſouldiers with readie money, and other ſome with faire wordes, being of themſelues euill inclined, and expected but occaſion to vtter their malice. For otherwiſe, had the ſouldiers bin all of one mind, it had not bin an enterpriſe to haue bene brought to paſſe in foure daies ſpace (being no more betwixt the adoption and murther) to make a whole campe rebell in that ſort. For they were ſlaine the fifteenth day of Ianuary, on which day Galba did ſacrifice in the morning within his pallace, before his friends.

But at that time the Soothſaier called Ombricius, when he had the intrals of the beaſtes ſacrificed in his handes, and had looked vpon them: he ſpake not doubtfully, but plainely, that he ſaw ſignes of great tumult and rebellion, and that the Emperour was in preſent daunger of great treaſon. Whereby it plainely appeared, that the goddes had put Galba into Othoes handes: for he ſtoode at that time behinde Galba, and both heard and ſawe all that the Soothſayers did.

So he ſeeming to be grieued withall in his minde, and his colour chaunging oft for the feare he was in: his infranchiſed bondman Onomaſtus came and tolde him that the maſons and chief carpenters were come to ſpeake with him, and taried for him. This was the watch word agreed vppon betweene them, at which time Otho ſhould then goe vnto the ſouldiers. Then Otho ſayed, that he went to looke to an old houſe he had bought, which was falling downe, and in decay, and that he would ſhew it vnto the workemen. So he went his way, and came from the pallace, by the place they call Tiberius houſe, into the market place, where the golden piller ſtandeth, where alſo the greateſt high wayes of all ITALIE doe meete together. There certaine met him that firſt called him Emperour, which were not in all aboue three and twenty perſons. Thereupon, though Otho was not vnconſtant as it appeared, notwithſtanding he was ſo fine and effeminate a man, but rather reſolute and ſtout in inſtant daunger: yet feare ſo oppreſſed him at that time, that he would faine haue left his enterpriſe. Howbeit the ſouldiers would not ſuffer him, but compaſſing his litter round about with their armes, and their ſwords drawen in their hands, they commaunded the litter men to go forward. So Otho as he went haſtening on his driuers, he often muttered to him ſelfe, I am but dead. Some hearing him as they paſſed by him, rather wondred, then that they were otherwiſe troubled, to ſee ſuch a ſmal number of men about him, that they durſt venter vpon ſo hard an enterpriſe. Now as he was caried through the market place, he was met withall by certaine others, and afterwards by others, by three and by four in a company: al the which came and ioyned with him, & cried Cæſar, Cæſar, hauing their ſwords drawen in their hands. Now the Colonell apppointed for that day to guard the field of Mars, knew nothing of this conſpiracy, but being amazed and affraied with their ſodaine comming, he ſuffred them to come in. So when Otho was come in, he found no man that reſiſted him. For they that knew nothing of the practiſe, being cōpaſſed in with thoſe that were made priuy to it, & had knowen it of long time: being found ſtragling here and there, by one and by two, they followed the reſt for feare at the firſt, & afterwards for good wil. This was brought ſtraight to Galba to the pallace, the Soothſayer being yet buſie about his ſacrifice: inſomuch that they which beforegaue no credite to thoſe diuinations, began then to maruell much at this heauenly ſigne. Then there ran immediatly a great number of people from the market place, vnto the pallace. Thereupon Iunius and Lacon, and certaine other of Galbaes infranchiſed bondmen, ſtood to gard Galbaes perſon with their ſwords drawen in their hands. Piſo alſo went out to ſpeake vnto the ſouldiers that guarded the Emperors perſon. Moreouer, becauſe the ILLYRIAN legion lay out of the campe in a place called Vipſanus: they diſpatched away Marius Celſus with all ſpeede, a very honeſt man, to get that place. Galba in the meane time ſtood in doubt whether he ſhould come out of the pallace or not: for Iunius would not let him go, but Celſus and Lacon perſwaded him to go out. Inſomuch as they fell at great words with Iunius, that went about to diſſwade him from it. In this ſturre there ran a rumor that Otho was ſlaine in the field. Immediatly after came Iubius Atticus, one of the nobleſt ſouldiers of all the Emperours guard, and ſhewed his ſword drawen, crying that he had ſlaine Cæſars enemy: and thruſt through the preaſe, and got to Galba, & ſhewed him his ſword bloudied. Galba looking him in the face, asked him who commanded him to doe it. The ſouldier anſwered him: the faith and oath he had made vnto him. Therewith all the people that ſtood by cried out, it was nobly done of him, and clapped their hands for ioy. Then Galba taking his litter, went out of his pallace to do ſacrifice to Iupiter, and alſo to ſhew him ſelfe openly. Howbeit he was no ſooner come into the market place, but he heard contrary news, that Otho was Lord and Maiſter of the whole campe and army. Then, as it happeneth in ſo great a preaſe of people, ſome cried out to him to returne backe againe, others would haue him to go forward: others bad him be affrayed of nothing, and others willed him to looke to him ſelfe. So his litter being thus turmoyled to and fro, as toſt vpon the ſea, ſomtime borne back, otherwhile caried forward: firſt of all they ſaw certaine horſmen, and then footmen alſo armed, comming frō Pauls pallace, al of thē together crying out with loud voice, hence, hence, priuat man. Thē al the people ſet vpō a running, not flying diſperſedly, but in heaps vpō proches & ſtals in the market place, as it had bin to haue ſeen ſome ſight or ſport. Thē one called *Attilius Sarcello, ouerthrew one of the images of Galba, which was as it were a beginning of opē wars. Others round about threw dartes on euery ſide of him againſt his litter. But when they ſaw they could not kill him, then they came nearer to his litter with their ſwords drawen in their handes, and neuer a man of his left with him to offer to defend him, ſauing one man onely, whom the Sunne ſawe that day, amongeſt ſo many thouſands of men, worthy of the Empire of ROME: and he was called * Sempronius. He hauing receiued priuately no manner of pleaſure at Galbaes hands, but only to diſcharge his oath and duety: ſtepped before the litter, and lifting vp a vine braunch he had in his hand (with the which the ROMAINE Captains doe vſe to beate their ſouldiers that haue offended) hee fell out with them that did ſet vpon him, and prayed them to hold their hands, and not to hurt their Emperour. But in the end when he ſaw they would not leaue, but that they fell to it in good earneſt: he then drew his ſword, and bare off the blowes as well as he could, vntill they hought him, that he fell to the ground. Then Galbaes litter being ouerthrowen right in the place called Curtius lake: Galba lay on the ground armed in his curaces. The traiterous ſouldiers flew vpon him, and gaue him many a wound: and Galba holding out his necke vnto them, bad them ſtrike hardily, if it were to do their countrey good. So he had many wounds on his armes and his thighes, as it is reported: howbeit the ſouldier that ſlue him, was called Camurius, of the fifteenth legion. Others do report that it was one Terentius, other alſo ſay Arcadius: And ſome other do call him Fabius Fabulus: who hauing ſtriken off his head, wrapped it in the lappe of his gowne, becauſe he could not otherwiſe take hold of it, for that he was al bald. Howbeit his fellowes and conſorts would not ſuffer him to hide it, but rather that his notable fact he had done ſhould be ſeene. Therefore he ſet it vppon the point of his launce, and ſo ſhaking the face of this poore olde man, (a wiſe and temperate Prince, and chiefe Biſhoppe, and Conſull) he ranne vp and downe (like madde women poſſeſſed with the ſpirite and fury of Bacchus at the feaſtes of Bacchus) bowing downe his launce being all of a goare bloud. When his head was brought to Otho, it is ſayed he cried out aloud: tuſh my fellowes, this is nothing: vnleſſe you bring me alſo Piſoes head. So not long after, they brought him his head alſo. For the yong man being hurt, fled, and was followed by one called * Marcus, who ſlue him hard by the temple of Veſta. So did they alſo kill Titus Iunius: who openly confeſſed that he was one of the conſpiracy againſt Galba, and cried out to them that ſlue him, that Otho did not know they did kill him. This notwithſtanding, the ſouldiers ſtrake off his head and Lacons alſo, and brought them both to Otho to receiue the reward. Howbeit, as the Poet Archilochus ſayth:

> Of ſeuen peraduenture ſlaine dead on the ground,
> A thouſand will ſay, that they all gaue the wound.

The Senate ſware by the name of Otho.

Citizens heades ſold at Rome.

So there were diuerſe men at that time, who being no partakers of this murther, hadde bloudied all their handes and ſwordes, and ſo ſhewed them bloudied to haue reward alſo: but Vitellius notwithſtanding made inquirie of them afterwardes, and cauſed them to be put to death. There came into the field alſo, one Marius Celſus, whom diuerſe men accuſed to haue perſwaded the ſouldiers to aide Galba, and the common people cried out, and bad he ſhould be put to death. Howbeit Otho would not ſuffer them to kill him: and yet being afrayed to contrary the ſouldiers mindes, he told them they ſhould not kill him ſo raſhly, becauſe he was firſt to learne ſome things more of him. So he commanded them to binde him, and deliuered him to be kept of thoſe he truſted moſt. Afterwards, the Senate were preſently aſſembled: who, as if men had bene ſodainely changed from them they were, or as if there had bene new goddes, they all ſware by the name of Otho, (the which oath he him ſelfe had before ſworne vnto Galba, and did not keepe it) and called him beſides, Auguſtus, and Cæſar, the bodies of them that were ſlaine lying yet headleſſe on the ground in the market place, all in their Conſuls robes. And as for their heads, the ſouldiers after they could tell no more what to doe with them, they ſold the head of Titus Iunius vnto his daughter, for the ſumme of two thouſand fiue hundred Drachmas. And for Piſoes head, his wife through intreaty, begged it of one called Veranius. On the other ſide, for Galbaes head, they gaue it vnto Patrobius and Vitellius ſeruaunts: who, after they had vſed it as vilely as they could deuiſe, they threw it at length in a place, wher their bodies are caſt, whom the Cæſars put to death, the which they cal Seſtertium. Now for his body, Heluidius Priſcus, through Othoes ſufferance, caried it away, and Argius, one of his infranchiſed bondmen, buried it by night. Thus haue you heard the hiſtory of Galba, a man that in nobility and wealth, was inferior to few ROMAINES, and in them both was the chiefeſt man of all his time, and had alway liued in honorable fame and eſtimation, in the raigne of fiue Emperours. So that he ouercame Nero by his good name, and the good opinion men had of him: and not through his owne force and power. For of them that ſtroue to make themſelues Emperours at that time, ſome found no man that thought them worthy of it: others did put forth them ſelues, as thinking them ſelues worthy of it. Howbeit Galba was called vnto it, and obeyed them that called him, vſing his name againſt Vindex boldnes: whereby he procured, that his riſing (which before was called innouation and rebellion) was then called ciuill warre, after that his faction came to haue a man to be their head, thought worthy to be their Emperor. And therefore he did not ſo much deſire to be Emperor for him ſelfe, as to do good to his countrey and common wealth. But yet he erred, in ſeeking to command the ſouldiers whom Tigellinus and Nymphidius had ſpoiled by their flatteries: euen as in old time Scipio, Fabricius, and Camillus did command the ſouldiers of the Empire of ROME at that time. So he being now a very old man, ſhewed him ſelfe a good Emperour and after the old ſort, in his behauiour towards the ſouldiers only: but in all other things elſe, being caried away with the couetouſnes of T. Iunius and Laco, and of other his infranchiſed bondmen, he left none deſirous to be gouerned by him, but many that were ſory for his death.

THE LIFE OF Otho.

IMP. OTTO CAESAR AVG. TR P

THe next morning, the new Emperour by breake of day went vnto the Capitoll, and ſacrificed, and there ſent for Marius Celſus to come vnto him, whom he curteouſlie ſaluted, and prayed him rather to forget the cauſe of his impriſonment, then to remember his deliuery. Marius Celſus made him a wiſe and noble aunſwere againe, and ſayed that the matter for the which they would haue accuſed him vnto him, did witnes his behauiour, ſhewing him ſelf faithfull vnto Galba, who neuer did him any pleaſure. Theſe words of them both did maruellouſly pleaſe the people: & ſo did they like the ſouldiers alſo wõderfully wel. Moreouer, after he had very fauorably and graciouſly taken order for matters in the Senate, the reſt of the time he had to be Conſull, he imployed partly about Verginius Rufus, and did alſo eſtabliſh them Conſuls in their place and degree, which had bene called vnto that dignity by Nero, or otherwiſe by Galba: and he alſo honored the oldeſt Senators and of greateſt eſtimation with certaine Prieſthoodes. Beſides all this, he reſtored vnto all thoſe Senators that were baniſhed by Nero, and called home againe, all their goods yet vnſold. Whereupon the chiefeſt Magiſtrates and noble men of the city that quaked before for feare, ſuppoſing that he was not a man, but rather a deuill or fury of hell that was come to be Emperour: they all became glad men, for the good hope of this ſmiling and gracious raigne they were ſo lately entred into. Moreouer, nothing pleaſed all the ROMAINES together more, nor wanne him the good will of all men ſo much, as that he did vnto Tegellinus. For it was puniſhment enough for him, if he had had no more but the feare of the puniſhment euery man threatned him withall, as a thing due to the common wealth, and alſo by reaſon of the incurable diſeaſes his body was infected withall. Now, though the noble men thought his vnreaſonable inſolency and luſt of the fleſh, (following naughty packes, and common ſtrumpets, burning ſtill in filthy concupiſcence) an extreame puniſhment, comparable to many deaths, and being alſo no better then a dead man in maner, ſtill following pleaſure and ſenſuality as long as he could: this notwithſtanding, all men were offended with him, that they ſhould ſee ſuch a wicked creature as he liue, that had put ſo many noble men to death. So Otho ſent for him, who liued very pleaſantly at his houſes in the countrey, by the city of SINVESSA, and had ſhippes euer ready vppon the ſea coaſt, to flie if neceſſity draue him to it. Thereuppon he firſt ſought to bribe him with money, which was ſent with commiſſion to apprehend him, and perſwaded him to let him ſcape: but when he ſaw he could not frame him to his minde, yet he refrayned not to giue him gifts, and prayed him to giue him leaue to ſhaue his beard. The other graunted him. Then Tigellinus tooke a razer, and did cut his owne throate. So, Otho hauing pleaſed the people thus well, he ſought not otherwiſe to be reuenged of his priuate iniuries. Moreouer, to curry fauour with the common people, he refuſed not to be called Nero, in any open aſſemblies at the Theaters. Alſo when certaine priuate men had ſet vp Neroes images in open ſight, Otho was not offended withall: but moreouer Clodius Rufus writeth, that letters pattents and commiſſions were ſent into SPAINE by poſts, ſubſcribing the goodly name of Nero, with the name of Otho. Howbeit when it came to his eares that the noble men of ROME miſliked of it: he left it off, and would write it no more in his letters. So Otho hauing begunne in this ſort to ſtabliſh his Empire, the ſouldiers maruellouſly troubled him. For they continually perſwaded him to take heede to him ſelfe, and to beware how noble men and gentlemen came neare vnto him: the which they did, either for that in deede they bearing him good will, were affrayd ſome trechery or treaſon would be ſecretly practiſed againſt him: or elſe it was ſome fayned deuiſe to ſet all together by the eares, and to bring it to ciuill warre. For when Otho him ſelfe had ſent Criſpinus with his ſeuenteenth legion to bring him certaine priſoners, and that Criſpinus was ready before day, going to performe the effect of his commiſſion, hauing loden carts with armor and weapon for his ſouldiers: the deſperateſt and boldeſt men among men, began to crie out, and ſayd that Criſpinus ment no good in his heart, and that the Senate went about to make ſome chaunge and ſturre, and that his armor and weapons were not for Cæſar, but againſt him. Theſe wordes moued many mens conſciences, and made them to rebell: ſo that ſome layed hold vppon the cartes to ſtay them, others ſlue two Centurions out of hand, and Criſpinus him ſelfe alſo that would haue ſtayed them. Thereuppon all of them together, one incoraging an other, went directly to ROME, as meaning to aide the Emperor. But when they came thither, vnderſtanding that there were foure ſcore Senatours at ſupper with the Emperour, they ranne ſtraight to the pallace, crying out that it was a good occaſion offered them to kill all Cæſars enemies at a clappe. Hereupon all ROME was ſtraight in armes, looking immediatly after to be ſacked and ſpoyled of all that euer they had: and the people ranne vp and downe the pallace, here and there, Otho him ſelfe alſo being in great feare and diſtreſſe. For men might eaſily ſee he was affrayed, becauſe of his gueſtes he had bidden, not for him ſelfe, ſeeing them all amazed with the matter for feare, not ſpeaking a word vnto him, but ſtaring on him ſtill, and ſpecially thoſe that came and brought their wiues with them to ſupper.

Tumult amongeſt the Prætorian ſouldiers.

The death of Criſpinus.

So Otho ſodainly ſent the Captaines vnto the ſouldiers and commanded them to ſpeake with them, and to pacifie them as well as they could: and therewithall he made them take away the borde, and conueyed his gueſtes out of his pallace by ſecret poſternes. So they ſaued themſelues, paſſing through the ſouldiers, a litle before they entred into the hall where the feaſt was kept, crying out, and asking, what was become of Cæſars enemies. So the Emperour riſing from his bedde, he pacified them with gentle wordes, the teares ſtanding in his eyes, and thereby at length he ſent them all away.

The next morning he liberally beſtowed vpon euery ſouldier, a thouſand two hundred and fifty Drachmas: and then hee went into the market place, and there gaue great commendation to the common people for their ready good wils they had ſhewed vnto him: howbeit, he ſaid there were ſome among them, that vnder colour and pretext of honeſty, did commit many leud partes, and made his goodneſſe and grace towardes them to be euill ſpoken of, and their conſtancy and faith alſo to be miſliked of, and prayed them his griefe might be theirs, and that the offendors might be puniſhed. They all confirmed his wordes, and bad him aloud he ſhould do it. So Otho thereuppon cauſed two of them only to be apprehended, ſuppoſing no man would be greatly offended with the puniſhment of them, and then went his way. Thoſe that loued and truſted him, maruelled much to ſee this chaunge. Other were of opinion, that it ſtoode him vppon to doe ſo, to winne the ſouldiers hearts, becauſe of the warre at hand.

Now news came flying to him out of all parts, that Vitellius had taken vpon him the authority to be Emperour, and poſtes came to him one in an others necke, to tell him that numbers of people came in dayly to ſubmit them ſelues vnto Vitellius. Others told him alſo, how the legions remaining in PANONIA, DALMATIA, and MYSIA, had choſen Otho. Immediatly after, friendly letters were brought him alſo from Mutianus and Veſpaſianus, the one of them being in SYRIA, and the other in IVDEA, with great and mighty armies. Whereupon Otho giuing credit vnto them, wrote vnto Vitellius and bad him beware how he meddled with any deeper enterpriſe, then became a priuate ſouldier: and that he would giue him golde and ſiluer enough, and a great city, where he might liue quietly, and take his pleaſure. Vitellius gently anſwered him at the firſt, and ſported with him: but afterwards they falling out one with an other, ſpitefull letters were ſent betwixt either parties, one of them reproaching an other, not falſely but fondly, and fooliſhly detecting each others vices.

For in deede it was hard to iudge, which of them two was moſt licentiouſly giuen, moſt effeminate, leaſt skilfull, poorer, or moſt indebted before. Now at that time they talked of wonderfull ſignes that had bene ſeene: howbeit they were but flying tales, and there was no man to iuſtifie them.

wonders ſeene at Rome.

But in the Capitol there was the image of Victory ſet vpon a triumphing chariot: the which euery body ſaw did let ſlacke the raines of the bridles of the horſes which ſhe had in her hands, as though ſhe could not ſtay them any more. The ſtatue of Caius Cæſar alſo within the Iland, which ſtandeth in the middeſt of the riuer of Tiber at ROME, without any earthquake or ſtorme of winde, turned of it ſelfe from the Weſt to the Eaſt: the which (as it is reported) chanced about the time that Veſpaſian began to take vpon him to be Emperour.

Many alſo tooke the ouerflowing of the riuer of Tiber for an euill ſigne. For in deede it was at that time of the yeare when riuers do ſwell moſt, yet was it neuer ſo great before, neither had it euer done ſo much hurt as it did at that time. For it had ouerflowen her bankes, and drowned the moſt part of the city, and ſpecially the corne market: inſomuch that they ſuffered famine many dayes after in ROME. In all this ſturre, newes came that Cecinna and Valens, (two of Vitellius Captaines) had taken the mountaines of the Alpes: and moreouer in ROME, Dolabella a noble man, was ſuſpected by the Prætorian ſouldiers, that he practiſed ſome treaſon. Now Otho, eyther becauſe he was affrayed of him, or of ſome other: he ſent him to the citie of AQVINVM, promiſing him he ſhould haue no other hurt. Then chooſing the choyſeſt gentlemen which he would take with him, among others he tooke Lucius, the brother of Vitellius, and did not depriue him of any iot of his honor and dignity. Moreouer, hee was verie carefull to ſee his wife and mother ſafe, that they ſhould not be affrayed of them ſelues. Beſides all this, he appointed Flauius Sabinus, Veſpaſians brother, Gouernour of ROME in his abſence: and did it for Neroes ſake, who had before giuen him the ſame honour and authority the which Galba had taken from him: or els to make Veſpaſian ſee, that he loued & truſted him.

The frowardnes of Otho and Vitellius ſouldiers.

Placentia the fertileſt towne of all Italie.

The praiſe of Othoes Captaines, and diſpraiſe of Vitellius Captaines.

Fabius Valens

So he taried behinde at Breſſelle, a city ſtanding vpon the riuer of Po: and ſent his army before vnder the conduct of Marius Celſus, of Swetonius Paulinus, and of Gallus and Spurina, all noble and great perſonages, howbeit they could not haue their wils to rule the army as they would, becauſe of the inſolency and ſtubborneſſe of the ſouldiers, who would haue no other Captaines but the Emperour onely, ſaying that he, and none other, ſhould commaund them. In deede, the enemies ſouldiers alſo were not much wiſer, nor more obedient to their Captaines, but were braue and luſty vppon the ſelfe ſame occaſion: howbeit they had this aduantage ouer the other, that they could tell how to fight, and were all well trained in the warres, and could away with paines and hardnes, and neuer ſhrunke from it. Whereas the Prætorian ſouldiers that came from Rome, were fine meale-mouthed men, becauſe they had beene long from the warres, and had liued at eaſe in Rome, and taken their pleaſure in banquetting and playes: and therefore in a brauety and iolity, they would needs haue men thinke that they diſdained to do what their Captaines commaunded them, as men that were too good to do it, and not that they were fine fingered, and loth to take paines. So that when Spurina would haue compelled them, he was in danger of death, and ſcaped very narrowly that they ſlue him not. For they ſtucke not to reuile him, and giue him as fowle wordes as they could: calling him traitor, and curſing him, ſaying that he marred all Caſars affaires. Yea and there were ſome of them that hauing their full cuppes went in the night to his tent, to aske him leaue to depart, ſaying that they would go to the Emperour, and complaine to him of him. But the flout they had giuen them by their enemies about that time, hard by the city of Placentia, did ſtand Spurina and his affaires to great purpoſe. For Vitellius ſouldiers comming hard to the wals of the city, did mocke Othoes men that were at the cranewes of the ſame, and called them fine dancers, and goodly ſtage players, that had ſeene nothing but playes and feaſtes: and that for feats of armes, and battels, they knew not what it ment: and that the greateſt act they euer did, was for that they ſtrake off the head of a poore naked olde man, meaning by Galba: and that to come to fight a battell in the fielde before men, their hearts were in their heeles. Theſe vile words galled them to the heart, and made them ſo mad withall, that they came of them ſelues to pray Spurina to commaund them what he thought good, promiſing that from thence forth they would neuer refuſe any paines or daunger he would put them to. Thereupon, there was a hotte aſſault giuen to the city of Placentia, with great ſtore of ſundry engines. Howbeit Spurinaes men had the better, and hauing with great ſlaughter repulſed the aſſailants, they ſaued one of the goodlieſt, the greateſt, and moſt floriſhing cities of all Italie. So Othoes Captaines were farre more familiar, curteous, and ciuill to deale with cities and priuate men, then Vitellius ſouldiers were. For, of Vitellius Captaines, Cecinna, was neither for perſon nor maners accompanyable for the people, but ſtraunge, monſtruous, and troubleſome to ſee him onely, a mighty made man wearing gallie gaskons, and coates with ſleeues, after the faſhion of the Gaules, and ſpake in this attire vnto the enſigne bearers, and Captaines of the Romaines. Furthermore, he had his wife alway with him brauely mounted a horſebacke, gallantly apparelled, and accompanied with a troupe of the choyſeſt men of armes of all the companies. The other, Fabius Valens, he was ſo couetous, that no ſpoile of enemies, no polling of ſubiects, nor bribes taken of their friends and confederates, could quench or ſatisfie his vnſatiable couetouſnes: whereby it ſeemeth that was the let, that comming on ſo ſlowly, hee was not at the firſt battell. Howbeit others do blame Cecinna for it, that made too much haſt, for the deſire he had to haue the onely honor of the victory to himſelfe: and this was the cauſe, that beſides his other light faultes, he alſo made this, that he gaue battell out of due time and ſeaſon, and when it came to the pointe in deede, yet he fought it out not valiantly, ſo that he had almoſt caſt all alway. For when he had the repulſe fr[illegible] Placentia, he went vnto Cremona an other great city. And Annius Gallus going to aide Spurina, who was beſieged in the city of Placentia: when he heard by the way that the Placentines had the better, and that the Cremonenses, were in great danger and diſtreſſe: he marched thither with his army, and went and camped hard by the enemies. After that alſo, the other Captaines of either ſide came to aide their men. Howbeit Cecinna hauing layed a great number of his beſt ſouldiers well armed in ambuſhe, in certaine thicke groues and woddes: he commaunded his horſemen to march forward,and if the enemies came to charge them, that they ſhould retyre litle and litle,making as though they fled, vntill they had drawen them within his ambuſh.So there were certaine traitors that bewrayed the ambuſh vnto Marius Celſus, who came againſt them with his choyce men of armes, and did not follow them ouer raſhly, but compaſſed in the place where the ambuſh lay, the which he raiſed, and in the meane time ſent to his campe with all poſſible ſpeede to his footemen to make haſte thitherward: and it ſeemeth,that if they had come in time, they had not left one of their enemies aliue, but had marched vppon the bellies of all Cecinnaes armie, if they had followed the horſemen in time, as they ſhould haue done. But Paulinus being come too late to aide them, for that he came ſo ſlowly: he was burdened that he did not the duetie of a Captaine, that bare the name and countenance he caried. Furthermore, the common ſouldiers accuſed him of treaſon vnto Otho, and ſtirred vp their Emperour againſt him,and ſpake verie bigge words of themſelues, ſaying, that they had ouercome for their owne partes, had not the cowardlines of their Captaines bene, who put them by the victory. So Otho did not truſt him ſo much,that he would not make him beleeue but that he miſtruſted ſomewhat. Therefore he ſent his brother Titianus to the campe, and Proclus with him, Captaine of the Prætorian guard, who indeede commanded all, but in ſight Titianus had all the honor, as bearing the name of the Emperours Lieutenant. Marius Celſus, and Paulinus followed after,bearing name of counſellers and friends only: howbeit otherwiſe they meddled with nothing, neither had any authoritie giuen them. On the other ſide, the enemies were in as much trouble as they, and thoſe ſpecially, whom Valens led. For when newes was brought of the conflict that was betweene them in this ambuſh, they were angrie with him, becauſe they were not at it, and for that he had not led them thither, to helpe their men that were ſlaine: inſomuch that he had much a doe to pacifie and quiet them, they were ſo readie to haue flowen vpon him. So Valens at length remoued his campe, & went & ioyned with Cecinna. Howbeit Otho being come to his campe at the towne of BEBRIACVM, which is a litle towne hard by CREMONA: he conſulted with his Captaines whether he ſhould giue battell or not. So Proclus and Titianus gaue him counſell to fight, conſidering that the ſouldiers were very willing to it, by reaſon of the late victorie they had wonne, and wiſhed him not to deferre it: for thereby he ſhould but diſcourage his armie, which was nowe willing to fight, and alſo giue their enemies leaſure to tarie for their Chiefetaine Vitellius, who came himſelfe out of GAVLE. But Paulinus in contrarie manner alleaged, that the enemies had all their force and power preſent, with the which they thought to fight with them, and alſo to ouercome them, and that they wanted nothing: whereas Otho looked for an other armie out of MYSIA and PANNONIA,as great an army as his enemies had alreadie,ſo that he could tary his time, and not ſerue his enemies turne: and alſo, that if the ſouldiers being now but a few in number were willing to fight, they ſhould then be much more incouraged, when they ſhould haue greater company, and ſhould alſo fight with better ſafetie. Furthermore he perſwaded them, that to delay time was for their auaile, conſidering that they had plentie and ſtore of all maner of prouiſion: where the enemies on the other ſide being alſo in their enemies country, their victuals would quickely faile them. Marius Celſus liked very well of theſe perſwaſions. And ſo did Annius Gallus, who was not preſent at this counſell (but gone from the campe, to be cured of a fall he had from his horſe) but he was written to by Otho to haue his opinion alſo. So Annius Gallus returned aunſwere, that he thought it not beſt to make haſte,but to ſtay for the armie that came out of MYSIA,conſidering they were onwardes on their way. Howbeit Otho would not hearken to this counſell, but followed their mindes that concluded of battell: for the which were alleaged diuers occaſions. But the chiefeſt and likelieſt cauſe of all was, that the ſouldiers which are called the Prætorian guard (being the daily guard about the Emperours perſon) finding then in effect what it was to profeſſe to be a ſouldier, and to liue like a ſouldier: they lamented their continuing in ROME,where they liued at eaſe & pleaſure, feaſting and banquetting,neuer feeling the diſcommodities and bitter paines of warre,and did therefore ſo earneſtly cry out to fight, that there was no ſtaying of them, as if they ſhould at their firſt crie and ſetting forward, haue ouerthrowen their enemies. Moreouer, it ſeemed alſo that Otho himſelfe could no more away with the feare and doubt of the vncertaine ſucceſſe to com, neither could any longer abide the grieuous thoughtes of the daunger of his eſtate, he was ſo effeminate, and vnacquainted with ſorrow and paines. This was the cauſe that caried him on headlong, as a man that ſhutteth his eyes falling from a high place, and ſo to put all at aduenture. The matter is thus reported by Secundus the Orator, and Othoes ſecretarie. Others alſo doe report, that both armies had diuers determinations and mindes: as to ioyne all together in one campe, and ioyntly to chooſe among them, if they could agree, the worthieſt man of all the Captaines that were there: if not, then to aſſemble the whole Senate in a place together, & there to ſuffer the Senators to chooſe ſuch a one Emperour, as they liked beſt of. And ſure it is very likely it was ſo, conſidering that neither of them both which were then called Emperours, was thought meete for the place they had: and therefore that theſe counſels and conſiderations might eaſily fall into the ROMAINE ſouldiers heades (who were wiſe men and expert ſouldiers) that in deede it was a thing for them iuſtly to miſlike, to bring themſelues into the like miſerable time and calamitie, which their predeceſſors before them had cauſed one an other to ſuffer, firſt for Sylla and Marius ſakes, and afterwards for Cæſar and Pompey, and now to beſtow the Empire of ROME either vpon Vitellius, to make him the abler to follow his drunkenneſſe and gluttony: or elſe vpon Otho, to maintaine his wanton & licentious life. This was the cauſe that moued Celſus to delay time, hoping to end the warres without trouble and daunger: and that cauſed Otho alſo to make the more haſte, being affraide of the ſame. Howbeit Otho returning backe againe to BRESSELLES, he committed an other fault, not only becauſe he tooke his mens good wils from thẽ to fight, the which his preſence, and the reuerence they bare vnto him did put in them: but becauſe alſo he caried away with him for the gard of his perſon, the valianteſt ſouldiers & moſt reſolute men of all his hoſt. About that time there chaunced a skirmiſh to fall out by the riuer of Po, becauſe Cecinna built a bridge ouer it, and Othoes men did what they could to hinder them. Howbeit when they ſaw they preuailed not, they laded certaine barges with faggots and drie wood, all rubbed ouer with brimſtone and pitch, and ſetting them a fire, then ſent them downe the ſtreame. When the barges were in the middeſt of the ſtreame, there ſodainely roſe a winde out of the riuer, which blew vppon this woodſtake they had prepared to caſt among the enemies workes of this bridge, that firſt made it ſmoke, and immediatly after fell all on a great flame, which did ſo trouble the men in the barges, that they were driuen to leape into the riuer to ſaue themſelues: and ſo they loſt their barges, and became themſelues alſo priſoners to their enemies, to their great ſhame and mockerie. Furthermore, the GERMAINES vnder Vitellius, fighting with Othoes fenſers, which of them ſhould winne a litle Iland in the middeſt of the riuer: they had the vpper hand, and ſlew many of the fenſers. Thereuppon Othoes ſouldiers which were in BEBRIACVM, being in a rage withall, & would needs fight: Proclus brought them into the fielde, and went and camped about fiftie furlong out of the citie, ſo fondly, and to ſo litle purpoſe, that being the ſpring of the yeare, and all the countrie thereabout full of brookes and riuers, yet they notwithſtanding lacked water. The next morning they raiſed their campe to meete with their enemies the ſame day, and were driuen to march aboue a hundred furlong. Now Paulinus perſwaded them to goe faire and ſoftly, & not to make more haſte then needed, and would not ſo ſoone as they ſhould come, (being wearied with their iorney and trauell) ſet vpon their enemies that were well armed, and beſides had leaſure & time enough to ſet their men in battell ray, whileſt they were cõming ſo long a iorney with all their cariage. Now the Captaines being of diuers opinions about this matter, there came a horſeman from Otho, one of thoſe they call the Nomades, that brought them letters, in the which Otho commaunded them to make all the haſte they could, and to looſe no time, but to march with all ſpeede towardes the enemie. So when theſe letters were read, the Captaines preſently marched forward with their armie. Cecinna vnderſtanding of their comming, was aſtonied at the firſt, and ſodainely forſooke the worke of his bridge to returne to his campe, where he found the moſt part of his ſouldiers alreadie armed, and Valens had giuen them their ſignall and worde of battell. And in the meane time, whileſt the legions were taking their places to ſet themſelues in battell ray: they ſent out before the choyceſt horſemen they had, to skirmish. Now there ran a rumor (no man knew how, nor vpon what cauſe) that Vitellius Captaines would turne on

Otho: a wanton and licentious liuer.

The towne of Breſſelles is hard by the riuer of Po.

Othoes ſide in battell. Inſomuch that when theſe men of armes came neere to meete with the voward of Othoes armie: Othoes men did ſpeake very gently to them, and called them companions. Vitellius men on the other ſide tooke this ſalutation in euill part, and aunſwered them againe in rage, as men that were willing to fight. Inſomuch that thoſe that had ſpoken to thē, were quite diſcoraged: and the reſidue alſo beganne to ſuſpect their companions which had ſpoken to them, and miſtruſted them to be traitors. And this was the chiefeſt cauſe of all their diſorder, being readie to ioyne battell. Furthermore, on the enemies ſide alſo, all was out of order: for the beaſts of cariage ranne in amongeſt them that fought, and ſo did put them maruellouſly out of order. Beſides that alſo, the diſaduantage of the place where they fought, did compell them to diſperſe one from an other, becauſe of ſundry ditches and trenches that were betwene them, whereby they were compelled to fight in diuers companies together. So there were but two legions onely, the one of Vitellius, called the deuourer: and the other of Otho, called the helper: which getting out of theſe holes and ditches a part by themſelues, in a good plaine euen ground, fought it out ſo a long time together in good order of battell. Othoes ſouldiers were men of goodly perſonages, ſtrong, and valiant of their handes, howbeit they had neuer ſerued in the warres, nor had euer foughten battell but that. And Vitellius men on the other ſide, were olde beaten ſouldiers, and had ſerued all their youth, and knew what wars and battels ment. So when they came to ioyne, Othoes men gaue ſuch a luſtie charge vpon the firſt onſet, that they ouerthrew, & ſlew all the firſt rancke, and alſo wanne the enſigne of the Eagle. Vitellius men were ſo aſhamed of it, and therewith in ſuch a rage, that they tooke hart againe vnto them, and ranne in ſo deſperately vpon their enemies, that at the firſt they ſlew the Colonell of all their legion, and wanne diuers enſignes. And furthermore, againſt Othoes fenſers, (which were accounted the valianteſt men, and readieſt of hande) Varus Alphenus brought his mē of armes called the BATTAVII, which are GERMAINES in the lower part of GERMANY, dwelling in an Iland compaſſed about with the riuer of Rhein. There were few of his Fenſers that ſtucke by it, but the moſt of them ranne away towards the riuer, where they founde certaine enſignes of their enemies ſet in battell ray, who put them all to the ſworde, and not a man of them ſcaped with life. But aboue all other, none proued more beaſts & cowards, then the Prætorian gard. For they would not tarie till the enemies came to giue them charge, but cowardly turned their backes, and fled through their owne men that were not ouerthrowen: and ſo did both diſorder them, and alſo make them affraid. This notwithſtanding, there were a great number of Othoes men who hauing ouerthrowen the voward of them that made head againſt them, they forced a lane through their enemies that were Conquerours, and ſo valiantly returned back into their camp. But of their Captaines, neither Proclus nor Paulinus, durſt returne backe with them, but fled another way, being affraid of the furie of the ſouldiers, that they would lay all the fault of their ouerthrow vpon their Captaines. Howbeit Annius Gallus receiued them into the citie of BEBRIACVM, that came together after this ouerthrow, & told them that the battell was equall betwixt them, and that in many places they had had the better of their enemies. But Marius Celſus gathering the noble men and gentlemen together that had charge in the army, he fell to conſultation what they ſhould do in ſo great a calamitie, and extreame ſlaughter of the ROMAINE Citizens. For if Otho himſelfe were an honeſt man, he ſhould no more attempt fortune: conſidering that Cato and Scipio were both greatly blamed, for that they were the cauſe of caſting away many men in AFRICKE to no purpoſe, (though they fought for the libertie of the ROMAINES) and only of ſelfe will, for that they would not yeeld to Iulius Cæſar after he had wonne the battell of PHARSALIA. For though fortune in all other things haue power ouer men: yet extremities happening to good men, ſhe can not preuent them to determine the beſt for their ſafetie. Theſe perſwaſions ſtraight caried away the Captaines, who went preſently to feele the mindes of the priuate ſouldiers, whom they found all of them deſirous of peace. So Titianus perſwaded them to ſend Ambaſſadors vnto the enemies to treate of peace: and Celſus and Gallus tooke vppon them the charge to goe thither, to breake the matter vnto Cecinna, and Valens. But by the way they met with certain Centurions, who told them how all the army of the enemies were cōming onwards on their way, to come directly to the city of BEBRIACVM, and that their chieftaines had ſent before to offer treatie of peace. Celſus and his companion Gallus being glad of this, prayed the Centurions that they would returne with them vnto Cecinna. But when they were come neare vnto him, Celſus was in great daunger of his life: becauſe the men of armes which he had ouerthrowen certaine daies before in an ambuſh, comming before, when they ſpyed him, they flew vpon him with great ſhoutes. Howbeit the Centurions that were in his companie, ſtepped before him, and cloſed him in: and ſo did the other Captaines that cryed vnto them they ſhould doe him no hurt. Cecinna vnderſtanding what the matter was, rode thither, and pacified the tumult of theſe men of armes: and then ſaluting Celſus very courteouſly, he went with him towardes B e b r i a c v m. But nowe Titianus in the meane time, repenting him ſelfe that hee had ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the enemies, he placed the deſperateſt ſouldiers he had vpon the walles of the citie, and incouraged the reſt alſo to doe the like, and to ſtand to the defence. But Cecinna came to the wall, & being a horſebacke, held vp his hand vnto them. Then they made no more reſiſtance, but thoſe that were vpon the walles, ſaluted the ſouldiers: and they that were within the citie opened the gates, and thruſt in amongeſt Vitellius men, who receiued them, and did no man any hurt, but courteouſly imbraced them, and ſaluted each other. Then they all ſware & tooke their othes to be true to Vitellius, and ſo yeelded them ſelues vnto him. So doe the moſt part of thoſe that were at this battell, report the ſucceſſe thereof: graunting notwithſtanding, that they knew not euery thing that was done, becauſe of the great diſorder among them. But as I trauelled on a time through the field where the battell was ſtriken, with Metrius Florus that had beene Conſull: he ſhewed me an olde man that when the fielde was fought in that place, was young, and againſt his will was at the ſame battell on Othoes part. Who told vs, that after the battell was fought, he came into the field to ſuruey the number of thoſe that were dead: and he found the dead bodies piled on a heape, of the height of thoſe that came to view them. And ſaide moreouer, that he made inquirie of the matter, but he neither could imagine it himſelfe, nor be ſatisfied by others. Now in deede it is likely, that in ciuill warres betwene countrimen of one ſelf city, where one of the two armies is ouerthrowen, that there ſhould be greater ſlaughter among them, then againſt the other enemies, becauſe they take no priſoners of either ſide: for thoſe they ſhould take, would ſerue them to no good purpoſe. But after they were ſlaine, one to be laide on heapes ſo by an other, that is a hard thing to iudge. But now to the matter. The newes of this ouerthrow came firſt but obſcurely vnto Otho, a common thing in a matter of ſo great importaunce: but afterwardes, when ſome that were hurt came and brought him certain newes of it, it was no maruell then to ſee Othoes friendes and familiars to comfort him, who praied him to be of good cheere, and not to be diſcoraged for that. Howbeit, the wonderfull great loue and good will which the priuate ſouldiers ſhewed vnto him at that time, did paſſe and exceede all ſpeech and education. For they forſooke him not, neither went they to ſubmit themſelues to their enemies the conquerors, neither tooke they any regard of themſelues, to ſee their Emperour in that diſpaire: but all of them ioyntly together went vnto his lodging, and called him their Emperor. Then he came out, and they fell downe at his feete, as men repreſented in a triumphe lying on the ground, & kiſſed his hands, with the teares running downe their cheekes, and beſought him not to forſake and leaue them to their enemies, but to commaund their perſons whileſt they had one droppe of bloud left in their bodies to doe him ſeruice. All of them together made this petition to him. But amongſt others, there was a poore ſouldier drawing out his ſword, ſaid vnto him: know, O Cæſar, that all my companions are determined to die in this ſort for thee, and ſo ſlew himſelfe. But all theſe lamentable things did neuer melt Othoes hart: who looking with a ſtout countenance round about him, and caſting his eyes euery where, ſpake vnto them in this manner. I thinke this a more happie day for me, my fellowes, then that in the which you firſt choſe me Emperour: to ſee you loue me ſo well, and doe me ſuch honour, with ſo great ſhew of loyalty. But yet I beſeech you not to denie me of a greater fauour, which is: to die va-

,, liantly and honorably, for the ſafetie of ſo many honeſt men as you be, and ſo good Citizens ,, of R o m e. If by your election you made me worthy to take vpon me the Imperiall crowne: I
,, muſt now needes ſhew my ſelfe an Emperour, not ſparing to ſpende my life for your and my ,, countries ſafetie. I am certaine that the victorie is not altogether mine enemies. For newes are come vnto me, that our armies of MYSIA and PANNONIA are in their way comming to vs, » and that they are not farre off from the Adriaticke ſea. ASIA, SYRIA, and ÆGYPT, and the » legions that made warre in IVREE, are all ours. The Senate taketh our part, and our enemies » wiues and children be in our handes. But this warre is not againſt Anniball, nor Pyrrhus, nor » againſt the CIMBRES, to fight who ſhould be owners of ITALIE: but it is againſt the ROMAINES » themſelues. For in this ciuill warre, both the Conquerour and vanquiſhed doe offend » their country: for where the Conquerors haue benefite, the country & common wealth » alwaies receiueth loſſe. Aſſure your ſelues I had rather die, than raigne Emperour: conſidering » alſo that my life with victorie can not ſo much benefite the ROMAINES, as the ſacrifice » of the ſame may doe my country good, for the peace and quietneſſe of my country men, keeping » ITALY thereby from ſeeing ſuch an other battell, as this hath bene. So when he had made » this oration vnto them, and put thoſe by, that would haue diſſwaded him the contrarie: he commaunded all the Senators and his friendes that were preſent, to auoyde. Then he wrote letters to them that were abſent, and alſo vnto the cities wherethrough they paſſed, to vſe them verie courteouſly, and to ſee them ſafely conueyed. Then came his Nephewe Cocceius to him, who was yet but a young boy, and he did comfort him, and bad him not to be afraide of Vitellius, for he had ſafely kept his mother, wife, and children, and had bene as carefull of them, as if they had bene his owne: and that he would not yet adopt him for his ſonne, though he was deſirous to doe it, vntill ſuch time as he ſawe the end of this warre: to the end that if he ouercame, he ſhould quietly raigne Emperour with him: and if he were ouercome, that for adopting of him, he would not be cauſe of his death. But this one thing onely, I commaund and charge thee, my ſonne, euen as the laſt commandement that I can giue thee: that thou doe not forget altogether, neither ouermuch remember, that thine Vncle hath bene Emperor. When he had told him this tale, he heard a noyſe at his dore: they were the ſouldiers that threatned the Senators which came from him, and would kill them, if they did not remaine with him, but would forſake their Emperour. Vpon this occaſion he came out once againe among them, being affraid leaſt the ſouldiers would doe the Senators ſome hurt, and made the ſouldiers giue backe, not by intreating of them, nor ſpeaking courteouſly to them, but looking grimly on them, and in great rage: inſomuch that they all ſhrunke backe, & went away for feare. So when night came, he was a thirſt, and dranke a litle water: and hauing two ſwordes, he was prouing a great while which had the beſt edge. In the end, he put by the one, and kept the other in his armes. Then he began to comfort his ſeruants, and liberally to giue out his money among them, to ſome more, to ſome leſſe, not prodigally throwing it away without diſcretion, as being an other mans money: but diſcreetely gaue to euery man according to his deſert. Then after he had diſpatched them away, he laide him downe to ſleepe all the reſt of the night, that the groomes of his chamber heard him ſnort, he ſlept ſo ſoundly. In the morning he called one of his infranchiſed bondmen, whom he had commanded to helpe to ſaue the Senators, and ſent him to ſee if they were all ſafe, and gone. So when he vnderſtood that they were all gone, and that they had all they would: come on, ſaide he then vnto him, looke to thy ſelfe I read thee, and take heede the ſouldiers ſee thee not, if thou wilt ſcape with life, for ſure they will kill thee, thinking thou haſt holpen me to kill my ſelfe. So aſſoone as his infranchiſed bondman was gone out of his chamber, he tooke his ſword with both his hands and ſetting the point of it to his breſt, he fell downe vppon it, ſeeming to feele no other paine, ſauing that he fetched a ſigh: whereby they that were without, knewe that he had done himſelfe hurt. Thereupon his friends made ſtraight an outcry, and all the campe and citie was incontinently full of teares and lamentation. The ſouldiers ſodainly ranne with a great noyſe to his gates, where they bitterly bewayled, and lamented his death, falling out with themſelues that they were ſuch Villaines ſo ſlenderly to haue guarded their Emperor, that they kept him not from killing himſelfe for their ſakes. So there was not a man of them that left his bodie, though the enemies were hard at hand: but hauing honourably buried him, and prepared a great ſtacke of wood, they conueyed him armed to the fire of his funerals, euery man thinking himſelfe happie, that could firſt ſet his ſhoulders to the coffin to helpe to carie him. Others comming to it, kneeled downe on their knees, and kiſſed his wound. Others tooke and kiſſed his handes. Others that could not come neare him, honoured him, and did reuerence him a farre off, and ſome there were alſo that after the ſtacke of wood was ſet a fire, ſlew themſelues hard by the fire: who had neuer receiued benefite by him that was dead, (at the leaſt to any mans knowledge) neither had they any occaſion to be affraid of him that was Conquerour. And truely me thinkes, neuer king nor tyrant was ſo ambitiouſly giuen to raigne, as they vehemently deſired to be commaunded by Otho, and to obey him: conſidering that their deſire left them not euen after his death, but was ſo liuely rooted in their mindes, that in the ende, it turned to a deadly hate vnto Vitellius. But of this we will ſpeake more hereafter in time and place. Now, when they had buried Othoes aſhes, they did ſet vp a tombe for him, neither for magnificence of building, nor for glorious epitaphe, ſubiect vnto enuie. For I haue ſeene his tombe in the citie of BRESSELLES, a meane thing, and the epitaph vpon it tranſlated out of Latine, ſaieth no more but this: This is the tombe of Marcus Otho. He died being but ſeuen and thirtie yeare old, and was Emperor but three monethes: and there were as many famous men that commended his death, as they that reproued his life. For though he liued not much more honeſter then Nero, yet he dyed farre more honorably. Furthermore, when Pollio one of the Captaines would haue compelled his ſouldiers preſently to haue taken their othes to be true to Vitellius, they fell out with him: and vnderſtanding that there were yet remaining ſome Senators, they would not meddle with them, but onely troubled Verginius Rufus. For they came to his dores armed, and called him by his name, and commaunded him to take charge of them, and to goe as Ambaſſador to intreate for them. Howbeit he thought it were but a fond part of him to take charge of them that were alreadie ouercome, conſidering he refuſed it when they had ouercome: and alſo he was affraide to goe Ambaſſador to the GERMAINES, because he had compelled them to doe things againſt their willes. Therefore he went out at his backe dore, and ſaued himſelfe. So when the ſouldiers heard of it they were at length contented to be brought to be ſworne vnto Vitellius, and ſo ioyned themſelues with Cecinnaes ſouldiers, ſo they might be pardoned for all that was paſt.

ANNI BAL CARD

Anniball.

The parentage of Anniball.

IF we doe call to minde the firſt PVNICKE war the CARTHAGINIANS had with the ROMAINES: we ſhall find many Captaines, who by the glory of their noble deeds, haue left great fame and renowme vnto their poſterity. Howbeit amongeſt all the Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, none are found more worthy of fame, and ſo commended of all Greeke and Latine Authors, then Hamilcar, Annibals father, otherwiſe ſurnamed Barcha, a valiant man doubtles, and in his time a ſkilfull ſouldier as any was. The ſame Hamilcar firſt of all made warre with the ROMAINS, a longer time in SICILIA then was looked for, who had done great hurt to his countrey and common wealth. After that alſo in the warres of AFRICKE (at what time the mercenarie ſouldiers through their rebellion did put the countrey of CARTHAGE in great daunger) he did ſo valiauntly appeaſe the inſurrection: that to euery mans iudgement, hee was reputed the onely preſeruer of his countrey. Then he was ſent Gouernour and Captaine into SPAINE, and caried with him at that time, (as it is reported) his ſonne Anniball, being but a young boy, where hee did noble ſeruice. In fine, in the ninth yeare of his aboad there in that prouince, he died fighting valiauntly againſt the VETHEONS. After his death, Haſdrubal his Sonne in lawe, whom the Carthaginians through the aide and friendſhip of the Barcinian faction had made generall of all their army ) remained gouernor there the ſpace of eight yeares. This Haſdrubal ſent for Anniball into Spaine, after his father Hamilcars death, againſt the minds of the chiefe of the contrary faction, to the end that as he had bene trayned from his youth in the diſcipline of warres, in his father Hamilcars life: euen ſo in like manner, that now being come to mans ſtate, he ſhould the better harden his body, to away with the paines and daungers of the warres. Now although at the firſt, the remembrance of his father was a great helpe vnto him to winne the loue and good will of the ſouldiers: Yet he him ſelfe afterwardes, through his diligence and induſtry ſo handled the matter, that the olde ſouldiers forgetting all other Captaines, they onely deſired to chooſe him (and none other) for their gouernour. For they found in him all the perfections that could be wiſhed for, in a noble Captaine or generall. He had a preſent and ready wit to giue counſell what was to be done, in moſt greateſt attempts: & beſides, he lacked neither manhood nor induſtry to put it in execution. He had a valiant and inuincible minde, euen in greateſt daungers and aduerſities of bodie: the which are wont to ſtay others from performing their indeuours and duetie. He would watch and ward as any priuate ſouldier, and was quicke and ready to doe any kind of ſeruice, either like a valiant ſouldier, or a good Captaine. In this ſort Annibal continued in ſeruice in the warres, the ſpace of three yeares, vnder the conduct of Haſdrubal. In that time he ſo wanne the hearts of all the army, that immediatly after Haſdrubals death, he was choſen to be Lieutenant generall, with the common conſent of all the ſouldiers: and this honor was laid vppon him without contradiction of any of the Carthaginians through the friendſhip and good will of the Barcinian faction. Annibal was now ſixe and twenty yeare old, when the ſouldiers made him their Lieutenant generall. For at what time his father Hamilcar brought him into Spaine, he was then but nine yeare old: and from that time vnto Haſdrubals death (according to Polybius declaration) it was ſeuenteene yeares moe. So he was no ſooner made Lieutenant generall of all the campe, and his countrey: but he bent him ſelfe to make war with the Romains, hauing long before determined it. For firſt of all, he chiefly maintained almoſt a common hate of all the Carthaginians againſt the Romains, becauſe of the loſſe of Sicilia and Sardinia. Beſides alſo, he bare them a ſecret malice in nature, as a thing inheritable from his father Hamilcar: who, of all the Captaines the Carthaginians euer had, was the mortalleſt enemy vnto the Romains. And it is written alſo, that at what time Hamilcar made his preparation to go into Spain, he compelled Annibal being but a boy, to ſweare in a ſacrifice he made, that he would be a mortall enemy to the Romains, as ſoone as euer he came to the ſtate of a man. So, the remembraunce of theſe things were ſtill freſh in the young mans minde, as the Idea (or image) of his fathers hate, and ſtill prouoked him to ſpie out all the meanes he could, how to deſtroy the Empire of Rome. Beſides alſo, the Barcinian faction neuer left to prick him forward vnto it, becauſe by wars he might raiſe him ſelfe to greatnes, and ſo increaſe his eſtate. Theſe cauſes, as well common as particular, inticed Annibal to attempt warre againſt the Romains, and gaue the ſtout young man occaſion by theſe meanes to practiſe innouation. There was a people at that time called the Sagvntines, who confined indifferently betwixt the Romaines and Carthaginians: and were left free by the former peace concluded. Theſe Sagvntines euer after tooke part with the Romaines, and by meanes of the league that was made betwixt them, the Romains alwaies found them very true and faithfull to the Empire of Rome. Annibal therefore thought with him ſelfe, hee could not deuiſe to make a better match to anger the Romaines withall, and to kindle the fire of his malice alſo againſt them: then to make warre with the Sagvntines, their confederates. Howbeit, before hee would be openly ſeene to ſet vpon them, he firſt determined to lead his army againſt the Olcades, and other people on the other ſide of the riuer of Iberus: and after he had ouercome them, then to finde occaſion to moleſt the Sagvntines, to make it appeare that the warre was rather begunne by them, then purpoſely intended by him. So after he had ouercome the Olcades, he did ſet vpon the Vacceians, ſpoyled their countrey, beſieged manie cities, and tooke Hermandice, and Arbocole, great and rich cities. Now hee had in manner ouercome all the whole countrey, when diuerſe fugitiues from the citie of Herman-

DICE, encoraging one another, conſpired againſt him, leauied men, & intiſed the OLCADES that were fled, to take their part. Then they perſwaded the CARPENTANIANS their neighbours, that they would all agree ſodainly to ſet vpon Annibal at his returne. They being a people that deſired nothing more then to fight, & conſidering alſo that they had receiued iniuries by Annibal, did eaſily hearken vnto that counſell: and thereuppon leauying a great number of men, to the number of a hundred thouſand, they went to aſſaile Annibal at his returne from the VACCEIANS, by the riuer of Tagus. When the CARTHAGINIANS diſcouered their army, they ſtaid vpon it, and were maruellouſly afraid. And doubtles, they had had a great ouerthrow, if they had fought with thoſe ſo fierce people, being afraid of their ſodain comming, & alſo loden as they were with ſo great ſpoiles: the which Annibal deepely conſidering, like a wiſe Captaine as he was, he would not fight, but lodged his campe in the place where they were. Then the next day following, he paſſed his army ouer the riuer with as litle noiſe as hee could, leauing the paſſage where the enemies might eaſilieſt come ouer, vngarded: becauſe vnder pretence of diſſembled feare, he might intiſe the barbarous people to paſſe ouer the riuer, to take the oportunity and occaſion offred them. Now in deede as he was the ſubtillieſt captaine, and had the fineſt ſtratagems of any other captaine of his time: ſo his policy was not in vaine, and his purpoſe to good effect, in abuſing of the enemy. For the wilde barbarous people repoſing too great truſt in the multitude of their men, ſuppoſing the CARTHAGINIANS had been afraid: with great fury entred the riuer to paſſe it ouer. So they being greatly troubled, and out of order by this meanes, and ſpecially before they could paſſe al ouer the riuer, they were ſet vppon by the CARTHAGINIANS: firſt by certaine horſemen, and afterwards with the whole army, ſo that there was a great number of them ſlaine, & the reſidue were put to flight. After this victory, all the people inhabiting about the riuer of Iberus, yeelded them ſelues vnto him, ſauing the SAGVNTINES: who, though they ſaw Annibal at hand comming towardes thē, truſting to the friendſhip of the ROMAINES, they prepared to defend them ſelues againſt him: and therewithall ſent Ambaſſadors preſently to ROME, to ſhew the Senate in what great daunger they were, and alſo to pray aide againſt their ſo great enemy, that made warres hottely with them. The Ambaſſadors that were ſent to ROME, were ſcant gone out of SPAINE, when Annibal made open warre on them, with all his army, & pitched his campe before the city of SAGVNTVS. When this matter was reported at ROME, and conſulted of for the wrongs that had beene done to their confederates: the Senators dealt but ſlackly in it, and by decree only ſent P. Valerius Flaccus, and Quintus Bebius Pamphilus vnto Annibal, to wil him to raiſe his ſiege from SAGVNTVS: & if they found he would not hearken to them, that then they ſhould thence repaire to CARTHAGE, and to pray them to deliuer their general Annibal vnto them, becauſe he had broken the peace. Polybius writeth, that Annibal did heare theſe Ambaſſadours, howbeit that he made them a ſlender anſwer. Liuius writeth in contrary manner, that they were neuer heard, nor came at any time to his campe. Howbeit they both agree thus farre, that they came into SPAIN, and afterwards went into AFRICK, & from thence came to CARTHAGE, where after they had deliuered their meſſage vnto the councell, the BARCINIAN faction were ſo much againſt them, that they diſhonourably returned to ROME, and obtained not their deſire. Now, in the Senate of CARTHAGE, there were two contrary parts and factions: of the which, the firſt tooke his beginning from the gouernment of Hamilcar, ſurnamed Barcha, & ſo diſcended as it were by ſucceſſion to his ſonne Annibal, and grew afterwards vnto ſuch greatnes, that that faction (as well abroad, as at home) ruled all matters iudiciall. The ſecond faction came of Hanno, a graue man, and of great authority in the ſame common wealth: howbeit a man more giuen to embrace peace and quietnes, then otherwiſe diſpoſed to war and trouble. It is he only (as it is reported) who at that time when the Ambaſſadours of the ROMAINES came to CARTHAGE, to complaine of the iniuries done to their confederates: that did then in maner againſt the will of all the whole Senate, counſell them to keepe peace with the ROMAINS, and to beware of warres, the which one day might peraduenture vtterly deſtroy their country. Doubtleſſe, if the CARTHAGINIANS would haue followed the graue counſell of Hanno, rather then to haue giuen place to their deſires, and had followed the Author of peace, and not to haue beene ruled by them that gaue counſell to make warres: they hadde not taſted of thoſe miſeries which their country afterwards came vnto. But giuing place to the fury & ambitious mind of a young man, they heaped ſuch miſchiefes on their heades, as afterwardes fell out vpon them. Therefore it is very meete for wiſe Magiſtrats & gouernors of cōmon weales, alwaies rather to haue an eye to the beginning of any matters, then to the end: and euer to decide all matters by aduiſe & councell, before they ſhould take any wars in hand. Now the SAGVNTINES ſeeing them ſelues beſieged by Annibal, & that againſt al reaſon & equity he made wars vpon them: they notwithſtanding valiantly defended the ſiege, many moneths together. Yet in fine, though Annibal had many moe men then they (hauing a hundred and fifty thouſand men in his camp) and that the moſt part of their rampars were battered & ouerthrowen: they liked rather to abide the ſacke of their city, then to yeeld them ſelues to the mercy of their mortall enemy. So ſome doe report, that SAGVNTVS was taken the eight moneth after ſiege was layed vnto it: But Liuie ſeemeth not to agree to that, neither to ſet downe any certain time of the continuance of the ſiege. Now, the taking of this ſo wealthy a city, was a great furtherance diuerſe wayes to Annibals enterpriſes. For many cities taking example of the ſacke of SAGVNTVS, who before miſliking to be ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, were ready to rebell: they kept them ſelues quiet, and the ſouldiers alſo waxed liuely and couragious: ſeeing the rich ſpoiles that were deuided in the campe. So Annibal ſent great preſents of the ſpoiles of the SAGVNTINES vnto CARTHAGE, whereby he wanne the chiefeſt men of the city, and made them like the better of warres: whom he determined to lead with him againſt the ROMAINES, not in SPAINE, as many ſuppoſed, but into ITALIE it ſelfe. Whileſt theſe matters were in hand, the Ambaſſadors returned from CARTHAGE to ROME, and declared in open Senate, the ſlender anſwer they had receiued, in manner at the ſelfe ſame time when they had intelligence of the ſacke of SAGVNTVS. Hereuppon the ROMAINES greatly repented them ſelues, (though ſomewhat too late) for that they ayded not their friendes and confederates in ſo great a daunger. Therefore all the Senate and people together, being very ſorie for it, and therewith alſo maruellouſly offended, they deuided the prouinces vnto the Conſuls, to weet: SPAIN vnto Publius Cornelius, and AFRICK and SICILIA alſo vnto Titus Sempronius. Afterwards, certain of the nobleſt men of the city were ſent ambaſſadors vnto CARTHAGE, to make their complaints in open Senate for breach of the peace, and alſo to denounce vnto them the cauſe of the warre to come, and therewith boldly to proclaime open war againſt them, after they had declared the occaſion there of to come of them ſelues. This was as brauely receyued of the CARTHAGINIANS, as luſtely offered vnto them: but therein they were not ſo well aduiſed, as the ſucceſſe of that warre in the end ſufficiently proued it to them. Now Annibal being aduertiſed how things were concluded in the Senat at CARTHAGE, and thinking with him ſelfe that it was time to goe into ITALIE, as he had determined from the beginning: he made all the poſſible ſpeede he could to prepare his ſhippes and things ready, and ſo required aide of the cities that were his beſt friendes and confederates, and commaunded that all the bandes ſhould meete him at new CARTHAGE. So when he came to GADES, hee appointed good garriſons in places moſt conuenient, in AFRICK and SPAINE, which he thought aboue all things els to be moſt neceſſary: becauſe that when he ſhould go into ITALY, the ROMAINS ſhould not winne it from him. Therefore he ſent into AFRICKE, twelue hundred horſmen, and thirteene thouſand footemen, all SPANIARDS: and beſides, he brought out of diuers parts of AFRICK foure thouſand ſouldiers, and placed them in garriſon in CARTHAGE, obtayning both hoſtages and ſouldiers by this meanes. So he left the gouernment of SPAINE to his brother Haſdrubal, and gaue him an army of fifty ſhippes of warre, two thouſand horſemen, and twelue thouſand footemen. Theſe were the garriſons he left in both thoſe prouinces. Nowe he thought them not ſufficient to withſtand the power of the ROMAINES, if they bent their warres into SPAYNE, or AFRICK: but becauſe he thought them ſtrong inough to ſtay the enemy from ouerrunning of the country, vntill that hauing brought his army by land, he had ſet foote in ITALY. Moreouer, he knew that the CARTHAGINIANS were ſtrong inough to leauy a new army if they liſted, and if neede ſo required, to ſend him ayde alſo into ITALY. For, after that they had driuen away this ſo daungerous a warre, procured againſt them through the ſpight of the mercenary ſouldiers, hauing euer after obteined victorie: firſt vnder

So, after they had paſſed the ſtraight which deuideth AFRICKE from EVROPE, they poſſeſſed almoſt all SPAINE, to the mountaines Pyrenei, which doe deuide SPAINE from GAVLE. Thus order being taken for all things in AFRICKE, and SPAINE: Annibal returned againe to new CARTHAGE, where his army was ready for him, and well appointed. So, meaning to delay time no longer he called his men together, and incouraging them with great and large promiſes, he greatly commended the commodities of ITALIE, and made great accompt vnto them of the friendſhippe of the GAVLES; and in the end he bad them be of good corage, and ſet luſtely forward.

Thereuppon, the next day following he departed from CARTHAGE, and brought his army all alongeſt the coaſt, vnto the riuer of Iberus. It is reported, that the next day following, Annibal dreamed he ſaw a young man, of a maruellous terrible looke and ſtature, who bad him follow him into ITALIE: but afterwards, that he ſaw a ſnake of a wonderfull greatnes, making a maruellous noiſe: and being deſirous to vnderſtand what the ſame might ſignifie, it was told him that it betokened the deſtruction of ITALY.

Annibals dreame at the riuer of Iberus

It is not to be maruelled at, though the great care and thought he tooke in the day time for the war of ITALIE, made his mind to run of ſuch fancies in the night, as dreaming of victory or deſtructiō, or ſuch other calamities of war. For they are things that happen often, as Cicero the Orator ſaith: that our thoughts & words do beget ſuch things in our dreame, as Ennius the Poet writeth of Homer, to wit, like to thoſe his minde moſt ran on, or that he talked of moſt. Now, after Annibal had paſſed ouer the mountaines Pirenei, and that he had alſo wonne the GAVLES hearts with bountifull gifts: in few daies he came to the riuer of Rhone.

The head and courſe of the riuer of Rhone.

Arar fl.

The head of the riuer of Rhone, is not far from the heads of the riuers of the Rhein and Danuby, and running eight hundred furlongs, it falleth into Lacus Lemanus at GENVA. Then it runneth from thence towardes the Weſt, and deuideth the GAVLES a prety way: and then being increaſed by the riuer of Arar (called in French, Saone) and with other riuers, in the end it falleth into the ſea with duers heades, betwixt the VOLCES, and the CAVARIANS.

The Volces: people that inhabited about the riuer of Rhone.

The VOLCES, at that time inhabited both the ſides of the riuer of Rhone, and were full of people, and the richeſt of all the other GAVLES. They hauing vnderſtanding of Annibals comming, paſſed ouer the riuer, and armed them ſelues, and prepared on the other ſide to ſtoppe the CARTHAGINIANS, that they ſhould not paſſe ouer. Now, though Annibal had wonne all the other GAVLES, yet thoſe he could neuer winne neither by giftes, nor threates, to cauſe them rather to proue the friendſhip of the CARTHAGINIANS, then their force, Therefore Annibal perceiuing he was to handle ſuch enemies rather by policy, he commaunded Hanno the ſonne of Bomilcar, ſecretly to paſſe ouer the riuer of Rhone, with part of the army, and ſo to ſet vppon the GAVLES on the ſodaine. Thereupon Hanno as he was commaunded, made a long iourney, and hauing paſſed ouer the riuer at paſſable fords: he ſhewed him ſelfe hard by the enemies campe, before they ſaw him, or that they knew what it was. The GAVLES hearing their ſhoutes and cries behinde them, and hauing their handes full of Annibal before them: who had many botes ready to paſſe ouer his men: they hauing no leyſure to conſult of the matter, neither to arme them ſelues to ſtand to defence, left their campe, and fledde for life. So they being driuen from the other ſide of the riuer, the reſt of the army of the CARTHAGINIANS paſſed ouer it with ſafety.

In the meane time, P. Cornelius Scipio, that but a litle before was come vnto MASSILIA, ſtill heard newes of Annibals armie. Wherefore, to be more aſſured of the matter, hee ſent a band of choyce horſemen to diſcouer what the enemies intent was: who making great ſpeede as they were commaunded, met by chaunce with fiue hundred horſmen of the NVMIDIANS, whom Annibal had alſo ſent to bring him word of the ROMAINES army. So, they firſt ſodainly gaue charge vpon the NVMIDIANS, and after a hotte and valiant conflict betweene both the parties, in the end the ROMAINES ouercomming them, they made them flie, but with great loſſe of their men: howbeit the greateſt loſſe and ſlaughter fell vppon the enemies. So Annibal by this meanes ſound where the ROMAINES lay, and ſtood in a great doubt with himſelfe, whether he ſhould keepe on his way into ITALIE, or elſe lead his army againſt the Conſull that then was, and ſo to proue his hap and ſucceſſe. At length, debating many wayes in his minde, and vncertaine which way he would determine: the Ambaſſadors of the BOIANS perſwaded him to leaue all other deuiſes, and to goe on into ITALIE. For before that Annibal had paſſed ouer the mountains Pirenei, the BOIANS hauing by craft taken the ROMAINES Ambaſſadors, and done great miſchiefe vnto Manlius the Prætor, and incited the INSVBRIANS alſo: they were reuolted from the ROMAINES, and tooke part with Annibal, and onely becauſe the ROMAINS had repleniſhed the cities of PLACENTIA, and CREMONA with people, and had made them Colonies to ROME. So Annibal being ruled by their counſell, raiſed his campe, and keeping the riuers ſide, ſtill going againſt the riuer: in few dayes he came to the place which the GAVLES do call the Iland, the which the riuer of Arar and Rhodanus comming from diuers mountaines doe make there. So at this preſent, there is the famous city of LION in GAVLE, which they ſay was built long time after, by Plancus Munatius. From thence he came to the country of the ALLOBROGES, and hauing pacified the variance betwixt two brethren for the realme, he came through the country of the CASVINIANS and VOCONTIANS, to the riuer of Durance. The head of this riuer commeth from the Alpes, and from thence running with a ſwift ſtreame, falleth into the riuer of Rhone: and as it oftentimes changeth her courſe, ſo hath it in manner no paſſable forde. Yet Annibal hauing paſt it ouer, he led his army vnto the Alpes, through open and plaine countries, as farre as hee could: howbeit as he paſſed through them, he had great loſſes, as it is reported. Inſomuch that ſome that were liuing at that time, did affirme, that they heard Annibal him ſelfe ſay, that hee had loſt aboue thirtie thouſand men, and the moſt part of his horſemen. For he was forced not onely to fight with the inhabitants of the mountaines, but alſo compelled to make wayes through the ſtraightes: ſo that in certaine places of the higheſt rockes, hee was driuen to make paſſages through, by force of fire and vineger. So when he had paſſed the Alpes in fifteene dayes ſpace, hee came downe into the valley, not farre from the city of TVRINE. Whereby it ſeemeth to me, that he paſſed ouer the mountaine they commonly called Genua, the which on the one ſide of it hath the riuer of Druentia, and on the other ſide it goeth downe to the city of TVRINE. Now it is hard to ſay truly, what number of men he had when he was come into ITALIE: becauſe of mens diuerſities of opinions. For ſome write, that he had a hundred thouſand footemen, and twenty thouſand horſemen: others alſo write, that he had twentie thouſand footemen, and ſixe thouſand horſemen, all AFRICANS and SPANIARDES. But others, rekonning the GAVLES and LIGVRIANS, doe count foure ſcore thouſand footemen, and tenne thouſand horſemen. Yet it is not credible, that his army was ſo great, as the firſt men report, and ſpecially hauing paſſed through ſo many countries, and alſo receiued ſuch loſſe as he had: neither alſo could his number be ſo ſmall, as the ſecond reporters do make it, if a man will conſider the famous exploites and great enterpriſes he did afterwardes. So that I like their opinions beſt, which keepe the meane betweene them both: conſidering that he brought into ITALY, the better part of foure ſcore thouſand footemen, and tenne thouſand horſemen, the which he had leauied in SPAINE: as it is manifeſtly knowen alſo, that a great number of the LIGVRIANS and GAVLES came to ioyne with him, for the great malice they bare vnto the ROMAINES, that gaue no place nor ground vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. So Annibal being come from TVRINE, into the country of the INSVBRIANS: he was met withall by Publius Cornelius Scipio, who marching with wonderfull ſpeede from MASSILIA, and hauing paſſed the riuers of Po and Teſin, he camped not farre from the enemy. So ſhortly after, both the Generals being come into the fielde to view each others campe, the horſemen of either ſide grew to skirmiſh, which continued long, and was not to be diſcerned which of them had the better. Howbeit in the end, the ROMAINES ſeeing the Conſull hurt, and alſo that the horſmen of the NVMIDIANS, by litle and litle came to compaſſe them in: they were driuen to giue ground, and ſo pretily retired, defending the Conſull the beſt they could to ſaue him, and ſo at length recouered their campe. It is reported that Publius Cornelius Scipio, was ſaued at that time through his ſonnes helpe, who afterwards was called AFRICAN, and at that time was but a young ſtripling: whoſe praiſe though it was wonderfull in ſo greene a youth, yet it is likely to be true, becauſe of the famous and valiant actes that he did afterwardes. Nowe Scipio hauing proued how much his enemie was ſtronger than himſelfe in horſemen: he determined to place his campe ſo, as his footemen might be in beſt ſafetie, & alſo fight with greateſt aduantage. And therefore the next night following he paſſed the riuer of Po, and made as litle noyſe as he coulde, and went vnto PLACENTIA. The like ſhortly after did T. Sempronius Longus, who had bene reſtored from baniſhment by the Senate, and ſent for out of SICILIA: becauſe both the Conſuls ſhould gouerne the common wealth by one ſelfe authoritie. Anniball alſo followed them both with all his armie, and pitched his campe neere vnto the riuer of Trebia: hoping that becauſe both campes lay ſo neere together, ſome occaſion would be offred to fight, the which he chiefly deſired, both becauſe he could not long maintaine warre for lacke of victuals, as alſo that he miſtruſted the ficklenes of the GAVLES. Who like as they ſoone fell in league and friendſhip with him, drawen vnto it with hope of chaunge, and with the fame alſo of his victorie obtained: ſo he miſtruſted that vpon any light occaſion (as if the warre ſhould continue any long time in their countrie) they would turne all the hate they bare vnto the ROMAINES, againſt him, as the onely author of this waare. For theſe reſpects therfore, he deuiſed all the meanes he could to come to battell. In the meane time, Sempronius the other Conſul, met with a troupe of the enemies, loden with ſpoile, ſtragling vp and downe the fieldes, whom he charged, and put to flight. So imagining the like ſucceſſe of all the battell, by this good fortune he had met withall: he had good hope of victorie, if once both the armies might come to fight. Therefore being maruellous deſirous to doe ſome noble enterpriſe before Scipio were recouered of his hurt, and that the new Conſul ſhould be choſen: he determined to ioyne battell againſt the will of his other colleague and fellow Conſul Scipio, who thought nothing could be to leſſe purpoſe, then to put all the ſtate and common wealth in ieopardie, ſpecially hauing all the whole GAVLES in maner in the field againſt him. Now, Annibal had ſecret intelligence of all this variance, by ſpials he had ſent into the enemies campe. Wherefore, he being politicke and ſuttle as he was, found out a place ſtraight between both campes, couered ouer with buſhes and briers, and there he placed his brother Mago to lye in ambuſh, with a companie of choſen men. Then he commaunded the horſemen of the NVMIDIANS, to ſcurrie to the trenches of the ROMANES, to intiſe him to come to battell: & thereupon made the reſidue of his armie to eate, and ſo put them in very good order of battell, to be readie vpon any occaſion offered. Now the Conſul Sempronius, at the firſt tumult of the NVMIDIANS, ſodainly ſent his horſemen to encounter them, and after them put out ſixe thouſand footemen, and in the ende, came him ſelfe out of his campe with all his armie. It was then in the middeſt of winter, and extreame cold, and ſpecially in the places incloſed about the Alpes, and the mountaine Appenine. Now the NVMIDIANS as they were commaunded, intiſed the ROMANES by litle and litle on this ſide the riuer of Trebia, vntill they came to the place where they might diſcerne their enſignes: and then they ſodainely turned vpon the enemies which were out of order. For it is the manner of the NVMIDIANS, oftentimes to flie of ſet purpoſe, and then to ſtay vpon the ſodaine when they ſee time, to charge their enemie more hotely and fiercely then before. Whereupon Sempronius incontinently gathered his horſemen together, and did ſet his men in battell ray, as time required, to giue charge vpon his enemie, that ſtayed for him in order of battell. For Annibal had caſt his men into ſquadrons, readie vpon any occaſion. The skirmiſh beganne firſt by the light horſemen, & afterwards increaſed hotter by ſupply of the men of armes: howbeit the ROMANE Knights being vnable to beare the ſhocke of the enemies, they were quickly broken. So that the legions maintained the battell with ſuch furie & noble courage, that they had bene able to haue reſiſted, ſo they had fought but with footemen onely. But on the one ſide, the horſemen and Elephants made them affraied, and on the other ſide the footemen followed them very luſtely, and fought with great furie againſt famiſhed and frozen men. Wherefore the ROMANES notwithſtanding, ſuffring all the miſeries that vexed them on euery ſide, with an vnſpeakeable corage and magnanimitie, ſuch as was aboue their force and ſtrength: they fought ſtill, vntill that Mago comming out of his ambuſh, came and ſodainly aſſailed them with great ſhowres and cries, and that the middle ſquadron of the CARTHAGINIANS alſo (through Annibals cōmandement) flew vpon the CENOMANIANS. Then the ROMAINS ſeing their confederats flie, their harts were done, and vtterly diſcouraged. It is ſayed that there were tenne thouſand footemen of the ROMAINS got to PLACENTIA, and came through the enemies. The reſt of the armie that fledde, were moſt part of them ſlaine by the CARTHAGINIANS. The Conſull Sempronius alſo ſcaped very narrowly from the enemies. The victory coſt Anniball the ſetting on alſo: for he loſt a great number of his men, and the moſt parte of all his Elephantes were ſlaine. After this battell, Anniball ouercame all the countrie, and did put all to fire and ſworde, and tooke alſo certen townes: and with a fewe of his men made a great number of the countrie men flie, that were diſorderly gathered together in battell. Then at the beginning of the ſpring, he brought his armie into the field ſooner then time required: & meaning to goe into THVSCAN, he was driuen backe by a great tempeſt at the verie toppe of the height of the Appenine, and ſo compelled to bring his armie about PLACENTIA: howbeit ſhortly after he put himſelfe againe into the fields for diuers vrgent & neceſſary cauſes. For had he not ſaued him ſelfe by that pollicie, he had almoſt bene taken tardie by the ambuſh of the GAVLES: who being angry with him that the warre continued ſo long in their cōutry, they ſought to be reuenged of him, as the onely author & occaſion of the warre. Therfore perceiuing it was time for him to auoide this daunger, he made all the haſt he could to leade his armie into ſome other prouince. Furthermore, he thought it would increaſe his eſtimatiō much among ſtrangers & alſo greatly encorage his owne people, if he could make the power of the CARTHAGINIANS to ſeeme ſo great, & alſo their Captaine to be of ſo noble a corage, as to dare to make warre ſo neare to the citie of ROME. All things therefore ſet apart, he marched with his campe by the mountaine Appenine, and ſo cōming through the country of the LIGVRIANS, he came into THVSCAN, by the way that bringeth them into the champion cōutry, & to the mariſſes about the riuer of Arnus. The riuer of Arnus at that time was very high, and had ouerflowen all the fields thereabouts. Anniball therefore marching with ſo great an army as he had, could not auoide it, but that he muſt needes loſe a number of his men & horſe, before he could get out of thoſe euill fauored mariſſes. Inſomuch that he himſelfe loſt one of his eyes, by reaſon of the great paines he had taken day and night without ſleepe or reſt, and alſo through the euill ayer: though he was caried vpon a high Elephants back, which only was left him of all that he had brought with him. In the meane time, C. Flaminius Conſul, to whom the charge of Sēpronius armie was giuen: he was come vnto ARETIVM againſt the Senates mind, who were maruellouſly offended with him, becauſe he left his cōpanion Cn. Seruilius at ROME, & went vnto his prouince by ſtelth as it were, without the furniture of a Conſul & his officers. This was a very haſty man of nature, and one that the people had brought to that dignitie & office: ſo that he was become ſo proud & inſolent that men might ſee he would hazard all things without wit or iudgement. Anniball hauing intelligence thereof, thought it the beſt way to anger the Conſul, & to do what he could poſſible to allure him into the field, before his fellow Cōſul ſhould come to ioyne with him. Therfore, he marching forward with his campe through the cōutry of FESVLA, & ARETIVM, he burnt & ſpoiled al the cōutrey therabouts, & filled them all with feare, neuer leauing to deſtroy all before him, vntill he came to the mountaine Cortonenſes, & ſo to the lake called Thraſimene. When he had viewed the place he went about to ſurpriſe his enemy by ſome ambuſh: whereupon he conuied certen horſemen vnder the hils, hard by the ſtraight that goeth vnto Thraſimene, and behind the mountaines alſo, he placed his light horſmen. Then he himſelf with the reſt of his army came downe into the field, ſuppoſing that the Conſul would not be quiet: and ſo it fell out. For hot ſtirring heads are eaſily intrapped, & fall into the enemies ambuſh, & oftētimes do put all in hazard, becauſe they will follow no counſell nor good aduiſe. C. Flaminius therfore ſeeing their country vtterly ſpoiled, the corne deſtroyed and cut downe, and the houſes burnt: he made great haſt to leade his armie againſt the enemie contrarie to all mens minds, who would haue had him taried for his companion Cn. Seruilius the other Conſul. So euen at ſunne ſet, when he was come to the ſtraightes of the lake of Thraſimene, he cauſed his campe to ſtay there, although his men were not wearie with the long iorney they had taken by the way. making no view of the coũtrie,he went ouer the mountains. Then Anniball who long before was prepared for this,did but ſtay for the oportunitie to worke his feate: when he ſaw the ROMAINS come into the plaine, he gaue a ſignall vnto all his men to giue charge vpon the enemie. Thereupon the CARTHAGINIANS breaking out on euerie ſide, came before and behinde, and on the flanckes to aſſaile the enemie, being ſhut in betweene the lake and the mountaines. Now in contrary maner, the ROMAINS beginning to fight out of order, they fought incloſed together, that they could not ſee one another, as if it had bene darke: ſo that it is to be wondred at, how, and with what minde they fought it out ſo long, conſidering they were compaſſed in on euerie ſide. For they fought it out aboue three howers ſpace, with ſuch furie and courage, that they heard not the terrible earthquake that was at that preſent time, neither did they offer to flie or ſtir a foot: vntill they heard that the Conſull C. Flaminius going from rancke to rancke to encourage his men, was ſlaine by a man of armes called Ducarius. Then when they had loſt their Generall, and being voyde of all hope, they fled, ſome towards the mountaines, and others towards the lake, of the which, diuers of them flying, were ouertaken and ſlaine. So there were ſlaine * fifteene thouſand in the field, & there ſcaped about ten thouſand. Furthermore the report went, that there were ſix thouſand footemen which forciblie (at the beginning of the battell) got to the mountaine, and there ſtayed on a hill till the battell was ended, and at length came downe vpon Annibals promiſe: but they were betrayed, and ſlaine, euery mothers ſonne of them. After this great victory, Anniball did let diuers ITALIAN priſoners goe free without ranſome paying, after he had vſed them maruellous curteouſly: becauſe that the fame of his clemencie and curteſie ſhould be knowen vnto all nations, whereas in deede his owne nature was contrarie to all vertues. For he was haſtie and cruell of nature, and from his youth was brought vp in warres, and exerciſed in murther, treaſon, & ambuſhes laide for enemies: and neuer cared for law, order, nor ciuill gouernment. So by this meanes he became one of the crueleſt Captaines, the moſt ſubtle, and craftieſt to deceiue and intrappe his enemie, that euer was. For as he was alway prying to beguile the enemie: ſo thoſe whom he could not ouercome in warre by plaine force, he went about to intrappe by ſlight and policie. The which appeareth true by this preſent battell, and alſo by the other he fought againſt the Conſull Sempronius, by the riuer of Trebia. But let vs returne to our matter, and leaue this talke till an other time. Now when the newes of the ouerthrow and death of the Conſull Flaminius was reported at ROME, hauing loſt the moſt part of his armie: there was great mone and lamentation made through all the citie of ROME. Some bewailing the common miſerie of the common wealth, others lamenting their priuate particular loſſe, & ſome alſo ſorowing for both together. But indeede it was a wofull ſight, to ſee a world of men and women to run to the gates of the citie, euery one priuatly asking for their kinne and friends. Some doe write, that there were two women, who being very ſorie & penſiue, diſpairing of the ſafetie of their ſonnes, died ſodainly for the extreame ioy they had, when beyond their expectation and hope they ſaw their ſonnes aliue and ſafe. At the ſelfe ſame time, Cn. Seruilius, the other Conſull with C. Flaminius, did ſend him foure thouſand horſemen, not vnderſtanding yet of the battell that was fought by the lake of Thraſymene. But when they heard of the ouerthrow of their men by the way, and therefore thought to haue fled into VMBRIA: they were compaſſed in by the horſemen of the enemies, and ſo brought vnto Anniball. Now the Empire of ROME being brought into ſo great extreamity and daunger, becauſe of ſo many ſmall loſſes one in the necke of an other: it was ordained, that an extraordinarie Gouernor or Magiſtrate ſhould be choſen, who ſhould be created Dictator: an office ſpecially vſed to be reſerued for the laſt hope and remedy, in moſt extreame daunger and perill, of the ſtate and common wealth. But becauſe the Conſul Seruilius could not return at that time to ROME, all the waies being kept by the enemy: the people contrary to their cuſtome, created Q. Fabius Dictator, (who afterwards attained the ſurname of Maximus, to ſay, very great) who likewiſe did name M. Minutius Generall of the horſemen. Now this Fabius was a graue and wiſe counſeller, and of great authority and eſtimation in the common wealth: inſomuch as the citizens had all their hope and confidence in him onely, perſwading them ſelues, that the honour of ROME might be better preſerued vnder the gouernment and conduct of ſuch a Generall, rather then vnder the gouernment of any other man whatſoeuer. So Fabius knowing it very wel, after he had carefullie and diligentlie giuen order for all things neceſſarie: he departed from ROME, and when he had receiued the armie of the late Conſull Cn. Seruilius, he added vnto them two other legions, and ſo went vnto the enemie. Now Anniball was gone from the lake of Thraſymene, and went directly towards the citie of SPOLETVM, to ſee if he could take it at the firſt aſſault. But when he ſaw that the townes-men ſtood vpon the rampers of their wals, and valiantly defended themſelues: he then left the towne and deſtroyed the countrie as he went, and burnt houſes and villages, and ſo went into APVLIA, through the marches of ANCONA, & the countrie of the MARSIANS and PELIGNIANS. The Dictator followed him at the heeles, and camped hard by the citie of ARPY, not farre from the campe of the enemie, to the ende to draw out the warre at length. For the raſhnes and foole-hardines of the former Captaines afore time, had brought the ſtate of ROME into ſuch miſerie: that they thought it a victorie vnto them, not to be ouercome by the enemie, that had ſo often ouercome them. Whereby all things were turned ſtraight with the chaunge and alteration of the Captaine. For, though Anniball had ſet his men in battell raye, and afterwardes perceiuiug his enemie ſtirred not, went and deſtroyed the country, hoping thereby to intiſe the Dictator to fight, when he ſhould ſee the country of his confederates ſo ſpoyled, as it was before his face: the Dictator, this notwithſtanding, was not moued withall, but ſtill kept his men cloſe together, as if the matter had not concerned him. Anniball was in a maruellous rage with the delay of the Dictator, and therefore often remoued his campe, to the ende that going diuerſe wayes, ſome occaſion or oportunitie might fall out to deceiue the enemie, or elſe to giue battell. So when he had paſſed the mountaine Appenine, he came vnto SAMNIVM. But becauſe ſhortly after, ſome of CAMPANIA, who hauing bene taken priſoners by the lake of Thraſymene, had bene ſet at libertie without ranſome: they putting him in hope that he might take the citie of CAPVA, he made his armie march forward, and tooke a guide that knew the countrie, to bring him vnto CASINVM. Now the guide ouerhearing CASINVM, vnderſtood it CASILINVM, & ſo miſtaking the ſound of the word, brought the armie a cleane contrary way vnto CALENTINVM, and CALENVM, and from thence about STELLA. So when they came into a country enuironned about with mountaines & riuers, Annibal knew ſtraight they had miſtaken their way, and ſo did cruelly put the guide to death. Fabius the Dictator, did in the meane time beare all this patiently, and was contented to giue Anniball libertie to take his pleaſure which way he would: vntill he had gotten the mountaines of Gallicanum, and Caſilinum, where he placed his garriſon, being places of great aduantage and commoditie. So the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS was in manner compaſſed in euery way, and they muſt needes haue died for famine in that place, or elſe haue fled, to their great ſhame and diſhonor: had not Anniball by this ſtratageame preuented the daunger. Who knowing the daunger all his armie ſtoode in, and hauing ſpied a fit time for it: he commaunded his ſouldiers to bring forth two thouſand oxen which they had gotten in ſpoile in the fieldes, hauing great ſtore of them, and then tying torches of fire linckes vnto their hornes, he appointed the nimbleſt men he hadde to light them, and to driue the oxen vp the hill to the toppe of the mountaines, at the relieſe of the firſt watch. All this was duely executed according to his commaundement, and the oxen running vp to the toppe of the mountaines with the torches burning, the whole armie marched after them faire and ſoftly. Now the ROMAINES that had long before placed a ſtrong garriſon vppon the mountaines, they were affrayed of this ſtrange ſight, and miſtruſting ſome ambuſhe, they forthwith forſooke their peeces and holdes. Fabius him ſelfe miſtruſting alſo that it was ſome ſtratageame of the enemy, kept his men within the campe, and could not well tell what to ſay to it. In the meane time, Anniball got ouer the mountaine, not far from the bathes of Sweſſa, which the countrey men doe call the tower of the bathes, and brought all his army ſafe into ALBA: and ſhortlie after, hee marched directlie as though hee would goe to ROME, howbeit he ſodainly turned out of the way, and went preſently into APVLIA. There he tooke the city of GLERENVM, a verie rich and wealthie towne, where he determined to winter. The Dictator followed him hard, and came and camped by LAVRINVM, not farre from the CARTHAGINIANS campe. So he being ſent for to ROME about waighty affaires of the ſtate, there was no remedie but that he muſt needes depart from thence with all the ſpeede he could: howbeit before he went, he lefte Marcus Minutius Generall of the horſemen, his Lieutenaunt of all the armie, and commaunded him in his abſence not once to ſturre nor to meddle with the enemies. For he was fully bent to followe his determination, which was: not to vexe the enemie, nor to fight with him, though he were prouoked vnto it. Howbeit Marcus Minutius litle regarding the Dictators commaundement, his backe was no ſooner turned, but he ſet vpon a companie of the enemies diſperſed in the field a foraging, and ſlue a great number of them: and fought with the reſt euen into their campe. The rumor of this ſkirmiſh flewe ſtraight to ROME, and there was ſuch great account made of it, that it was eſteemed for a victorie: and the common people were ſo ioyfull of it, that they ſtraight made the power of the Lieutenaunt, equall with the Dictator Fabius: the which was neuer heard of before. Fabius patiently bearing this extreame iniurie with a noble courage, hauing no way deſerued it: he returned againe vnto the campe. Thus there were two Dictators at one ſelfe time (a thing neuer ſeene nor heard of before) who after they had deuided the armie betweene them, either of them commaunded his armie a parte, as the Conſulles were wont to doe before.

Two Dictators together neuer heard of before

Marcus Minutius thereupon grewe to ſuch a pride and haughtie mind, that one day he ventured to giue battell, and made not his companion Fabius a councell withall: the which Anniball hauing ſo often ouercome, durſt ſcantly haue enterpriſed. So he led his armie into ſuch a place, where the enemie had compaſſed them in: inſomuch that Anniball ſlue them at his pleaſure, without any hope left them to eſcape, if Fabius had not come in time (as he did) to aide them, rather reſpecting the honor of his countrey, then remembring the priuat iniurie he had receiued. For he comming freſh with his armie to the battell, made Anniball affrayed, that the ROMAINES legions had liberty to retire with ſafety. Whereby Fabius wan great fame for his wiſedome and valiantnes, both of his owne ſouldiers, as alſo of the enemies them ſelues. For it was reported that Anniball ſhould ſay, returning into his campe: that in this battell he had ouercome M. Minutius, but withall, that he was alſo ouercome by Fabius. And Minutius ſelfe alſo confeſſing Fabius wiſedome, and conſidering that (according to Heſiodus ſaying) it was good reaſon to obey a better man then him ſelf: he came with all his army vnto Fabius campe, and renouncing his authority, came and humbly ſaluted Fabius as his father, and all that day there was great ioy, and reioycing among the ſouldiers. So both the armies being placed in garriſon for the winter time, after great contention about it, at length there were two new Conſuls created: L. Paulus AEmylius, and C. Terentius Varro, one that of a meane man (through the fauour of the common people) was brought to be Conſul. So they had liberty and commiſſion to leauie a greater armie then the Generals before them had done.

L. Paulus AEmylius, and C. Terentius Varro Conſuls.

Whereby the legions were newly ſupplied, and alſo others added vnto them, more then were before. Now when the Conſuls were come into the army, as they were of ſeuerall diſpoſitions, ſo did they alſo obſerue diuerſe manners in their gouernment. Lucius Paulus, who was a graue wiſe man, and one that purpoſed to follow Fabius counſell and faſhions: he did deſire to draw out the warre in length, and to ſtay the enemy without fighting. Varro on the other ſide was a haſty man, and venturous, and deſired nothing but to fight.

The difference betwixt L. Paulus, and C. Ter. Varro.

So it chaunced, that not long after it was knowen, to the great coſt and daunger of the citie of ROME, what difference there was betwixt the modeſtie of AEmylius, and the foole-hardineſſe of Varro. For Anniball being affrayed of ſome ſturre and tumult in his campe for lacke of victuals, hee departed from GLERENVM, and going into the warmeſt place of APVLIA, came and camped with all his army, by a village called CANNES. So hee was followed with both the Conſuls, who came and camped ſeuerallie hard by him, but ſo neare one to an other, that there was but the riuer of Aufide that parted them. This riuer as it is reported, doth alone deuide the mountaine of the Appenine, and taketh his head on that ſide of the mountaine that lieth to the ſea ſide, from whence it runneth to the ſea Adriaticum.

Now, Lucius Paulus finding that it was impoſſible for Anniball beeing in a ſtraunge countrey to maintaine ſo great an armie of ſuch ſundrie nations together: hee was fullie bent to tracte time, and to auoyde battell, perſwading him ſelfe that it was the right and onelie waie to ouercome him, being as much to the enemies diſaduauntage, as alſo maruellous profitable and beneficiall for the common wealth. And ſure if C. Terentius Varro, had caried that minde, it had bene out of all doubt, that Annibals armie had bene ouerthrowen by the Romains, without ſtroke ſtriking. Howbeit he had ſuch a light head of his owne, and was ſo fickle minded, that he neither regarded wiſe counſell, nor Paulus AEmylius anthoritie: but in contrarie manner woulde fall out with him, and alſo complained before the ſouldiers, for that he kept his men pent vp, and idle whileſt the enemie did put forth his men to the fielde in battell raye. So when his turne came, that he was abſolutelie to commaunde the whole armie, (for they both had abſolute power by turnes) he paſſed ouer the riuer of Aufide by breake of day, and gaue the ſignall of battell without the priuitie of his companion Aemylius, who rather followed him againſt his will then willingly, becauſe he coulde doe none otherwiſe. So he cauſed a ſkarlet coate of armes to be put out verie earlie in the morning, for a ſignall of battell. Anniball on the other ſide was as glad of it as might be poſſible, that he had occaſion offered him to fight (conſidering that the continuall delaying of battell did alter all his purpoſe) he paſſed his armie ouer the riuer, and had ſtraight put them in verie good order. For hee had taken great ſpoyles of his enemies to furniſh himſelfe verie brauely. Now the armie of the Romaines ſtoode South-ward, inſomuch that the South winde (which the men of the countrie call Vulturnus) blewe full in their faces: whereas the enemies in contrarie manner had the vantage of the winde and ſunne vpon their backes, and their battell ſtoode in this manner. The Afrikans were placed in both the wings, and the Gavles and Spanyardes ſet in a ſquadron in the midſt. The light horſemen firſt beganne the ſkirmiſh, and after them followed the men of armes: and becauſe the ſpace betwixt the riuer and the footemen was verie narrow, ſo as they could not well take in any more ground, it was a cruell fight for the time, though it laſted not long. So, the horſemen of the Romaines being ouerthrowen, the footemen came with ſuch a luſtie courage to receiue the charge, that they thought they ſhould not haue day enough to fight. Howbeit the ouer earneſt deſire they had to ouercome their enemies, made their ouerthrow more miſerable, then their ioy and good happe was great at the beginning. For the Gavles and Spanyardes, (who as we haue ſaid before kept the battell) not being able any longer to withſtand the force of the Romaines, they retyred towards the Afrikans in the wings. The Romaines perceiuing that, ranne vpon the enemie with all the fury they could, and had them in chaſe & fought with them, till they were gotten in the midſt of them. Then the Carthaginians that were in both wings, came & compaſſed them in before they were aware. Moreouer, there were fiue hundred of the Nvmidian horſemen, that colourably fled vnto the Conſuls, who receiued them very curteouſly, and placed them in the rereward of the armie. They ſeeing their time, ſhewed behind the enemies, and did ſodainly giue them charge. Thē the army of the Romains was vtterly ouerthrowen, & Anniball obtained victory. Liuie writeth that there were ſlaine in this battell* forty thouſand footmen, and aboue two thouſand ſeuen hundred horſemen. Polybius ſaith, that there were many more ſlaine. Well, letting this matter paſſe, it is certaine that the Romains had neuer greater loſſe, neither in the firſt warre with Africke, nor in the ſecond by the Carthaginians, as this ouerthrow that was giuen at Cannes. For there was ſlaine, the Conſull Paulus AEmylius him ſelf, a man vndoubtedly deſeruing great praiſe, and that ſerued his country and common wealth euen to the hower of death: Cn. Seruilius, Conſul the yeare before, he was alſo ſlaine there, and many other that had bene Conſuls, Prætors, and others of ſuch like dignity, Captaines, Chieftaines, and many other Senators and honeſt citizens, and that ſuch a number of them, that the very crueltie it ſelfe of the enemy was ſatisfied. The Conſull Terentius Varro, who was the onely author of all this warre and ſlaughter, ſeeing the enemy victor euery way, hee ſaued him ſelfe by flying. And Tutidanus a Chiefetaine of a band, comming through his enemies with a good company of his men, he came vnto Canvsivm. Thither came alſo about tenne thouſand men, that had eſcaped from their enemies, as out of a daungerous ſtorme: by whoſe conſent, the charge of the whole army was giuen vnto Appius Pulcher, and alſo vnto Cornelius Scipio, who afterwardes did end this warre. Thus was the end of the battell fought by Cannes. Newes flew ſtraight to Rome of this ouerthrow, the which though they iuſtlie filled all the citie with ſorrow and calamitie, yet the Senate and people of ROME kept alwaies their countenance and greatnes, euen in this extreame miſerie. Inſomuch they had not onely good hope to keepe their citie ſafe, but furthermore they leauied a new armie and made young men to beare armor, and yet left not SICILIA and SPAYNE vnprouided in the meane time: ſo that they made the world to wonder at them, to conſider theſe things how they could in ſo great calamitie and trouble haue ſo noble hartes, and ſuch wiſe counſell. But to let paſſe the former ouerthrowes, and great loſſes they ſuſtained at TICINVM, at TREBIA, & at the lake of Thraſimene: what nation or pepole could haue borne this laſt plague wherby the whole force and power of the ROMAINS was in manner vtterly deſtroied and ouerthrown? and yet the people of ROME ſo held it out, and that with ſo great wiſdome and counſell: that they neither lacked manhood, nor magnanimity. Beſides to help them the more, Anniball being cōqueror, trifling time in taking his leiſure, and refreſhing his armie: he gaue the ROMAINS leiſure that were ouercome to take breath againe, & to reſtore themſelues. For doubtles, if Anniball being conqueror, had immediatly after the victorie obtained, brought his armie directly to Rome: ſurely the ROMAINS had bene vtterly vndone, or at the leaſt had bene compelled to haue put all in venture. So it is reported, that Anniball often times afterwardes repented himſelfe he followed not his victorie, complaining openly, that he rather followed their counſaile which wiſhed him to let his ſoldiers reſt, then Maharbals aduiſe, generall of his horſmē, who would haue had him gone ſtraight to ROME, and ſo to haue ended all this warre. But he ſeing Annibals delay, told him (as it is reported) this that is now common in euery mans mouth: Anniball, thou knoweſt how to ouercome, but thou knoweſt not how to vſe victory. But what? all things are not (as Neſtor ſaieth in Homer) giuen to men altogether. For ſome had no skill to ouercome, others knew not how to follow their victory, & ſome alſo could not keepe that they had won. Pyrrhus king of the EPIROTES that made war with the ROMAINS, was one of the famouſeſt captains that euer was: yet as men write of him, though he was maruellous fortunat to conquer realmes, he would neuer keepe them. Euen ſo in like manner, ſome captaines haue bene indued with excellent vertues, & yet notwithſtāding haue bin inſufficient in martiall affaires, deſeruing praiſe in a captaine: as we may read in diuerſe hiſtories. Now after this battell fought by CANNES, the ATTELLANIANS, the CALATINIANS, the SAMNITES, after thē alſo, the BRVTIANS, LVCANIANS, & diuers other nations & people of ITALY, caried away with the fame of this great victory: they all came & yeelded to Anniball. And the citie of CAPVA alſo (which Anniball was deſirous to haue won long before) forſaking their old frends & confederats, made new league & frendſhip with Anniball, the which wan him great eſtimatiō with other nations. For at that time the city of CAPVA was verie populous & of great power, & the chiefeſt city of eſtimation of all ITALY next vnto ROME. Now to tell you in few words what is reported of CAPVA, it is certaine that it was a colony of the THVSCANS, the which was firſt called VVLTVRNVM, & after that CAPVA, by the name of their Gouernor called Capius: or otherwiſe, (as it is moſt likely) becauſe of the fields round about it. For on euery ſide of it, there are goodly pleaſant fields, full of all kinds of frutes growing on the earth, called in Greeke Kepi. Furthermore, all the cōtry is confined round about with famous nations. Towards the ſea there dwell the SVESSANIANS, the CVMANIANS, and the NEAPOLITANS. On firme land alſo towardes the North, are the CALENTINIANS, and the CALENIANS. On the Eaſt and South ſide, the DVNIANS and the NOLIANS. Furthermore, the place is of a ſtrong ſituation, and on the one ſide is compaſſed in with the ſea, and on the other ſide with great high mountaines. Now the CAMPANIANS floriſhed maruellouſly at that time: and therefore, ſeeing the ROMAINS in manner vtterly vndone by the battell they had loſt at CANNES, they quickly tooke part with the ſtronger, as it commonly falleth out: and furthermore beſides that they made league with Anniball, they receiued him into their citie with great triūph, hoping that the warre being ended, they ſhould be the chiefeſt & welthied of all ITALIE. But marke how men are commonly deceiued in their expectation. Now, when Anniball came into the citie of CAPVA, there was a world of people that went to ſee him, for the great fame they heard of him. For there was no other talke, but of his happy victories he had wonne of the enemie. So being come into the citie, they brought him vnto Pacuuius houſe, his verie familiar friend, who was a man of great wealth and authoritie, as any among all the CAMPANIANS. Then he made him a notable banquet, to the which no citizens were bidden, ſauing onely Iubellius Taurea a ſtout man, and the ſonne of Pacuuius his hoaſt: who through his fathers meanes, with much a doe, was reconciled to Anniball, for that Anniball hated him as he did, becauſe he followed Decius Magius, who alwaies tooke the ROMAINS part. But now let vs conſider a litle I pray you, how great men ſometime vnwares are ſubiect to great dangers and miſfortunes. For this yong man diſſembling his reconciliation with Anniball, watching time and occaſion notwithſtanding to do him ſome diſpleaſure, in the time of this feaſt, while they were making merrie, he tooke his father aſide into a ſecret corner of the houſe, and prayed him together with him, by a great good turne, to redeeme the fauor & good will againe of the ROMAINS, the which they had loſt through their great wickedneſſe. Then he told him how he was determined to kill Anniball, the enemy of his coũtry, and all ITALIE beſides. His father that was a man of great countenance, and authoritie, was maruellouſly amazed withal, to heare what his ſonne ſaid: wherfore imbracing him with the teares running downe his cheeks, he prayed him to leaue off his ſword, and to let his gueſt be ſafe in his houſe. The which his ſonne in the end yeelded to with great a doe. Thus Anniball hauing before withſtoode all the force of his enemies, the ambuſhes of the GAVLES, and hauing brought with him alſo a great army from the ſea, and the fartheſt part of SPAYNE, through ſo many great and mightie nations: he ſcaped killing verie narrowly by the hand of a young man, whileſt he was at the table making merrie. The next morning Anniball had audience in open Senate, where he made great and large promiſes, and told them many things, which the CAMPANIANS eaſily beleeued, and therefore flattered themſelues, that they ſhould be Lords of all ITALIE: howbeit they reckoned beſide their hoaſt. And to conclude, they did ſo cowardly ſubmit themſelues to Anniball: that it ſeemed they had not onely ſuffered him to come into their citie, but that they had alſo made him their abſolute Lord, like men that neither remembred, nor regarded their libertie. And this appeareth plainely by one example I will ſhew you amongſt many. Anniball willed them to deliuer him Decius Magius, the head of the contrarie faction to him. Whereunto the Senate not only obeyed with all humilitie, but worſt of all, ſuffered him to be brought bound into the market place, in the preſence of all the people: who, becauſe he would not forſake the ancient league and friendſhippe with the ROMAINS, had ſhewed himſelfe a more faithfull citizen to his countrie & common wealth, then vnto the barbarous people. Now whileſt theſe things paſſed thus in CAPVA, Mago (Annibals brother) went to CARTHAGE, to report the newes of his happie victorie to his countrimen, which they had wonne of the enemies: and with all, before the Senate to declare the noble exploytes of armes done by Anniball, and to proue the words true he ſpake, he poured out at the comming in of the Senate houſe, the golden rings which had bene taken from the ROMAINE Knights: of the which there were (as ſome doe report) aboue a buſhell full, and as other ſome doe write, aboue three buſhels full and a halfe. After that he praied a new ſupply for Annibals army: which was granted him by the Senate with greater ioy, then afterwards it was ſent. For the CARTHAGINIANS perſwaded themſelues by the things preſent, that the warre would fall out as fortunate, as the beginning was fayer, they thereupon decreed to continue the warre, and to aide Annibals attempts, by leuying of ſouldiers. Now no mā withſtood this new ſupply to be ſent to Anniball, but Hanno, a perpetuall enemie of the Barcinian faction. Howbeit the CARTHAGINIANS wayed not his counſell and aduiſe then, though it tended to peace, and was good counſell for them, as often times before he had vſed the like. So whē Anniball had made league with the CAMPANIANS, he led his campe before the citie of NOLA, hoping they would yeelde of themſelues without compulſion. And certainly ſo had it come to paſſe, had not the ſodaine comming thither of Marcellus the Prætor bene, who both kept the people in, pacified the ſedition & repulſed the enemie that was comming into the citie, by a ſaly he made vpon him at three ſeuerall gates, chaſing and killing them euen to their campe with great loſſe. This is that noble captaine and valiant ſouldier Marcellus, who with a noble corage made the world know that Anniball was not inuincible. Anniball perceiuing that there was no other way, but to let NOLA alone til an other time: he came to ACERRES, and tooke and ſpoiled it without reſiſtance. Then going on further with greater power vnto CASILINVM, a fit place to offend the CAPVANS, he went about to win them that lay there in garriſon: but when he ſaw that neither his faire promiſes, nor otherwiſe his threates could preuaile, he left part of his armie to beſiege the citie, and beſtowed the reſidue in garriſons before the winter ſeaſon. Howbeit, he choſe for his chiefeſt ſeate and ſtrength the citie of CAPVA, which ſtoode verie pleaſauntly, and had plentie of all things, There it was that Annibals ſouldiers being vſed to lye hard, and eaſily to away with colde, hunger and thirſt, became then of valiant men, rancke cowardes: of ſtrong menne weakelings: and of ſeruiceable and readie men, timerous and effeminate perſons, through the daily pleaſures they enioyed at will. For ſweet intiſing pleaſures, do corrupt the ſtrength and courage of the minde, and mans diſpoſition vnto vertue: moreouer they ſpoile his witte, and take all good counſell from him, all which things are daungerous for men. And therefore Plato rightly calleth pleaſure, the bayte of all euils. And doubtleſſe in this caſe, the pleaſures of CAMPANIA did hurt the CARTHAGINIANS more then otherwiſe the higheſt Alpes, and all the armies of the ROMAINS did. For one onely winter paſſed ouer in ſuch pleaſure and wantonnes, was of ſuch great force to extinguiſh the vehement courage in the ſouldiers: that when they were brought into the fielde at the beginning of the ſpring, ſure you would rightlie haue ſayd that they had forgotten all martiall diſcipline. Thus the winter being paſſed ouer, Anniball returned again to CASILINVM, hoping that the citizens within would willingly yeelde vnto him, after they had abidden ſo long a ſiege. Howbeit they were bent to abide all extreamity, before they would yeeld to their ſo cruell an enemie, although they lacked victuals. Wherfore liuing firſt by ſpelt, or beere barly, and afterwards with nuts which they had receiued of the ROMAINS by the riuer of Vulturnus: they held it out ſo long, that Anniball in the end being angrie with the continuance of the ſiege, he was content to take the citie vpon compoſition, the which he had refuſed before. Now this warre in the which the CARTHAGINIANS had alwaies had great victories and good fortune, and receiued any loſſe worthy of memorie: began at that time to decline, and to fall to great chaunge and alteration. For the league that was made with Philip king of MACEDON, and the newe ayde and ſupply that was ſent frō CARTHAGE, & the taking of PETILIA, CONSTANTIA, & of other cities of the coũtry of the BRVTIANS, kept the CARTHAGINIANS in good hope. On the other ſide, the great victories which the ROMAINS had won vpon the enemies of SPAIN, & SARDINIA, did greatly encourage them, & gaue them alſo good hope that their affaires would proſper better and better. They had alſo choſen three excellent captaines, Fabius Maximus, Sempronius Gracchus, and Marcus Marcellus, a man moſt worthy of praiſe for martiall diſcipline: who ſo wiſely gouerned the affaires of the ſtate, that Anniball found he ſhould make warre with an enemie, no leſſe politike and wiſe, than hardie and valiant. For, firſt of all, he was driuen from the citie of CVMES, with great ſlaughter of his men, by Sempronius Gracchus, and forced to raiſe his ſiege: and ſhortly after he was ouercome by Marcellus, in a battell he fought at NOLA. For there were ſlaine aboue a thouſand ROMAINES, and * 6000 CARTHAGINIANS ſlaine, and taken flying. Now it is eaſily ſene what great importance that battel was of: becauſe Anniball immediatly vpon it, raiſed his ſiege from NOLA, & went into APVLIA to winter his army there. By this meanes came the ROMAINS to recouer againe, as out of a great ſicknes, and ſent a great power againſt the enemy: and were not content only to keepe their owne, but they durſt alſo inuade others. So their chiefeſt intent was, to beſiege the citie of CAPVA, for the iniurie they had but lately receiued of the CAMPANIANS. For incontinently after the battell, was fought at CANNES, they forſook the ROMAINS, euē in their greateſt extreamity & miſery, & took part with Anniball that was conqueror, forgetting the great pleaſures their city had receiued in old time by the ROMAINS. On thother ſide the CAMPANIANS, knowing they had made a fault, & being afraid of this new preparatiō of the ROMAINS, they ſent to Anniball into APVLIA, to pray him to come & aid their citie (being of the number of their confederats) in their greateſt neceſſity. Anniball departed out of APVLIA without delay, & came on with great iornies into CAMPANIA, & cāped by TIFATA ouer CAPVA, wherby he rather defered til another time, thē preuented the plague hanging ouer the CAMPANIANS heads: ſo ſpoiling the country round about NAPLES, he began to take conceit of a new hope, that he might take NOLA by treaſon.

For in NOLA, the people and Senate were at variance the one againſt the other, as they were likewiſe in diuerſe other cities of ITALIE. The common people deſirous of change, fauored Anniball and the noble men, and men of authoritie, tooke part with the people of ROME. So when Anniball went to take the citie of NOLA, Marcellus met him with his army in battel ray, as he had often done before, and failed not to fight with him, euen at the firſt meeting. There the ROMAINS ouercame, and draue the enemie with ſuch manhood and readines: that if the horſemen which had taken another waye had come in in time, as Marcellus commaunded them: no queſtion the CARTHAGINIANS had bene vtterly ouerthrown. Anniball after he had retyred his armie into his campe with great ſlaughter, he ſhortly after departed thence, & went into the countrie of the SALENTINIANS. For certen young TARENTINES that had bene taken priſoners in former battels, where the ROMAINS had bene ouerthrown, and that were afterwards deliuered free without ranſome: they to ſhew themſelues thankful, had put Anniball in hope to deliuer him the citie of TARENTVM, ſo he would bring his army before the citie. Anniball intiſed by their promiſes, did what he could to obtain it, becauſe he might haue ſome citie vpon the ſea in his power, the which he had deſired of long time. And indeed, of all the cities vpon the ſea coaſt, there was none ſo meete as TARENTVM, to bring aide out of GRECE thither, & alſo to furniſh the cāpe with many things that were to be occupied daily. So thogh this thing was drawen out in length, by the garriſon of the ROMAINS that valiantly reſiſted: yet Anniball neuer gaue ouer his enterpriſe, vntill that Nico and Philomenes the authors of the treaſon, had deliuered him the citie into his hands. The ROMAINS kept onely the caſtle, the which is in manner enuironned with the ſea on three ſides: and on the fourth ſide, that lay vpon the firme lande, it was verie ſtrong with rampers and bulwarks. Anniball perceiuing that he could doe no good on that ſide, becauſe of their great ſtrength: he determined to ſhut vp the mouth of the hauē of TARENTVM, hoping that was the only way to make the ROMAINS yeld, when their victuals ſhould be cut frō them. Yet the enterpriſe ſeemed verie hard, becauſe the enemies had all the ſtraights of the hauen in their power, and the ſhips alſo that ſhould beſiege the iſſue of the hauen, were ſhut vp in a narrow litle place, and were to be drawen out of the hauen, at the foote of the caſtle, to bring them into the next ſea. But when neuer a man of the TARENTINES could deuiſe howe to bring this enterpriſe to paſſe: Anniball himſelfe perceiued that theſe ſhips might be drawen out of the hauen with certen engines, and then to cart them through the citie to the ſea. So hauing ſet cunning workmen in hand with the matter, the ſhips within fewe daies after were taken out of the hauen, and caried into the ſea, and then came and ſhewed before the barre of the hauen. Thus the citie of TARENTVM, being won againe, after the ROMAINS had kept it the ſpace of a hundreth yeares: Anniball leauing the caſtle beſieged both by ſea and land, he returned vnto SAMNIVM. For the Conſuls of the ROMAINS had ſpoyled and ſtripped the CAMPANIANS that went out to forrage, and hauing brought their armie before CAPVA, they determined (if it might be) to win it by ſiege. Wherfore Anniball being very ſory for the ſiege of CAPVA, he came with all his armie againſt the enemie: and ſeeing ſhortly after that the ROMAINS did not refuſe to fight, they both marched forward, and doubtles to fight, it would haue proued a bloody battell, had not Sempronius army ſeuered them as he did, which came into CAMPANIA, vnder the conduct of Cn. Cornelius, after they had loſt Sempronius Gracchus in the coūtry of LVKE. For they ſeing this army far off, before they could know who they were, the ROMAINS & CARTHAGINIANS both were afraid and ſo retired into their campe. Afterwards the Conſuls went into ſeuerall countries, the one into LVKE, and the other towards CVMES, to make Anniball remoue from CAPVA: who went into LVCANIA, and found occaſion to fight with M. Centenius, who very fondly and deſperatly did hazard his army left him in charge, againſt a ſubtill aud dangerous enemy. The battel being begun, M. Centenius was ſlaine valiantly fighting, & few other eſcaped. After this alſo there hapned another loſſe. For Anniball returning ſhortly after into APVLIA, he met with another army of the ROMAINS, the which Fabius the Prætor led, who alſo intrapped that armie by ambuſhes, and ſlue the moſt of them: ſo that of twenty thouſand men 2000 ſcant ſcaped the edge of the ſword. In the meane time the Conſuls perceiuing that Anniball was gone, they came with all their army vnto CAPVA, & did beſiege it round. This being come to

Annibals eare, he came with his armie into CAMPANIA, in very good order and well appointed: and at his firſt comming he ſet vpon the campe of the ROMAINS, hauing firſt willed the CAMPANIANS at the ſelfe ſame inſtant to make a ſalye out on them. The ROMAIN Conſuls at the firſt tumult of their enemies, deuided the army betwene them, & went againſt them. The CAMPANIANS were eaſily driuen againe into the citie: howbeit againſt Anniball, the battell was verie bloody. For if euer he proued himſelfe a valiant captaine or noble ſouldier, that day he ſhewed it. He attempted alſo to ſurpriſe the ROMAINS by ſome ſtratageme. For as his men were about to breake into the ROMAINS camp, he ſent one thither that had the Latine tongue excellently well, who cryed out, by the commandement of the Conſuls, that the ROMAINS ſhould ſaue themſelues in the next mountains, conſidering they had almoſt loſt all their camp & ſtrength. This cry made on the ſodaine, had eaſily moued thē that heard it, if the ROMAINS being throughly acquainted with Annibals ſubtilties, had not found out his deceit. Wherfore one of them incouraging another, they made the enemie retire, and compelled him in deſpite of his beard to flie into his campe. When Anniball had done what he could by all deuiſe and practiſe poſſible to raiſe his ſiege from CAPVA, and perceiuing all would not ſerue, being ſory for the danger of his confederates: he then determined to call a councell, the which he had paſſed ouer a long time, hauing reſerued it for the laſt refnge. For he truſſed vp his cariage, and marched away with his army, & as quietly as he could, he paſſed ouer the riuer of Vulturnus, and coaſting through the countries of the SIDICINIANS, ATIFANIANS, & CASSINIANS, he came to ROME with enſignes diſplayed, hoping thereby he ſhould make them raiſe their ſiege, being ſo earneſtly bent to winne CAPVA. This flying ſtraight to ROME by currers, they were ſo afraid there, as ROME was neuer in like feare it ſtood in then. For they ſaw their mortall enemie come to them with enſignes diſplayed, whom they had ſo often proued, almoſt to the vtter deſtruction of their Empire: and now they ſaw him preſent, whom they could not reſiſt being abſent, threatning to bring the Senate and people of ROME into ſubiection. So all ROME being in feare and tumult, it was ordained that Fuluius Flaccus (one of the Conſuls lying before CAPVA) ſhould be ſent for home. And that the new Conſuls Sulpitius Galba, and Cornelius Centimalus, ſhould lye in campe out of the citie: and that C. Calphurnius Prætor, ſhould put a ſtrong garriſon into the Capitoll, and alſo that the Citizens that had borne any office or dignitie, ſhould be appointed by their countenance and authoritie, to pacifie the ſodaine tumults that might happen in the city. So Annibal marched forward without ſtaying, till he came to the riuer of Anienes, and there camped within 24 furlong of ROME: and ſhortly after that, he came with two thouſand horſe ſo neare vnto ROME, that riding from the gate Collina, vnto Hercules temple, he had leiſure to view at his pleaſure, the ſituation and walles of ſo great a citie. Fuluius Flaccus ſeeing that, could not abide it, but ſtraight ſent out certen men at armes of the ROMAINES againſt him: who comming with great furie to giue charge vpon him as they were commaunded, they eaſily ſent him packing. The next morning Anniball brought his armie out of the campe, and did ſet them in battell ray, determining to fight preſently, if he could allure the enemy to battell. The ROMAINS on the other ſide did the like. So, both armies marched one againſt the other with ſuch life and courage, that to ſee them, they appeared men that feared no daunger, ſo they might obtaine the victorie that day. For on the one ſide, the CARTHAGINIANS were to fight (in maner) for the Empire of the world: the which they thought depended vpon this battell, as being the laſt they ſhould fight. The ROMAINS in contrary maner, they were to fight for their country, libertie, and their goods to ſee whether they could keepe them, or that they ſhould come to their enemies handes. Howbeit there fell out a thing worthy of memorie. For as they were ready ſet in battell ray, tarying but for the ſignall of battell to giue charge: there fell ſuch a wonderfull great ſhower and ſtorme vpon them, that both of them were driuen in ſpight of their teethes, to bring backe their armie into their forts againe. The next day following in like manner, vnto the which it ſeemed the battell had bene deferred: when they had againe both of thē ſet their men in battell raye, there fell the like ſtorme vpon them, which did as much hurt the ROMAINS and CARTHAGINIANS, as the firſt: ſo that it forced them onely to looke to ſaue themſelues, and not to thinke otherwiſe to fight. Anniball perceiuing this, he turned to his frends and tolde them, that the firſt time he thought not to winne ROME, and that at the ſecond time the occaſion was taken from him. So there was a thing that greatly troubled Anniball, and that was this. That though he came ſo neere to ROME, with an armie of horſemen and footemen: yet he heard that the ROMAINS had ſent aide into SPAINE, and that they had redeemed the coũtry where he had bene, at a farre greater priſe than reaſon required. Wherefore being in a rage withall, he cauſed all the goldſmithes and bankers ſhoppes of the ROMAINS citizens to be ſolde by the Cryer. But afterwardes caſting with himſelfe what a hard enterpriſe it was to take the citie of ROME, or elſe being afrayed to lacke victuals: (for he had ſtored himſelfe onely but for tenne dayes) he rayſed his campe, and remouing thence came vnto the holy wood of the goddeſſe Feronia, and rifled the rich temple there, and afterwardes went thence into the countrie of the BRVTIANS and LVCANIANS. The CAPVANS hauing intelligence therof being left out of all hope: they yeelded vp their citie vnto the ROMAINS. The citie of CAPVA being thus yeelded vp, and brought againe to the ſubiection of the ROMAINS, it was of great importance to all the people of ITALY, and withall brought a great deſire of change. Anniball himſelfe alſo following euill counſell, did ſpoile and deſtroy many cities he could not keepe: wherby he did ſturre vp the harts of diuerſe nations againſt him. For where before when he was conqueror, he had often let priſoners goe without ranſom paying, through which liberality he had won the harts of many men: euen ſo at that preſent time, his barbarous crueltie made diuerſe cities (miſliking to be ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS) to rebell againſt him, and to take parte with the ROMAINS. Amongſt them was SALAPIA, the which was yeelded vp vnto the Conſul Marcellus, by Blacius meanes chiefe of all the ROMAINE faction: and a band alſo of choice horſemen which was left there in garriſon, were in manner ſlaine euerie man of them. This is the citie where Anniball fell in fancy with a gentlewoman, and therefore they greatly reproue his immoderate luſt & laſciuiouſnes. Howbeit there are others, that greatly commending the continencie of this Captaine, ſay that he did neuer eate lying, and neuer dranke aboue a pynte of wine, neither when he came to make warre in ITALY, nor after that he returned into AFRICK. Some there be alſo that ſay, Anniball was cruell and vnconſtant, and ſubiect to diuerſe ſuch other vices: howbeit they make no manner of mention of his chaſtitie or incontinencie. But they report that his wife was a SPANIARD, borne in CASTVLO, a good towne: and that the CARTHAGINIANS granted her many things, and truſted her very much, becauſe of the great faith and conſtancy of that nation. Now Anniball after he had loſt (as we haue told you) the citie of SALAPIA: he found the meanes to crie quittance, and to make the ROMAINS loſe more then he had loſt. For at the ſelfe ſame time Fuluius Viceconſul, laye beſieging of HERDONEA, hoping to winne the citie without reſiſtance. And becauſe he ſtood in no feare of any enemy roũd about him, (for Anniball was gone into the coũtry of the BRVTIANS) he kept no watch, and was altogether negligent in martiall affaires, contrary to the nature of the ROMAINE Captains. Anniball being aduertiſed thereof by ſpyals, would not loſe ſuch a goodly oportunitie: and therefore comming into APVLIA with his army ready, he came ſo haſtely vnto HERDONEA, that he had almoſt ſtolen vpon Fuluius, vnprouided in his campe. Howbeit the ROMAINES valiantly receiued the firſt charge with ſuch corage, that they fought it out longer then it was looked for. Notwithſtanding in the end, as the ROMAINS two yeare before that had bene ouercome not farre from thence, with their Conſul Fuluius: euen ſo likewiſe vnder the conduct of this Fuluius Viceconſul, the ROMAINE legions were vtterly ouerthrowen, and their Captaine ſlaine, with the moſt parte of his armie. The Conſull Marcellus was at that time in the citie of SAMNIVM, who being aduertiſed of this great ouerthrow, deſired to be euen with him: and though it ſeemed he came too late to helpe things paſt remedie, yet he brought his armie into the countrie of the LVCANIANS, whither he vnderſtood Anniball was gone after his victorie, and came and camped directly ouer againſt his enemie, and ſoone after came to battell. The which the CARTHAGINIANS refuſed not, but gaue ſuch a fierce onſet on either ſide, that they fought it out till Sunne ſet, and no man knewe who had the better, and ſo the night parted them. The next morning the ROMAINS ſhewing againe in field in battell raye, made it knowen that the enemies were afraid of them. For Anniball kept his men within the campe, and the next night following ſtole away without any noiſe, and went into Apvlia. Marcellus alſo followed him foote by foote, & ſought to put all to hazard by ſome notable battell: for he bare himſelfe thus in hand, that of all the Romaine Captaines there was none machable with Anniball but himſelfe, either in counſell, wit, or policie: or elſe in mattiall diſcipline, or warlike ſtratagemes. Howbeit the winter folowing kept him, that he could not fight any ſet battell with the enemie: for after he had made a few light skirmiſhes, becauſe he would not trouble his ſouldiers any more in vaine, he beſtowed them in garriſon for the winter time. At the beginning of the next ſpring, procured partly by Fabius letters (who was one of the new Conſuls for that yeare, ) and partly alſo through his owne diſpoſition: he brought out his garriſons ſooner then they were looked for, and came with his army againſt Anniball, who lay at that time at Canvsivm. Now it chanced, that through the nearenesſe of both their campes, and the good deſire they both had to fight: in few dayes they fought three ſeuerall times. The firſt battell, when they had fought it out till night, in manner with like hope of both ſides, and that it could not be iudged which of them had the better: they both of purpoſe retired into their campe againe. The ſecond day Anniball was conquerer, after he had ſlaine almoſt two thouſand ſeuen hundred enemies, and put the reſidue of the army to flight. The third day, the Romaines to recouer the ſhame & diſhonor they had loſt the day before: they were the firſt that prayed they might fight, and ſo Marcellus led them out to battell. Anniball wondring at their valiantneſſe, ſayd vnto his people: that he delt with an enemie that could neither be quiet Conquerer, nor conquered. So the battell was more bloudy and cruell then any that was before: becauſe the Romaines did their beſt to be reuenged of their loſſe, and the Carthaginians on the other ſide were mad in their mindes, to ſee that the vanquiſhed durſt prouoke the vanquiſhers vnto battell. In the end, the Romaines being ſharply reproued, and alſo perſwaded by Marcellus to ſticke to it valiantly like men, that the newes of their victorie might come to Rome, before the newes of their ouerthrow: they flue in among the preſſe of their enemies, and neuer left fighting, till that after they had thriſe broken their enemies, they made them all flie. At the ſelfe ſame time Fabius maximus tooke the citie of Terentvm againe, almoſt after the ſelf ſame ſort it was loſt. This being reported vnto Anniball, he ſaid: the Romaines haue alſo their Anniball. The next yeare following, Marcellus and Criſpinus were choſen Conſuls, who preparing to put themſelues in readines for warre, they led both the armies againſt the enemy. Anniball diſpayring that he was not able to reſiſt them in battell, he ſought all the wits he had to deuiſe ſome way to intrappe them by ſutteltie, whom he could not ouercome by battell. So Annibals head being occupied thus, there was offred him a better occaſion to bring this enterpriſe to paſſe, then he looked for. Betweene both campes, there was a prety groue, in the which Anniball layed certain bands of the Nvmidians in ambuſh, to intrappe the enemies paſsing to and fro. On the other ſide, the Conſuls by conſent of them all, thought it beſt to ſend to view this groue, and to keepe it if neede required: leaſt in leauing it behind them, the enemies ſhould come, and ſo be vpon their iackes afterwards. Now before they remoued their army, both the Conſuls went out of their campe, with a ſmall company of horſemen with them, to view the ſituation of this place: and ſo going on very vndiſcreetely, and worſe appointed then became men of their authoritie and place, they vnfortunatly fell into Annibals ambuſh. So, when they ſaw themſelues in a moment compaſſed about on euery ſide with enemies, that they could not go forward, and were alſo fought withall behind: they defended themſelues the beſt they could, rather by compulſion, then of any determination they had to fight. So Marcellus was ſlaine fighting valiantly: and Criſpinus the other Conſul alſo very ſore hurt, who hardly ſcaped the enemies hands. Anniball being aduertiſed that Marcellus was ſlaine, who was the chiefeſt mā of all the Romaine Captaines, that had moſt hindered the happy ſucceſſe of his victories, and had beſides troubled him moſt: he preſently went and camped there where the battell was fought, and when he had found Marcellus body, he gaue it honorable pompe and funerall. Hereby we may ſee how magnanimitie, and excellent vertues, are eſteemed of all men: conſidering that the cruell and moſt mortall enemy, gaue honourable buriall to ſo noble and excellent a Captaine. The Romaines in the meane time ſeeing one of their Conſuls dead, and the other Conſull very ſore hurt: they drew ſtraight to the next mountaines, and camped in a ſtrong place. Howbeit Cri-

ſpinus had ſent to the next townes of the mountaines, to aduertiſe them that Marcellus his companion was dead, and that the enemy had gotten the ring he ſealed his letters withall: wherefore he wiſhed them to beware of any letters written in Marcellus name. Criſpinus Meſſenger came but newly vnto SALAPIA, when letters were brought alſo from Anniball in the behalfe of Marcellus, to tell them that he would be there the next night. The SALAPIANS knowing his craft, they ſent his Meſſenger away, & carefully looked for Annibals comming. About the fourth watch of the night, Anniball came to the citie of SALAPIA, who of purpoſe had put all the ROMAINS that had fled, in the vauntgard, becauſe that they ſpeaking the Latin tongue, might make them beleeue that Marcellus was there in perſon. So when the Citizens had ſuffred ſix hundred of them to come in, they ſhut to the gates, and with their ſhot and darts thruſt out the reſt of the army, and then put all them to the ſword they had let into the citie. Thus Anniball being in a maruellous rage he had miſſed of his purpoſe: he remoued thence, & went into the countrey of the BRVTIANS, to ayde the LOCRIANS that were beſieged by the ROMAINES, both by ſea and by land. After all theſe things, at the earneſt requeſt of the Senate and people, two new Conſuls were created, both famous Captaines, and valiant ſouldiers, Marcus Liuius, & Claudius Nero: who hauing deuided the army betwixt them, went vnto their ſeuerall charge & prouinces. Claudius Nero went into the country of the SALENTINIANS, and M. Liuius into GAVLE, againſt Haſdruball BARCINIAN, who was come ouer the Alpes, & made haſt to ioyne with his brother Anniball, bringing with him a great army both of footemen and horſemen. Now it chaunced at the ſame time, that Anniball had receiued great loſſe by Claudius the Conſul. For firſt of all, he ouercame him in the countrey of the LVCANIANS, vſing the like policies & fetches that Anniball did. Afterwards againe, meeting with Anniball in APVLIA, by the citie of VENVSIA: he fought ſuch a luſty battell with him, that many of his enemies lay by it in the field. By reaſon of theſe great loſſes, Anniball ſodainly went to METAPONT, to renew his army againe. So hauing remained there a few dayes, he receiued the army from Hanno the which he ioyned vnto his, & then returned vnto VENVSIA. C. Nero lay not farre from VENVSIA with his campe: who hauing intercepted letters of his enemies, he vnderſtood by them that Haſdruball was at hand with his army. Thereupon, he bethought himſelfe night and day, what policie he might vſe to preuent the ioyning of two ſo great armies together as theſe. So after he had taken aduiſe of himſelfe, he followed in ſight a daungerous determination: but peraduenture neceſſary, as the time required. For, leauing the campe vnto the charge of his Lieutenaunt, he tooke part of the army with him, and making great iourneyes, came to PICENVM (being the marches of ANCONA) ſo that on the ſixt day he came to SENA. There both the Conſuls ioyned their forces together, and ſetting vpon Haſdruball by the riuer of Metaurum, they had very good lucke at that battell. For, as it is reported, there were ſix and fiftie thouſand of the enemies ſlayne on that day: ſo that they almoſt had as great an ouerthrow, as the ROMAINES had receiued before at the battell of CANNES. Now Claudius Nero, after this famous victorie, returning as ſpeedily vnto VENVSIA as he went thence, he ſet vp Haſdrubals head, where the enemies kept their watch: and did let certaine priſoners go, to cary newes to Anniball of this great ouerthrow. For afterwardes it was knowen, that Anniball knew nothing yet of Claudius ſecret enterpriſe, nor of the ſpeedy execution and great ſlaughter he had made. VVhereat ſure I can but wonder, that ſo ſuttle a Captaine as Anniball, could be deceiued by Claudius, conſidering both their campes lay ſo neare together: ſo that he firſt heard the newes of the ouerthrow of his brother, and all his army, before he vnderſtood any thing of the Conſuls departure, or heard of his returne againe to the campe. Now Anniball hauing not onely receiued a generall, but alſo a particular great loſſe by the death of his brother: he ſayd then he plainly ſaw the chaunge and alteration of the CARTHAGINIANS good fortune, and ſhortly after remoued his campe, and went thence into the country of the BRVTIANS. For he knew that this great ouerthrow giuē by the riuer of Metaurum, was a maruellous incouragemēt to the ROMAINES, & would alſo be a great logge in his way, for the ſucceſſe of all this warre. This notwithſtanding, he gathered together all his power he had left in ITALIE, after ſo many great battels and conflicts, and ſo many cities taken: and mainteyned the warre with an inuincible courage. But the moſt ſtraungeſt thing in Anniball was this:that through his authoritie or wiſedome,he kept all his army in peace and amitie together,(being a medley of SPANIARDS, AFRICANS, GAVLES,and of diuers other nations) and neuer man heard that there was any brawle or tumult among them. Howbeit the ROMAINES themſelues, after they had wonne SICILIA, SARDINIA,and SPAYNE againe, they could neuer vtterly ouercome him,nor driue him out of ITALIE,before they had ſent P. Corlius Scipio into AFRICK:who making warre with the CARTHAGINIANS,he brought them to ſuch great extremitie,that they were driuẽ to ſend for Anniball home out of ITALIE. Anniball at that time,(as I haue ſayd before)was in the country of the BRVTIANS, making war by inrodes and ſodaine inuaſions,rather then by any fought battell: ſauing that once there was a battell fought in haſt betwixt him and the Conſull Sempronius, and immediatly after he came and ſet vpon the ſame Sempronius with all his army. At the firſt battell,Anniball had the victorie: but at the ſecond, Sempronius ouercame him. Since that time,I can finde in no Greeke nor Latin Author,that Anniball did any famous acte in ITALIE worthy memorie. For being ſent for into AFRICK by the CARTHAGINIANS,he left ITALY,ſixteen yeares after this AFRICK warre was begun, greatly complayning of the Senate of CARTHAGE, and of himſelfe alſo. Of the Senate, becauſe that all the time he had bene in his enemies country ſo long, they had allowed him ſo litle money: and ſo ſcanted him beſides with all other things neceſſary for the warres: And of himſelfe, becauſe that after he had ſo often ouercome the ROMAINES, he had alwayes delayed time after the victorie, and had giuen the enemy libertie to gather force againe. It is reported alſo,that before he imbarked and tooke ſea, he ſet vp a triumphing arche or piller, by the temple of Iuno Lacinia, in the which were briefly grauen his noble victories, both in the Punick and Greeke tongue. So when he was departed out of ITALY, the wind ſerued him well,that in few dayes he arriued at LEPTIS,and landing all his army,he firſt came to ADRVMENTVM,& afterwards vnto ZAMA. There receiuing aduertiſement how the affaires of the CARTHAGINIANS proſpered: he thought it beſt to deuiſe ſome way to end this war. For this cauſe he ſent vnto Scipio, to pray him to appoint him ſome conuenient place where they might both meete,and talke together,of matters of great importance. Now it is not certainly knowen, whether Anniball did this of his owne head,or by commaundement from the Senate. Scipio refuſed not to come to parley. Wherefore at the day appointed, there met two famous generals of mighty nations, in a great plaine together, either of them hauing his Interpreter, to talke together of diuers matters touching peace and warre. For, Anniball was altogether bent to peace: becauſe he ſaw the affaires of the CARTHAGINIANS waxe worſe & worſe euery day: that they had loſt SICILIA, SARDINIA, and SPAYNE: becauſe the warre was brought out of ITALIE into AFRICK: becauſe Syphax (a mighty king) was takẽ priſoner of the ROMAINES: and alſo becauſe that their laſt hope conſiſted in the army he had brought into AFRICKE: which was the onely remaine and reliefe of ſo long a warre as he had made in ITALIE: and alſo becauſe that the CARTHAGINIANS had ſo ſmall a power left (both of ſtraungers, and alſo of Citizens) that there were ſcarſe men enough to defende the citie of CARTHAGE. So he did his beſt to perſwade Scipio, with a long oration he made, rather to agree to peace, then to reſolue of warre. Howbeit Scipio that liued in hope to bring this warre to a good end, he would not ſeeme to giue eare to any peace. Wherefore after they had long debated the matter of either ſide, in the end they brake off, and made no agreement. Shortly after,was this famous battell ſtrikẽ by the citie of ZAMA, in the which the ROMAINES obtained victorie. For firſt of all,they made the CARTHAGINIANS Elephants turne vpon their owne army,ſo that they did put all Annibals horſemen out of order. And Lælius and Maſiniſſa, who made both the winges, increaſing their feare, gaue the horſemen no leyſure to gather themſelues in order againe. Howbeit the footemen fought it out a long time, and with a maruellous great courage: in ſo much that the CARTHAGINIANS (truſting in their former victories) thought that all the ſafetie and preſeruation of AFRICKE, was all in their handes, and therefore they layed about them like mẽ. The ROMAINES on the other ſide had as great harts as they,and beſides, they ſtood in the better hope. Howbeit one thing indeede did the ROMAINES great ſeruice to helpe them to the victorie: and that was, Lælius and Maſiniſſaes returne from the chaſe of the horſemen, who ruſhed in to the battell of the enemie with great

furie, and did put them in a maruellous feare. For at their comming, the CARTHAGINIANS harts were done, and they ſaw no other remedy for them, but to hope to ſcape by flying. So it is reported, that there were ſlaine that day, aboue twenty thouſand CARTHAGINIANS in the field, and as many more priſoners. Anniball their generall, after he had taried to ſee the end of the battell, fled with a few of his men out of the great ſlaughter. Afterwardes when he was ſent for to CARTHAGE, to helpe to ſaue his country: he perſwaded the Senate not to hope any more in warres, but did counſell them, that ſetting all deuiſes a part, they ſhould ſend vnto Scipio the ROMAINE Captaine, to make peace with him vpon any condition. When the ten Ambaſſadours had brought the capitulation and agreement vnto CARTHAGE of the articles of peace: it is reported that there was one Giſgo, who miſliking to heare talke of peace, he made an oration, and perſwaded all he could to renew war againſt the ROMAINES. Wherefore Anniball perceiuing that diuers men confirmed his opinion, and being much offended to ſee ſuch beaſtes, and men of no vnderſtanding, to dare to ſpeake of ſuch matters, in ſo daungerous a time: he caſt him downe headlong, whileſt he was yet in his oration. So when he ſaw that the Citizens, and all the whole aſſembly, thought this too preſumptuous a part of him, & vnmeete altogether for a free citie: he himſelfe got vp into the pulpit for orations, and ſayd. Let no man be offended, if a man that from his youth hath bene alway out of CARTHAGE, and brought vp all his life time in warres, be ignoraunt of the lawes and ordinaunces of the citie. After that, he ſpake ſo wiſely to the articles of peace, that the CARTHAGINIANS being immediatly moued by the authoritie of ſo great a perſon: they all agreed to accept the conditions which the vanquiſher, & the neceſſitie of time offred them. The articles out of doubt were very extreme, and ſuch as the vanquiſhed are wont to receiue with all extremitie by the conquerours. But beſides all other things, the CARTHAGINIANS were boũd to pay the ROMAINES an annuall tribute, vntill a certaine time were runne out. So when the day came that the firſt penſion was to be payd to the ROMAINES, & that euery man grudged when the ſubſidie was ſpoken of: ſome ſay that Anniball being offended with the vaine teares of the CARTHAGINIANS, he fell a laughing. And when Haſdruball Hædus reproued him becauſe he laughed in ſuch a common calamitie of all the citie, he aunſwered, that it was no laughter nor reioycing from the hart, but a ſcorning of their fond teares, that wept when there was leſſe cauſe (and onely becauſe it touched euery priuate mans purſe) then before, when the ROMAINES tooke from the CARTHAGINIANS their ſhippes, armour, and weapons, and their ſpoyles of the great victories which they had wonne before, and now gaue lawes and ordinaunces vnto thẽ that were vanquiſhed. I know ſome Authors write, that Anniball immediatly after he had loſt the battell, fled into ASIA, for that he was affrayed they would deliuer him into Scipioes handes, that perhaps might demaund him of them. But whether that was done ſodainly, or ſome time after the battell was loſt at ZAMA, it makes no great matter: conſidering that all the world knoweth, that when he ſaw things brought to extremitie, he preſently fled into ASIA vnto king Antiochus. So is it moſt true, that king Antiochus receiued him with great curteſie, and vſed him very honourably: in ſomuch as he made him of counſell with him all in all, both in priuate and publike cauſes. For the name of Anniball caried great reputation with all men: beſides that, he had a common & mortal hate to the ROMAINES, which was a pricking ſpurre ſtill to moue warre againſt them. And therefore it ſeemeth that he came in happy houre into that country, not onely to pricke forward the courage of the king againſt them, but alſo to ſet warres at libertie againſt the ROMAINES. So he told him, that the onely way to make warre with the ROMAINES, was to go into ITALIE to leauy ITALIAN ſouldiers, by whom onely, that victorious country of all other nations might be ſubdued. He requeſted of the king a hundred ſhips, ſixteen thouſand footemen, and a thouſand horſemen onely. With this ſmall army he promiſed to inuade ITALIE, and that he would maruellouſly trouble the ITALIANS, whom he knew yet to ſtand in no ſmall feare of him, for the very ſound of his name onely: becauſe of the late warres he had made there, ſo freſh yet in memorie. Furthermore, he tooke hart againe vnto him to renew the warres of AFRICKE, if the king would licence him to ſend men vnto CARTHAGE, to ſtirre vp the BARCINIAN faction, whom he knew hated the ROMAINES to death. When he had gotten the king to graunt him his requeſt, he called Ariſton

Tyrian vnto him, a fine ſuttle fellow, and meete for ſuch a purpoſe: to whom he made large promiſes, and perſwaded him to go to Carthage to his friends, and to cary them letters from him. Thus Anniball being a baniſhed man, & fled out of his country, raiſed warre in all parts againſt the Romaines. And ſurely his counſell had taken good effect, had king Antiochus rather followed his aduiſe, as he did at the firſt, then the vaine perſwaſions of his fine Courtiers. But enuy, a common plague frequenting Princes Courts, bred Anniball great enemies. For they being affrayed that by his counſels he ſhould grow in great fauour with the king, (for he was a wiſe and politike Captaine) and that thereby he ſhould beare great ſway and authoritie: to preuent it, they lacked no deuiſe to bring him in diſgrace with the king And it ſo chaunced at that time, that P. Villius, who came Ambaſſadour vnto Ephesvs, he had often conference with Anniball. Hereupon his priuie enemies tooke occaſion to accuſe him, and withall, the king himſelfe became ſo ielous of it, that from thence forth he neuer more called him to councell. At the ſelfe ſame time alſo, as ſome do report, P. Cornelius Scipio African (who was one of the Ambaſſadours ſent vnto king Antiochus) talking familiarly with Anniball, prayed him amongeſt other things to tell him truely, whom he thought the worthieſt Captaine of all others. Anniball aunſwered him. Firſt he thought Alexander, king of Macedon the chiefeſt: next vnto him, Pyrrhus king of the Epirotes: and thirdly, himſelfe. Then Scipio African ſmiling, asked him: what wouldeſt thou ſay, Anniball, if thou haddeſt ouercome me? Truely ſayd he, then I would be chiefeſt my ſelfe. This anſwer pleaſed Scipio maruellous well, becauſe he ſaw he was neither deſpiſed, nor yet brought to be compared with the other, but left alone as peereleſſe, by ſome ſecret flattery of Anniball. After theſe things, Anniball found occaſion to talke with king Antiochus, and began to lay open his life vnto him from his youth, and bewray the malice he had alwayes borne vnto the Romaines: whereby he ſo ſatisfied the king, that he was againe receiued into his grace and fauour, which he had almoſt vtterly loſt. Thereupon the king was determined to haue made him Admirall of his army by ſea, the which he had put in readineſſe for Italie, and alſo to make proofe of his great courage and ſeruice, whom he knew to be a worthy man, and a mortall enemy to the Romaines. But one Thoas, Prince of the Ætolians, thwarting this opinion, either for malice, or elſe for that his fancie was ſuch: he altered the kings minde, and cleane changed his purpoſe, the which was a matter of great importance for the warre he pretended to make. For he gaue counſell vnto Antiochus, that he ſhould go himſelfe into Grece, and direct his owne affaires: and that he ſhould not ſuffer an other to cary away the honor & glory of this warre. So king Antiochus ſhortly after wẽt into Grece, to make warre with the Romaines. Within few dayes after, when he conſulted whether he ſhould make league with the Thessalians, Annibals opinion was ſpecially asked: who ſpake ſo wiſely touching the ſtate of the Thessalians, and the chiefeſt matter of importance, that they all went with his opinion, & gaue their conſents vnto it. Now his opinion was, that they ſhould not need much to care for the Thessalians, but rather to make all the meanes they could, to get king Philip of Macedon to take their part: or elſe to perſwade him to be a Newter, & to take neither part. Furthermore, he gaue counſell to make war with the Romaines in their owne country, & offred himſelfe to ayde him the beſt he could. Euery man gaue good eare to his words, but his opinion was rather cõmended, then followed. Wherefore euery man maruelled, that ſuch a Captaine as he, that had ſo many yeares made warre with the Romaines (who had in manner cõquered all the world) ſhould then be ſo light ſet by of the king, when it ſpecially ſtood him vpõ, to haue ſuch a mãs helpe & cõſell. For, what captaine liuing could a mã haue foũd more ſkilfull or politike, or meeter to make war with the Romaines, thẽ him? Howbeit the king made no reckoning of him, at the firſt beginning of this war: but ſhortly after, diſdaining all their cõſel, he cõfeſſed that Anniball only ſaw what was to be done. For after the Romaines had obtained victory in the war he made in Grece: Antiochus fled out of Evrope into Ephesvs, where making mery, & there following pleaſure, he hoped to liue in peace, litle thinking the Romains would come with any army into Asia. Now, theſe flattering courtiers ſtill fed his humour: a perpetuall plague to Kings & Princes, that ſuffer thẽſelues to be flattered, & are contented to be deceiued, becauſe they giue good eare to that that pleaſeth them. But Anniball, who knew the power & ambition of the ROMAINES, perſwaded the king to hope for any thing rather then peace, & bad him truſt to it, that the ROMAINES would neuer ſtay, till they had proued whether they could enlarge the dominions of their Empire, into the third part of the world, as they had done in AFRICKE, and EVROPE. Antiochus perſwaded by the authority of ſuch a man, ſtraight commaunded Polyxenidas, a very ſeruiceable man, and skilfull in ſea ſeruice, that he ſhould go meete with the army of the ROMAINES that was comming thither. Then he ſent Anniball into SYRIA, to leauy a great number of ſhippes together, and afterwards made him, and Apollonius, (one of his fauoured Courtiers) generals of his army by ſea: who notwithſtanding that Polyxenidas was put to the worſt by the ROMAINES, they went & ſet vpō the RHODIANS, that were confederates with them. Anniball in this battell aſſayling Eudamus the Captaine of the RHODIANS, that led the left wing: he had already compaſſed in the Admirall galley, and doubtleſſe had obtained the victorie, but that the other wing came in to reſcue, after they had followed Apollonius in chaſe, and tooke the victorie from him, that was his owne. After this battell by ſea, which had no great good ſucceſſe: we do not finde that Anniball did any thing worthy memorie. For king Antiochus being ouercome, beſides other conditions, the ROMAINES offred him: they deſired that Anniball (the mortall enemy of their country) ſhould be deliuered vnto them. Anniball foreſeeing this long before, he ſodainly ſtale from Antiochus, after this notable battell that was fought by MAGNESIA, where the kings power was ouerthrowen. So, after Anniball had wādred vp & downe a long time, he fled at length vnto Pruſias, king of BITHYNIA, for ſuccour. Now he did not ſo much truſt to his friendſhip, but becauſe he ſought for the meeteſt place he could come by, as alſo for the ſafeſt, the which he moſt deſired: conſidering that the ROMAINES had the moſt part of the ſea and land in their ſubiection. Some ſay, that after king Antiochus was ouercome, Anniball wēt into CRETA vnto the GORTYNIANS: & that the rumour ran immediatly, he had brought a great maſſe of gold and ſiluer with him. Wherfore being affrayd leaſt the CRETANS ſhould offer him ſome violence, he deuiſed this ſhift to ſcape the daunger, he filled earthen pots with lead, gilt, and ſent them into the temple of Diana, fayning that he was maruellous carefull for them, as though all his treaſure had bene there. On the other ſide he had hid all his gold in images of braſſe, the which he had left careſly lying on the ground in the houſe. In the meane time, whileſt they watched the temple carefully, that theſe earthen pots ſhould not be caried away without their priuitie: Anniball hoyſed ſayle, and fled into BITHYNIA. In BITHYNIA there is a village vpon the ſea ſide, which the country men call LIBYSSA, of the which by ſome mens ſaying, there ranne an old oracle and prophecie in this ſort.

There Anniball lay, not ſpēding his time idlely, but paſsing it away in exerciſing of the mariners, riding of horſes, and trayning of his ſouldiers. Some Authors alſo do write, that at that time Pruſias made warre with Eumenes, king of PERGAMVM, who was a cōfederate & friend of the ROMAINES: & that he made Anniball his Lieutenant generall of his army by ſea: who aſſayling Eumenes with a new found and vnknowen deuiſe, wan the victory of the battell by ſea. For before they began to fight, it is reported that Anniball had gotten an infinite number of ſnakes into earthen pots, and when the battell was begun, & they buſily tending their fight: he threw thoſe pots with ſnakes into the enemies ſhips, and that by this fearefull and ſtraunge deuiſe he made them flie. Now whether this was true or not, the old chronicles do make no manner of mention, but onely AEmylius and Trogus. And therefore I report me to the Authours. So, the newes of the diſſention betwixt theſe two kings, Pruſias, and Eumenes being brought to ROME: the Senate ſent T.Q. Flaminius Ambaſſadour into ASIA, whoſe name was famous for the noble victories he had obtained in GRECE, to the end (as I coniecture) to make peace betwixt theſe two kings. Flaminius being come vnto king Pruſias, he was maruellouſly offended, and ſory in his minde to ſee Anniball yet aliue, (that was the mortalleſt enemy of the ROMAINES) after the cōqueſts of ſo many nations, & the ſacking of ſo many people: therfore, he was very earneſtly in hand with king Pruſias, to deliuer him Anniball. Anniball frō the firſt beginning miſtruſted king Pruſias incōſtancie very much, & therfore had digged diuers vaults in his houſe, and made ſeuen ſeuerall vents to flie out at, if he were ſodainly taken. The report of Flaminius cõming did encreaſe his ſuſpition the more, for that he thought him the greateſt enemy he had in Rome: both generally for the hate he bare vnto all the Romaines, as alſo particularly for the remembraunce of his father Flaminius, that was ſlaine in the battell fought by the lake of Thraſymene. So Anniball being full of care and griefe (as it is reported) he founde deuiſes to eſcape, the which ſtood him to no purpoſe againſt ſuch a great power. For when the kings gard which were ſent to take him, had compaſſed his houſe about: Anniball thought to flie at their firſt comming, and to ſaue himſelf by the ſecreteſt vault he had. But when he found that the place was kept by the gard, then he determined to rid himſelf out of the Romaines handes, by doſtroying himſelfe. So, ſome do report, that he was ſtrangled by one of his men, whom he had commaunded to helpe to diſpatch him. Others write again, that he had druncke buls bloud, and when he had druncke it, dyed, as Clitarchus, and Stratocles do falſly report of Themiſtocles. Howbeit Titus Liuius, that famous Hiſtoriographer writeth, that Anniball called for the poyſon he had ready for ſuch a miſchiefe, & that holding this deadly drinke in his hand, before he dranke he ſayd: Come on, let vs rid the Romaines of this payne and care, ſith their ſpight and malice is ſo great, to haſten the death of a poore old man that is halfe dead already. The auncient Romaines aduertiſed Pyrrhus king of the Epirotes, who came with enſignes diſplayed to the very wals of the citie of Rome, that he ſhould looke to himſelfe, and beware of poyſoning: and theſe Romaines now do make a friend forgetting his kingly ſtate & faithfull promiſe, vilely to betray his poore gueſt. After he had ſayd, bitterly curſing king Pruſias, he poyſoned himſelfe, being three ſcore and ten yeare old, as ſome writers do teſtifie. His body was buried in a tombe of ſtone by Libyssa, on the which was ingrauen no more but this: Here lyeth Anniball. The Romaines being aduertiſed of his death, euery man ſayd his opinion, as his fancie ſerued him. Some greatly blamed T. Q. Flaminius crueltie, who to make himſelfe famous by ſome notable acte (as he thought) made a poore old man put himſelfe to death, that was in manner halfe dead by age, and beſides, was paſt doing the ſtate of Rome any more hurt, they being Conquerours in manner of all the world. But ſome againe on the other ſide, commended Flaminius for it, & ſayd it was a good deede of him, to rid the Romaines of their mortall enemy: who though he had a weake body, yet he lacked no wit, wiſe counſell, and great experience in warres, to intiſe king Pruſias to make warre, & to moleſt all Asia beſides with new warres. For at that time, the power of the king of Bithynia was ſo great, that it was not to be lightly regarded. For after that, Mithridates king of the ſame Bithynia, did maruellouſly moleſt the Romaines both by ſea & by land, & moreouer fought battels with L. Lucullus, and Cn. Pompey, famous Captaines of the Romaines. And ſo the Romaines might alſo be affrayd of Pruſias, & ſpecially hauing Anniball his Captaine. So ſome iudge, that Q. Flaminius was ſpecially ſent Ambaſſadour vnto king Pruſias, ſecretly to practiſe Annibals death. Howbeit it is to be ſuppoſed, that Q. Flaminius was not ſo deſirous to haue Anniball ſo ſodainly put to death, as he would haue bene glad otherwiſe to haue brought him againe to Rome, that had done ſuch miſchiefe to his country: & this had bene a great benefit for Rome, and much honour alſo vnto himſelfe. Such was the death of Anniball the Carthaginian, a famous man doubtleſſe, and highly to be commended for martiall prayſe, ſetting his other vertues aſide. So we may eaſily iudge, of what power and force his noble minde, his great wiſedome and courage, and his perfit skill of martiall diſcipline was in all things. For in all the warre the Carthaginians had ſo vehemently, & with ſuch great preparation enterpriſed: they neuer thought themſelues ouercome, till Anniball was ouerthrowen at that great battell by Zama. So it appeareth, that all their ſtrength and skill of warres began, and alſo ended, with Anniball their Captaine.

The parentage of Scipio.

P*Vblius Scipio* a PATRICIAN, of the familie of the Cornelij, who was the firſt ROMAINE Captaine againſt whõ Anniball fought in ITALIE: was the father of Cornelius Scipio afterwardes ſurnamed AFRICAN, the firſt ſo called, becauſe he had cõquered that natiõ. The ſame Scipio, after he had obtained many great victories in SPAYNE, and done notable feates of armes: was in the end ſlaine with a wound he had in a battell againſt his enemies, as he was plying & incouraging of his men frõ place to place, thronging in the greateſt daunger & fury of the battell. Shortly after did his brother Cn. Scipio alſo end his life, much after one ſelfe maner, and was ſlaine valiantly fighting. So theſe two Captaines, beſides the fame they atchieued by their noble deedes, left behind them great praiſe of their faithfulneſſe, modeſtie, and courage: the which made them not onely wiſhed for of their ſouldiers that were then liuing, but alſo of all the SPANYARDES beſides. Cn. Scipio had a ſonne called P. Cornelius Naſica, one that had bene Conſull and had alſo triumphed: who being but a young man, was thought the meeteſt man of all the citie of ROME to receiue Idaa, the mother of the goddes. This Publius had two ſonnes, the ſo famous Scipioes: of the which the one was called ASIAN, becauſe he cõquered ASIA: and the other AFRICAN, becauſe he ſubdued AFRICK at that famous battell of ZAMA, where he ouerthrew Anniball and the CARTHAGINIANS, as we ſaid before. Whoſe life we purpoſe now to write, not ſo much to make the glory of his name (ſo famous by all the Greeke and Latin Authours) the greater by our hiſtory: as for that we would make all mẽ know the order of his noble deeds, & morall vertues, to the end that all Princes and noble Captaines in reading it, ſhould behold the liuely image of perfit vertue, which may moue an earneſt deſire in thẽ to follow the example of P. Cornelius Scipioes life, who from his childhood gaue great hope & ſhew of a noble nature, & excellẽt vertue, after he followed the inſtruction of martiall diſcipline, vnder the conduct of his father. He was caried into the field at the beginning of the ſecond warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, followed the campe being but ſeuenteen yeare old, & in a very ſhort time grew ſo toward, & forward in all things, in riding, in watching, in taking all manner of paines like a ſouldier, that he wan great cõmendation of his own father, & beſides, great eſtimatiõ alſo of all the army. Furthermore, he ſhewed ſuch tokẽs of a ſharpe wit, & noble courage: that it made him beloued, & alſo feared of his

his enemies. For this Scipio was preſent at the battell of the horſemen, where P. Cornelius Scipio the Conſul fought with Anniball, by the riuer of Theſin: & ſome writers do affirme, that Cornelius the father being hurt, was almoſt taken by the enemy, had not his ſonne Scipio ſaued him, who had then but a litle downe on his beard, he was ſo young. After that alſo, at the battel that was fought by CANNES, to the great loſſe, & in maner vtter deſtruction of the Empire of ROME, when the ten thouſand men that fled to CANVSIVM, had all together with one conſent referred the gouernement of the army vnto Appius Pulcher, that had bene Ædilis, & vnto Cornelius Scipio, that was yet but very young: the ſame Scipio ſhewed then by his deedes, what noble minde & courage was in him. For when he ſaw certain young men cōſult together betweene thēſelues to forſake ITALIE: he thruſt in among them, & drawing out his ſword, made them all ſweare they would not forſake their country. Theſe, and ſuch like deeds done by him with a liuely courage & noble mind, being then but a young man: wan him ſuch fauour with the ROMAINES, that not reſpecting his young yeares, nor their auncient cuſtome, they called him forward, & layd offices of great charge & gouernement vpon him. In ſomuch that when he ſued for the office of Ædilis before his due time, notwithſtanding that the Tribunes of the people were againſt his ſute, becauſe he was ſo yong a man: yet the people ſuffered him to be brought from tribe to tribe, & ſo was preſently choſen Ædilis with the moſt voyces. So after his father & vncle, (both famous and noble Captaines) had bene ſlayne one after the other in SPAYNE, & that the ROMAINES were in conſultation to appoint ſome worthy Captaine in the roome: they could finde no man that durſt vndertake this ſo daungerous war, conſidering the loſſe of two ſo great captaines before. Wherfore the whole aſſembly being called to chuſe a Viceconſull, all the other Princes & peeres of the Realme being ſilent at ſo worthy a motion: Scipio onely of all the reſt, being but foure & twenty yeare old, ſtood vp in the middeſt of thē, & ſayd, with a good hope & confidence he would willingly take the charge vpō him. He had no ſooner offred this promiſe, but he was preſently made Vicecōſull of SPAYNE, with the wōderfull good will and fauour of the people, who gaue him all their voyces. Howbeit the Senators afterwardes conſidering better of the matter, againſt what Captaines & nations he ſhould make warre: they thought it vnpoſsible ſo young a man could performe ſo waighty a charge. Wherefore mens minds were wonderfully chaunged againe on the ſodaine, as if the tribes of the people had repented them of their voyces & election. Scipio perceiuing it, called an aſſembly preſently, & made ſuch an oration of his age, and diſcipline of warres, that euery man that heard him wondred at him, and the people began againe to renew the good hope they had of him for the warres. For he had not onely a noble courage in him, being indued with many ſingular vertues, but he was alſo a goodly gentleman, and very comly of perſon, and had beſides a pleaſaunt countenaunce: all which things together, are great meanes to winne him the loue and good will of euery man. Moreouer, euē in his geſture and behauiour, there was a certaine Princely grace. Now, the glory of martiall diſcipline, being ioyned vnto thoſe his rare giftes of minde and nature: it was to be doubted, whether his ciuill vertues made him more acceptable vnto ſtrangers, then wonderfull for his skill in warres. Furthermore, he had filled the commō peoples harts with a certain ſuperſtitious feare, becauſe he did daily (after he had takē the mans gowne) vſe to go vp to the Capitoll, & ſo into the Church without any company: in ſomuch that all men began to thinke that he learned ſome ſecret things in the temple, which others might not know, as they were perſwaded long before, that Numa Pompilius was taught by the Nymphe AEgeria. Furthermore, it ſeemeth that ſome had the like opinion of Scipio, as in old time they had of Alexander king of MACEDON, to wit: that oftentimes there was a ſnake ſeene in his mothers chamber. But let theſe things go. Scipio departing out of ITALY with ten thouſand footemen, & a fleete of thirty gallies, euery one of thē hauing fiue owers to a banke: he ſayled into SPAYNE, & in few dayes arriuing at EMPORIA, he landed his mē, and marched by land to TARRACON. There he kept a councell, and many Ambaſſadours of the cities their confederates came thither, who being curteouſly receiued, returned to their lodgings with ſuch aunſwere as they liked. After this, Scipio being carefully bent to proſecute the warre he had taken vpon him, he thought it beſt to ioyne the remaine of the old bandes with his army, which had bene ſaued through the manhood and valiantneſſe of Lucius Martius. For after both the Scipioes were ſlayne, and both Spaynes almoſt loſt, and the Romaine legions alſo ouerthrowen & put to flight: L. Martius a Romaine Knight, hauing gathered together the remnant of both armies, reſiſted (beyond all hope of man) the enemies puffed vp with glory of the victorie they had gotten, & with great valiantneſſe, and vnſpeakeable induſtry he mainteined war in Spayne, againſt three Captaines of the Carthaginians. Now Scipio being come to this army that lay in garriſon for the winter time, euery man did certainly perſwade themſelues that the warre ſhould proſper: and when they ſaw him, they remembred their old Captaines, in ſomuch that there was neuer a ſouldier could haue his fill, with looking vpon this young man. Howbeit, after he had commended the ſouldiers for their noble courage, not diſpayring for the calamity of their countrey: he greatly honored Lucius Martius, to ſhew, that who ſo truſteth in his owne vertues, neede not enuy the glory of another man. So winter being paſt, he tooke the old and new bandes out of the garriſons, and firſt of all determined to go and lay ſiege vnto new Carthage. For of all the cities of Spayne it was the wealthieſt, & none more meeter to make warre both by ſea & land, then that. Moreouer, the Captaines of the Carthaginians had beſtowed in this citie all their munition, and greateſt treaſure: and left a ſtrong garriſon, both in the citie, and caſtle. But the Captaines themſelues were deuided in diuers countryes, to the end that they three might keepe the whole regiõ from ſpoyle, leaſt of all looking then that Carthage ſhould be beſieged.

The valiantneſſe of Lucius Martius a Romaine knight.

But Scipio hauing put all in readineſſe, he came to beſiege new Carthage with all his army both by ſea & lãd. This ſeemed to be a maruellous hard enterpriſe, and would continue long, both becauſe the citie was very ſtrong of it ſelfe, and alſo for that the men within it were ſo couragious: that they did not onely thinke themſelues able to defend the citie, but their harts ſerued them alſo to make ſalyes out vpon the enemy, and to skirmiſh with them, euen to the very trenches of the Romaines campe. Howbeit it happeneth often, that what a man can not attaine by force, he may winne by induſtrie. Now Scipio knew, that the lake or mer which is not farre from the wals of Carthage, did ebbe and flow with the tyde, and that it was paſſable by forde on that ſide where they might eaſilieſt come to the walles: So, he thinking to imbrace this occaſion, and that he could not poſsibly meete with a better deuiſe to take Carthage: when he ſaw his time, he ſet his men in battell ray, and hauing deuided them into ſeuerall ſquadrons, gaue a more deſperate aſſault vnto the citie, then he had done before. In the meane time, he choſe out a band of the valianteſt men he had, and commaunded them to wade ouer the lake, and to ſcale the walles on that ſide, where they within the towne made leaſt account of it. So, theſe ſouldiers that were commaunded to giue this attempt, after they had paſſed ouer the lake without any let or trouble: they found that part of the wall without any watche or garde, becauſe the greateſt fury of the fight, was on the other ſide of the citie. Therefore they eaſily getting vp on the wall, came and aſſayled the enemies behind them. The citizens, and thoſe of the garriſon, perceiuing they were vnwares fallen into that great daunger: they immediatly forſooke the walles, and ſeeing themſelues charged on euery ſide, betooke them to their legges, and fled.

Scipio wanne the citie of new Carthage by aſſault.

The Romaines purſued them ſo hotly, that they wanne the citie, and ſacked it: where they found a wonderfull great ſpoyle, and aboundance of all things neceſſary for warre. Scipio greatly prayſed his ſouldiers, & did rewarde them, for that they had done ſo valiant ſeruice. Howbeit when he ſhould come to giue the ſcaling crowne of the wals, vnto the firſt man that got vp vpon the wall: there were two ſouldiers at ſuch variance for the matter, that all the army was in daunger of diuiſion and mutinie vpon that occaſion. Thereupon Scipio called his men together, and in open aſſembly told them, that he knew they both got vp on the wall together, and ſo gaue them both a ſcaling crowne: and by this meanes their tumult was preſently pacified. Afterwards he ſent vnto all the cities of Spayne, the hoſtages that were found in the citie, which were a maruellous number: the which wanne him great fame for his curteſie and clemencie, whereby he allured many nations to yeeld themſelues vnto the Romaines, & to forſake the Carthaginians.

But one thing aboue all the reſt, chiefly increaſed his prayſe, and wanne him great loue and good will, as a myrror and example of all vertue. There was a young Lady taken priſoner, that in beautie excelled all the women in Carthage: whom he carefully cauſed to be kept, and preſerued from violence and diſhonour. And afterwardes whẽ he knew that ſhe was maried vnto Luceius, Prince of the CELTIBERIANS: he ſent for her husband that was a very young man, and deliuered her vnto him, vntouched, or diſhonoured. Luceius not forgetting his noble cutteſie vnto her, did let all his ſubiectes vnderſtand the great bounty, modeſty, and rare excellencie of all kinde of vertues that were in this ROMAINE generall: and ſhortly after he returned againe to the ROMAINES campe, with a great number of horſemen. The three Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS (Mago, Haſdruball BARCINIAN, & the other Haſdruball, the ſonne of Giſgo) knowing that the loſſe of new CARTHAGE did thẽ great hurt, as well in the impairing of their credit with other ſtraunge nations, as alſo by the coniecture diuers made of the ſucceſſe of this warre: they firſt practiſed to diſſemble the loſſe of it, and then in ſpeach to make light of it as much as they could. Scipio hauing ioyned vnto him diuers nations and Princes of SPAYNE, (among the which were the two litle kings, Mandonius, and Indibilis) vnderſtãding where Haſdruball BARCINIAN lay: he marched towards him with his army, to fight with him, before Mago and the other Haſdruball came to ioyne with him. Haſdruball BARCINIAN lay in campe by the riuer of Beſula, & was very deſirous to fight, truſting wholly to his ſtrength and army. But when he heard that Scipio was at hand, he left the valley, and got to a hill of prety ſtrength. The ROMAINE legions followed him, and gaue him no reſpit, but purſued ſo neare, that they came and aſſaulted his campe at their firſt comming. So they fought it out vpon the trenches and rampers, as if they had bene at the aſſault of a citie. The CARTHAGINIANS truſting to the ſtrength of the place, and driuen vnto it of neceſsitie, (the which maketh cowards moſt deſperat) they valiantly reſiſted their enemies the beſt they could. The ROMAINES in contrary manner, being valiant, and full of good hope, fought it out luſtely like men, and the fight was ſo much more cruell, for that it was in the ſight of their Generall Scipio, and of all the army beſides: in ſomuch that their valiant ſeruice there could not be hidden. Therefore they neuer gaue ouer the aſſault, vntill that hauing done their vttermoſt endeuour, they got vp vpon the rampers, and entred in diuers places into the enemies campe, and made them flie. Haſdruball, Captaine of the CARTHAGINIANS, ſaued himſelfe by flying, with a few with him, before the ROMAINES entred into their fort. After this battell, Scipio according to his manner, cauſed all the Spaniſh priſoners to be brought before him, and then gaue them libertie to depart, without paying of raunſome. Among the priſoners, there was a young gentleman of the kings bloud, and nephew vnto Maſiniſſa, whom when he had vſed very honourably, he ſent vnto Maſiniſſa, with great and rich gifts: to ſhew thereby, that a generall of an army ſhould be as bountifull & full of ciuill vertues, as otherwiſe skilfull and expert in martiall diſcipline. For the end of warre is victorie: the benefite whereof conſiſteth in bountie, and clemencie. From thence commeth the glory and all other prayſes due to Captaines: as it happened in thoſe things whereof we now treate. For a great number of SPANYARDS being preſent, wondering at the great clemẽcie of the generall of the ROMAINES: they could do no leſſe but call him king, to honour and recompence his vertue. But Scipio ſtrake that word dead ſtraight, the which was no common ſound to the ROMAINES eares, and therfore he would by no meanes allow that title, which he knew to be hatefull to the noble men of his country, and alſo vnmeete for the libertie of the ROMAINES. He onely prayeth the SPANYARDS, that if they had any minde & deſire not to ſhew themſelues vnthankefull to him, that then they would be faithfull and louing to the people of ROME. So whileſt theſe things were done by Scipio, the other two captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, (Mago, & Haſdruball, the ſonne of Giſgo) after they vnderſtood of the ouerthrow of their men by the riuer of Beſula: they made all the ſpeede they could ioyne together, and ſhortly after came and met with Haſdruball BARCINIAN, to conſult together, and to take order for the warre. So after they had layed their heades together, and conſidered all things, they concluded thus: that Haſdruball BARCINIAN ſhould go into ITALY to his brother Anniball, where the warre was greateſt: & that Mago, and the other Haſdruball ſhould remaine in SPAYNE, ſhould ſend for aide from CARTHAGE, & ſhould not fight with the ROMAINES vntill all their forces looked for were aſſembled, & ſo might make a great and puiſſant army. When Haſdrubal was gone into ITALIE, Hanno was ſent from CARTHAGE in his place. But practiſing in his iourney to make the CELTIBERIANS to rebell, M. Syllanus came and ſet vpon him by Scipioes commaundement,

Mago, Haſdruball Barcinian, Haſdruball Giſgo, the three famous Captaines of the Carthaginians.

Scipio called king, by the Spanyards.

and was ſo fortunate, that he ouercame him in battell, and tooke him priſoner. Now there was a citie which the country men called ORINGE, the which was very wealthy, and meete to renew the warre. Lucius Scipio was ſent thither with part of the armie to beſiege it: but finding it a very ſtrong ſituation, and too well manned to take it at the firſt aſſault, he enuironned the towne, and within few dayes tooke and ſacked it. Winter came on a pace, and the time of the yeare made thē both to retire into their garriſons, for the winter. So Scipio hauing had ſo good fortune in this warre, he went vnto TARRACON: Mago, and the other Haſdruball, the ſonne of Giſgo, went to the ſea ſide. The next ſommer, warres growing more bloudy and cruel then before in the lower SPAYNE, the ROMAINES & CARTHAGINIANS met, and ioyned battell by the riuer of Beſula, and fought ſet battels. After they had fought a long time together, Scipio at length got the victorie, and made the enemies flie: (of the which there were ſlaine a great number in the field) and giuing them no leaſure to gather together againe, and to make head againſt him, he fought with them, and followed the chaſe ſo hotly, that Haſdruball & Mago were driuen to leaue the maine land, and to flie to GADES, after they had loſt all their army. In the army of the CARTHAGINIANS, there was a young man of a noble courage, and very wiſe, called Maſiniſſa, who finding meanes to haue ſecret conference with Syllanus, he was the firſt man that offred him friendſhip, either being brought to it through Scipioes liberalitie, or elſe becauſe he thought the time was come, that it was the ſureſt way to take part with the ROMAINES, which were the cōquerors.

It is that Maſiniſſa that afterwards, (through the goodnes of the ROMAINES) became the great & mighty king of NVMIDIA, & indeede he was diuers wayes a profitable friend vnto the ROMAINES. Furthermore, the ſelfe ſame yeare, (which was the fourteenth of the ſecond warre with the AFRICANS) SPAYNE was the firſt nation and people of the vpland men dwelling in the hart of the realme, that was conquered vnder the happy conduct of the Viceconſull Scipio: howbeit it was the laſt realme that was made a prouince long time after, by Auguſtus Cæſar. Now Scipio not contenting himſelf with the great victories he had obtained, in very ſhort time in SPAYNE (for he had an imagination & good hope alſo to cōquer AFRICKE) he thought that his beſt way, to make all the meanes he could poſible to get Syphax, king of the MASÆSYLIANS, a friēd to the ROMAINS.

Wherefore after he had felt the kings minde, perceiuing that he was well inclined to make league with the ROMAINES: he preſently ſet all his other affaires aſide, & ſailed into AFRICK with two gallies onely, at fiue owers to a bancke. At the ſelfe ſame time alſo came Haſdruball, the ſonne of Giſgo thither, from GADES: ſo that both theſe valiant & luſty Captaines came of purpoſe to the king, enuying one the other, to craue the kings good will, vnto their country and common wealth. Syphax welcomed them both into his Court, and did vſe them very honourably and curteouſly, and appointed that they ſhould both eate at one table, and lye in one ſelfe chamber, becauſe the one ſhould not thinke his enterteinement better then the other.

Haſdrubals iudgement of Scipio.

It is reported, that Haſdruball wondering at the magnanimity and great wiſedome of Scipio that was preſent, he conſidered with himſelfe the great daunger the citie of CARTHAGE and all AFRICKE beſides was in, through that mans meanes: for he ſaw him yet a young man, quicke, and excellent in all manner of great vertues, and that had continually obtained ſuch victories, and therefore conſidering the luſtie youth of this gentleman, he imagined that it was vnpoſſible to perſwade him to imbrace peace, rather then warre. Beſides, he was affrayed alſo that Syphax, moued by the perſonage and authoritie of him that was preſent, would take part with the ROMAINES: and indeed his minde gaue him rightly, for ſo it happened. For though Syphax at the firſt ſhewed himſelfe indifferent to them both, and had moued talke to end the war betwixt the ROMAINES & the CARTHAGINIANS: yet afterwards when Scipio told him he could conclude no peace without conſent of the Senate of ROME, he reiected Haſdruball, and inclining to Scipioes requeſt, he made league with the people of ROME.

Syphax, king of the Maſæſylians, maketh league with the Romaines.

So Scipio being returned againe into SPAYNE, himſelfe partly by force, and partly alſo by L. Martius meanes, conquered ILITVRGIVM, CASTVLO, and certaine other places that refuſed to yeeld themſelues vnto the ROMAINES. And to the end nothing ſhould be lacking for all kind of ſportes and pleaſures, after he had ſo fortunately obtained ſo many famous victories: when he was come to new CARTHAGE, he cauſed the fenſers to prepare themſelues to fight with great pompe, where there were many great eſtates, not only to ſee that paſtime, but alſo they themſelues to handle the weapons in perſon. But amongeſt other SPANYARDES of noble houſes, there were two called, Corbis & Orſua, which were at ſtrife together for the kingdome: but that day they ended their quarrell, the one being ſlaine by the others hand. The fight was very lamentable & grieuous to the beholders: but the death of him that was ſlaine, troubled them much more, for they were both couſin germaines.

After all this, Scipio hauing his mind ſtill occupied in matters of greater waight and importance, then thoſe which he had alreadie brought to paſſe: he fell ſicke. His ſickneſſe being caried through all SPAYNE, and as it happeneth often, his diſeaſe being reported to be much greater and daungerous then it was in deede: thereupon, not onely the nations of SPAYNE beganne to riſe in hope of chaunge, but the armie ſelfe alſo of the ROMAINES, the which he had left at SVCRO. Firſt of all, martiall diſcipline was corrupted, through the abſence of the Generall.

Afterwardes alſo, the report of his ſickeneſſe, and daunger of his life being ſpred abroad in the armie, raiſed ſuch a rebellion among them: that ſome of them litle regarding the authoritie and commaundement of the head Captaines of the bands, they draue them away, and choſe two meane ſouldiers for their Captaines, who preſumptuouſly tooke vpon them the name giuen vnto them by men of no authoritie, and yet with more arrogancie, made the bundles of roddes and axes to be caried before them. Such folly doth furie and vaine ambition oftentimes worke in mens minds.

Mandonius: Indibilis, two kings of Spain.

On the other ſide, the SPANYARDS ſlept not, and ſpecially Mandonius and Indibilis: who aſpiring to the kingdome of SPAYNE, came to Scipio when he was conqueror, after he had taken new CARTHAGE. But afterwards, being offended to ſee the power of the ROMAINES increaſe daily, they ſought occaſion to make ſome alteration. So after they had heard, not only of Scipioes ſickeneſſe, but alſo how he was at deathes dore, and did beleeue it: they preſently leauied an armie, and went and made warre with the SVESSITANS which were confederats of the ROMAINES. But Scipio being recouered againe of his ſickneſſe, like as vpon the falſe rumor of his death euery man beganne to riſe: euen ſo after the truth was knowen in deede of his recouerie, they were all put downe againe, and not a man of them durſt proceede any further in their rebellion.

Scipio being more skilfull in martiall diſcipline, then acquainted with ſedition and rebellion: although he was maruellouſly offended with the ſouldiers that had committed this follie, yet in the end, leaſt following his anger, men ſhould haue thought him to haue exceeded all boundes of reaſon in puniſhing of them, he referred all vnto the councell. The moſt part of them gaue aduiſe, that the authors of the rebellion ſhould be puniſhed, and all the reſt pardoned: for by this meanes ſaid they, the puniſhment ſhall light vpon a few that haue deſerued it, and all the reſt ſhall take example by them.

Scipioes great wiſedome in puniſhing the offenders.

Scipio followed that aduiſe, and preſently ſent for all the ſeditious bandes, to come to new CARTHAGE to receiue their pay. The ſouldiers obeyed his commaundement, ſome of them making their fault leſſe then it was, as men doe often flatter themſelues: others alſo truſting to the Captaines clemencie, as knowing him not to be extreame in puniſhment.

Scipioes care of his countrimen

For Scipio was wont to ſay, that he had rather ſaue the life of one ROMAINE citizen, then to kill a thouſand enemies. The rumor ranne alſo, that Scipio had an other armie readie, the which he looked for to ioyne with them, and then to ſet vpon the kings (Mandonius & Indibilis) who made warre with the SVESSITANS. Theſe ſouldiers departing frō SVCRO, with good hope to obtaine pardon, came vnto CARTHAGE. Howbeit the next day after they were come into the towne, they were brought into the market place: where their armour and weapons being taken from them, they were enuironned with all the legions armie. Then the ROMAINE Generall ſitting in place of iudgement, ſhewed himſelfe before all the company in as good health & good diſpoſition of bodie, as euer he was in all his youth. Then he made a ſharp & bitter oration, full of grieuous complaints: inſomuch as there was not one of all the ſouldiers that were vnarmed, that durſt caſt vp their eyes or looke their Generall in the face, they were ſo aſhamed. For their conſciences did accuſe them for the fault they had committed, and the feare of death did take their wits and ſenſes from them, & the preſence of their gratious Captaine, made them bluſh as well that were innocent, as the parties that were offenders. Wherefore there was a generall and ſorrowfull ſilence of all men. So after he had ended his oration, he cauſed the chiefe authors of this rebellion to be brought forth before the whole aſſembly, who, after they had bene whipped according to the maner, were preſently beheaded, the which was a fearefull and lamentable ſight to the beholders. Theſe matters thus pacified, Scipio made all the other ſouldiers to be ſworne againe, and then went and proclaimed warre againſt Mandonius and Indibilis. For they conſidering with themſelues, how the ROMAINE ſouldiers that had rebelled in the campe, were put to death: they were out of hope to obtaine any pardon. Therefore they had leauied an armie of twentie thouſand footmen and two thouſand horſemen, and came downe with them againſt the ROMAINES. Scipio hauing intelligence thereof, before that the kings could increaſe their army, & that other nations could rebell: he departed from CARTHAGE, & went with as great ſpeed as he could to meete with the enemy. The kings were camped in a very ſtrong place, and truſted ſo to their army, that they were not determined to prouoke the enemie, nor alſo to refuſe the battell if it were offred them. Howbeit it chanced by the neerenes of both campes, that within few daies, they being prouoked by the ROMAINS, came downe & ſet their men in battell ray, & ioyned battell with Scipio: ſo that a good while together, the fight was very bloudy & cruel. But at length the SPANYARDS ſeeing themſelues compaſſed in behinde, and being driuen to fight in a ring to defend the enemie on euery ſide, they were ouercome: ſo that the third part of them ſcarcely ſaued themſelues by flying. Mandonius and Indibilis ſeeing themſelues vtterly vndone, and that there was no hope nor remedy left: they ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Scipio, humbly to pray him to receiue them to mercie, and to pardon them. But Scipio knowing right well how greatly they had offended him, and the ROMAINES, yet thinking it more honorable to ouercome the enemy by curteſie and clemencie, then by force: he did pardon them, and onely cõmaunded them to giue him money to pay his ſouldiers. In the meane time Maſiniſſa came from GADES, & landed: becauſe he would himſelfe in perſon confirme the friendſhip he had offered Scipio in his abſence, by the meanes of M. Syllanus, and alſo ſpeake with him face to face, whom he iudged to be a worthy man, for the famous victories he had obteined. And in truth Maſiniſſa was not deceiued in the opinion he had of the valiantnes and vertues of Scipio, but found him the ſelfe ſame man whom he before had imagined him to be in his minde: the which but ſeldome happeneth ſo notwithſtanding. For beſides the great rare gifts of nature that Scipio had aboue all others, there was in him alſo a certaine Princely grace and maieſtie. Furthermore, he was maruellous gentle & courteous vnto them that came to him, and had an eloquent tongue, and a paſſing gift to winne euery man. He was verie graue in his geſture & behauiour, and euer ware long haire. Maſiniſſa being come to ſalute him, when he ſaw him, he had him in ſuch admiration as it is reported, that he could not caſt his eies off him, nor haue his fill of looking on him. So he thãked him maruellouſly for ſending his Nephew vnto him, and promiſed him that his deedes ſhould confirme and witneſſe the friendſhip agreed vpon betwene them: the which he euer after inuiolably kept vnto the ROMAINES, euen to the houre of his death. So all the nations of SPAYNE became ſubiect to the Empire of ROME, or at the leaſt their confederats: wherupon thoſe of GADES alſo following the example of others, came and yeelded themſelues vnto the ROMAINES. This is a very auncient nation, and if we may credit the report of it: as CARTHAGE was in AFRICKE, and THEBES in BOEOTIA, ſo was GADES vpon the ſea, a Colony of the TYRIANS. Scipio after he had conquered all SPAYNE, & driuen out the CARTHAGINIANS, conſidering that there remained nothing more for him to doe: he left the gouernment of the prouince vnto L. Lentulus, and to Manlius Acidinus, and returned to ROME. When he was arriued at ROME, the Senate gaue him audience out of the citie, in the temple of Bellona. There, when he had particularly tolde them of the thinges he had valiantly, and fortunately brought to end: and further, that he had ouercome foure Captaines in diuers foughten fieldes and alſo put to flight foure armies of the enemies, and driuen the CARTHAGINIANS out of both SPAYNES, and that there was no nation left in all thoſe partes, but was ſubdued to the ROMAINES, the Senate gaue iudgement, that all theſe things were worthie of a noble triumph. But becauſe neuer man yet was ſuffred to enter into ROME in triumph, for anie victories he had obtained, whileſt he was onely but Vicecounſull, and had not yet beene Conſull: the Senators thought it not good, and Scipio himſelfe alſo made no great ſute for it, becauſe he would not be an occaſion to bring in any newe cuſtome, and to breake the olde. So when he came into the citie, he was afterwardes declared Conſull, with the great good will and conſent of the whole aſſembly. It is reported that there neuer came ſuch a world of people to ROME, as were there at that time, not only for the aſſemblies ſake, but more to ſee P. Cor. Scipio. Wherefore, not the ROMAINES onely, but all the ſtrangers alſo that were there, all their eyes were vpon Scipio, and ſaid both openly and priuately: that they ſhould ſend him into AFRICK, to make war with the CARTHAGINIANS, at home in their owne country. Scipio alſo being of the ſame opinion, ſaid, that he would aske aduiſe of the people, if the Senate would be againſt ſuch a worthie enterpriſe. For amongeſt the peeres and Senators, there were ſome that vehemently inueyed againſt that opinion, and among the reſt, Fabius Maximus ſpecially, a man of great fame and authoritie. Scipio went forward with the matter, and thwarted him, and ſhewed many reaſons that there was no may to ouercome the CARTHAGINIANS, and to driue Anniball out of ITALY, but that only: and that all other counſels were in vaine, and vnprofitable. After this matter was long debated in councell, SICILIA was appointed vnto Scipio: and the whole Senate gaue him commiſſion to go with all his armie into AFRICKE, if he thought it meete and profitable for the common wealth. The decree of the Senate being publiſhed, euery mans minde ranne of ſo great enterpriſes, that they perſwaded themſelues AFRICKE was already their owne, and had great hope to end this warre. Howbeit Scipio ſaw it a hard matter to make his preparation for this iorney, becauſe of the pouertie of the common treaſure, and for lacke of young men: the flower and choyſe of the which was vtterly gone, by the former great loſſes and ouerthrowes Anniball had giuen them. Howbeit to ſatisfie euerie mans expectation of him, he made all the poſſible ſpeede he could, to prepare things neceſſarie for the warres. So diuers people of THVSCAN, and of the VMBRIANS, offered to helpe him to their beſt power: ſome of them gaue him timber to builde his ſhippes, others holpe him with armour, and others alſo furniſhed him with corne, and all other kind of victuals and munition for his armie. The ſhippes being built, and all the armie by ſea put in readineſſe, in the ſpace of fiue and fortie daies, a thing incredible to manie: Scipio departed out of ITALIE, and ſailed towards SICILE. But when he came to take muſter of his armie, he ſpecially choſe thoſe that had ſerued long time in the warres, vnder the conduct of M. Marcellus, the which were all eſteemed for very expert ſouldiers. And for the SICILIANS, he partly wanne them by courteſie, and partly by compulſion compelled them to giue him aide for the warre he tooke in hand, the which he ment to make in AFRICKE, when the time of the yeare ſhould ſerue for it. Among other things, it is reported that Scipio choſe out of diuers cities, three hundred young gentlemen of the nobleſt houſes of all the ſaide prouince, and commaunded them to meete at a certaine day appointed, euerie man with horſe and armor. Then comming at the day appointed, according to his commaundement: the Conſull bad them chooſe whether they would follow him in the warres of AFRICKE, or elſe deliuer vp their armor & horſe, to as many other ROMAINES as they were in nũber. So when they all prayed they might be diſmiſſed from the warre, Scipio appointed three hundred other young ROMAINES in their places, whom he had brought out of ITALY with him vnarmed, becauſe he would mount and arme them at the SICILIANS coſt, as in deede it chaunced. Afterwards, they did him great ſeruice in AFRICK, in many great battels. Now time was come on for Scipio to put his armie in garriſon for the winter time, when he came to SYRACVSA, taking order not only for the preparation of warre, but alſo for the affaires of SICILIA. There when it was tolde him by complaint of diuers, that there was a great companie of ITALIAN ſouldiers in that citie, who would not reſtore the ſpoiles which they had gotten in the warres, but kept them ſtill in their hands, notwithſtanding that the Senate had enioyned them by ſpeciall commandement to make reſtitution to the SYRACVSANS: he ſtraight compelled them by proclamation, to accompliſh the Senates commaundement. Whereby he wanne all the peoples hearts of SICILIA, and was reported to be a iuſt and vpright Conſull. In the meane time he was aduertiſed by Caius Lalius, that returned out of AFRICKE with great ſpoile: how king Maſiniſſa was verie deſirous of his comming thither, and that he inſtantly praied him he would come into AFRICKE, as ſoone as he could poſſible, ſo it were without the preiudice of the common wealth. Moreouer, that diuers nations and people of AFRICKE had the like deſire: who hating the gouernement of the Carthaginians, deſired nothing more, then ſome good occaſion to rebell. Nowe this iorney was not deferred through Scipioes fault or negligence, conſidering that ſuch a Captaine could hardly be found that was more carefull & diligent in his charge then he. Howbeit the affaires of Sicilia, and the oportunitie he had to recouer Locres againe, did hinder him that he could not bring his purpoſe to paſſe according to his minde. Furthermore, his Lieutenant Pleminius diſorder grieued him much: becauſe that hauing left him at Locres, he fell to all ſortes of inſolencie, as to defloure women, and to ſpoile the poore citizens: inſomuch that they being maruellouſly offended with theſe infinite troubles and villanies offered them, they determined rather to ſuffer all other things, then to be ſubiect to the gouernement of ſo vile & wicked a man. So the Ambaſſadors of Locres being arriued at Rome, and exhibiting their complaintes in open Senate of the great wrongs and iniuries Pleminius did them: the noble men tooke the matter ſo grieuouſly, that they made bitter decrees, not only againſt the ſame Pleminius, but alſo againſt P. C. Scipio himſelfe.

Wherupon Scipioes enemies hauing gotten matter enough to accuſe him, they were then ſo bold to affirme, that he was acquainted with the iniuries offred the Locrians, with the licentiouſneſſe of Pleminius, and with the rebellions of his ſouldiers alſo: and that he had ſuffred all theſe things more negligently, then became the office or dutie of a Conſull. They added thereto moreouer, that his army he had in Sicile was altogether vnruly & vnſeruiceable, and regarded not the ordinances of the campe: and that the Captaine himſelfe was careleſſe, and altogether giuen ouer to pleaſure and idlenes.

Q. Fabius Maximus, a great aduerſary vnto Scipio.

But aboue all others, Fabius Maximus was his heauy enemy, and ſo vehement againſt him in his words, that he exceeded the bounds of all modeſtie and reaſon, and thought good to call him preſently home out of Sicilia, and to diſmiſſe him of his charge. This decree was thought of all men very ſtraight, & extreame. Wherefore following Quintus Metellus counſell, the Senators appointed ten Ambaſſadors to go into Sicilia, to make diligent inquirie, whether the accuſations obiected againſt Scipio were true: and if they found him in fault, that then they ſhould commaund him in the name of the Senate preſently to returne into Italy. And on the other ſide, if they found that he was vniuſtly accuſed, and only through the procurement of his malicious enemies and detracters: then that they ſhould ſend him to his armie, and encourage him valiantly to go forward with this warre. So when the Ambaſſadors were arriued in Sicilia, after they had made diligent inquirie according to the articles of their commiſſion: they could not finde that Scipio was faultie in any thing, ſauing that he had too lightly paſſed ouer the wrongs and iniuries Pleminius had done vnto the Locrians.

Scipioes nature

For Scipio was very liberall in rewarding of his men, and exceeding curteous and mercifull alſo in puniſhing of them. But when they ſaw his armie, his ſhippes, and all his other furniture and munition for warre: it is reported that they wondred ſo much to ſee the great aboundance and good order taken for all thinges, that when they returned to Rome, they greatly commended Scipio, and reiecting all the accuſations of his accuſers, they did promiſe the Senate and people of Rome, aſſured hope of victorie. So when all theſe home troubles at Rome were taken away, there chaunced other outwarde troubles abroad that grieued him much.

King Syphax reuolteth from the Romaines.

For the Ambaſſadors of king Syphax came and tolde him that their maſter had made new league with the Carthaginians, & was become friend to Haſdruball, whoſe daughter he had maried: and therefore that he wiſhed him if he ment to do his country good, to make no attempt vpon Africk, for he was determined to reckon the Carthaginians friends his, & alſo to ſet vpon them who the Carthaginians account their enemies. Scipio quicklie returned the Ambaſſadors againe vnto Syphax, becauſe the effect of their comming ſhould not be blowen abroad in his campe: & gaue them letters, in the which he praied king Syphax, that remembring his league and faithfull promiſe, he ſhould beware he attempted nothing vnworthy the name of a Romaine, & faith of a king. Afterwards calling his men together, he told thẽ, that the Ambaſſadors of king Syphax were come into Sicile, to complaine of his long tarying, as Maſiniſſa had done before. Therefore he was to haſten his iorney to go into Africke, and therupon commanded all his ſouldiers to put themſelues in readines, and to prouide all things neceſſary for their iorney. The Conſuls commaundement being publiſhed through all Sicile, there repaired immediatly vnto Lilybea a multitude of people, not only of thoſe that were to ſaile into Africk, but of others alſo that came to ſee the fleete & armie of the Romaines: becauſe they neuer ſaw an army better furniſhed, nor ſet out with all things neceſſarie for warre, nor better repleniſhed with ſouldiers, then that. So Scipio, all things being readie, imbarked at Lilybea with ſo earneſt a deſire to paſſe ouer the ſea, that neither owers nor wind did content his minde. Yet he was brought in few daies ſailing, to the promontory or mountaine called faire, and there he put all his men a land. The newes of his arriual flying ſtraight to Carthage, all the city was preſently in ſuch an vprore, that ſodainly they ſounded the allarme, and garded the gates and wals, as appeareth by teſtimony of ſome in writing. For from M. Regulus time, vnto that preſent day, it was almoſt fifty yeares ſpace ſince any Romaine Captaine euer entred Africk with force of armes. And therefore it was no maruell though they were affraid, and grew to vprore. The name of Scipio did encreaſe their feare the more, becauſe the Carthaginians had no Captaine matchable with him. Haſdruball the ſonne of Giſgo had the name at that time of a luſty Captaine, whom they knew had notwithſtanding bene ouercome, and driuen out of Spayne by Scipio. Howbeit putting all the hope & ſafety of their coũtry in him, & in king Syphax that mighty king: they neuer left intreating the one, nor perſwading the other, to come & helpe the affaires of Africke, with all the ſpeed they could poſſible. So, whileſt they two were preparing to ioyne both their armies together, Annibal the ſonne of Hamilcar, being appointed to keepe the next country adioining to it, came againſt the Romaines. Scipio after he had deſtroied the country, & enriched his army with great ſpoile: he camped by the city of Vtica, to ſee if it were poſſible for him to win ſo noble and wealthy a citie, and being beſides ſo commodious for the warres both by ſea and land. At the ſelfe ſame time Maſiniſſa came to the Romaines campe, and was inflamed with a vehement deſire to make warre againſt king Syphax, by whom he had before bene driuen out of his kingdom & inheritance. Scipio, that had knowen him in Spayne, a young Prince of an excellent wit, and quicke and valiant of his hand: he ſent him to diſcouer the army of the enemies, before the Carthaginians could gather any greater power, and willed him to vſe all the deuiſe and meanes he could poſſible to intiſe Hanno to fight. Maſiniſſa as he was commanded, began to prouoke the enemy, and drawing him out by litle and litle, he brought him where Scipio lay with all his legions armed, looking for a good houre to fight. The armie of the enemies was now wearied, when the Romaines came to ſet vpon them with their freſh armie. Hanno at the firſt onſet was ouercome and ſlaine, with moſt of his men: and all the reſt fled, and diſperſed themſelues here and there, where they thought they might beſt ſcape. After this victory, Scipio returning backe againe to beſiege the city of Vtica: the ſodaine comming of Haſdruball & king Syphax, made him to leaue off his enterpriſe, for that they brought with them a great army both of footemen & horſemen, and came and camped not farre from the Romaines. Scipio perceiuing that, raiſed his ſiege immediatly, and came and fortified his campe vpon a hill, from whence he might go & fight with the enemy, and moleſt them of Vtica, and alſo keepe his ſhippes ſafe that rode at ancker. Howbeit the time of the yeare being come, that both armies were to diſpoſe their men in garriſons for the winter ſeaſon: he determined to ſend vnto king Syphax to feele his minde, and to make him leaue the friendſhippe of the Carthaginians if it were poſſible. For he knew wel it was his mariage with Sophoniſba, that through her flattering perſwaſions had brought him to that furie, that he had not only forſaken the friendſhip of the Romains, but alſo ment to deſtroy them, contrary to his faith and promiſe: and that if he had once ſatisfied the heate of his loue with her, he thought then he might be called home againe. Syphax hauing vnderſtoode Scipioes meſſage ſent him, he anſwered, that indeed it was time not only to leaue the league with the Carthaginians, but alſo to giue vp all thought of warre: and ſo promiſed, that he would be a good meane to make peace. Scipio gaue good eare vnto it, and caught holde of an excellent fine deuiſe. He choſe the valianteſt ſouldiers in his armie, apparelled them like ſlaues, and made them waite vpon the Ambaſſadours, and gaue them inſtructions what they ſhould doe. Theſe fellowes, whileſt the Ambaſſadors and king Syphax were in talke together about the articles and conditions of peace, and that the conſultation helde longer then it was wont to doe: they went and walked vp and downe through the enemies campe, to ſee all the wayes and entries into it, according vnto Scipioes inſtructions. After they had done this diuers times, they came again to Scipio. Truce was taken for a time, the which being expired, Scipio ſeemed to make preparation for wars, (as being out of hope of any peace) & to make his army ready by ſea, preparing engines of battery to returne to beſiege VTICA, as he had done before. He gaue out this rumor through all the country, to perſwade his enemies that it was true: howbeit hauing called the Captaines & pety Captaines of his army together, he made them priuy to his intent and enterpriſe. He told them that both the enemies campes lay not farre a ſunder, of the which, the one of them had all their tents & cabbins of wood: and the building of the other campe was all of reedes, ſo that they were both eaſie to be burnt. Wherupon hauing ſent for Maſiniſſa, & Caius Lælius to come vnto him, he gaue them charge about midnight to giue alarom vnto Syphax camp, & to ſet it a fire: and that he himſelfe on the other ſide, would ſet vpon the CARTHAGINIANS campe. They two obeyed Scipioes commandement, performed his will without delay, & came at the houre appointed them to aſſaile the NVMIDIANS camp, & ſo did ſet the houſes of reedes afire, which tooke fire in ſuch ſort, as the flame was immediatly round about the campe. The NVMIDIANS at the firſt, thinking the fire had come by misfortune, ranne thither ſtraight vnarmed to quench it. But when they found thẽſelues among the legions of the ROMAINES, and that there was nothing but killing downe right, ſeeing themſelues ſo compaſſed in on all ſides, they ſaw their beſt remedie was to flie. On the other ſide alſo, where Scipioes armie was: the CARTHAGINIANS campe was almoſt all burnt, and the enemies put to flight with ſuch cruell ſlaughter, that ſome writers affirme there were ſlaine that night about fortie thouſand men, aſwell CARTHAGINIANS as NVMIDIANS. This great ouerthrow & ſlaughter being caried to CARTHAGE, did put the citizens there in ſuch a feare and terror, that ſome thought beſt to ſend for Anniball out of ITALIE: and others gaue aduiſe to make peace with Scipio. Howbeit the BARCINIAN faction which was rich & wealthy, and altogether againſt the peace makers: they ſo preuailed, that they leauied a new power to beginne warre againe. King Syphax and Haſdruball, hauing leauied a great multitude of footmen & horſemen againe, renewed their armie ſooner then was looked for, and came againe to pitch their campe directly ouer againſt the enemies. Scipio hauing vnderſtanding of that, would not tarry, but determined to giue them battell, whileſt his men were in good heart, and willing to fight. So it chanced at the firſt, by the neereneſſe of both their campes, that there were certaine skirmiſhes: but in the end, the armies came to ioyne battell, and the ROMAINES fought with ſuch corage and terror, that at the firſt onſet, they made the NVMIDIANS and CARTHAGINIANS flie, & ſlew the moſt part of them. Haſdruball and Syphax ſcaped, by flying out of the ſlaughter. Scipio ſent Maſiniſſa and Caius Lælius with the light horſemen to giue them chaſe. Syphax being come into NVMIDIA, & from thence into his own realme & kingdome he leauied an army in haſte, of all ſorts of people, and came to meete with Maſiniſſa & Caius Lælius, and was not affraid to giue them battel. But it was a fond part of him, conſidering that he was nothing like ſo ſtrong as his enemy, neither for number of fighting men, nor yet in liklihood of ſouldiers. For neither the ſouldiers, nor Captaines of his army were matchable with the ſouldiers & Captains of the ROMAINES campe: and therfore king Syphax was eaſily ouercome by ſuch skilfull ſouldiers, & moreouer was himſelfe taken in battell, with many other great noble men, whõ Maſiniſſa would hardly haue looked for: & then they were brought vnto Scipio. At the firſt there was a maruellous ioy among thẽ, when it was told them that king Syphax ſhould be brought priſoner vnto the camp: but afterwards when they ſaw him bound, they were all ſory to ſee him in ſuch pitifull ſtate, remembring his former greatnes & regall maieſtie. For they called to mind how famous the name of this king had bin but a litle before, what wonderfull great wealth he had, & alſo the power of ſo great a realme & kingdom. Howbeit Scipio the ROMAIN Conſul, receiued him very curteouſly, and gently asked him what he ment to change his mind in that ſort, & what moued him to make war with the ROMAINS. Then the king remẽbring his former friendſhip and faithfull promiſe broken, he boldly told him, that it was the loue he bare to his wife Sophonisba, who only had procured him to deale ſo diſhonorably with the ROMAINS: howbeit, that he had ſo ſmarted for it, as all others might take example by him, and beware how they breake their promiſe. And yet, that this was a great comfort to him in his extreame miſery, to ſee that his mortall enemy Maſiniſſa was alſo taken with that frenzy & mad humor, wherewith he before was poſſeſſed. For after Syphax was ouercome and taken, Maſiniſſa went vnto CYRTHA, the chiefe city of the realme, the which he wan, and found Sophonisba there, with whom he fell in fanſie: who after ſhe had finely wrapped him in with her deceitfull flatteries and kindnes, he promiſed her alſo to deliuer her out of the ROMAINS handes: and becauſe he might the better perform his promiſe made, he tooke her to his wife, & maried her. When Scipio was informed of theſe things, it grieued him maruellouſly. For it was knowen to al mē, that Syphax was ouercome vnder the conduct, and through the ROMAINS meanes: and therefore all that was belonging to Syphax, was at the diſpoſition of the ROMAINES. Wherefore if Maſiniſſa had without Scipioes conſent, vndertaken to defend Sophonisbaes quarrell: then it appeared plainly, he deſpiſed the authority of the Conſul, and the maieſty of the people of ROME. Furthermore, his filthy luſt did agrauate his fault the more, the which ſeemed ſo much more intollerable, by how much the continency of the ROMAIN Conſul was the greater, the which Maſiniſſa ſaw daily before his eies, and might haue bene a patterne and example vnto him. For Scipio, beſides many other proofes and ſhewes of his vertues, in all places where he obtayned victory, he alwaies kept the women vndefiled, which were taken priſoners. So, Scipio being much offended with Maſiniſſa, (though he ſhewed it not before company) receiued him verie louingly at his returne to the campe: yet afterwards notwithſtanding, taking him aſide, he ſo ſharply reproued him, that he made him know what it was to obey a moderate, and alſo a ſeuere Captaine. Whereupon Maſiniſſa went into his tent and wept, & could not tell what way he ſhould take: howbeit ſhortly after, perceiuing that it was vnpoſſible for him to keepe promiſe with Sophonisba, which grieued him to the heart: he ſent her poiſon, & a meſſage withall, the which ſhe dranke immediatly, and ſo willingly made her ſelfe away. Furthermore, the CARTHAGINIANS after they had receiued ſuch wonderfull great loſſes & ouerthrowes, one after an other, perceiuing that their affaires were brought to ſuch a ſtraight and extreamity, that they were no more to looke after the enlarging of their dominions, but only to cōſider which way they might keepe their owne country: they ſent for Annibal to come out of ITALY. Who returning with great ſpeede into AFRICK, before he did any thing elſe, he thought good firſt to talke with P. Scipio about peace: either becauſe he was affrayed of the good fortune of this young man, or elſe for that he miſtruſted he could not otherwiſe helpe his countrey and common wealth, which he ſaw decaying, and like to be deſtroied. Wherefore a place was appointed, where they might meet according to his deſire: where when they were both met, they had long talke together about the ending of this warre. In the end, Scipio offred Anniball ſuch conditions of peace, that by them it appeared the ROMAINES were not weary of warre, and that Scipio him ſelfe being a young man, had better hope to obtaine victorie, then great deſire to hearken to peace. So, all hope of peace being ſet aſide, they brake off their talke, and the next morning two famous and worthy Captaines of the moſt noble nations that could be, prepared them ſelues to battel, either to giue or take away in ſhort time from their common weales, the ſeigniorie and Empire of all the world. The place where they imployed all their force, and where this famous battell was fought, as it is reported, was by the city of ZAMA: in the which the ROMAINES being conquerours, did firſt make the Elephants flie, then the horſemen, and in the end brake ſo fiercely into the footemen, that they ouerthrew all the army. It is reported, that there were ſlaine and taken by the ROMAINES, aboue forty thouſand CARTHAGINIANS. Annibal fled out of the fury of the battel, and ſaued him ſelf, though that day he had ſhewed him ſelfe like a valiant and famous Captaine. For at this battel he had ſet his army in better order then euer he had done before, and had ſtrengthened it, both with the commodity of the place, and reliefe beſide: and euen in the very fury and terror of the battell he ſo beſturred him ſelfe among his ſouldiers, that the enemies them ſelues did commend and praiſe him, for a noble Captaine. After this victory, Scipio meeting with Vermina king Syphax ſonne, that brought aide to the CARTHAGINIANS: he put him to flight, and came and brought his army to the wals and hauen of CARTHAGE, thinking (as in deede it fell out) that the CARTHAGINIANS would ſue to him for peace. For, as the CARTHAGINIANS before had bene very good ſouldiers, and ready to make warres: ſo were they now become timerous and faint hearted, ſpecially when they ſaw their Generall Anniball ouercome, in whom they chiefly repoſed all their hope and truſt, for defence of their countrey. Wherefore they being (as I haue ſayed) out of heart, ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Scipio, to pray him that according to his accuſtomed clemency he would graunt them peace. Now was great ſute made at Rome, to haue the gouernment of the prouince of Africke, and one of the new Conſuls made haſt to come and make warre, with ſuch charge and preparation as was meete for his dignity and calling: and therefore Scipio doubting that an other ſhould cary away the glory for ending of ſo great a warre, he was the better contented to yeeld to the Carthaginian Ambaſſadours requeſts. So, the capitulation of the articles of peace was offred vnto the Carthaginians, according to the conquerors minde: and beſides all other things, the whole fleete of all their ſhippes and gallies (in the which conſiſted much their hope) were taken from them. For when the whole fleete was burnt, it was ſuch a lamentable ſight vnto them all, that there was no other thing but weeping and lamenting through the whole city, as if Carthage had bene deſtroied and raſed to the very ground. For as ſome doe write, there were fiue hundred ſhippes burnt of all ſortes. Theſe things therfore ſhould make vs all beware of humaine frailtie, the which we often forget in our proſperity. For they that before perſwaded them ſelues to conquer the world, after they had wonne ſo many great battels and victories of the enemy, and in manner conquered all Italie, and ſo valiantly beſides beſieged the city of Rome: were in ſhort time after brought to ſuch miſery and extremity, that all their power and force being ouercome, they had left them no more but the wals of Carthage, and yet they were not ſure to keepe them, but through the ſpeciall grace and fauour of the enemy. After theſe things were done, Scipio by decree of the Senate, did not onely reſtore king Maſiniſſa to his realme againe, but alſo adding thereunto the beſt part of all king Syphax countrey, they made him one of the mightieſt kings of all Africke: and afterwards he gaue honorable gifts vnto euery man as he had deſerued. In fine, after he had ſet all the affaires of Africke at good ſtay, he brought his army backe againe into Italy: at what time there came to Rome a world of people, to ſee ſo great and famous a Captaine, returning from ſuch wonderfull great victories. So he entred into Rome with pompe of triumphe, Terentius Culeo following of him with a hatte on his head, becauſe that through his fauor and friendſhip he was taken out of bondage. Polybius writeth, that king Syphax was led in triumph: howbeit ſome ſay he died before Scipio triumphed. In deede diuerſe that did triumphe, ſome before him during the warres of the Carthaginians, & others afterwards in the wars of Macedonia and Aſia, they made greater ſhew of plate, both of gold and ſiluer in their triumph, and led alſo a greater number of priſoners: howbeit one only Annibal that was ouercome, and the glory of ſo great a war ended, did make the triumphe of P. Scipio ſo excellent and famous, that it farre paſſed all the gold and magnificent pompe of all others triumphes. For after Africke was conquered, no nation then was aſhamed to be ouercome by the Romains. For he made this prouince, as it were a bridge and open paſſage to encreaſe and enlarge the Empire of Rome, both in Macedon, and alſo in Aſia, and in other parts of the world beſides. Now Scipio (whom I may righty call African, after the conqueſt of Africke) being returned to Rome, hee lacked no temporall dignities nor honors. For in the councel holden for the election of Cenſors, although there were diuers others of the nobleſt houſes of Rome that ſued for that office: yet he him ſelfe, and AElius Petus were preferred before all the reſt, and after they were created Cenſors, they did gouerne in their office like good men, and with good quietnes. Afterwardes the Cenſors that followed them, did ſtill one after an other chooſe Scipio African Prince of the Senate: the which dignity was wont to be giuen to them onely, that obtained the type of all honor, through their great conqueſts and benefits done to their countrey. Shortly after, he was againe choſen Conſull with Sempronius Longus, the ſonne of that Sempronius whom Anniball ouercame in that great ouerthrow, at the battell by the riuer of Trebia. They two were the firſt (as it it reported) that deuided the noble men and Senatours from the people, in the ſhew place to ſee paſtime. This ſeparation was very odious to the people of Rome, and they were maruellouſly offended with the Conſuls for it: becauſe they tooke it, that increaſing the honour of the ſtate of the Senators, they thereby did diſcountenaunce and imbaſe them. Some ſay alſo, that

Scipio AFRICAN afterwardes repented him ſelfe that he had taken away the olde cuſtome, and brought in a new. At that time there fell out great variaunce betwixt Maſiniſſa and the CARTHAGINIANS touching their borders and confines. Whereuppon the Senate ſent Scipio thither with two other commiſſioners: who after they had heard the cauſe of their quarrell, they left the matter as they found it, and would proceede no further in it. And this they did, becauſe that the CARTHAGINIANS being troubled with ciuill warres at home, ſhould take vppon them no other warres abroade, neither ſhould haue leyſure to attempt anie alteration otherwiſe. For the ROMAINES had great warre with king Antiochus, and Anniball CARTHAGINIAN was there with him, who ſtill ſtirred vp the old enemies againſt the ROMAINES, and practiſed to raiſe vp new enemies againſt them, and in all things to counſell the CARTHAGINIANS to caſt amay the yoke of bondage, which the ROMAINS had brought them into vnder the title of peace, and to proue the friendſhip of the kings. Howbeit ſhortly after, the ROMAINES hauing obtayned victory, and driuen king Antiochus out of GREECE: they intended alſo to conquer ASIA: and therefore all their hope was in Scipio AFRICAN, as a man that was borne to end warres of great importaunce. Howbeit Lucius Scipio, and Caius Lælius were Conſuls, and either of them made ſute for the gouernment of ASIA. The matter being conſulted vppon, the Senate ſtood doubtfull what iudgement they ſhould giue, betwixt two ſo famous men. Howbeit, becauſe Lælius was in better fauour with the Senate, and in greater eſtimation: the Senate began to take his part. But when P. Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the elder brother of Lucius Scipio, prayed the Senate that they would not diſhonour his houſe ſo, and told them that his brother had great vertues in him, and was beſides very wiſe, and that he him ſelfe alſo would be his Lieutenant: he had no ſooner ſpoken the wordes, but the Senatours receiued him with great ioy, and preſently did put them all out of doubt. So it was ordayned in open Senate, that Lucius Scipio ſhould goe into GREECE to make warre with the ÆTOLIANS, and that from thence he ſhould goe into ASIA, if he thought good to make warre with king Antiochus: and alſo that he ſhould take his brother Scipio AFRICAN with him, becauſe he ſhould goe againſt Anniball, that was in Antiochus armie. Who can but wonder at the loue and naturall affection of Publius Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the which he firſt ſhewed from his youth vnto his father Cornelius, and afterwardes alſo vnto his brother Lucius Scipio, conſidering the great things he had done? For, notwithſtanding hee was that AFRICAN by name that had ouercome Anniball, that had triumphed ouer the CARTHAGINIANS, and excelled all others in praiſe of martiall diſcipline: yet of his owne good nature he made him ſelfe inferiour to his younger brother, becauſe he might haue the honour of obtayning the gouernment of that prouince from his fellow Conſull Lælius, that was ſo well beloued, and of great eſtimation. Lucius Scipio the Conſull brought great honour to his countrey by that warre, for that hee followed the ſound and faithfull counſell of his brother. For firſt of all going into GREECE, he tooke truce for ſixe monethes with the ÆTOLIANS, through the aduiſe of his brother AFRICAN: who counſelled him, that ſetting all things a part, hee ſhould ſtraight goe into ASIA, where the warre was rifeſt. Afterwardes alſo he wanne Pruſias king of BITHYNIA from Antiochus friendſhippe, who before was wauing vp and downe, doubtfull which ſide to take, and all through his brother AFRICANS meanes and practiſe. So the authoritie of the AFRICAN was very great, and all thoſe that would obtaine any thing of the Conſull, came firſt to the AFRICAN to be their meane and interceſſor. Now when he came into ASIA, Antiochus Ambaſſador, and Heraclides BIZANTINE, came vnto him to offer to make peace, and after they had openly told their meſſage, perceiuing that they could not obtaine reaſonable conditions of peace: they priuately talked with Scipio AFRICAN as they were commaunded, and practiſed the beſt they could to make him king Antiochus friend. For they told him, that Antiochus would ſend him his younger ſonne which he had taken, and furthermore that he would willingly make him his companion in the gouernment of all his realme, only reſeruing the name and title of the king. Howbeit P. Scipio, excelling no leſſe in faithfulneſſe and bounty, then in many other vertues, after he had aunſwered them to all other matters, hee told them, that for his ſonne hee would take him for a maruellous friendlie gift: and that for a priuate good turne,

Who can but wonder at the loue and naturall affection of Publius Cornelius Scipio African, the which he firſt ſhewed from his youth vnto his father Cornelius, and afterwardes alſo vnto his brother Lucius Scipio, conſidering the great things he had done? For, notwithſtanding hee was that African by name that had ouercome Anniball, that had triumphed ouer the Carthaginians, and excelled all others in praiſe of martiall diſcipline: yet of his owne good nature he made him ſelfe inferiour to his younger brother, becauſe he might haue the honour of obtayning the gouernment of that prouince from his fellow Conſull Lælius, that was ſo well beloued, and of great eſtimation. Lucius Scipio the Conſull brought great honour to his countrey by that warre, for that hee followed the ſound and faithfull counſell of his brother. For they told him, that Antiochus would ſend him his younger ſonne which he had taken, and furthermore that he would willingly make him his companion in the gouernment of all his realme, only reſeruing the name and title of the king.

Howbeit P. Scipio, excelling no leſſe in faithfulneſſe and bounty, then in many other vertues, after he had aunſwered them to all other matters, hee told them, that for his ſonne hee would take him for a maruellous friendlie gift: and that for a priuate good turne, he would do the beſt he could to requite him with the like. Howbeit, that he would counſell the king aboue all things to leaue of thought of warre, and to receiue thoſe offers and conditions of peace, which the Senate and people of ROME would offer him. Shortly after, Antiochus ſent P. Scipio his ſonne according to his promiſe: who (as it is reported) had bene taken priſoner from the firſt beginning of the warre, as he went from CHALCIDE, vnto ORICVM: or as other writers ſay, as he paſſed by in a pinnaſe. Yet ſome hold opinion, that hee was taken as he went to diſcouer the counſell of the enemies, and that he was then ſent againe vnto his father, lying ſicke at the city of ELEA. This great curteſie of king Antiochus was maruellous well thought of of the AFRICAN, and not without cauſe: for to ſee his ſonne after he had bene away ſo long, it did greatly lighten his ſpirites, and diſeaſed body. But P. Scipio to ſhew ſome token of a thankefull minde, prayed the Ambaſſadours that came vnto him, greatly to thanke king Antiochus for the exceeding pleaſure he had done him, to ſend him his ſonne. Afterwardes he gaue Antiochus aduiſe alſo that he ſhould not giue battell, till he vnderſtoode of his returne from ELEA to the campe. So Antiochus being perſwaded by the authority of ſo worthy a man, he kept cloſe in his campe for a certaine time, and determined to draw the warre out at length, hoping in the end that he might come to ſpeake with the Conſull, by the AFRICANS meanes. But afterwardes, the Conſull camping hard by MAGNESIA, did ſo vexe and prouoke the enemy, that the king came out to battell, and ſette his men in battell ray. It is reported that Anniball him ſelfe was preſent at the battell, being one of the Generalles for the king. So Antiochus being ouercome, and his army diſcomfited, perceiuing that there was no helpe in his affaires: he came vnto the AFRICAN, (who being newly recouered of his ſickneſſe, came to the campe within a litle after the field was wonne) and by his meanes obtayned of the Conſull to be contented to talke of peace. When Antiochus Ambaſſadours were come to the campe, and that they had humbly craued pardon in the behalfe of their king, and alſo prayed that they would giue them ſuch conditions of peace, as they beſt liked of: Scipio AFRICAN with the conſent of them all aunſwered them, that it was not the manner of the ROMAINES to yeelde to aduerſity, neither alſo to be proud in proſperity: and therefore that he now made him the ſelfe ſame offers and conditions of peace, which he did before the victory. That the king ſhould not meddle with EVROPE, that he ſhould ſurrender vp all he had in ASIA from the mountaine Taurus, vnto the riuer of Tanais: that he ſhould pay tribute twenty yeares together: that he ſhould alſo put in ſuch hoſtages as the Conſull would chooſe out: and that ſpecially aboue all the reſt, they ſhould deliuer Annibal CARTHAGINIAN vnto the Conſul, who was the only author and procurer of this war. But he, as we haue written in his life, perceiuing that king Antiochus army was ouerthrowen both by ſea and by land, eſcaped the ROMAINES handes, and went vnto Pruſias king of BITHYNIA. Antiochus hauing accepted the offers and conditions of peace, ſayd, that the ROMAINES vſed him verie fauourably, to ridde him of ſo great care, and to appoint him ſo ſmall a kingdome. For great kindomes, and ouermuch wealth which euery man coueteth, are full of great and ſundry troubles: inſomuch that Theocritus wordes are as true, as otherwiſe excellently written.

So when the mighty king of ASIA was ouercome, and that ſo great a warre was ſo eaſelie ended beyond all mens opinion: the Conſull L. Scipio returned to ROME, and made his entry into the citie, ſhewing a great and honourable triumphe. Hee alſo deſerued the ſurname of the prouince and countrey ſubdued by him. So that as his elder brother before was called AFRICAN, for that he had conquered AFRICKE: euen ſo was Lucius Scipio ſurnamed ASIAN, for conquering ASIA vnto ROME. And P. Scipio, through whoſe counſell his brother Lucius had brought his warres to happy end, he went not cleare without honour alſo. For ſhortly after, two noble Cenſors, *T. Q. Scipioes and Cornelians floriſhed, with ſupreame degree of honour: and the authority of Scipio AFRICAN was growen to ſuch height and greatneſſe, as no priuate man could wiſh to be any greater in a free city. Howbeit the ſecrete malice of wicked hearts, which could no longer abide this greatnes and authority, began at length to burſt out, & to light vpon thoſe that were the authors of ſo great things. For two Tribunes of the people, ſuborned (as it is reported) by Porcius Cato: they accuſed P. Scipio AFRICAN for keeping backe king Antiochus money, and becauſe he brought it not into the common chamber or treaſury. Scipio AFRICAN knowing his innocency, being called by the Magiſtrate, ſhewed him ſelfe obedient, and came into the market place with a bold countenaunce, and there made an oration, declaring what things he had done for the benefit and commodity of his countrey and common wealth. The reherſall of theſe things did not miſlike the common people that were preſent: becauſe he did it rather to auoide the daunger prepared for him, then otherwiſe for any vaine glory or oſtentation. Howbeit the Tribunes not being ſo contented, were vehement againſt him, and ſpared no iniurious words, but accuſed him as though he had in deede beene in fault, howbeit vpon ſuſpition, rather then of any due proofe. The next morning being commanded to come before them againe, hee appeared at the hower appoynted, and being well accompanied with his friends, he came through the whole aſſembly, and went vp to the pulpit for orations. When he ſaw that euery man kept ſilence, then he ſpake in this manner. I remember my Lordes, that on ſuch a day as this, I wan that famous victory of Anniball and the CARTHAGINIANS, and therefore leauing a ſide this contention, I thinke it good we go vnto the Capitol to giue God thankes for the victory. So he departed thence, and all the whole aſſembly followed him, not onely to the Capitoll, but alſo to all the other temples of the city, leauing the two Tribunes all alone with their Sergeaunts. That day was the very laſt date of all the AFRICANS good fortune, for the great aſſembly and multitude of people that wayted vppon him, and for the great good will they bare him. For from that day forward he determined to get him into the countrey, far from all ambition, and the company of people: and ſo went vnto LINTERNVM in a maruellous rage, that for reward of his ſo great ſeruice, and ſo ſundry benefites as he had brought vnto his countrey, he receiued but ſhame and reproach: or els, for that in deed being as he was of a noble minde, he thought it more honour willingly to giue place to his enemies, then to ſeeke to maintaine his greatnes by force of armes. So when the Tribunes did accuſe him of contempt, and that his brother Lucius did excuſe his abſence by reaſon of his ſickneſſe: Tiberius Gracchus, one of the Tribunes that was againſt the AFRICAN, tooke his excuſe (beyond all mens opinions) for good payment, and did ſo well defend Scipioes cauſe, ſometime honorably praiſing him, an other time alſo threatning his enemies: that the Senate afterwards thanked him very greatly for it. For they were maruellouſly offended for the great iniury they did him. Some doe write, that P. Scipio him ſelfe, before he went vnto LINTERNVM, did with his owne hands teare the booke his brother had brought vnto the Senate, to deliuer the accompt of his charge: and that he did it not for any deceit nor pride, but with that ſelfe boldnes of mind he had afore time vſed to the treaſurers, when he did againſt the law require the keyes of the common treaſure, to ſupply the preſent neede of the ſtate. Now ſome there be alſo that ſay, it was not the AFRICAN, but Scipio ASIAN that was accuſed before the Tribunes: and that Scipio AFRICAN was ſent in commiſſion at that time into THVSCAN. Who, vnderſtanding of his brothers accuſation at his returne to ROME, and finding his brother Lucius condemned, and the Sergeaunts wayting on him to carie him, being bound, into priſon: he was in ſuch a rage withall, that he reſcued his brother by force out of the Sergeaunts hands, and from the Tribunes of the people. And they report beſide, that Tiberius Gracchus one of the Tribunes, complayning firſt that the authority of the Tribuneſhip was troden vnder feete by a priuate perſon: he afterwardes letting fall all the malice and enuy he bare vnto the Scipioes, defended their cauſe, becauſe the Tribunes ſhould rather ſeeme to be ouercome by a Tribune, then by a priuate perſon. They ſayed moreouer, that the ſelfe ſame day the Senate ſupped in the Capitoll, he perſwaded the AFRICAN to let Tiberius Gracchus mary his younger daughter. This promiſe was no ſooner made, but P. Scipio comming home to his houſe, told his wife that he had beſtowed their daughter: Whereupon ſhe being angrie, told him again that he ſhould not haue maried her without conſent of her mother, though he could haue beſtowed her vpon Tiberius Gracchus. This anſwer liked Scipio maruellous well, when he ſaw that his wife was of his minde, touching the mariage of their daughter. I know it is thought of ſome, that it was attributed to Tiberius the ſonne, and to Appius Claudius his father in law. For Polybius, and other ancient writers affirme, that Cornelia, the mother of Caius and Tiberius Gracchi, was maried vnto Gracchus after the AFRICANS death. For Scipio AFRICAN was maried vnto AEmylia the daughter of L. Paulus AEmylius Conſull, that was ſlain at the battell of CANNES. By her he had two daughters, of the which the eldeſt was maried vnto P. Cornelius Naſica, and the younger vnto Tiberius Gracchus, either before, or after the death of his father. Now touching his ſon, there is litle mention made of him in writing, that a man may write of certainty to be true. We haue ſpoken of his yonger ſonne that was taken by king Antiochus, and afterwardes franckly ſent vnto his father: of whom notwithſtanding afterwards I finde no mention in writing, ſauing that ſome ſay he was afterwards Prætor, and that he came to this office by means of Cicereius his fathers Secretary. There appeareth in writing alſo, that the yonger AFRICAN was adopted by the ſonne of P. Scipio. Cicero in his book intituled Cato Maior ſayth, how weake (ſaied he) was the ſonne of P. AFRICAN that adopted thee his ſonne? And in his ſixth booke alſo de repub. AEmylius the father exhorteth Scipio his ſon, to follow iuſtice and piety, as his grandfather Scipio AFRICAN had done. And touching the death of P. Scipio AFRICAN, writers doe diuerſly varie: for ſome ſay that he died and was buried at ROME. And for proofe thereof they doe bring forth the monument that was ſette vp for him by the gate Capena, ouer the which ſtoode three ſtatues or images, two whereof were the images of P. and Lucius Scipio, and the third was of Q. Ennius the Poet. And ſurely that which Cicero wrote, ſeemeth to confirme it true: our Ennius, ſayed he, was maruellouſlie beloued of AFRICAN the great, & therfore it is thought that he was buried in Scipioes tomb. Other authors write alſo (and ſurely they agree beſt with the common report) that Scipio AFRICAN died at LINTERNVM, and that there hee was buried at his owne appointment: becauſe his country ſo vnthankefully acknowledging his ſeruice, ſhould do him no honor at his death: and that there they ſet him vp a tombe, and his ſtatue vpon that, the which afterwardes was blowen down by a tempeſt of wind, and the which Liuie him ſelf witneſſeth he ſaw. Furthermore, by CAIETA this Epitaphe was grauen in a plate of copper, ſet in a marble tombe.

Now touching the time of his death, hauing made great ſearch for it, I haue found in certaine Greeke Authors, that the AFRICAN liued foure and fifty yeares, and died ſhortly after. Furthermore, he was a noble Captaine, and worthy of all commendation for martiall diſcipline, and beſides excelled in all other vertues: the which did ſo delight his minde, that he was wont to ſay, he was neuer leſſe idle, then when he tooke his eaſe: neither more ſolitarie, then when he was alone. For ſome times he would withdraw him ſelfe out of the aſſemblie, and from all mens company, and thought him ſelfe ſafe when he was alone. The fame of his noble deedes was ſo great, that whereſoeuer he went, all ſorts of people would come and ſee him.

The common report went, that when he was at LINTERNVM, there came certaine rouers vnto him to ſee ſo famous a man, and to kiſſe that ſo faithfulll and victorious a hand. For vertue hath great force and power with all ſortes of people: becauſe it doth not onely make the good, but the euill alſo to loue and honour it.

THE COMPARISON OF Anniball with P. Scipio African.

NOW let vs compare Anniball and Scipioes deedes together, as touching their ciuill diſcipline. Firſt if we remember their deedes in warres, it is manifeſt that both of them haue bene great and famous Captaines in warre, and that they haue not onely bene comparable with the nobleſt Kings and Princes in their time (being alſo in that age when warres floriſhed moſt) but with thoſe alſo that were before their time. One thing maketh me wonder much at thē, that they hauing great and heauie enemies in their cōtry, (who ſought to ouerthrowe all their doings and enterpriſes) could poſſibly goe through with ſo great matters, and to obtaine ſuch happie and famous victories, in ſtraunge and forreyne warres. Therefore paſſing ouer all other matters, what a doe had P. Scipio, before he could obtaine to be ſent into AFRICK, to make warre with the CARTHAGINIANS? Fabius Maximus, and other noblemen of the citie being greatly againſt it? Againe, what enemie had Anniball of Hanno, who was prince and head of the contrary faction againſt him? Now they both hauing ouercome ſuch greate troubles at home, did notwithſtanding bring things to end worthy perpetuall memorie: not by chaunce as it hapneth vnto many, but through their induſtrie, great wiſedome, and counſell. So diuers do wonder greatly at Annibals courage and noble minde: who after he had ſacked the citie of SAGVNTVS, came boldly from the fartheſt part of the world into ITALY, and brought with him a great armie of footmen and horſmen, and came to make warre with a great ſtate and common wealth, the which his predeceſſors alwayes dreaded: and after he had wonne many battels, and ſlaine ſundry Conſuls and Captaines of the ROMAINS, he came and camped hard by the citie of ROME it ſelfe, and procured ſtraunge kings and farre nations to make warre with the ROMAINS. He that was able to do ſo great things as theſe, men cannot otherwiſe thinke of him, but that he was a great and valiant Captaine. Others alſo ſpeaking of Scipio doe greatly prayſe and commend him for the foure Chieftaines he ouercame, and for the foure great armies which he defeated, and put to flight in SPAINE, and alſo for that he ouercame and tooke that great king Syphax priſoner. In fine, they come to praiſe that famous battell in the which Scipio ouercame Anniball at ZAMA. For if Fabius (ſaid they) were praiſed, becauſe he was not ouercome by Anniball: what eſtimation will they make of the AFRICAN, that in a pitched battell ouercame that ſo famous and dreadfull Captaine Anniball, and alſo did end ſo dangerous a warre? Beſides alſo, that Scipio did alwayes make open warre, and commonly fought with the enemy in plaine field. Where Anniball in contrary manner did alwaies vſe craft & ſubtilty, and was full of ſtratagemes and policie. And therefore all Authors, both Greeke and Latine, doe count him very fine and ſubtell. Furthermore, they greatly commend Anniball for that he maintained his army of ſo ſundry nations, ſo long time in peace, as he had warre with the ROMANES: and yet that there was neuer any mutinie or rebellion in his campe. On the other ſide, they blame him againe, becauſe he did not follow his victorie, when he had ouercome the ROMANES at that famous battell of CANNES: and alſo becauſe he ſpoiled his ſouldiers with too much eaſe, and the pleaſures of CAMPANIA and APVLIA, whereby they were ſo chaunged, that they ſeemed to be other ſouldiers then thoſe that had ouercome the ROMANES, at the ſundrie battels of TREBIA, THRASIMENE, and CANNES. All writers do reproue theſe things in Annibal, but ſpecially his crueltie. For amongſt other things, what crueltie was it of him to make a woman with her children to come from ARPI to his campe, and afterwardes to burne them aliue? What ſhall a man ſay of them whom he cruelly put to death, in the temple of Iuno Lacinia, when he departed out of ITALY? For Scipio AFRICAN on the other ſide, if we ſhall rather credit the beſt authors that write, then a number of other detracters and malicious writers: we may ſay, he was a bountifull and temperate Captaine, and not onely liuely and valiant in fight, but alſo curteous and mercifull after victory. For oftentimes his enemies proued his valiantnes, the vanquiſhed his mercy and clemency, and all other men his faithfulnes. Now therefore, let vs tel you what his continencie & liberalitie was, which he ſhewed in SPAINE vnto a young Ladie taken priſoner, and vnto Luceius Prince of the CELTIBERIANS: doth it not deſerue great praiſe? Now for their priuate doings, they were both vertuouſly brought vp, and both of them imbraced learned men. For as it is reported, Annibal was verie familiar with Socillus LACEDÆMONIAN, as the AFRICAN was with Ennius the Poet. Some ſay alſo, that Annibal was ſo well learned in the Greeke tongue, that he wrote an hiſtory in Greek touching the deedes of Manlius Volſo. Now truly I do agree with Cicero, that ſayd in his booke de Oratore, that Anniball heard Phormio PERIPATETICIAN in EPHESVS, diſcourſing very largely of the office & dutie of a Chieftaine & generall, and of the martiall lawes and ordinances: & that immediatly after being asked what he thought of that Philoſopher, he ſhould anſwer in no verie perfect Greeke, but yet in Greeke, that he had ſeene many old doting fooles, but that he had neuer ſeene a greater doterd then Phormio. Furthermore, both of them had an excellent grace in their talke, & Anniball had a ſharpe taunting wit in his anſwers. When king Antiochus on a time prepared to make warre with the ROMAINS, and had put his army into the field, not ſo well furniſhed with armor and weapon, as with gold and ſiluer: he asked Anniball if he thought his army ſufficient for the ROMAINS? yea (Sir) ꝙ he, that they be, were the enemies neuer ſo couetous. This may truely be ſayed of Anniball, that he obained many great victories in the warres, but yet they turned to the deſtruction of his countrie. Scipio in contrarie maner did preſerue his countrie in ſuch ſafetie, and alſo did ſo much increaſe the dominions thereof: that as many as ſhall looke into his deſert, they cannot but call ROME vnthankefull, which liked rather that the AFRICAN (preſeruer of the citie) ſhould goe out of ROME, then that they ſhould repreſſe the fury and inſolency of a few. And for mine owne opinion, I cannot thinke well of that citie, that ſo vnthankfully hath ſuffered ſo worthy & innocent a perſon to be iniured: and ſo would I alſo haue thought it more blame worthy, if the citie had bene an ayder of the iniurie offred him. In fine, the Senate (as all men doe reporte) gaue great thankes vnto Tiberius Gracchus, becauſe he did defend the Scipions cauſe: and the common people alſo following the AFRICAN, when he viſited the temples of ROME, and left the Tribunes alone that accuſed him, did thereby ſhew how much they did loue and honor the name of the Scipoes. And therefore, if we ſhould iudge the Citizens hartes and good willes by thoſe things, men would rather condemne them for cowards, to haue ſuffered ſuch outrage, then vnthankefull for forgetting of his benefits: for there were verie few that conſented to ſo wicked a deed, and all of them in manner were very ſorie for it. Howbeit Scipio, that was a man of a great minde, not much regarding the malice of his enemies: was content rather to leaue the citie, then by ciuill warres to deſtroy it. For he would not come againſt his coũtry with enſignes diſplaid, neither would he ſolicite ſtrange nations and mighty kings to come with force, and their aide, to deſtroy the citie, the which he had beautified with ſo many ſpoyles and triumphes as Martius Coriolanus, Alcibiades, and diuerſe others did, by record of auncient ſtories. For we may eaſily perceiue how carefull he was to preſerue the libertie of ROME, becauſe when he was in SPAINE, he refuſed the title and name of king which was offered him: and for that he was maruellous angrie with the people of ROME, becauſe they would haue made him perpetuall Conſull and Dictator: and conſidering alſo that he commanded they ſhould ſet vp no ſtatue of him, neither in the place of the aſſembly, nor in the iudgement ſeate, nor in the Capitoll. All which honors afterwardes were giuen by the Citizens vnto Cæſar, that had ouercome Pompey. Theſe were the ciuill vertues of the AFRICAN, which were great and true praiſes of continencie. Now therefore, to deliuer you the ſumme and effect of theſe things: theſe two ſo famous Captaines are not ſo much to be compared together in their ciuill vertues (in the which Scipio chiefly excelled) as in the diſcipline of warres, and in the glorie of their famous victories. To conclude, their deathes were ſomwhat alike: for they both died out of their contries, although Scipio was not condemned by his contry as Annibal was, but would by voluntarie baniſhment dye out of the citie.
